THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to inquire into the Working of the APPRENTICESHIP SYSTEM in the COLONIES, the Condition of the APPRENTICES, and the Laws and Regulations affecting them which have been passed; and who were empowered to report their Observations thereupon, together with the MINUTES OF THE EVIDENCE taken before them, to The House;—HAVE examined the Matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following REPORT.

YOUR Committee commenced their Inquiry by examining the various Enactments, which have been passed in the Colonies by the Local Legislatures, affecting the condition of the Apprentices, with a view to ascertain the manner in which the intentions of the Imperial Parliament, as expressed in the Act of Emancipation, have been carried into effect. They soon found, however, that it would be impossible for them to go through the whole subject in a satisfactory manner during the present Session, and determined therefore to limit their investigation to Jamaica, in which colony alone they have obtained Evidence sufficiently complete to be fit for them to submit to The House, or to justify them in expressing any opinion. After having attentively considered the objections which had been urged against the Jamaica Acts, Your Committee proceeded to obtain such information as was within their reach, on the still more important questions connected with the practical operation and effects of the system of Apprenticeship, which might serve to throw light upon the provisions of the Laws which they had previously examined, or enable them to form a judgment of the present condition and future prospects of all classes of the Inhabitants of the Colony.

Upon the subject of the Laws which have been passed in Jamaica affecting the Apprentices, Your Committee have examined several Gentlemen of the Legal Profession whose attention had been directed to them. A very full and minute examination of the objections which have been urged against them will be found in the Appendix; especially in the Evidence of Mr. Jeremie; a reply to which is contained in that of Mr. Burge, the Agent for the Island. With reference to this subject, Your Committee would also call your attention to the Evidence of Sir George Grey, as affording an important addition to the information which has already been submitted to The House, of the views and conduct of the Colonial Office and of the Governor of Jamaica in this respect.

Your Committee are not prepared to express an opinion upon all the points which have been made matter of controversy, some of which appear to rest upon legal difficulties of considerable intricacy. They conceive that they shall best discharge their duty by calling the attention of The House to such questions alone as seem to them to involve substantial and practical consequences, as well as important principles.

The chief objections which have been taken to the Jamaica Laws, which appeared to Your Committee to require a more detailed notice, are the following:

1. The want of reciprocity in the amount and application of the penalties inflicted by the authority of the Special Magistrates on Managers and on Apprentices.

This objection, as far as regards the application, was noticed by Lord Stanley in a despatch of the 20th February 1834, commenting on the Jamaica Act, in which the following passage occurs:

“ The 49th clause enables the Special Magistrates to impose fines upon the parties entitled to the services of any Apprenticed Labourer for any wrong or injury which he may sustain from such parties.”

“ The 68th clause directs that these fines shall be applied to the use of the public of the island. As the Act has provided that the Apprentice should compensate by labour the loss which his Employer may sustain from indolence, neglect, non-performance of work, or absence, it seems but reasonable that the Special Magistrate should have the power of compensating, out of the fine, the Apprentice for the injury which he may have sustained from his Employer; and I think that a clause should be introduced to that effect.”

No such clause, however, was introduced into the subsequent Act passed by the Legislature of Jamaica, in pursuance of Lord Stanley's suggestions: and Lord Sligo appears to have concurred in the course adopted by the House of Assembly in reference to that subject

Your Committee are of opinion that, in theory at least, the objection is well founded; and they are not aware of any satisfactory reason for the omission of the clause recommended by Lord Stanley. No Evidence has, however, been submitted to them of practical evil having arisen from this defect, to warrant any further recommendation on this point.

2. The defective constitution of the Tribunal for the valuation of Apprentices applying to purchase their freedom.

With reference to this objection, Your Committee feel themselves bound to state, that a serious obstacle appears to have arisen to the fair and equitable operation of the process of compulsory manumission. It was clearly the intention of the British Parliament that the Apprentice should by law enjoy the right of having his services appraised at a fair value, at which he should be enabled to purchase his own freedom; nor can Your Committee suppose that the intention of the Jamaica Legislature differed in this respect from that of the British Parliament. They find, however, that undue and excessive valuations are alleged, on official authority, in many instances to have occurred; and they cannot but attribute this evil, in a great measure, to the constitution of the tribunal to which the valuation is by law confided, and which appears to them to give an undue preponderance to Colonial Magistrates. Although no valuation can take place in which the Special Magistrate does not concur, it is equally true that both or either of the Colonial Magistrates may, by adhering to a higher appraisal than that which the Special Magistrate thinks just, render the proceeding nugatory. They have reason, however, to believe, that the more common effect in such cases has been, that a value has been set upon the services of the Apprentice by a compromise between the respective Magistrates.

Your Committee find that this subject has formed the topic of much correspondence pondence between the Secretary of State and the Governor of Jamaica, by whom it was brought at an early period under the consideration of the Government. Instructions have consequently been at various times addressed to Lord Sligo, with a view to prevent the continuance of this evil; and he has recently been directed to suggest to the Legislature of Jamaica, such an alteration of the Law as is calculated to place the constitution of the tribunal upon a satisfactory footing. Your Committee cannot but express a confident hope that the Legislature of Jamaica will give a prompt attention to this recommendation, which Your Committee conceive that they are bound by good faith and every consideration of justice to carry into full effect.

3. The want of adequate protection to the Special Magistrates against vexatious prosecutions.

To the principle involved in this objection, Your Committee attach the utmost importance. They are of opinion that the beneficial working of the present system, and the full protection of the rights of the Apprentices, depend even more upon the Administration of the Law, than on the Provisions of the Law itself. They consider it of the greatest consequence that the independence of the Special Magistrates, in the discharge of their duty, should be effectually maintained; and that while they are subject to a vigilant superintendence on the part of the Executive Government, they should not be exposed to any well-founded apprehension of a want of due protection against vexatious prosecutions.

Two cases have been stated to Your Committee, in which Actions of Trespass have been brought against Special Magistrates for acts performed in their magisterial capacity, and damages were obtained; which, together with the costs of the action, it would be altogether beyond the means of the defendants to defray. In each case a new trial was expected to take place, and the final decision is not yet ascertained.

Your Committee deem it right to observe, that by an Act passed in Jamaica in 1834, usually termed the Act in Aid, a protection which was not comprised in the original Act was afforded to the Magistrates. This Act expired at the end of the year 1835, but has been subsequently re-enacted for a period co-extensive with the apprenticeship. The actions referred to were both tried during the interval when this Act was not in force, and its re-enactment may render it improbable that actions of a similar nature will hereafter be brought.

Your Committee have ascertained the intentions of the Government in both of these cases, in the event of the verdicts being ultimately sustained; the result will be, the effectual protection of the individual defendants from eventual loss; but should there be any repetition of actions against Special Magistrates, not appearing to rest on a solid foundation, Your Committee cannot think that the evil would be fully met by anything short of some Legislative Enactment, which would secure any Special Magistrate, acting bonâ fide in the discharge of his duty, from harassing and vexatious prosecutions. The Governor of Jamaica has been directed to bring this subject also under the consideration of the Legislature; and Your Committee abstain from any more specific recommendation on this point, in the hope that the measures already taken for checking the evil may prove adequate to the attainment of the object.

4. It has been urged as an objection against the Jamaica Law, that it contains no enactment to regulate the Distribution of the Time which the Apprentice is bound weekly to give to his Employer. The interpretation put upon the Law in this respect, in Jamaica, negatives the presumption of the legal right on the part of the Employer to exact from his Apprentice continuous labour to an unreasonable extent, and in practice nine hours appear to be the utmost amount of labour to which the Apprentices in Jamaica are subject in one day by compulsory process. Whatever time they may give to their Employer beyond this limit, appears to be by arrangement, and for remuneration mutually agreed upon. It is, however, universally admitted, that, subject to the qualification before adverted to, the Employer has the legal right to apportion the hours of labour: the result has been the want of uniformity in the distribution of the legal time. Two systems are prevalent in Jamaica, the one termed the Nine-hour System, by which the Apprentice works nine hours a day for four days in the week, and four and a half on the fifth day, having the half of the Friday and the whole of Saturday at his own disposal. The other is termed the Eight-hour System; by which he works eight hours a day for four days in the week, and eight and a half on the fifth.

From the Evidence which Your Committee have received on this subject, there appears to be no doubt that the former system is very generally and decidedly preferred by the Apprentices, as it leaves them a larger portion of time free from interruption at their own disposal, for the cultivation of their grounds, or for any other purpose. Your Committee are convinced that that system must prove most conducive to the interests of the Employers which will secure the most cheerful acquiescence on the part of the Apprentices; and they cannot but express their hope, that the example which has been set on many of the larger properties, of meeting the wishes of the apprentices on this subject, by an adherence to the nine-hour system, will be generally followed throughout the Island.

In connexion with this subject, Your Committee would observe, that they have examined into the discontinuance of certain indulgences which were usually granted to the negro when in a state of slavery, and which, it has been urged, are secured to him, in the same manner as the other allowances, by the Imperial Act, during the period of apprenticeship.

Although Your Committee do not feel warranted in putting this construction upon the Act, yet they conceive that it is to be regretted that these indulgences should in any case be withheld, as long as the Apprentice works in a proper manner for his employer, during the time which he is bound to give to him: unless indeed a compensation is given to him by an increased amount of wages for the extra labour which he voluntarily undertakes to perform; a plan which seems to have been adopted by Mr. Shirley upon his estates with equal judgment and humanity. It appears that these indulgences have been very generally continued to the Apprentice upon the larger properties.

5. Your Committee have felt it their duty to institute a strict inquiry into the alleged cases of Corporal Punishment inflicted on Female Apprentices. They found that this subject had engaged the close attention both of the local Government of Jamaica and of the Government in this country, and that measures had already been taken to prevent the recurrence of the violation of that most important enactment, contained alike in the Imperial Act for the Abolition of Slavery, and in the Jamaica Statute, which prohibits the infliction of corporal punishment on female Apprentices.

The result of Lord Sligo's inquiry upon this point, led to the discovery of many instances of a practice of this nature existing for offences against the discipline of the Workhouse in the Houses of Correction in Jamaica, not under the immediate control of the Executive Government, but subject to local regulations and superintendence. Your Committee are happy to observe that the legality of this punishment has in no instance been asserted, but that all parties in Jamaica have concurred in its being contrary to the enactment in the Abolition Act before referred to. In several cases prosecutions were instituted against the offenders by order of the Governor; in one recent case the party was convicted, and the illegality of the punishment thereby established. As, however, some doubt has been thrown upon the construction which may be placed on the Law in this respect, Your Committee are of opinion that it is essential that such doubt should be effectually removed. The attention of the House of Assembly of Jamaica has been directed to the subject, and as they had distinctly recorded their opinion of the illegality of this mode of punishment, Your Committee entertain the fullest confidence that they will not fail to take such measures as will prevent the possibility of the continuance of a practice at once contrary to Law and abhorrent to the best feelings of our nature.

In connexion with this branch of their inquiry, Your Committee feel it right to express their opinion, that the practice of working females in chains (of a light description it is true), when in the penal gang, is open to serious objection. Although it may be expedient and even necessary that female Apprentices should be sentenced in some cases to the penal gang, Your Committee consider that the labour and degradation involved in that punishment, would be a sufficient object of terror, without the addition of chains, and that the effect of this addition cannot fail to have an injurious influence on the characters and feelings of individuals. They are of opinion, that in the infliction of punishment, care ought to be taken to avoid anything which needlessly tends to lessen that self respect which, in the female character especially, it is of the highest importance to maintain, or, when it does not exist, to create.

6. Strong objections have been urged against the present state of the Law with regard to Marriages, which confines to clergymen of the Church of England the power of solemnizing the marriage ceremony. It appears to Your Committee to be of the utmost consequence, in such a state of society as now exists in Jamaica, that all ground for these complaints should be speedily and completely removed. They do not however feel it necessary to dilate upon this subject, as they find that the same view of it has been taken by Lord Glenelg, and they concur in the trust expressed by his Lordship in his Circular, of the 5th March 1836, to the Governors of the West India Colonies, that the Local Legislatures, "will promptly and diligently apply themselves to the work of maturing a liberal and comprehensive Law, dispelling all doubts respecting the validity of marriages already celebrated by the Missionaries, and removing all obstacles to their solemnizing such contracts hereafter amongst the members of their various congregations."

7. The present condition of that portion of the negro population which was under the age of six years on the 1st of August 1834, and is consequently free, has been forcibly urged upon the attention of Your Committee by several competent and respectable witnesses. It appears that there exists a general disinclination on the part of the parents of those children to suffer them to become Apprentices (a circumstance which Your Committee cannot but consider indicative of the just value which the negroes attach to freedom); that the means of education are provided for them in a most inadequate manner, and the consequence is, that they are growing up for the most part in ignorance and idleness. Your Committee need not dwell upon the great importance to the future prospects of the West India Colonies, that bad habits should not be formed in the minds of the rising generation, which are but too likely to become contagious. With a view to prevent so great an evil, Your Committee trust that the Legislature of Jamaica will take immediate measures (as they have stated their willingness to do) for the better encouragement of schools, which, independently of the peculiar case of the children who have been referred to, appear to be exceedingly wanted for the general use of the negro community; and in that event Your Committee hope that Parliament may feel disposed to contribute, in future Sessions, yet more liberally than they have already done, towards the attainment of this most pressing and momentous object.

Your Committee have thus commented upon the principal points which have been brought before their notice; and upon a general review of the Evidence which they have received, they conceive that they are warranted in expressing a belief, that the system of Apprenticeship in Jamaica is working in a manner not unfavourable to the momentous change from Slavery to Freedom which is now going on there. They perceive undoubtedly many traces of those evils which are scarcely separable from a state of society confessedly defective and anomalous, and which can only be defended as one of preparation and transition. But, on the other hand, they see much reason to look forward with a confident hope to the result of this great experiment. In the Evidence which they have received, they find abundant proof of the general good conduct of the Apprentices, and of their willingness to work for wages whenever they are fairly and considerately treated by their Employers. It is indeed fully proved, that the labour, thus voluntarily performed by the negro, is more effective than that which was obtained from him while in a state of Slavery, or which is now given to his Employer during the period for which he is compelled to work as an Apprentice. The mutual suspicion and irritation of the different classes of the community appear to be gradually subsiding, and on the part of the negro population, industrious habits, and the desire of moral and physical improvement, seem to be gaining ground. Under these circumstances, Your Committee feel bound to express their conviction, that nothing could be more unfortunate than any occurrence which had a tendency to unsettle the minds of either class with regard to the fixed determination of the Imperial Parliament to preserve inviolate both parts of the solemn engagement by which the services of the Apprenticed Labourer were secured to his Employer for a definite period, and under specified restrictions; at the expiration of which, he is to be raised to a state of unqualified freedom, and be governed by Laws framed in all respects on the same principle as those to which his white fellow-subjects are amenable.

Some of the objections taken to the Jamaica Legislation have been satisfactorily explained by further Evidence in the course of the Investigation, and do not, therefore, appear to require any specific notice. Upon other points which have not been satisfactorily explained, Your Committee have omitted to animadvert, because they believe that the attention of the Colonial Office and of the Governor of the Island has been, and that they trust it will continue to be, steadily and unremittingly, directed to every part of the subject. In conclusion, Your Committee would observe, that it appears to them to be most expedient, that such Enactments as are intended to come into operation after 1840, should, as much as possible, be delayed until that period shall arrive, and at all events be postponed until the time which more immediately precedes it.

MEMBERS PRESENT.

Mr. William Gladstone.
Lord Viscount Sandon.

Mr. Patrick Stewart.
Sir George Grey.
Mr. Plumptre.
Sir James Graham.
Mr. Thorneley.
Mr. Andrew Johnstone.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

John Jeremie and Joseph Beldam, Esqrs., called in; and Examined.

1. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] MR. JEREMIE, are you familiar with slavery as it existed for some years previous to its abolition?—For nearly 12 years I have been familiar with the Colonial system of labour, and I may say with slavery from the year 1824 to the year 1834; ten years.

2. Have you had any particular opportunity of directing your attention to slavery, and to the best modes of its abolition?—Various opportunities; when I was first appointed to the West Indies this question excited much interest, as the resolutions of Parliament, of March 1823, had been recently sent out to the Colonies to be carried into effect. On leaving England I was particularly required to turn my attention to those resolutions under directions from Lord Bathurst, and to prepare the measures requisite for introducing the ameliorations determined upon by the Government into the Island of Saint Lucia. In consequence I prepared a slave ordinance, which was subsequently submitted to Parliament, with the observations that appeared requisite upon it. In the year 1826 I was called upon to amend this ordinance by Lord Bathurst's Government. In the year 1828, on coming home, my attention was called to the question again, and I had to draw up a report to the Government upon the ameliorations which then appeared feasible, and upon the objections which had been made to those which were already introduced. Finally, on my going out to the Mauritius the last time, in the commencement of the year 1833, or the close of the year 1832, in consequence of the part which, under the directions of the Government, I had throughout taken in the question, I was particularly directed by Lord Goderich to turn my attention to the means of abolishing slavery, a strong feeling having been excited against slavery itself at the preceding election, which was just over; and I drew up a report, suggesting the apprenticeship system and other matters connected with it, which I transmitted to Government, and which arrived somewhere about the time that Lord Stanley's measure was introduced.

3. Chairman.] Were the directions you have spoken of as given by Lord Goderich in writing?—No, they were not; it was the last time I saw Lord Goderich; he told me, as I was going out, it was very desirable that I should turn my attention to that immediately, and I sent home these papers.

4. Have you any copy of the written plan which you say you drew up in consequence of those directions?—I have it not here, but it might be produced. I drew up a plan in the first place, and I next prepared the draft of an Order in Council that was intended to carry that into effect, the draft of an Act of Parliament, and the draft of another Order in Council respecting the distribution of the compensation to the different proprietors. I have only by me the report; the remainder, I suppose; are at the Colonial Office.

5. Mr.

*John Jeremie
Jos. Beldam, Esqrs.*

19 April 1836.

and
Jos. Beldam, Esqrs.

19 April 1836.

5. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] Did you then consider that the intermediate condition of apprenticeship was indispensable, in order to effect a safe transition from entire slavery to perfect freedom?—As regards the negro, certainly not; and I laid it down as a principle, that with regard to him it was not so; but as regards commerce and other political questions, I considered that it might be of use to pass gradually from a system of slavery to a system of freedom.

6. Chairman.] What do you mean by political?—The maintenance of public order particularly.

7. Do you not consider the negro population to be deeply interested in the maintenance of public order?—I understood the original question related to the moral condition of the negroes. The question put to me referred, I supposed, to the actual condition of the negro, and whether he was in a fit state to acquire perfect freedom. I considered, and still consider, that he was so; and that any attempt to improve his condition, as by instruction, which has been spoken of, will come much better after he is free.

8. You say you think that would come much better afterwards, than when in a state of slavery; how do you reconcile that with what you have stated, that the gradual emancipation of the negro appears to you to be desirable for the sake of public order?—In this sense, that when a power of control so important as that which the master possessed is removed, then, except a counteracting power be placed in the hands of the executive, and a system be organized sufficient to suppress disorder on the part of the persons previously coerced, it matters little whether they be negroes, soldiers, or any other body of men, whether West Indians or Europeans, disorder is likely to ensue; in short, whenever so large a body of persons, previously subject to control, are likely to be turned at once upon the community, then I conceive that the hands of the executive should be strengthened, and measures, which require time, be taken, to prepare the community for their reception.

9. Does not what you have now said, go to prove that, even with reference to the advantage of the negro population themselves, it was desirable that there should be some system of restriction placed upon them, before they were in a condition that was rendered one of complete freedom?—With regard to the negro population, taken as a part of the community, undoubtedly; but with regard to the population taken singly, which I understand to be the gist of the question, I have ever maintained that it was not requisite. The question that I answered in the first instance, I took to mean this, whether there was anything peculiar in the negro character, or in the condition of those colonies with regard to the negroes, which would render a measure unsafe there, that might have been adopted in Europe with perfect safety, assuming slavery to have existed here for any length of time.

10. You merely meant then, in answer to the observation, that the negro was only to be treated as a body of white men in similar circumstances might be treated, who were restored to a state of perfect freedom from slavery; that the same temperate precaution was desirable?—Undoubtedly.

11. Mr. O'Connell.] Then I understand you, that the restrictions upon the whole were to prevent their using violence?—I meant, that the restrictions should be such as would enable the executive to suppress violence whenever it occurred; I am rather more afraid, and ever have been, of the conduct of those who have lost influence, than those who have acquired it. I am so on general principles.

12. Mr. Gladstone.] Of the restrictions you desire to see enacted, a part might be restrictions upon the whole, and a part restrictions upon the negro?—Undoubtedly it might.

13. Then may I ask you, if that is your opinion, whether part of the restrictions which were to apply to the negroes, appeared, in your opinion, necessary for the benefit of the negro?—They appeared beneficial to the community generally, the negro forming part of that community.

14. As regards its application to the character of the negro himself, as considered distinct from the community, was it your opinion that the restrictions would be beneficial or otherwise?—Beneficial, so far as I considered them necessary, but I consider every restriction that is unnecessary an evil in itself.

15. Do you think then that it would be beneficial to the community, including the the negro, yet hurtful to the negro if considered apart from the community?—Clearly not; what is beneficial to the whole will be beneficial to part.

16. You then consider that restrictions would be beneficial to the negro?—I considered that it might be beneficial to the community of which the negro formed a part, and therefore indirectly to the negro himself as a member of the community.

17. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] You were of opinion then that an intermediate state was desirable; but having since seen some colonies in which that intermediate state has been interposed, and other colonies in which it has not been interposed, do you retain the opinion that it is desirable to have that intermediate state in all colonies?—As far as I have been able to ascertain, and judging only from the reports of others, if it be true that in certain colonies the experiment of free labour has worked so beneficially as is reported, of course the intermediate state is absolutely unnecessary; but of my own knowledge I can state nothing. My opinion arises from this; I felt there was much peril at the time in throwing so large a body of persons upon any community, without lodging a power somewhere sufficient to repress disorder. This was an emergency which, like all other emergencies, must be carefully met by the executive.

18. Then you are now of opinion that the apprenticeship is unnecessary?—To that extent; no more. It having been proved now, that the danger which was apprehended, does not exist, it follows, as a matter of course, that my opinion, so far as that goes, is considerably modified.

19. Are you acquainted with the Jamaica Acts passed to carry into effect the Imperial Act?—Yes.

20. Do they correspond in spirit with the Imperial Act?—May I be allowed to state how I have examined the Jamaica Acts, and what Acts I have examined; I have considered them carefully in their many important relations to the Imperial Act. The first Jamaica Abolition Act is the Act passed on the 12th of December 1833; the second, commonly called the Act in Aid, passed 4th July 1834, and which expired on the 31st of December 1835; and next the Act passed on the 22d of November 1834, which was subsequently disallowed. I have examined these and the Imperial Act with great attention, in company with two English barristers, my friends Messrs. Beldam and Matthews, and we have drawn up the result of our opinions after the fullest investigation. This duty was performed with some care, and our objections to these Acts were noted down whilst we were still together, on each occasion of our meeting. They have been, many of them, embodied in a memorial subsequently addressed to the Government. I conceive, perhaps, that it would be more agreeable to the Committee to lay before them our observations as they were noted at the time; and I think I can state, though there may be mistakes in matters examined, even with scrupulous care, that upon the whole I can answer for the accuracy of these observations.—[Handing in a paper, vide Appendix No. 1.]—Mr. Beldam.] Perhaps I may be allowed to observe, as my name has been mentioned in connection with the examination of these Acts, and as my friend Mr. Jeremie has put in a document which is a joint document, that I have subsequently examined these Acts alone; and therefore, when I am called upon, I shall be prepared to put in another document, in which I have considered these Acts more minutely than I did with my friend Mr. Jeremie. I have taken other points which appear to my mind material, and which I shall most humbly submit at a proper time.

21. Chairman.] You had better hand in the documents now. [Mr. Beldam handed in the documents; vide Appendix No. 2.]

22. Sir George Grey.] I wish to know whether the observations you have made in those papers are with reference to the Jamaica Act, or made upon a comparison of that Act with the Imperial Act; or whether those observations relate generally to the regulations which you conceive ought to be made as affecting the negro population?—In some respects to both, but most particularly the first. In my examination of those two Acts, I have taken the Imperial Act for the purpose of contrasting the enactments with the Jamaica Act. Mr. Beldam.] Perhaps the Committee will allow me to read the first clause of my analysis in order to explain it: “The object of this analysis is to compare the provisions of the Imperial Act of Abolition with the various Orders in Council, Ordinances, Acts, Provisions, Rules and Regulations, which have been made and passed for the purpose of carrying it into practical practical operation in the Colonies, and to suggest such amendments in the colonial provisions as may produce a closer correspondence between them and the Imperial measure." Mr. Jeremie.] Perhaps it may be as well for me to observe, that at the period I undertook this duty, I was out of office; and that immediately I became a candidate for office again, I gave up the investigation. Mr. Beldam.] Perhaps it may be also necessary for me to state, that I appear here as an independent person; certainly considerably interested in the question, but impartial; a barrister of ten years' standing at the bar; and being interested in the question, I have volunteered my evidence, with a view to the general interest of the country and the rights of the parties who are involved in the decision of it. I have volunteered my investigations, not only on the Jamaica laws, but on the whole of the West India laws which have been submitted to me; but I appear here as an independent person, unconnected with any individual, to give my unbiassed testimony upon the subject.

23. Mr. O'Connell.] By interested, you mean not having any other interest than that of feeling and judgment?—No other than that of feeling and judgment.

24. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] With reference to the 16th clause of the Imperial Act, does it appear to you that adequate provision has been made by the Colonial Legislature for the protection of apprentices in the several points enumerated?—Mr. Jeremie.] Assuredly not, on many points.

25. In what respect is the Jamaica Act defective?—First, as regards the manner, form, and solemnities, in which the discharge, by purchase, of any apprentice-labourer from his apprenticeship may be effected; in other words, with regard to the compulsory manumission clauses, I consider it must be, in practice, very defective. These, I may be perhaps allowed to say, I have ever viewed as among the most important enactments of the whole; yet I regard them as completely vitiated in practice; or rather I should consider them, practically, very nearly so. I consider them so, in this respect, particularly, that the appraisement is placed, by the Jamaica Act, in the hands of one special, and two ordinary Magistrates; so that, in truth, the labourer is to be appraised by persons having a direct interest in enhancing his value when estimating his qualifications. I allude more particularly to this point, because those who are acquainted with, or who have followed up the West India controversy, as the duties of my office required that I should do, are perfectly aware that this question was mooted, over and over again, in the course of that controversy, the practical difficulties having been repeatedly brought under the consideration of the Government; more especially in the celebrated Trinidad case, the case of Pamela Munro. Upon that occasion two arbitrators, who had an interest in slavery, had set what appeared an exorbitant value upon this person, and the question which came to be submitted to the Government, was, whether the actual value of Pamela Munro, as she, or a slave of her description would sell in the market, was a fair price for her? Was this the price at which she ought to be appraised, or should an ideal value be added, owing to her being attached and forming part of a plantation? And I always considered the decision arrived at (certainly in the colony where I then held office) was, that the value, the marketable value, of the slave, was alone to be considered on that, as on all other occasions. Now, I conceive all the evil consequences that arose in the case of Trinidad must again arise in the case of Jamaica; and indeed it would appear that an ideal value had been already added to the intrinsic value of the services appraised, such ideal value being estimated, not by the actual value of the slave alone, but by the additional loss inflicted upon slavery by the act of emancipation itself. I had this declaration from an authority which I consider unquestionable; the gentleman will be submitted to examination in the course of this investigation, as I saw him (he has published the fact) in the next room this morning. Now, I have ever considered that the great advantage of the system of apprenticeship arose from this, that by means of the principle of compulsory manumission, slavery would gradually merge into a state of freedom; that there would be no sudden change, and that, at the expiration of the term of the five years, or of any other given period, the apprenticeship would have disappeared of itself; principally so by means of arrangements between the proprietor and the negroes; but if a value of this kind is to be put upon the negro, a rule perfectly different from any which is adopted in any other case of appraisement, then, to that extent, the purpose of the Legislature seems to be completely defeated. I took great pains with this part of the subject in the drafts of ordinances which accompanied my report, for my principal dread has ever been, a sudden change; but unhappily, by means of this ideal appraisalment, a change will take place, at the end of seven years, nearly as sudden as if slavery had been abolished in an hour! Mr. Beldam.] The clauses I object to on this subject are from the 9th to the 13th, in the first Jamaica Act. I object to them, not only for the reason which has been assigned by my friend, Mr. Jeremie, namely, the appointing two out of the three arbitrators from among the ordinary magistrates, whom we may therefore presume to have been interested in enhancing the price of the slaves to be manumitted, but because there is nothing inserted in the Jamaica clauses to direct the minds of the arbitrators or appraisers as to the principle upon which the valuation should be made. Understanding, as I do, that there was a valuation made of slaves throughout the colonies before the Act of Abolition came into operation, it appears to me, that that valuation ought to be applied to all purposes subsequent to its coming into operation; and therefore it should not be competent to any justice to put any other valuation upon the negro to be manumitted under this clause, but what would be a proportion of the valuation so fixed by the colonists themselves previous to the Act coming into operation. For these reasons I agree, with my friend, Mr. Jeremie, in the objection he has taken; but I think there is another objection, and it is this: That neither the first Jamaica Act, nor the second Jamaica Act, have provided for all cases of compulsory manumission. In the first Jamaica Act no provision whatever is made to compel trustees and persons possessed of limited interests in apprentices to discharge them. In the second Jamaica Act, clauses 3 and 4, provision was made to remedy this omission, but not sufficient; even that was defective, for even there no provision was made for a case in which the owner was unknown, or happened to be absent from the colony, a case which very frequently occurs, and which, therefore, ought to be provided for. The amending clause is certainly beneficial, but the law appears to me to be still both defective and repugnant to the Imperial Act.

19 April 1836.

26. Sir George Grey.] You stated that the provisions of the Jamaica Act, respecting compulsory discharge, were in your opinion completely vitiated?—Mr. Jeremie.] I rather think I qualified it.

27. You stated that the provisions of the Jamaica Act, in respect to compulsory discharge, were in your opinion completely vitiated, and that the principles of the British Act are in a great measure vitiated?—I first made use of the word “completely,” and afterwards I used the words “very nearly,” as a modification of the first passage in my reply; I also added “vitiating in practice.”

28. Do you found your opinion upon your practical knowledge of cases in which valuation has taken place, and apprentices have been unable to pay, or merely upon the provisions of the Act, and the effect which they appear to you calculated to produce?—I found it on both; I found it upon the provisions of the Act as explained, and next on my own experience, as president of a Court through which compulsory manumissions were effected for many years under the old system.

29. I am speaking of Jamaica?—No; as to practice there, that is utterly impossible.

30. But with respect to Jamaica, have you a practical knowledge of a numerous class of cases, in which valuation has been, in your opinion, ideally high, and the compulsory discharge consequently has not taken place?—I have information, but I have no personal knowledge of it, therefore I should say I have none.

31. Have you seen the list of the valuations which have been made, and the amount of them?—I have heard some mentioned, and particularly I might allude to Dr. Madden's work, and to information received from other sources, but I have not information to induce me to say that I have a practical knowledge on that point.

32. You have never seen a complete list?—I will not answer for that information personally. Mr. Beldam.] Perhaps I should state that I have no practical knowledge upon the subject, never having been in the colonies, and having derived my information solely from those who have been there; I have however treated this subject as a question of solemn compact between the two parties; here is the Imperial measure which certain other legislatures are bound to carry into effect, and my single question has been, whether in point of fact the Imperial measure has been carried into effect. In reporting therefore upon these clauses, I state what appears to me to be their legal effect, and I feel convinced that they do not carry into effect either the spirit or design of the Imperial Act.

33. Mr. Gladstone.] The information therefore on which your opinion is formed, has reference to cases of compulsory discharge in colonies other than Jamaica, and to returns for a period preceding the abolition of slavery?—Mr. Jeremie.] It goes to this, that enactments in substance similar to that of Jamaica, have led to the requiring prices so exceedingly high, that the Act was, in practice, so long as these enactments continued, absolutely void.

34. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] That it might be rendered so?—That it might be rendered so in practice.

35. But you have not evidence that this opportunity to raise the price of slaves ideally high was taken advantage of in Jamaica?—I cannot supply evidence upon that point, therefore I must say I have not.

36. Mr. O'Connell.] If I understand you, it is thus; that similar enactments have led to appraisements much heavier than would have occurred had such enactments been passed in more specific terms?—Yes, whenever they were introduced.

37. Sir George Grey.] Did the enactments previous to the abolition of slavery, then, require that special judges, unconnected with the colony, should be a party to the valuation, the evidence upon which the opinion of the valuers was to be founded being upon oath?—The arbitrators were always sworn under the old system, and the particular course adopted in the Crown colonies, at least at St. Lucia, was this: the proprietor named one, the protector named another individual, and then there was a third arbitrator, named by the two parties or by the court; by the Chief Justice, who could not be a slave-holder.

38. Lord Sandon.] And under that system, did you find that any fraudulent appraisement was made?—Occasionally I even then found that very high appraisements were made, but still not to the extent to which they might be carried under an enactment such as this.

39. Then you apprehend that, according to the Jamaica enactment, the extravagant appraisements first alluded to are not likely to take place?—They are likely to take place.

40. Then the method which is now introduced, with regard to appraisement, is not so extravagant?—It is rather the reverse; I observed that, even in taking every precaution, still in communities such as these, the appraisers being necessarily selected from among the free class, there was always a bias and a tendency rather to enhance than diminish the price of negroes, and therefore the more defective the enactment, the greater this bias or tendency.

41. Then you consider the enactment more defective than that which has been used, with regard to other appraisements which you consider so much above the value?—I consider it precisely open to similar objections to that other system where appraisements were so exorbitant.

42. I thought you said that in no case where there was a person in the character of a special justice, whose consent was requisite to the sale?—In the character of a special justice, his consent is not requisite to the appraisement, but the special justice is one of three selected.

43. Mr. O'Connell.] Can you point out the difference in which you think the system worse than that of which you spoke before?—Undoubtedly.

44. Be so good as to state in what you deem it worse?—From the circumstance that the appraisement must be made by one special and two ordinary magistrates, and therefore the one will be overruled by the two; but this one alone is unconnected with slave property; the others must have, in most cases, an interest in it, direct or indirect.

45. Is it the award of the majority, or must the three concur; or is the award of the majority sufficient?—I consider the award of the majority sufficient. Mr. Beldam.] To avoid all mistakes as to the form in which an opinion has been expressed, I think it right to state, that in the Jamaica Act, the words "ordinary magistrate" are not employed, though the context, and the spirit of the clause evidently imply that he must be an ordinary magistrate, as contradistinguished from a special magistrate; but the word "ordinary" or "common" is not employed. There can be no doubt that the clause intends one special justice and two ordinary justices; justices; wherever the word "special" is not employed, I believe the clause intends the ordinary magistrate.

46. Mr. O'Connell.] At all events, it is not compulsory to have more than one special magistrate?—No.

47. Mr. Gladstone.] You used the expression that there must be two who are necessarily connected?—I consider that every person who carries on business in these colonies must be in some way, directly or indirectly, connected with slaves; if he is a merchant, he is indirectly connected; if he is a planter, he is directly connected; if he is a manager or attorney, he is equally so; if a barrister he runs the risk of losing his practice if he renders himself unpopular; and therefore I consider that all persons, except public officers and a few others, but particularly excepting special magistrates, will be connected more or less with that which is the staple of the country.

48. Are you aware what the law in Jamaica was previous to the abolition of slavery, with reference to compulsory manumission?—It did not exist in any shape.

49. Sir George Grey.] No slave could demand his manumission?—It was not a right.

50. Mr. Gladstone.] Consequently, if there was no right whatever of compulsory manumission previous to the abolition of slavery, and if there is now a right established, although subject to the condition which you consider as ill-judged, there has been an improvement with respect to compulsory manumission as compared with that of the previous Jamaica law.—Most unquestionably, I do not mean to deny that this Act contains many very valuable enactments, as compared with the old law, but there are three ways of examining it; first, with reference to the old law, and there these regulations are certainly, taking them generally, an improvement upon it; next, with reference to the Imperial Act, and there they fall below it (and that, I conceive, is the right way of examining this Act; that is the proper test); and, thirdly, with regard to my own views of apprenticeship, as it might have been rendered, when it falls far below them indeed. Mr. Beldam.] It is not pretended there are not improvements in many of the particulars introduced into the Act; but the question appears to be, whether or no this particular clause did carry into effect the intention of the Imperial measure, which was to enable any negro to obtain compulsory manumission upon the terms mentioned in the Imperial Act, that is, upon equitable terms.

51. Then the information you convey to the Committee is, the system of appraisement in Jamaica is worse than it was before?—No, not in Jamaica; but worse than I conceive it was intended to be rendered at the time the Imperial Act was framed.

52. Mr. O'Connell.] And worse than the particular appraisement which you have mentioned in the other islands?—Yes; and that is the inducement to believe, that if not absolutely contrary to the letter of the Imperial Act, it does not amount to what was contemplated by the Government at the time of framing the Act; my reason is, that at that time all these questions had been mooted, and a decision solemnly come to by the Government, and therefore I infer, that as that Act was intended to confer additional advantages upon the negro population, it never could have been the intention to withdraw that advantage which, on mature deliberation, it had been previously determined they should possess.

53. Sir George Grey.] Can you specify any discrepancy between the portion you have been speaking of and the enactments of the Imperial Act?—The Imperial Act requires that certain regulations should be framed and established "for determining the manner and form in which, and the solemnities with which the purchase by any such apprenticed labourer, of his or her discharge from such apprenticeship, without or in opposition, if necessary, to the consent of the person or persons entitled to his or her services, shall be effected; and how the necessary appraisement of the future value of such services shall be made; and how and to whom the amount of such appraisement shall in each case be paid and applied; and in what order the form and by whom the discharge from any such apprenticeship shall thereupon be given, executed and recorded." Now, looking upon the Imperial Act as a remedial measure, I consider that it was not only intended by this clause to give to apprentices in all cases the right to purchase manumission, with or without their owner's consent, but that all that was left to the colonial legislature to perform, was to decide as to the formalities which should be observed on such occasions,

occasions, and there being no express provision afterwards inserted as to the principle upon which their appraisements were to be made, I take it for granted, that it was intended to be a fair and equitable method of appraisement, and that nothing short of what was equitable and fair could have been contemplated by the Imperial Act, or would (as I should have supposed) have been allowed to exist in the Acts of any other legislature. But if it be true that by this Act two in three of the appraisers are interested in enhancing the value of the thing appraised, and it is a principle of human nature that a man's conduct will be generally conformable to his interest, however pure his motives, then I conceive that such an enactment could never have been contemplated by the Imperial Legislature; in short, an equitable mode of appraisement was alone contemplated, and the mode provided by the Jamaica Act is not, in my opinion, an equitable one.

54. Lord Sandon.] Then your objection to the enactment is to the spirit and not the letter of the Imperial Act?—Mr. Beldam.] The repugnancy applies to the spirit of the Act; I think it quite an inequitable mode of appraisement, and I have another objection to the clause, namely, that it is defective, inasmuch as it omits various classes of owners, so that in certain cases a negro cannot, if he had a mind, under any circumstances, obtain compulsory manumission.

55. Sir George Grey.] I should like to look at the clause you specified?—Mr. Beldam.] I have already read them, but I will read them again; the first Act omits altogether trustees and other persons possessed of limited interest.

56. Mr. O'Connell.] As to the right of somebody else; limited interest is quite a different thing.—Mr. Beldam.] Suppose, for instance, a proprietor absent in this country; and the word "other" applies to persons possessed of life estates, and various other kinds of limited estates, a numerous class, not provided for in the first Act.

57. My objection is to the use of the word "other" after trustees; the trustees and other persons having a limited interest?—Mr. Beldam.] That is merely a verbal error.

58. But looking at that clause, are there any persons still subject to that observation?—Mr. Beldam.] There are various persons; for instance, cases in which owners are unknown, or absent and unrepresented.

59. Sir George Grey.] Are not the cases in which they may be absent from the colony provided for by the 9th section of the first Act; do not you think that the agent of an absent proprietor is competent to act under that clause?—Mr. Beldam.] It appears to me, that does not necessarily include all the cases; but if there be any ambiguity, that would be sufficient for me to take an objection.

60. State in what respect the agent would not be a competent person to represent the owner?—Mr. Beldam.] I doubt whether an agent would be a competent person to perform such a part in case of the absence of the proprietor from the colony; and, although under the equity of such a clause, he might be let in to do so, I do not think that the law of the colony could compel him to do so; but the circumstance of a doubt being raised as to the power or right to do so would be an objection to a provision applying to so many cases of parties who are desirous of obtaining manumission.

61. Do you happen to know, in point of fact, that any case has occurred of an agent refusing to act for an owner under these circumstances?—Mr. Beldam.] I do not know any such case; I have already stated, that I look at the law as it is in the letter before me, and I do not consider that the absence of any practical grievance would exempt a commentator from the necessity of taking objections; I should think, for instance, that no humane conduct on the part of the functionary or person entitled in law to the services of the apprentice, would make the law itself good, if it were in its provisions defective. Mr. Jeremie.] My particular objection to the word "agent" is, that this is an alienation of property, and I should have my doubts as to the power, and especially the willingness of all agents to undertake a duty of the kind; for instance, take a mere overseer of an estate, entrusted with its superintendence only, or the mere daily care during a short absence, would he feel inclined to act under circumstances of that kind, even though it may be said there is little doubt as to his authority as an agent under the Act, for the words are "representative or agent." Then again, in some islands in the West Indies where life is so exceedingly short, for instance in St. Lucia, there have been properties without an agent for years together.

62. Sir

and
Jos. Beldam, Esqrs.

19 April 1836.

62. Sir George Grey.] It is desirable, in considering the effect of the Jamaica Act, to confine ourselves to the Jamaica practice?—Then I know nothing of it. Mr. Beldam.] There is an exception still to the clause, namely, as to owners unknown; however the objection as to agents may be disposed of. There are some colonial Acts, in which an express provision is made for the absence of proprietors, which certainly appears to raise a doubt as to whether, in case of the absence of such an express provision here, the agent would be authorised to represent the proprietor: in other colonial Acts the provision is made.

63. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] Would an agent empowered to act in general cases, consider himself entitled to act in peculiar cases?—Mr. Beldam.] In general cases I think not.

64. Sir George Grey.] Are you perfectly acquainted with the practice of Jamaica, and with the duty of an attorney for an absent proprietor?—Mr. Beldam.] I am not perfectly acquainted with them; I took objection to the absence of an express provision.

65. Mr. O'Connell.] You said something about the Act being remedial; would not the word "agent" in a remedial Act, include every description of agent?—Mr. Beldam.] Every agent, perhaps, who is fully invested with an agent's authority.

66. Would it not extend to a limited agent, as being remedial?—Mr. Jeremie.] To agents for estates; to any agent connected with the property, I should think it would. Mr. Beldam.] I am asked whether this question materially affects the planter, and whether any objection has been taken by an agent to the want of power; the negro, I should think, would be the person most likely to complain.

67. Sir George Grey.] Do not you think, with the feeling which has been excited in Jamaica, if that had been a fair and reasonable objection, that it is probable it would have been taken before this time by some Jamaica agent?—Mr. Beldam.] I do not know how probable it may have been; but I know many other objections have not been taken in other cases which appear to me to be exceedingly important.

68. Mr. O'Connell.] It may very well occur that several years would elapse before any such point would arise?—Mr. Beldam.] Yes.

69. And again, it is only the negro who would have a right to complain if the proprietor refuses to appoint an agent?—Yes.

70. Mr. Gladstone.] Can you point out to the Committee how it would be possible to frame a clause in more comprehensive words than it is at present?—Mr. Jeremie.] Yes, I think I can; in some parts of the West Indies, or at least in those islands with which I was connected, where there is no agent, they are bound to give notice to a certain public officer who will represent the absentee, and the difficulty in that case is removed at once.

71. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] Mr. Beldam, would an agent appointed subsequently to the Abolition Act, have an authority to act in an emergency created by that Act?—I think not so much as to part with the property over which the agency was created. Mr. Jeremie.] If you will allow me to say, the question comes back to the original point, what is the meaning of the word "representative" or "agent" in a remedial Act of Parliament? Now I consider, as I have already stated, that where the agent, be he who he may, is known to be in connexion with the property, that is quite sufficient to render him an agent under that clause of the Act; but that does not afford a remedy where the agent is unknown. When a person has quitted the island on a sudden, for instance, or in any case of that kind, or without leaving any agent, then a public officer might have been pointed out on whom notice was to be served; a practice that may be beneficially adopted on other occasions also.

72. Lord Sandon.] If this is considered an omission, is it such an omission as could be attributed to any intentional neglect on the part of the legislature of Jamaica?—Not in my opinion, distinctly not.

73. Mr. Gladstone.] Is it your opinion, in all cases in which there was an agent, who would be qualified to act for the owners in matters of manumission before the abolition, that such person would be equally qualified to act after the abolition?—Most undoubtedly. Mr. Beldam.] My reply as to agency generally is this, that I have looked at the strict interpretation of this clause. I know no agent employed merely to manage a property, who has a right, without some special authority, to part with that property; and this I beg to repeat, whatever may be the interpretation or legal construction to be put upon the word "agent."

19 April 1836.

74. Mr. O'Connell.] Is the doctrine to which you have referred intended as between agent and employer, or between agent and third person?—Mr. Beldam.] I apply my remarks likewise to a third person.

75. Then as to a third person, when a party is allowed by the owner to appear to have authority, the owner would be bound by the Act?—That again must depend upon circumstances; it is an important branch of law, and which has been considered more particularly by Mr. Paley, and other legal persons. I should wish to limit my observations to some particular question put to me. As to owners who are known, that is a clear omission; as to the agents of persons absent from the colonies, and unrepresented, there is no express provision made for them. If agents have a right to act at all, it seems to be under some general power they possess as agents; but the absence of an express provision as it regards them, must give rise to doubts and disputes which will at least produce delay if it do not absolutely nullify the right of manumission.

76. Mr. P. Stewart.] Did you ever read a power of attorney, such as is invariably granted to managers in the West Indies?—I have not read any West India power of attorney.

77. Mr. A. Johnstone.] Mr. Beldam, do either of the Jamaica Acts to which you have turned your attention, specify anything as to the agreement between two or three special magistrates and other magistrates, as to the power?—Mr. Beldam.] Do I understand your question to be, whether there is any principle of valuation, or any basis for valuation, agreed upon?

78. I mean, whether the consent of three must be necessary, or the consent of two?—There must be the consent of two.

79. Mr. O'Connell.] Is that by positive enactment?—Not by positive enactment; but taking the words of the clause, it appears to be similar in that respect to all clauses of appraisement.

80. Mr. Fowell Buxton.] Then it might happen, if a special magistrate was one, and two planters having a direct interest in enhancing the value of the apprentices were the two others, that the amount might be decided by the two who had an interest?—It must be decided by two, but not necessarily by the two who have an interest; but it is in their power. Mr. Jeremie.] My objection is distinctly this: The special justice seems to me merely appointed as a sort of umpire between two persons having the same interest; he can only come into play where there is a difference of opinion between these two. I should mention that that is not the only objection which I think I might submit to this Committee; there are other minor objections; but if this, and other more serious ones to be hereafter mentioned, were removed, I should be inclined to view the Act as much more perfect than I yet do; for at present my opinion is rather strong with regard to that Act, in consequence of the very serious discrepancies it appears to me to contain.

81. And you have found that the Jamaica Acts are defective with regard to the appraisement; are they defective with regard to any other points?—Yes; and the next point, as it strikes me, is extremely material. I shall at once make a general objection to all the remaining points which did not apply with regard to compulsory manumission. The other regulations relate chiefly to the maintenance of order, discipline and punctuality, and my general objection is this, that very extensive powers appear to have been entrusted to the special magistrates whenever misconduct was attributable to the labourer, and very inadequate powers, amounting, I should say, to nearly the shade of a power, have been entrusted to these magistrates wherever the manager was likely to be the delinquent; that is my general objection to all the clauses which regard order, discipline, and punctuality; there is no reciprocity.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

John Jeremie, Esq., called in; and further Examined :

82. Mr. Buxton.] WILL you proceed to state any objections which you entertain to the Jamaica laws relative to punishments?—The objection with which I closed my last answer, was, that there was no reciprocity in the punishments; wherever the manager is concerned there is a trifling fine imposed, and beyond this the magistrate's authority does not extend. (I refer to the 49th clause of the first Jamaica Act, page 280 of the Parliamentary Papers, the first clause in that page.) I would beg to direct the attention of the Committee to the wording of this clause. It comprises "all complaints made by any apprenticed labourer or labourers" against the person entitled to his or their services, touching any "fraud practised or refusal to furnish any such apprenticed labourer with a sufficiency of provision-grounds," and so on; or of "any cruelty, injustice, or other wrong or injury;" and it directs, that "such complaint shall be heard, adjudged, and determined before any one or more special justices; and he or they is or are empowered to punish any offender, in any of the cases above-mentioned, with a fine not exceeding 5*l.*;" so that, for any "cruelty, injustice, or other wrong or injury," or for any "fraud practised," a special magistrate can only inflict a penalty of 5*l.*, which is to be commuted (if not paid) to five days' imprisonment. That is the full extent of his power as a special magistrate. I am perfectly aware that, in cases of extreme cruelty, punishable under the common law, apprentices may have recourse to the ordinary tribunals of the country. I am prepared to make that concession; I believe there can be no doubt about it.

John Jeremie, Esq.

22 April 1836.

83. Sir George Grey.] Is not there an express proviso?—There was a proviso which was not very clear in this Act, but it has been subsequently settled by the Act in Aid, and therefore there can be no doubt about it now; but my objection to this clause is, that the apprentice must have recourse to the ordinary courts, to courts which, as far as my general experience has gone, I believe to have proved themselves unwilling to inflict punishments against managers; indeed, if they were sufficient for every such purpose, it was quite unnecessary to give extraordinary powers to the special magistrate, or to appoint special magistrates; and if they were not sufficient for such purposes, it was advisable that the special magistrate should possess sufficient powers by this Act. If you go into the courts of common law, those cases will be tried by a jury of persons interested in slave cultivation, a jury of overseers or managers; and, consequently, a jury which, if the very principle which pervades this Act be correct, is incompetent to determine cases of the kind. Now, if a labourer should happen to be the delinquent, the powers possessed by a special magistrate are extremely extensive; there are several clauses that relate to labourers, and inflict punishments abundantly severe. I would point out the 36th clause as one; by this, an apprenticed labourer is liable to six months' hard labour, or fifty stripes, on any order from a special justice; so that a special justice who can only inflict a penalty of 5*l.* on a manager in any possible case, may in certain given cases inflict a punishment of six months' hard labour or fifty stripes on an apprentice.

84. Do you mean to say in any given case?—In the particular case I have pointed out.

85. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you consider that the actions punishable by the 36th and 49th clauses are so far analogous as to be capable of comparison?—On this point undoubtedly; because the 49th clause embraces every possible fraud or act of cruelty which can be committed by a manager; and therefore, cases of extreme cruelty, unless they are punishable by some other Act, (and by no other Act, that I am aware of, does a special justice possess any further powers with regard to managers,) are only punishable by a special justice to the extent of a fine of 5 l.

John Jeremie, Esq.

86. Do you conceive that it was contemplated by the Imperial Parliament that a special justice should be empowered to deal with cases of extreme cruelty, or that he was rather intended to adjudge on minor and ordinary complaints?—It is very possible, and I think very likely, that the Imperial Parliament merely intended to confer powers on special justices in matters of domestic discipline, though I find the 49th clause so worded as to embrace cases of fraud and cruelty; but even assuming that the Imperial Parliament had no intention of extending the powers of a special magistrate beyond cases of domestic discipline, still I maintain that a fine of 5 l. is quite inadequate in many of those cases as a penalty.

87. Lord Sandon.] The great value of your objection upon this head, is the inadequacy of the common tribunals, or the want of confidence in the common tribunals to adjudicate on such offences?—That is one of my objections. There is also another clause to which I will call the attention of the Committee, as showing the disproportion between punishments where the labourer or where the manager happens to be the delinquent, the 30th clause. It relates to the endangering the property of the employer or any other person by the careless use of fire; that I think, was an assumption of power never intended to be conferred on special magistrates, and that is another objection to this clause. These magistrates were merely appointed for the purpose of maintaining discipline and order, and supporting the rights of the manager on the one side, and the slave on the other; so that the extending their powers to offences committed by labourers against “other persons” is clearly contrary to the spirit of the Act. Then, the “ill-using of cattle,” (not destroying or wantonly -illusing) “or other stock, or apprentices who shall wantonly destroy” (that is all well) “or injure property entrusted to them, these offences are to be punished by hard labour in the house of correction, or in the penal gang, for a period not exceeding three months, or by stripes, not exceeding fifty.” This, for merely ill-using cattle, though not done wantonly, I consider also severe in itself. Another objection to these enactments, founded on the same want of reciprocity, regards the manner in which the penalties are to be applied, and this is an important point. Whenever a labourer is condemned to a certain punishment, such as an extension of the period of labour, or the loss of a certain number of hours of his own time, the penalty accrues to the manager; but whenever the manager is convicted of an offence which causes a loss to the apprentice, the penalty accrues to the Crown, and this pervades the Jamaica Act. Here then is a complete want of reciprocity. I shall admit there may be cases where it will have been advisable that the labourer should be compelled to indemnify his manager, but it was equally advisable that the manager should be compelled by the same authority, in cases of a similar nature, to indemnify the labourer.

88. Lord Sandon.] Can you quote the cases of a similar nature?—I shall first point out the 68th clause. By this clause all fines and penalties accrue to the use of the public. Now as the only penalty that can be inflicted by the special magistrate upon the manager is a fine of 5 l., whatever the nature of the wrong, injury, or cruelty committed, such as depriving a man of his Sunday or his working-day, and as the 68th clause declares that all forfeitures shall go to the Crown, it follows that the special magistrate cannot adjudge the manager in any case to indemnify the labourer; but, on the other hand, there are several clauses where the labourer is required to indemnify the manager. Nay, farther, there are cases where he is condemned to pay the manager a certain sum, or (which is equal to a certain sum) to give him a certain amount of labour, though in such case the manager may have suffered no loss, or no adequate loss, from the offence; for instance, drunkenness. By the 28th clause, an apprentice being guilty of drunkenness shall forfeit to his employer not more than four days’ labour; those four days’ labour are to be taken from him in his own time, and as he has only one day in each week for his own use, he is at once deprived of his own time for one month, which accrues to his manager for an act of drunkenness that may have been committed on his own day, when he owed no kind of service whatever to his employer. The same principle pervades a great number of, I might say all, these clauses in the Act. I shall point out another instance: a man absenting himself from his labour. On such occasions nothing could be fairer than a clause by which he would have been bound to make good the time lost; but here he is bound to do something more; more; he is to make good double or treble the time lost. A labourer absent for half a day, or any shorter period (therefore a quarter of an hour would do), shall incur a forfeiture to his employer of not more than one whole day of the apprentice's own time; more than half a day, a forfeiture of not more than three whole days; two successive days absence, or two distinct days within the same fortnight, render the offender a deserter, with punishment by hard labour in the penal gang, or the house of correction, (that I do not complain of, the owner does not derive benefit from that,) of not more than one week. Here then is a domestic offence of daily occurrence which the manager has henceforth a direct interest in producing, an offence which will happen in some shape or other in every gang in Jamaica, probably once a month, or once a fortnight: the absence of a negro for half an hour, or even a quarter of a day, must frequently occur. I will read the clause itself: "Be it therefore enacted, that all such offences shall be tried in a summary manner before any justice appointed by special commission, and that any apprenticed labourer convicted of absenting himself or herself from the service of his or her employer without reasonable cause for half or any smaller portion of a day, shall forfeit to such employer not exceeding a whole day's labour of his or her own time, &c."

89. Mr. Gladstone.] Without adverting to the exact proportion of time this Act has rendered exigible from the apprentice, is it your opinion it would have been unfair under any circumstances to abstract from the apprentice for wilful absence a greater proportion of time than he was absent?—For the proprietor's benefit, undoubtedly; that they should have been imprisoned for a certain time would have been proper, but they never should have been required to do more than indemnify the proprietor for the loss incurred.

90. Do you conceive that the loss of an hour of the apprentice's time at one period must necessarily be adequately reimbursed by the possession of an additional hour of his time at another?—A great deal would depend upon the manner in which he was employed, but there is a routine of duty on all these plantations, so that he might be compelled to give an hour of his time in the same kind of employment in which he had previously lost an hour.

91. Suppose the case of one intrusted with the care of sugar in a boiling-house, where the absence might be from that duty at the moment when it is necessary for him to be present incessantly; is it not the fact, that very considerable damage may ensue to the process of boiling from that absence, a damage very much greater than would be repaired by an hour of the apprentice's time, even employed in the same work, at another period?—It is possible; but all these extreme cases might have been foreseen, if they were foreseen at all, on both sides.

92. Mr. O'Connell.] You think that the excess may be punished otherwise, namely, by imprisonment?—That is my opinion.

93. Mr. Gladstone.] You have already answered the question that the excess may be punished otherwise; but admitting your principle fully, that the owner has no claim whatever beyond indemnification, do you not also admit, on the other hand, that there are certain things in which the owner could not be indemnified by merely obtaining the same amount of time during which the apprentice absented himself, and was it not right therefore to leave to the special magistrate a certain discretion of adapting the time to be required from the apprentice to make good the loss inflicted on the owner?—I have my doubts whether such a discretion was left by the Imperial Legislature; but assuming it to have been left, I think it was a very dangerous exercise of that discretion on the part of the Jamaica legislature, to grant a power of that kind to a special magistrate, at the same time that I fully admit there may be cases in which the granting exactly the same period to the master, which has been lost by the apprentice, would not be a full indemnification.

94. Lord Sandon.] Your objection would have been greatly removed, if there had been more reciprocity on the other side?—It would have been, I may say entirely removed.

95. Chairman.] Do you conceive that injustice is likely to ensue from this power being vested in the hands of the special magistrate?—I think it may; I would point out the 22d to the 26th clauses, by which more than half a day entails a forfeiture of not more than three whole days; now for one day the forfeiture is trebled. I conceive that the legislation would have been much sounder, if the two second days had been spent in the workhouse, or in any such way. I can imagine many cases in which those two clauses may prove seriously inconvenient to labourers; there is nothing more common on a West Indian plantation than the absence of a mother, when she is nursing; or she may remain a quarter or half an hour away, in consequence of her having several children to attend to; formerly, if she had a certain number of these, say six, she was allowed a certain additional time. Mothers were also allowed various indulgences; those, as I shall point out by and by, appear to have been withdrawn, or they may be withdrawn owing to the construction put upon this Jamaica Act; therefore she is tied down to her time as completely as any negro on the estate; and yet, in all instances, she may forfeit for half a day, or even a quarter of an hour's absence, in the one instance three days, in the other one day. Yet are all these indulgences which she actually enjoyed at the time she was a slave.

96. Sir George Grey.] Is not the absence to be without reasonable cause, and is not the special magistrate the judge of the reasonableness of the cause alleged by the absentee?—Yes, undoubtedly; but it is giving a special magistrate a power which was unnecessary, and which he should not have possessed.

97. Lord Sandon.] Do you not imply a very great distrust in the magistrate, unconnected with colonial property, and appointed by the Crown, in supposing that he will not be a proper judge of the reasonableness of the cause alleged by the absentee?—Distrust of individual power I do not assume; but a general distrust of the exercise of an authority of this kind in a place constituted as the society of Jamaica is, and generally in the colonies, I consider a fair objection in critically examining these enactments.

98. Of course you have taken into consideration that you may always make out extreme cases where there is a maximum of punishment, if you suppose a maximum of punishment inflicted for the minimum of crime?—Yes, and have still an objection to them; but my principal objection is at last an objection arising from the want of reciprocity; if there had been a power of inflicting similar penalties on the manager, that would have removed my objection; but as there is not, I conceive the Jamaica legislature should have been particularly cautious in creating this right against the labourer.

99. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware whether the special magistrates are subject or not to the supreme authority of the governor of the colony, who has the power of remitting any sentence imposed by them on any point, or removing them from the commission of the peace, if he thinks they abuse the power intrusted to them?—If the Committee should require me to go into that, I shall give my opinion according to the best of my judgment; but whatever the powers of the governor, the question may next come, as to whether these powers have been duly exercised, and then you may arrive at expressing an opinion of the governor himself.

100. Is the discretion vested in special magistrates subject to any legal control in the colony?—Certainly; the appointment of special magistrates is not for life, and therefore the governor may remove a special magistrate whenever he thinks fit, and the governor in this, as in all other cases, has the prerogative of mercy.

101. Mr. O'Connell.] But to obtain any rehearing from the governor, by way of appeal, must be difficult for an isolated negro?—In practice I consider it out of the question in cases of domestic discipline; in serious cases I admit the governor may exercise his authority, and often very beneficially; but in matters of this kind, respecting half a day's labour, the person has paid the penalty before the governor can hear of it, in nine cases out of ten; therefore, though that power is unquestionably vested in him, I consider that, as a practical remedy for defects which relate to points of domestic and internal regulation, it is almost nugatory.

102. Lord Sandon.] The power of inflicting imprisonment would have been equally open to abuse on the part of the special magistrates?—Yes; but then there would not be the interest of the master to produce, and to encourage the offence; on the contrary, he would himself have suffered in some degree.

103. Sir George Grey.] Have you read the despatch addressed by Mr. Secretary Stanley to the Marquis of Sligo, dated the 20th of February 1834?—I have looked cursorily over the whole of those papers.

104. Does it appear that he felt the same objection to the want of reciprocity to which you have now adverted?—He did, in some degree.

105. Has that been remedied by the Jamaica legislature, and the clause he suggested inserted in any subsequent Act?—Not that I am aware of.

106. Mr. Gladstone.] You are understood to urge a particular objection against the use of the word "endanger," in the 30th clause?—I consider it too vague.

107. Do you consider it fair to recognize the principle, that conduct tending to injure the property of the employer in its own nature should be punishable, as well as conduct actually injuring it, though injury might not actually take place? —In these cases I should have my doubts whether the clause should not be more specific; the words are, “endangering by the careless use of fire.”

108. Mr. O'Connell.] That is an offence which might be committed without the least wilfulness?—A man smoking his cigar near a cane-piece might be within it.

109. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you observed the phraseology of the 16th clause of the Imperial Act upon that particular point, the following words: “And for the prevention or punishment of vagrancy, or of any conduct on the part of any such apprenticed labourers, injuring or tending to the injury of the property of any such employer.” Do you think the language used in the clause you refer to is more vague than that used in the Imperial Act?—No; but the Imperial Act was an Act laying down certain principles; the Jamaica Act is an Act which ought to have applied that general Act to particular circumstances; therefore, I should expect a greater precision in the one than the other.

110. Does not the clause in the Jamaica Act apply a penalty to a particular case; namely, a careless use of fire?—Yes.

111. Lord Sandon.] You apply a different stress to these different particulars?—Yes; I point out what I consider serious objections; these minor objections arise in the course of observation. I do not attach that importance to them, and would not say anything of them if they were not quoted in illustration of more serious ones.

112. Sir George Grey.] It is desirable to know whether the objection you have stated as to the careless use of fire applies in whole, or in part, to the terms used by the Imperial Act, or whether you consider the terms used by the Imperial Act wholly unobjectionable?—I stated on a former day that the Jamaica Act might be scrutinized with reference to the law as it formerly stood, with reference to the Imperial Act itself, or with reference to your own views of what the apprenticeship might have been rendered. In giving my evidence before this Committee, I conceive that, unless called on to do otherwise, I am bound to consider, simply, the Colonial Act with reference to the Act of the Imperial Legislature, without expressing an opinion of what I might venture to consider would have been an improvement in the latter Act itself.

113. Mr. Buxton.] What is the next point you propose to take?—The next points regard domestic discipline. The most important is this, that throughout the first Jamaica Act, and the subsequent Acts, there is no clause which requires that the labourers should enjoy each day a certain number of hours continued repose; it is an omission.

114. Chairman.] Where is that subject treated of in the Imperial Act?—In the 16th clause.

115. Lord Sandon.] Do you conceive the distribution of labour prescribed by the Jamaica Act to be at variance with the distribution of labour prescribed by the Imperial Act?—By means of different clauses in the Jamaica Act it is a possible case, and I mention it only as a possible case; by no means as one which has occurred in practice, for I am not aware that it has, and therefore I would not impute it to them; but in combining the various clauses of the Jamaica Act, the hours of labour may be so arranged as to render it possible for a manager, without committing an illegal act, to compel a labourer to work for 42 hours in succession.

116. Which is decidedly at variance with the Imperial Act?—With the spirit of the Act, and with the special provision which requires they shall be duly protected.

117. Mr. Gladstone.] Can you point to any passages in the Act which will enable the Committee to verify that assertion?—By combining, of course, the various clauses of this Act. This is owing entirely to the clause to which I objected so strongly before, by which the negro is compelled to labour for his master as a species of penalty. In the first Act there is no regulation whatever; in the second Act, the Act which has been recently introduced into the Imperial Legislature, is this clause: That the negro shall be employed in field labour for nine hours only per day. So that there was no regulation in the old Act, and in the second the regulation extends to field labour only. I refer to No. 1, sections 5 and 6 of the Act in Aid, p. 283 of the Parliamentary Papers: “And whereas it is necessary to regulate,” and so forth, “be it enacted, that on all sugar estates, and other plantations, field labour shall commence with sunrise, and terminate with sunset, sunset, giving such cessation in the middle of the day as, with the usual half hour allowed for breakfast, shall reduce the actual time of labour to nine hours in the day; provided always, that nothing herein contained shall prevent the employer and the labourers from making any other arrangements as to the hours of labour which they may mutually agree upon." Here is my first objection. I do not know whether the arrangement noticed in the proviso must have the consent of the special magistrates.

John Jeremie, Esq.

22 April 1836.

118. Lord Sandon.] Would it prevent the negro being called on to give additional labour in case it were adjudged against him as a penalty?—I should say that it would not.

119. Chairman.] Is there anything in the nature of West India cultivation that holds out any temptation to a master to subject a labourer to work more hours continuously than would be consistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act?—It is exactly the argument on which they founded their whole resistance to the abolition of slavery, the necessity for sugar cultivation, or the manufacture of sugar being carried on continuously.

120. Is it necessary it should be carried on continuously by the same hands?—I should maintain not; but still that has been their argument throughout; it is on this that they, so far as I can understand the objections they made to the proceedings of their opponents, have founded nearly their whole resistance to the design of amelioration.

121. Sir George Grey.] The Imperial Act limits the duration of time to be given to his employer by the week?—Forty-five hours per week, and they have allowed the local legislature to distribute those forty-five hours as they thought fit, except on the Sunday, which they are bound to give the labourers under all possible circumstances.

122. Are you aware of what is called the eight-hour system in Jamaica?—I have heard of it. I have not sufficient information.

123. Have you not heard that the apprentices prefer the nine-hour system to the eight-hour, though longer each day, on account of its giving them one half day in each week?—I have understood that was the case; but in a place like Jamaica I should think there would be two opinions on such a point, though 99 in 100 of them would prefer the nine-hour system.

124. Mr. Gladstone.] With reference to the continuous labour in the manufacture of sugar, in stating the argument used against the measure of amelioration, did not the argument assume this form, that you must have a succession of hands, and that it was very doubtful whether such a succession could be depended on, from the general aversion of the blacks to labour of that description?—The objection, as I understand it, went to the limiting in any way the hours of labour; and in practice, I have always found that the old clauses bearing upon this point, have been more strenuously objected to than any of the others. So it happened with regard to the regulations I introduced in the island of St. Lucia; in their amending Act, there was a clause to this effect, that under every possible circumstance, the negroes should have eight hours continued rest within the 24 hours, and that was warmly opposed. I wanted to make it 10; the planter maintained that he was obliged sometimes to work his negroes for a greater length of time, but that where he did so, he indemnified them afterwards. I replied he could not indemnify them sufficiently for such continuous labour; for the giving them merely the hours he had deprived them of, would not be a sufficient indemnification; to which I added, there was not a planter in the colonies who did not allow they ought to have rest, and if there was no intention to break in upon their necessary rest, there was no reason for making the objection.

125. Mr. Burton.] You have stated that the negro might be employed in labour for a continuous 42 hours; is this the mode by which that 42 hours' continuous labour can be obtained: A negro employed at three in the afternoon on Monday till 12, nine hours; beginning at midnight on Monday night, nine hours; on Tuesday fifteen hours, adjudged in one week for punishment, will carry us on to midnight on Tuesday; the nine hours beginning at midnight on Tuesday, will be the time for Wednesday?—Yes, and those added together make up 42.

126. Sir George Grey.] Do you speak of field labour?—No, any kind of labour; it could not take place in field labour; any but field labour; the negro could not be kept constantly in the field 42 hours, but he might be 18 out of the 42 in the field, and the remainder of the time in the sugar-house.

127. Take

127. Take the clause in the second Act, providing that field labour should commence with sunrise and terminate with sunset?—Yes. John Jeremie, Esq.

128. Could the field labour begin at three in the afternoon and terminate at midnight under that clause?—No; but as there must be nearly two days within the 42 hours, the negro might be brought into the field at the hour pointed out by the second Act; it is barely possible, but I believe it might be done. 22 April 1836.

129. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you conceive the planters of Jamaica, with or without justice, have any inducement to inflict on the negro any such labour?—That is the practical part of the question; I am at present dwelling on the legal part. I should suppose that no human being who has an interest in another, can have a sufficient inducement, on the ground of self-interest, to work him 42 hours in succession.

130. Mr. Buxton.] It would be, strictly speaking, legal to employ them in labour, not field labour, for those 42 hours. Supposing the negro felt himself aggrieved by being thus deprived of his natural rest, and he were to complain of that to a special magistrate, is it not in the power of the special magistrate to inflict upon him, in addition to his former punishment, the punishment of 20 lashes for having made an unfounded complaint?—There is a clause of that kind.

131. Sir George Grey.] Could the special magistrate inflict such a punishment without believing the complaint to have been unreasonable or unfounded?—I should think not; I presume that a special magistrate, like every other magistrate, will do his duty, and I conceive it would be a very proper thing for the governor to notice if he did.

132. Would any magistrate in the sound exercise of a summary jurisdiction impose, until a check was put upon him, a very inordinate punishment for a trifling offence?—Undoubtedly not.

133. Does not it resolve itself into the discretion of the magistrate in ordinary cases being controlled by appeal to the governor?—No, for a special magistrate is only entrusted with the power of adjudication, the carrying the judgment into effect is left in those cases to the manager; all the special magistrate can do, is to inflict 15 hours' additional labour for the week, and as to the manner in which that labour shall be apportioned, it is the manager who distributes it.

134. That is your opinion?—I conceive he may do it.

135. Chairman.] The observation you have made does not apply to the case you have supposed of a magistrate inflicting 20 lashes?—As to the 20 lashes it does not.

136. Sir George Grey.] The question was whether, if a labourer was liable to 42 hours' continuous labour, and he was to complain to a special magistrate, the special magistrate might not sentence him to 20 lashes for an unreasonable complaint; would he not, by inflicting such sentence, grossly abuse his power?—Certainly.

137. Does not the question resolve itself into a question of the discretion used in the exercise of the power vested in the special magistrate, and whether he had not so abused his power as to be liable to the censure of the governor?—Yes, as regards the lashes.

138. Mr. Buxton.] Though the magistrate might be liable to the censure of the governor, would he be liable to any legal penalty for having imposed this punishment?—He would not be liable to any legal punishment.

139. Sir George Grey.] Could he not be deprived of his commission?—Any officer who is merely commissioned during pleasure is liable to be deprived of his commission.

140. Chairman.] Does not he stand in precisely the same condition as a magistrate in England would do, who inflicted a punishment not proportioned to the offence of the individual?—Yes, and with this circumstance against him, that the magistrate in England can scarcely be deprived of his commission so easily as a special magistrate might.

141. Mr. O'Connell.] Is a magistrate in England controlled by public opinion?—Yes, and there is greater control here than in the West Indies.

142. Are you aware of the manner in which magistrates conduct themselves in Ireland, for example?—I have heard of it.

143. The presumption that the magistrate will do his duty may be exceedingly weakened by circumstances, may it not?—Undoubtedly it may.

144. Mr. C. Lushington.] Supposing a special magistrate was guilty of this sort of act of injustice and cruelty, according to the habits of the society by which he is surrounded, is it likely that his conduct would be brought before superior authority?

authority?—I am bound to say I have never visited Jamaica, but, if I may draw an inference from other slave colonies, I should say it was not.

145. Sir George Grey.] Is it not the fact, that every special magistrate is bound to make a return to the governor of every punishment he inflicts, and the cause of inflicting, so that his conduct must go before the governor irrespective of any complaint?—I am aware that he is now bound to do so, but for a short time after the passing of this Act it was not so.

146. Mr. Buxton.] Supposing there to be this return to the governor, would not the special magistrate put it down as 20 lashes inflicted for having made a groundless complaint?—Yes, he might.

147. Sir George Grey.] Would it be a groundless complaint in point of law, in your opinion?—No, because there is always the common law which prohibits cruelty, but it would be a groundless complaint in regard to this Act.

148. Have you any doubt it was a case of cruelty?—No; I conceive it is a case of cruelty certainly.

149. Does not the 49th section of the Jamaica Act give special jurisdiction to the magistrate in case of cruelty?—Yes.

150. Can then a complaint made by an apprentice of an undoubted case of cruelty be a groundless complaint under the Jamaica Act?—The original question has branched out into two others; the question originally put was whether the magistrate would not return it as a groundless complaint; the answer was, that he might so return it; and the reason of this answer is, that if he has adjudged it a groundless complaint, he will have so inserted it in his report; but that it is a groundless complaint, in fact, I am not prepared to admit. I should consider it a well-founded complaint; but the magistrate having, on the hearing of the case, formed another opinion, and declared it a groundless complaint, I infer that he will have so inserted it in his report, and the governor could have no clue from such a report whereby to judge of it or to control him.

151. By the 49th section of the Jamaica Act, is that a groundless complaint in point of law?—I conceive it is not; it is an act of cruelty punishable by the common law.

152. Mr. O'Connell.] Is it your opinion that would be a groundless complaint or not by the Jamaica Act?—Taking the Jamaica Act alone, and with reference to the clauses relating to the labourer, it would be a groundless complaint, as it would not be a complaint of any illegal act.

153. Sir George Grey.] Having reference, not to the clauses relating to the labourer, but to the 49th clause, which gives a jurisdiction to the magistrate as against the manager, would it be a groundless complaint under that clause?—I have very strong doubts; the 49th clause only confers jurisdiction over the manager, while the other clauses relate to the labour required of the apprentice; and in that specific clause which has reference to the labour of the apprentice, no provision having been made by which the manager cannot exact the 42 hours in succession, (taking that as the only law of that country,) it would be a groundless complaint; but taken with reference to the common law, I should say it would not be groundless, for that punishes extreme cruelty.

154. Your opinion is, that under the Jamaica Act, the continuous employment of an apprentice for 42 hours, without some rest, would not be an act of cruelty and injustice, or injury?—That it would not be illegal.

155. Do you think the continuous employment of a labourer for 42 hours is not such a case of cruelty, injustice, wrong or injury, as, under the 49th section, would allow the labourer to come to a magistrate and make a complaint to him of the exercise of the power?—I beg to say, in answer to that question, that under the Jamaica Act it would not; under the general law of Jamaica, it might. I mean the law of the land, the common law.

156. Mr. O'Connell.] Is it your opinion that that would be an indictable offence which did not exceed the legal bounds of one man's power over another?—There again, even in that sense, it is a very difficult point; indeed I have a very strong impression with regard to it.

157. Lord Sandon.] Is there any law which exactly defines what cruelty is?—No.

158. Chairman.] Would not the special magistrate punish the employment of a man such a length of time as that as an act of cruelty?—Not beyond 5*l.*, and even then it would depend on his interpretation of cruelty.

159. Mr. Buxton.] Though it would be regarded as cruelty by proper feeling in this country, it would not be regarded as cruelty in the contemplation of the colonial law?—In the contemplation of this Jamaica Act; I do not go beyond these two Acts; it would not under the Jamaica Acts which I am now examining.

John Jeremie, Esq.

22 April 1836.

160. With reference to the checks imposed on magistrates in England and in Jamaica, do not you think there is this difference, that popular feeling here controls the acts of magistrates, whereas popular feeling there may very much side with the perpetrator of those cruelties?—I am convinced there is not the same popular control over the acts of officers in public authority, particularly in these matters, in such communities, as there is in England; but, as I have already said, with respect to Jamaica, I can only judge of the condition of society there by hearsay.

161. Might it not be necessary and proper to introduce checks into the existing law in Jamaica that are not necessary here?—I conceive it was for that very purpose the 16th clause was introduced into the Imperial Act and this law framed.

162. Lord Sandon.] There is also this distinction between the dismissal of the Jamaica magistrate and the magistrate here, that the dismissal of the one is merely a dismissal from an office of honour, and the other involves the loss of income?—Certainly.

163. Sir George Grey.] On what do you found your opinion that the fifteen hours' additional labour a week which may be imposed by a special magistrate is left to the manager, and that it is not subject to the discretion of the magistrate?—I do not say it must be left, but that, there being no clause to the contrary, it may be left.

164. You think that the master may in legal conduct apportion that 15 hours' additional labour as he thinks most suitable to the circumstances of the case?—I see nothing to prevent his doing so.

165. Lord Sandon.] You feel yourself bound in construing the Act to make every possible objection?—I cannot see the necessity of a law being passed, but to guard against abuse, and that omission might have been so easily supplied by allowing a certain number of hours continuous repose.

166. You would not impute every possible opening to abuse you may observe to a wicked intention on the part of the legislature that such abuses should be allowed to prevail?—No, I say most willingly that I certainly would not; I consider this a very serious omission, and therefore quite sufficient to warrant my calling very earnestly the attention of the Committee to it; but I view it as an omission, and nothing more. Indeed, all the objections I am making I view much in the same light; I view this Act as a piece of defective legislation; nor can I assume there was an intention of perverting or counteracting the Act of the Imperial Legislature, however defective it may be in many points. I also consider that some of the subsequent Acts have been framed in a wrong spirit; but if I am to take this Act singly, I do not know that this objection applies to it.

167. Mr. Buxton.] Do you confine your objections to the Act being defective, or might not those powers be held over the negro for the purpose of extortion?—I do not think that at the time this Act was framed, the legislature of Jamaica (as regards this section) had any such object in view; but with regard to some points I may hereafter notice, I think they might. On this point I must fully admit they had no such intention, for this reason, that it is not a case which would have struck the person who drew up these clauses as being likely to occur; that it is only on a critical examination of this document, and by combining its various clauses, that I see the powers conferred for different purposes are open to this abuse. Now when a public body such as the House of Assembly is legislating on any subject, omissions of this kind may easily occur unintentionally; but when from a fair construction of the words, it appears tolerably palpable that abuses will creep in, then I should, especially if this be often repeated, impute design.

168. Might it not be used, though not so intended by the legislature, as a means of extortion?—Undoubtedly, and that is my reason for urging it on this Committee.

169. Was not this clause framed obviously to deter apprentices from making just complaints?—That would be a proof of intention on the part of the legislature; I think it may be so applied by individuals, as to deter apprentices from making just complaints, and that is where I see it is defective, and why I dwell so anxiously upon it; but I do not know that I can give it as my opinion that it was framed for that particular purpose.

John Jeremie, Esq.

22 April 1836.

170. Mr. Gladstone.] Have the goodness to suppose the case of an apprentice who for an offence has been sentenced by a special justice to give to his employer fifteen hours of labour, and the special justice has made no award of that fifteen hours over the several days of the week; suppose the apprentice says I will not work for fifteen hours in one day, I will work two and a half on each of the six days; do you conceive that an apprentice taking that course does not satisfy the sentence, or that he can be liable to any detriment or injury on that account?—I should think that a negro who would apportion the share of his own time, which he has been adjudged to forfeit to his employer, in that way, would be immediately liable to punishment for disobedience.

171. Do you think that the command of the special magistrate being, that he is to give fifteen hours within the week, he can be liable to punishment if he gives the fifteen hours within the week, distributing them as he pleases?—Undoubtedly; he is a subordinate, and where a superior authority has not given specific directions, it is then the authority immediately over him that may make such arrangements as he sees fit.

172. Is not the authority which the master exercises in reference to those 15 hours of labour, an authority limited by the conditions under which the special magistrate has given the sentence?—Yes, but I understand the question to apply to cases where the magistrate had not distributed them.

173. Is there any further specification in the sentence than that the labour should be given within the week?—No, but it is for the employer's own benefit.

174. Is not the sentence satisfied if the apprentice gives the 15 hours within the week?—Not if he disobeys his master as to the time when he is to give it. It is for the master's benefit that the 15 hours are awarded, and that is one reason why I object to the penalties thus enuring to the master's profit.

175. Supposing the circumstances as we have before supposed them, and that 42 hours of labour were exacted from the apprentice continuously in one week, do you not think that the apprentices can have it in their own power, by refusing to work for wages during extra hours, to inflict, at particular seasons of the year, a very severe punishment on their employers for such conduct?—They have a right to refuse everything that is a matter of contract, of course.

176. But have they not it in their power by such refusal to cause very great and serious detriment to the property of their employer?—I do not know how they can.

177. During the manufacture of sugar in crop time?—No, except it be ascertained that the proprietor can find no one else to work for wages throughout the colony.

178. Is it your opinion that a proprietor can get in his crop sufficiently without paying wages to negroes for their extra time?—To his negroes I should say yes, for there are working gangs nearly all over the West India colonies, whom he may hire from their proprietor whenever he thinks fit; and I further believe that, in many cases, if the time allowed by law be justly distributed it will not be necessary to pay wages.

179. Would he not, by calling in a task gang, be put to additional expenses?—I should hope not, if he gives his negroes fair wages he gives them the same wages as to the task gang.

180. Sir George Grey.] Although those task gangs apply to the present case, they would not be applicable to a general one?—I consider the case an extreme one.

181. Are you aware whether the extra labour is paid for in Jamaica?—Practically, I am not aware of anything relating to Jamaica.

182. Are you not aware, that on the majority of estates extra labour has been performed?—I suppose it will have been performed, but I am only answering from supposition.

183. Mr. Buxton.] Supposing a negro were employed continuously for 42 hours, and supposing a special magistrate cognizant of this law were to inflict a punishment on him for making a frivolous and groundless complaint, would that magistrate expose himself to an action of damages from the negro?—No.

184. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware that there is a very considerable discretion vested in a judge in England with respect to the punishment for manslaughter?—Perfectly.

185. You are aware that there is sometimes a fine of 1s. on the prisoner being discharged, and sometimes transportation for life. Suppose a case that deserved to be visited with the fine of 1s. and the prisoner to be discharged; that the judge, judge, in the exercise of his discretion, should pass the sentence of transportation for life; would he be liable to an action for damages on the part of the prisoner?—I consider that the judge, like every other judicial magistrate, is merely responsible for acts which are exorbitant in themselves, being both illegal and exorbitant; but in questions so exceedingly doubtful as this is, both as regards the common law and statute law of Jamaica, I should say that a magistrate, exercising his discretion, would not be responsible in damages.

186. Mr. O'Connell.] Anything that a judge does judicially, you are aware, cannot be subject to damages; it is only where a magistrate acts ministerially?—Not even then, if he do not exercise an undue discretion; he must act illegally.

187. Sir George Grey.] Does not the vesting a large discretion in any public officer involve, of necessity, the possibility of an abuse of that discretion in the first instance?—It does.

188. Mr. O'Connell.] Therefore there ought to be as little discretion left as possible?—Certainly; in these Acts particularly.

189. Mr. Buxton.] I have asked you whether the negro might have his action of damages against the magistrate, if he inflicted a punishment on him for complaining of having been employed continuously 42 hours; but supposing the justices were to convict the master of cruelty for continuous employment of the negro for 42 hours, would the master have his action of damages against the magistrate?—I think he would; it is very probable that he would; and I think, in Jamaica, he would successfully, if what is reported of Jamaica society be true.

190. Sir George Grey.] I understood you were speaking of the legal right, not of the state of feeling?—The right of action.

191. Mr. Gladstone.] There would be a right of action on the one side and not on the other, supposing the two alternatives of the case?—Yes.

192. Taking it in each alternative of the case respectively, you think the master would have the right of action and the labourer not?—I think the manager would have a right of action against the special justice if he were fined, or punished with five days' imprisonment under this Act, for having done what is legal in itself; and that it is legal in itself, on a sufficient consideration of this subject, I should be inclined to think; whilst, on the contrary, the labourer would not have a right of action, for the same reason, that the Act was legal in itself.

193. Sir George Grey.] Are there any clauses in this Act affording special protection to magistrates in respect of actions brought against them in the discharge of their duty?—Yes, by the Act in Aid.

194. Mr. O'Connell.] Be so good as to state all the circumstances of protection, such as additional forms and notices.—They are the 11th and 12th and 13th sections; see page 284.

195. Of what Act?—The Act in Aid, 4th of July 1834, the expired Act. No action or suit shall be brought against any special justice, unless notice of bringing such action shall be served for one month previously to such action being brought. If the verdict be for the defendant, or the plaintiff therein shall be nonsuited, or such action shall be discontinued for want of going to trial, the plaintiff shall pay treble costs. The clause respecting tendering amends comes next, and then it is enacted that no action or suit shall be brought for any matter or thing done unless the same shall be commenced within six months after the cause of action shall have accrued.

196. Sir George Grey.] Do you consider that protection as a sufficient protection in ordinary cases where special magistrates have actions brought against them for acts done in the discharge of their duty?—I am perfectly satisfied with these clauses as far as they go, though I believe objections have been raised to them, and I think the special magistrates will never be completely protected so long as they remain liable to an action at all, before a Jamaica jury and a Jamaica bench.

197. I want to know what alteration you would suggest which, in your opinion, would give full and adequate protection to special magistrates in the discharge of their duty?—I would have them tried by the governor, chief justice, and any other principal officer of the government, not being a slave-owner.

198. Instead of by a jury?—Yes.

199. Mr. Gladstone.] You have directed the attention of the Committee in the early part of to-day's examination to the inadequacy of the remedy on behalf of the apprentice for the grosser injuries committed against him in particular, inasmuch as the remedy must be through the medium of a jury; can you suggest to the Committee your own ideas as to the manner in which a sufficient remedy might be procurable of competent authority for the apprentice in such cases?—Yes, certainly. In the Order in Council which I had framed, or the draft rather, carrying out the system of apprenticeship as I contemplated it originally, I had given the special magistrate larger powers as regards both the labourer on the one hand and the manager on the other, (because I wish it to be ever understood that I do not so much object to the penalties inflicted on the labourer for their extent or severity as to the want of reciprocity,) but I had also provided that courts of quarter sessions should be held by a certain number of special justices, and in those courts the graver offences committed by both labourers and managers could have been punished by heavier penalties.

John Jeremie, Esq.

22 April 1836.

200. But do you think that those courts of quarter sessions can be considered tribunals adequate for the trial of the gravest class of offences?—No; transportation and death, I would never confer the power of inflicting, to any but the ordinary tribunals of the land; but still there is an immense difference between penalties of that kind, and a penalty of 5*l.* I think that a court of quarter sessions, constituted as I should recommend, might have been authorized to award a penalty to the amount of 100*l.* or 150*l.*, and imprisonment for three, or even six months; and to inflict also that very proper stigma which attaches, occasionally, to persons condemned under the French or the Spanish laws, that they should not again have the management of slaves within the colony or district where they have committed the offence.

201. While you think, then, that the courts of quarter sessions would be very fit to try the intermediate class of offences, you do not see any immediate remedy for the difficulty under which the apprentice labours with respect to the highest class of offences?—I consider that those are entirely foreign, I may say, to the condition of the apprentice; for instance, if an apprentice is murdered, then the punishment is inflicted, not in consequence of these Jamaica Acts, but under the general law of the country; the man is tried for murder; and so with regard to all these graver offences. It is one of the causes of complaint against this Act, that it enters on matters which have no immediate reference to the condition of the manager and apprentice; and, of course, that complaint would be still more marked, if matters of so grave a nature had been even noticed in an Act of this kind, which is entirely an exceptional enactment.

202. At the same time you are aware, that complaints have very frequently been made of the disadvantage under which the negro population labour, even with reference to that most serious class of offences to which you have adverted?—Yes; but I have always considered the law of the land sufficient to punish them; that this remedy was at least the best that could be devised, and that the inconvenience would be greater in authorizing exceptional tribunals to take cognizance of these cases.

203. Mr. Buxton.] Seeing the persons of whom the juries are composed, and knowing the kind of influence that prevails over them, do you apprehend that substantial justice could be expected in cases in which the negro and his master were concerned?—On all questions of domestic discipline, and on all matters which have reference to the relation between manager and apprentice, I should distinctly say not, if colonial society is in Jamaica what I have known it in other places.

204. Sir George Grey.] Should you have confidence in Jamaica juries, supposing the apprenticeship to be at an end?—I can say nothing of Jamaica juries; if the question be put as to colonial juries, I can answer it.

205. Well, colonial juries; do you think colonial juries, as at present constituted, would be a tribunal such as you would place confidence in, on questions arising between white men and black, irrespective of the apprenticeship?—I do not know exactly how colonial juries are constituted at present; but if there is no objection to black men being introduced into those juries (as there is to apprentices), I see no objection to them; my objection is, that now they are all of one class. If apprentices were admitted into them, I should see no objection then.

206. Lord Sandon.] Men of colour are capable of serving on juries in Jamaica?—Yes, but then comes the question, whether there are a sufficient number of men of colour in the class of jurors.

207. If

207. If there are?—My objection is to persons of a particular description trying offences committed by others of the same description on another class of beings. John Jeremie, Esq.

208. You are aware there are two or three in the legislature of Jamaica?—
Yes. 22 April 1836.

209. Mr. Buxton.] May they not be slave-owners themselves?—Yes.

210. Mr. Gladstone.] When you speak of colonial juries, are we to understand that you speak of them as you would of any other men in a country where the relations of whites and blacks have been those of master and slave?—The objection in all these cases is simply this, that if the body before which these cases are brought, happen to be all of one class, and the plaintiff or defendant is of the same privileged class, while the opposite party is of another, they will lean in favour of their own class, and especially in communities where a power so exorbitant as the slave owner formerly possessed, has been recently exercised.

211. Sir George Grey.] Do not objections arise out of the state of slavery which has existed in these colonies?—Yes, and therefore I was particularly anxious that these Acts should be most carefully worded and framed. There would have been no necessity for all this caution, if slavery had not existed so long in these communities. Many of its prejudices will continue when it is removed.

212. Do you not think, irrespective of these Acts, many of these evils are now so engrafted into the social system which has arisen out of a state of slavery, that they will subsist after the apprenticeship has expired?—I have said so, and that is precisely my reason for wishing these special magistrates had been vested with power to punish managers; they will scarcely be punished at all.

213. Mr. C. Lushington.] Supposing a man of colour serving on a jury to be actuated by a certain degree of bias, to which side do you suppose that bias will incline, the master or the negro?—Nine times in ten to the master; before he can get on the the jury he will be a proprietor in some way or other.

214. Mr. Buxton.] You have said that many evils must necessarily arise out of the state of society which had subsisted; do you conceive that, in reference to the inequality of station and rights between the master and apprentice, to the character and feeling of colonial juries, and to the state of popular opinion in the colonies, that a system of apprenticeship admits of adequate and legal protection being provided for?—If the question applies to the system of apprenticeship as provided by these Acts, I should say adequate protection had not been afforded to the negro; if I am asked whether adequate protection could be provided, then I am not prepared to say that it could not to a much greater extent than it is here, though the enactments must be such that no colonial legislature would think of passing them.

215. Are not the negroes in fact, while apprentices, labouring under the same kind of legal incapacity as minors, married women, and lunatics, and therefore do they not require more than ordinary legal protection?—They require more than ordinary legal protection, as does every individual who is in the power of another.

216. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you not see an indication of a spirit in conformity with the opinion you have just uttered in the appointment of special magistrates, for the purpose of giving them such legal protection?—There is, but the question resolves itself into this: has that been carried far enough to afford adequate protection to the negro; it is a question of degree.

217. Sir George Grey.] Was not that principle recognized in our Imperial Act?—No; because the Act did not provide that the special magistrate should not be a slave-owner; and if the special magistrate be a slave-owner, then the principle is not recognized. In the Imperial Act I do not see this laid down anywhere; and, in point of fact, I find by these Parliamentary Papers, that persons who were slave-owners have held commissions in many parts of the colonies; therefore I may safely say it was not recognized; but it is now.

218. Mr. Buxton.] You have complained that the planter is subject only to a penalty of 5*l.*, or an imprisonment of five days; is that 5*l.* sterling, or 5*l.* currency?—It would matter very little with regard to me, for I would not be satisfied with 50*l.*; however, it is currency.

219. Are you aware that 5*l.* currency is about 3*l.* sterling?—Yes; here is another instance of inequality taken from the Act in Aid; any person, not being an apprenticed labourer, who shall remove, or assist in removing any apprenticed labourer from this island in any boat or vessel, without the written consent of his or her employer, such person shall, for every apprenticed labourer he or she shall 0.58. remove,

John Jeremie, Esq. remove, or assist in removing from this island, forfeit the sum of 100 l., current money of Jamaica, to the use of the employer of such apprenticed labourer, to be recovered as servants' wages, before any two justices of the peace.

22 April 1836.

220. Lord Sandon.] That is under the summary power of the special magistrate?—Of their own ordinary justices; and why so? Because this goes to the employer; whereas, when the labourer is to be protected from the manager, they give the Crown 3 l. sterling, and send him to the courts of law for any other remedy he may find there.

221. Sir George Grey.] That is intended as an indemnity to the employer for the loss of the labourer and his services?—It is, shall remove or assist in removing.

222. Do not you think the removal must be complete?—Yes, I should feel inclined to think so. Here is another which I wish to call the attention of the Committee to: "that if any person shall harbour, conceal, or clandestinely or fraudulently employ any apprenticed labourer who may be absent from the service of his or her employer without leave, every such person so offending shall for every such offence, upon conviction thereof before any two or more justices of the peace, in case the party complained of be not an apprenticed labourer, and if an apprenticed labourer then before the special justice of the district on the complaint of the employer or employers of such apprenticed labourers, be adjudged to pay and shall pay to the person or persons entitled to the services of such apprenticed labourer the sum of 10 l. current money of this island, for each and every such apprenticed labourer so harboured, concealed, or clandestinely or fraudulently employed, and the further sum of 10 s. like current money per day for each and every such apprenticed labourer, for each and every day or part of a day such offender or offenders shall be proved to have been so harboured, concealed, or fraudulently or clandestinely employed. And upon the hearing of such complaint it shall and may be lawful for such justices of the peace, and they are hereby authorized and empowered, if they shall see just cause, to examine the party complained against upon his or her oath touching the matter of such complaint." Here then is a confession extracted from the party complained against on his oath. The sum awarded in consequence of this information goes to the employer, is levied by summary process, and is twice the amount awarded for the gravest offence that could be committed against the labourer; besides which, there is an indemnification of double the value, at least, for every day that this man may have been so concealed.

223. Lord Sandon.] It is not so much against the justice as the deficiency on the other side?—Yes.

224. Mr. Gladstone.] It is possible that the abstraction of the services of an apprenticed labourer might be of immense value?—It is the contrast that is glaring; and the regulation that the party accused is to be examined on oath is a very extraordinary thing in a penal enactment. I believe that many will consider the examination of a party an improvement; but that he should be examined on oath against himself is a novelty, and is contrary to every principle; it is going back to the old French law of 1671.

225. Mr. C. Lushington.] Suppose a negro be removed against his will, and he suffered injury in consequence, what redress can he obtain for such forcible removal and injury; is he considered merely as a chattel?—For any kind of injury that may affect the negro, the only sure remedy he has, the only remedy he can rely on, is 5 l. currency, to be levied by direction of a special magistrate, and he may have an action; but then the damages will be assessed by a colonial jury.

226. Sir George Grey.] The question was, whether supposing a third person?—With regard to a third person he is free. He has the usual remedy for false imprisonment; he is a free person.

227. That clause which imposes the 5 l. penalty does not apply to that case?—No, it does not.

228. Mr. C. Lushington.] There is no special redress to the negro removed under such circumstances?—No.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

John Jeremie, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

228*. Mr. Buxton.] WHAT is the next point which you propose to take?—That the negro is deprived of all indulgences he was entitled to by usage when he was in slavery, and therefore in this respect he is in a worse position than when he was a slave. I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee to the 11th enacting clause of the Imperial Act as compared with the 16th clause of the 1st Jamaica Act, which will be found in page 275 of the Printed Papers. By this Act of the Imperial Parliament, it was enacted “that during the continuance of any such apprenticeship as aforesaid, the person or persons for the time being entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer shall be, and is and are hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances, as by any law now in force in the colony to which such apprenticed labourer may belong, an owner is required to supply to and for any slave being of the same age and sex.” I take the purpose of the Legislature in framing the clause, to have been to allow the slave to enjoy all the rights that he possessed under any law then in force in any of the colonies. Now by immemorial usage, which I consider to be in effect equal to any written enactment, the negro in Jamaica had a right whilst a slave to various advantages which he has been deprived of as an apprentice, in consequence of the enactment contained in the 11th section of the Imperial Act being narrowed to one single law in the Jamaica Act. The 16th section of the Jamaica Act is as follows: “And be it further enacted, that during the continuance of any such apprenticeship as aforesaid, the person or persons for the time being entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer shall be, and are and is hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances as by an Act intituled ‘An Act for the Government of Slaves’ now in force in this island, an owner is required to supply;” therefore by this new law the privileges of the negro are narrowed to those set forth in one particular Act.

John Jeremie, Esq.

23 April 1836.

229. Chairman.] Do you mean to express an opinion, that it was the intention of the Legislature, that the slave in Jamaica should be entitled thereafter to any allowances or indulgences which were by law secured to a slave in any other colony?—No, certainly not; but to that which was by immemorial usage (which I consider a law in itself) secured to the slave in the island of Jamaica.

230. Lord Sandon.] The gist of your observation is, that usage has not been considered a law?—That the enacting clause, by confining the allowances to those granted by one particular Act, has enabled the planter to throw off the burthen of providing them with other things they invariably gave them previously, but which were not specified in that particular Act.

231. Were there other Acts under which they enjoyed other advantages, or were the other allowances enjoyed by custom only?—By custom or by immemorial usage; and these indulgences, as they are now called, (but which I conceive were rights, for I think they have been enjoyed from a remote period, a period the commencement of which cannot be traced,) those allowances are exceedingly important; they are “a weekly allowance of herrings, salt cod-fish, oatmeal, flour, sugar, rum, and sundry articles of clothing, at Cropover and Christmas;” and to “women with six children, a weekly or daily allowance, according to their respective cases, of rice, sugar, &c.,” and these et cetera, by immemorial usage, also comprised, I have reason to believe, the time allowed to a mother nursing, and the employment of a certain number of the negroes in cooking and preparing the labourers' meals ; for up to the period when the apprenticeship system was introduced, while the larger portion of the gangs were in the field, a certain number of younger or feebler negroes were employed in preparing and cooking the labourers' meals, so that they had them ready the moment they returned from the field, and could then take their rest for the remainder of the interval allowed.

232. From whence do you take that?—I take this from the memorial, but it is chiefly extracted from a case submitted by the planters of Jamaica themselves to a very eminent barrister in Jamaica on one side, and to the attorney-general on the other. Now all those allowances are withdrawn, or at least a construction has been put upon the Act by which they may be withdrawn.

233. Lord Sandon.] All the allowances you refer to depended on usage, and are not found in the Act?—Yes; I maintain that, under the words of the Imperial Act, which generally comprised all laws affecting Jamaica at the moment that Act passed, it never can have been the intention (at the moment, especially, when they were conferring important advantages on the negroes, and limiting the period of apprenticeship) to withdraw nearly every indulgence which rendered their condition tolerable; particularly indulgences granted to mothers nursing, or mothers of six children, or such as allowed field labourers to have their meals cooked, or by which they were supplied with rice, oatmeal, flour, and, above all things, with the allowance of herrings, or salt cod fish.

234. Chairman.] Do you mean to state that those allowances and indulgences have actually been withdrawn, or is your complaint confined to the legislature of Jamaica having declared that they cannot be legally enforced?—In this case it applies to both, if the information derived from the planters themselves is to be relied upon; if it be true that a construction has been put upon their own Act (not by the legislature of Jamaica, but by the bar), which has been acted up to by many, I do not say all.

235. Lord Sandon.] Are you aware whether those allowances were uniform; whether one common usage prevailed over the whole island?—I think I can assume, from my colonial experience, that all allowances of this kind vary occasionally in degree; but rights of this kind were possessed on all the estates; in some cases, perhaps, they might have had one hour more than in others; and throughout many of the islands, for instance, in the island of St. Lucia, there were enactments which secured those rights to the negro, very old enactments indeed; but that there was a uniformity of practice which the question I am now answering clearly pointed at, I will not assert.

236. Mr. Buxton.] Was not there a minimum of allowances to which all the slaves on all the estates were entitled?—I conceive there was not an estate in the West Indies where allowances of this kind, though perhaps differing in degree, and in their particular nature, were not made to the negroes.

237. Lord Sandon.] You mean, then, to give the validity of law to customs varying on each particular estate, which apparently depended on local circumstances, and on the disposition of the masters from time to time?—This Act might have been so drawn up, certainly, as to protect the negro in this particular; for instance, "and such other maintenance and allowances as by the Act referred to, and by immemorial usage;" those words, if inserted, would have covered everything.

238. Supposing those usages depended upon the will of the master of each estate, and that it depended on the will, not only of the master of each estate, as between each other, but between father and son; how would it have been possible to give the force of law to a usage which, in that case, could hardly be considered immemorial?—No; and therefore, perhaps, there might have been some difficulty there, which could still have been obviated by stating distinctly in this Act what should be considered a fair allowance in future.

239. What Act do you refer to?—The first Jamaica Act.

240. In fact, you think that the Legislature might and ought to have made a sort of supplementary code with regard to indulgences derived from the usage of the island?—Yes, or the law of other islands; for that which was usage there was law in Demerara, at St. Lucia, and in Trinidad, and especially in the enactments of the old Spanish and French laws; they should therefore have introduced clauses tantamount to those found elsewhere, or which would have afforded the allowances invariably invariably given previously, whatever those might be; thus a sort of average would have been struck, and a uniform scale established in the different plantations. John Jeremie, Esq.

23 April 1836.

241. A minimum would have been established?—Yes.

242. Mr. Gladstone.] Is not the objection you have now urged rather applicable to the construction of the Imperial Act than of the Colonial Act?—It may be so construed, though the words are, “and they are hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances, as by any law now in force;” then I certainly conceive an usage of some kind having obtained from time immemorial, there was a law under this Act; and therefore, if there remained any difficulty as regarded uniformity, it might have been settled by the Jamaica Act.

243. Do you not think there is a clear and palpable distinction between law and such an usage as this?—Immemorial usage is undoubtedly a law in all countries, and it was clearly the intention of the Legislature, I conceive, to secure to the negro everything he possessed by immemorial usage; in short, the intention of this clause, as far as my own judgment goes, is to grant to the negro every indulgence which he had been accustomed to in that particular colony.

244. Do you suppose it was intended that, under the apprenticeship, he should have by positive legal enactment, that which he had previously had in the form of favour?—I maintain that it could scarcely be considered a favour, that it rather partook of a right; but I shall further say, that even in that sense, had the Imperial Legislature conceived for a moment that the cod fish or herrings, that the right conceded in most of the other colonies to a mother of six children, to remain for at least one hour behind the others to nurse them, had been mere matter of favour, they would certainly have made such an enactment as would have secured them to the negro in future.

245. The fact that such indulgences were matter of legal enactment in other colonies, did not render it imperative upon the legislature of Jamaica to make them so in Jamaica?—If that 11th section of the Imperial Act be taken in connexion with the 16th of the same Act, it appears to me it will be found to have been imperative on the legislature of Jamaica to protect the apprentice in this particular.

246. Have the goodness to point out the words to which you refer.—The wording of this clause is very important: “And whereas it will also be necessary for the protection of such apprenticed labourers as aforesaid, that various regulations should be framed and established in the said respective colonies for securing punctuality and method in the supply to them of such food, clothing, lodging, medicines, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances as they are hereinbefore declared entitled to receive, and for regulating the amount and quality of all such articles, in cases where the laws at present existing in any such colony may not, in the case of slaves, have made any regulation, or any adequate regulations for that purpose;” and here they should certainly have introduced an enactment which should have secured rights so important to the slave as those he had hitherto enjoyed.

247. You conceive by the 16th clause there was a permissive power given to the legislature of Jamaica, on behalf of the apprentice, which power they have not thought fit to exercise?—I find the words, “if it be necessary” for the protection of the negro, then they shall exercise this power; and if it be admitted that the protection of a mother nursing, and the distribution of a certain supply of cod fish and herrings, and certain other things which had been given, were necessary for the negro, it was their bounden duty to frame such a law as would entitle the negro to them of right.

248. The expressions of the clause to which you refer are in the preamble; but the enacting part of the clause is permissive, is it not?—The enacting part of the clause is permissive throughout; but then we always return to the original question, Has the local legislature fairly fulfilled the intentions of the Imperial Legislature, when they confided this subsidiary authority to them? because the whole is permissive; and, therefore, I submit it can scarcely be maintained, that if the local legislature had done nothing, they would have been acting up to the spirit of the enactment.

249. Independently of the 16th clause of the Imperial Act, in your opinion, even under the 11th clause, taken alone, the 16th clause of the Jamaica Act does not satisfy the positive enactment of the Imperial Act?—I am of opinion that the 16th clause of the Jamaica Act does not meet the intentions of the British Legislature as set forth in the Imperial Act, taking the Imperial Act as a whole, and explaining explaining the 11th clause by the 16th. The 16th merely shows, according to my conception, that my original interpretation of the 11th was the correct one.

John Jeremie, Esq.

250. Chairman.] Are you able to state to what extent you conceive those indulgences and allowances to have been prevalent in the island of Jamaica?—I could only state from information, and it is probable that information will appear directly before the Committee; I should prefer confining myself in matters of practice to those colonies with which I am conversant.

251. Mr. Gladstone.] Supposing those allowances were kept up at the abolition of slavery in the form of indulgence, and also supposing there was generally, on the part of managers of estates, no disposition to withdraw them, would it not in that case have been a hardship on the owners and managers of estates that they should be compelled to give, under the form of law, what previously they had been in the habit of giving as indulgences?—I confess I do not see, if it was a fair allowance for the negro, why it should not be confirmed by law.

252. As fairness would be a matter of opinion, does not it depend very much on the distinction between law and equity?—Of course; but a minimum could have been affixed by the Jamaica legislature, and it strikes me that the allowance of a certain quantity of fish or salt beef, or something of the kind, ought to have been secured to the negroes in every colony.

253. Do you think it quite necessary that the negroes should have an allowance of animal food secured to them by law?—Undoubtedly. I conceive it only just that they should have it.

254. Do you conceive that necessary for the support of the labouring population in every country?—For their sustenance, to enable them to do their duty to their masters.

255. Are you aware how the labouring population of Scotland are supported?—In a great measure; but I am not aware that they are worked in the same way, and I know how sailors and soldiers are supported.

256. Do you conceive more work is done by the negro than is done by the agricultural labourer in Scotland in a day?—That is a very important consideration. I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think so. I have always considered that it was the system, not the labour, that consumed them.

257. Is it your opinion that, under all the circumstances of the case, the negro in Jamaica requires a stronger subsistence, than the agricultural labourer in Scotland?—Yes.

258. So much, that though the one can live, and live in health and strength, without animal food, it is necessary that animal food should be secured to the other by law?—Yes, and I will state my reason; they are acting under a very different impulse; the one is acting under the impulse of fear, the other of hope; the labourer of Scotland may remove to another place, the slave was tied down to his estate, and so is the apprentice; therefore, I have ever contended that, where a person was worked in the manner the negro was, (exclusively for the benefit of another, without any other stimulus than the dread of punishment,) it was requisite he should be sustained, supported and fed, and that he should obtain indulgences not necessary for the freeman, who could turn his abilities to any other purpose, and who had the hope of advancement before him.

259. Would you say, with regard to the present condition of the apprentice, that he laboured under no other stimulus than the dread of punishment?—During the period of apprenticeship principally.

260. If these matters remain in a great measure indulgences by the law of Jamaica, do not those very indulgences afford a stimulus so far as they go, independent of the fear of punishment?—They depend in a great measure on the will of the master, and therefore this is a capricious stimulus. A stimulus dependent on the pleasure of another, I consider a most precarious stimulus.

261. The question is not whether the tenure of the indulgence is precarious, but whether the indulgence does not afford a stimulus in its own nature distinct from the fear of punishment?—It affords that stimulus which is dependent upon the caprice of another.

262. Does not it afford a stimulus independent of the fear of punishment?—No doubt it may afford such a stimulus, but my objection to it is still the same, that it is dependent on the caprice of another man, which I consider very objectionable, and insufficient permanently to uphold the negro's energies.

263. Sir George Grey.] Do you know whether task-work has been adopted in Jamaica?—

Jamaica?—That again is a point of practice. I have heard of it as of other things, John Jeremie, Esq. and I dare say it has.

23 April 1836.

264. The necessary ignorance in which you are with regard to the practical details of the working of the system in Jamaica renders you unable to give a decided opinion that the negroes are subject only to the stimulus of fear?—That is the chief impulse; legally, that will be their condition.

265. The question is practically?—Then I can only say, that being entirely ignorant of the practice, I can give no opinion, negative or affirmative, on the question propounded.

266. Mr. Johnstone.] Do you mean to say that the agricultural labourers in Scotland live entirely without animal food?—I do not know.

267. Mr. Buxton.] You do not mean to maintain that universally all the labouring classes must, for the maintenance of life, have animal food supplied to them?—No; but I maintain that a person employed by another, and exclusively for his benefit, may expect to obtain as a right animal food occasionally, and that it is one of the fair and reasonable advantages which ought to have been provided for him in the Jamaica statute.

268. Mr. Johnstone.] Does the Jamaica Act for the government of the slaves, to which you have referred, provide any allowances for the negro?—It provides some, undoubtedly. I have not that Act before me, and therefore I cannot state the particulars as regards the original question relating to Scotland. I can only say of this as I did of Jamaica, that I judge by report.

269. Chairman.] Do you not think it possible that the spare time which is now secured by the apprentice in Jamaica may give him a power of obtaining those comforts and allowances which may, in some degree at least, dispense with the necessity of obliging the master to give them to him?—There are two provisions in the Act; the one with regard to the allowances and the maintenance, which applies in cases where a master supports his negroes, and there is another clause in the Act which applies to cases where the negro is indemnified by an increased time; it is evident, therefore, that the Imperial Legislature intended, according to the construction which I venture to put upon it, that where the master furnished his negro with provisions in kind, and not with time, those articles should be such as he had hitherto been accustomed to receive. That under the new Act, which allows the negro, in all cases, one day in the week or part of two, the negro may provide himself with additional means of enjoyment, is certain; but I conceive that the right application of these means would be to the improvement of his condition, the starting point (if I may use the term) being the same; that therefore the withdrawal of anything he previously enjoyed, is a diminution in some measure of the rights which are secured to him by the Imperial Legislature.

270. Lord Sandon.] Have you read the Act referred to in the Jamaica Act?—Yes, many years ago, but not recently.

271. Have you a distinct recollection of the provisions made by that Act, and whether they are or not sufficient for the maintenance of the negro?—Not so as to be able to give an opinion upon the subject. I should be rather inclined to think, that the enactment was exceedingly vague, something like “adequate allowances;” so that, as at present advised, I conceive it does not contain anything with regard to food in particular, which could be considered a sufficiently specific enactment; but it is now four years since I read the Act, therefore I am very unwilling (especially having had so many other things to attend to) to rely upon my memory in regard to its contents.

272. It will be necessary for the Committee to refer to that Act, for the purpose of seeing whether that did give sufficient maintenance to the slave?—Undoubtedly.

273. Mr. Buxton.] Is there any other observation you wish to make in respect to allowances?—I would merely take the liberty of observing, in reference to the allowances, that I conceive, under the 11th section of the Imperial Act, it may be a question whether all those allowances are not due at this moment by law; it is reported that the attorney-general of Jamaica has declared that they were due, and that there is a difference of opinion among the legal authorities there.

274. On the general construction of the whole clause, or any particular words?—On the words “any law” in force on that island; the attorney-general lays it down, that the words “any law” will embrace an immemorial usage; and if so, there must have been very great uniformity in the practice.

John Jeremie, Esq.

23 April 1836.

275. Sir George Grey.] Do you know that the opinion of the attorney-general was controverted by the opinions of other lawyers?—I am aware of that.

276. You are aware it is purely raising the question, what the meaning of those words is?—The meaning is certainly the point in question.

277. If it shall be declared by legal authority that those words comprise the allowances by immemorial custom, there will be an end of the question?—Not absolutely; because then there will be a question whether the allowances necessary for the supply of the negro, and which he enjoyed, were possessed by immemorial custom.

278. With regard to those allowances which you state to have been enjoyed or possessed by immemorial custom, those will be governed by the decision?—Those would be undoubtedly enjoyed by the negro; but it would then become a question of fact, whether those allowances, which are of great importance to the apprentice, and which he had enjoyed, perhaps, not by immemorial custom, but by the general practice of the island (though the quantity might have varied on different estates), were such as to be governed by that decision.

279. Did the attorney-general's opinion refer to that second class of allowances?—I have not read the attorney-general's opinion; I have read Mr. Battye's opinion; that went to say, as well as I recollect, that by the Jamaica Act the allowances and indulgences were narrowed to those specified in the "Act for the Protection of Slaves," and that the others were mere indulgences.

280. Mr. Battye's opinion did not touch the other allowances to which you have referred?—It did not draw any distinction, to the best of my recollection, between those enjoyed by immemorial usage and others.

281. You give your opinion, as a lawyer, that, under the 11th section, the words "allowances as by any law now in force in the colony, to which such apprenticed labourer is entitled," would include not only those prescribed by statute law in Jamaica and those enjoyed by immemorial custom, but those which, by any existing practice, had been enjoyed previously to the abolition of slavery?—No; on the contrary, I state that my opinion, as a lawyer, is the reverse, or else the enactment would not be so defective.

282. The question has regard to the enactments of our own Imperial Parliament?—My opinion here is, that it is sufficiently clear; but I consider that, by the 16th enactment, they have given directions (not merely a permission) to the local legislatures to regulate matters which it was impossible the Imperial Parliament could be practically acquainted with; and that among those directions is one requiring them to ascertain how far the allowances of food, maintenance, and so forth, were sufficient.

283. Which are those requiring them to see how far the allowances of food, maintenance, and so forth, were sufficient?—The terms are not there, the substance is in the 16th section.

284. Will you state the words which comprise the substance of that enactment?—"And whereas it will also be necessary for the protection of such apprenticed labourers as aforesaid, that various regulations should be framed," and so forth; "And for regulating the amount and quality of all such articles in cases where the laws at present existing in any such colony may not, in the case of slaves, have made any regulation, or any adequate regulation for that purpose;" I rely on the word adequate.

285. What do you understand to be meant by the word adequate in that clause?—All such sufficient maintenance and allowances as they are hereinbefore declared entitled to receive.

286. Where do you find that declaration?—In the 11th section, I presume.

287. Have you any doubt about it?—Not as at present advised, but I will not say that positively without reading over the Act.

288. Where would have been the impossibility in the Imperial Legislature adding after the word "law," in the 11th section, "or immemorial usage or custom?"—There would have been no impossibility.

289. You were understood to say that the Imperial Legislature did all they possibly could have done to meet the case?—Yes, I maintain that, because I conceive they meant to include as due by immemorial usage, and therefore by law, that which is now said to be matter of favour; the Imperial Legislature had not a sufficient practical knowledge of the management of estates in Jamaica to point out such details more particularly.

290. You think perhaps ignorance in the House of Commons of the practical management management of estates in Jamaica, prevented their making more adequate provision?—The want of information rather than ignorance, or the portion just read of the 16th clause would not have appeared there at all.

291. You conceive that that want of information was referable to those gentlemen who had taken an active part in informing themselves of the state of the colonies?—It is impossible for me to express an opinion of the intention of the House of Commons, except as I deduce it from this clause.

292. You think if they had been practically acquainted with the working of the law then in existence in Jamaica, they would have applied themselves to that?—I think the Imperial Legislature could not do more than they did with regard to those points of detail, but when this was submitted to the Jamaica legislature they should have applied themselves to it.

293. Do you conceive that the section of the British statute comprises allowances which had been enjoyed by immemorial custom, as well as those enjoyed by favour, and the precarious tenure of the caprice of the master?—It comprises undoubtedly the allowances enjoyed by immemorial custom, but not allowances enjoyed by the pleasure of the master; that is my view of it.

294. Mr. Buxton.] But supposing that when the subject was inquired into before the Committee of the Lords, the agent of Jamaica, Mr. Burge, there declared that immemorial usages and allowances had the nature of matters of law in Jamaica; would it not then appear to you, that enacting that all the laws for providing for the negroes should be enforced, comprehended also those immemorial customs?—This is a construction arising from extraneous circumstances; I should beg leave to submit to the Committee, that it were both an invidious, and, perhaps, an unnecessary duty, to express in that manner an opinion as to the effect of a declaration made by another gentleman. I am prepared to give my opinion as to the best construction to be put upon that Act, but I should be very unwilling to draw an inference from a declaration made by a gentleman in an inquiry which had passed long before.

295. Sir George Grey.] You perfectly agree that the word "allowances" includes all?—Yes, that the word includes all allowances sanctioned by immemorial custom, there we agree; but there comes a difficulty; it seems that, admitting that construction to be true, the negro may still be practically deprived of certain very important advantages he enjoyed before this Act passed, from this circumstance, that what was supposed to be an immemorial usage turns out, in the view of the master, to have been merely an indulgence; and if there was not (and it is assumed there was not) that uniformity which would warrant these allowances being considered a right guaranteed by law, then the Jamaica legislature, who were practically acquainted with all those facts, were bound to consider what was an adequate provision for the negro, and to secure it to him by statute. In the conception of the Imperial Legislature it was, I conceive, a right, the providing for which, if necessary, they transferred to them.

296. Your objection is, that the Jamaica legislature adhered to the letter of the British statute, but not to the spirit of it, in this respect?—It may be doubtful how far they adhered to the letter of the British statute. I think that, on the contrary, they appeared inclined to narrow it; the 11th clause of the Imperial Act governs the island of Jamaica now, not in consequence of their having adhered to it in the 16th section of their statute, but because there is a clause in the Imperial Act which provides that no local Act contrary to the terms of the Imperial Act shall be considered as law in Jamaica.

297. Would you call that 16th section of the Jamaica Act, however defective, repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act?—It is an omission; but whether an omission or a repugnance, there is an important clause in the Imperial Act, which declares that that Act shall be in force notwithstanding any regulation to the contrary.

298. Lord Sandon.] You complain of the inadequacy of the 16th clause, enacted for the purpose of providing for the negroes sufficient maintenance, clothing, &c.; still you say you have not read that Act lately; how, therefore, can you show its inadequacy, without knowing what it contains?—I complain of the 16th Jamaica clause narrowing the allowances given by any law to those specified in one particular Act, as I find it admitted by the planters themselves that there are allowances not comprised within that particular Act, which the negroes enjoyed anteriorly to the passing of those measures. Now those allowances, I contend, ought to have been guaranteed to the negro by the Jamaica legislature. I assume the fact on their own authority.

John Jeremie, Esq.

23 April 1836.

299. Sir George Grey.] Are they not guaranteed to the negro by the origin Act?—If they are sanctioned by such an immemorial custom as will be considered by the courts of Jamaica tantamount to a statute, then they are; if they are merely matters not so fully established, if they are what the planters call them, mere indulgences and matters of favour, they are not.

300. Lord Sandon.] If they were merely capricious indulgences, not sanctioned by immemorial usage, and varying on each estate, would you have thought it right to have those matters of law established over the whole island?—If they were necessary for the fair support and maintenance of the negro, I certainly should; if, on the contrary, they were not necessary for his fair support, then I should say it was not; but those are points they should have examined.

301. Not knowing whether they were necessary for the fair support and maintenance of the negro, how can you impeach the Legislature for not having secured them to the negro?—From the circumstance of difficulties having arisen, owing to the negroes being deprived of that which must have been necessary; for instance, from the fact of a mother of six children, or a mother nursing, not being allowed any additional time or increase of allowance; or the fact of the cooks hitherto employed by the gang, being done away with; all these are necessary in themselves. Then comes the question, whether they were indulgences, or sanctioned by immemorial usage, a point which cannot be determined here.

302. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware practically whether these indulgences in the case of the mother and the cook are now enjoyed by the negroes or not?—Practically of course, I must say (and it is the simplest answer), that I am not better acquainted with that point than with any other.

303. Lord Sandon.] If those allowances are the subject of immemorial usage they will be secured by the Imperial Law?—Yes.

304. Sir James Graham.] Admitting that the word “law,” in the 11th section, is studiously used in the broadest sense, for the purpose of admitting immemorial usage; coupling that with the 16th section, which is only a permissive power, given to the colonial legislature, do not you think that the object of the British Legislature was to let in a discretionary power according to varying circumstances?—A discretionary power with regard to anything more, but not with regard to anything he possessed when he became an apprentice.

305. Was not the question of the extent of right, or the variation of circumstances or of usages, left to the colonial legislature by the permissive words of the 16th clause?—All doubtful matters of that sort I should have thought to have been completely within the province of the colonial legislature.

306. And studiously left so by the terms of the 16th section?—And intentionally left so, and that is exactly the reason for which I complain of the omission.

307. Mr. Gladstone.] With reference to one of the points, namely, the mother of six children being required to remain for a short time behind the rest of the apprentices; is that one of the points you would characterize as one of absolute necessity strictly understood?—I think it was one of those fair rights which it was the intention of the British Legislature to secure to the negroes at the time they made them apprentices, for it was customary to give it them before, or an increased allowance, which comes to the same thing.

308. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that it is a matter of doubt whether the Jamaica Act comes up to the letter of the Imperial Act; do you consider, with regard to those allowances, that it fairly comes up to the spirit of that Act?—Certainly not, or I would not have raised the objection.

309. In the Imperial Act it is stated that “it is also necessary that provision should be made for preventing the imposition of task-work on any such apprenticed labourer, without his or her free consent to undertake the same; but it may be necessary by such regulations, in certain cases, to require and provide for the acquiescence of the minority of the prædial apprenticed labourers attached to any plantation or estate, in the distribution and apportionment, amongst the whole body of such labourers, of any task-work which the majority of such body shall be willing and desirous collectively to undertake;” do you think the 50th clause in the Jamaica Act corresponds, in letter and spirit, with that clause?—I consider it a very fair and judicious arrangement, that the adults alone should have to decide on a matter of that kind; but with regard to task-work, I think that the local legislature might have fixed a limit to the discretion even of the magistrate, though, when it is considered that there must not only be the consent of the magistrate but the consent of the majority of the adults, I think even that objection falls to the ground. I beg to say, that I conceive the Act may be easily evaded in all that relates to the provision-grounds, and other matters of that kind; the regulations with regard to the provision-grounds, which I consider defective, are embodied in the 45th and 46th clauses of the Jamaica Act; the Imperial Act merely directs that proper regulations should be made: "And whereas it is necessary in those cases in which the food of any such prædial apprenticed labourers as aforesaid may either wholly, or in part, be raised by themselves, by the cultivation of ground to be set apart and allotted for that purpose, that proper regulations should be made and established as to the extent of such grounds, and as to the distance at which such grounds may be so allotted from the ordinary place of abode of such prædial apprenticed labourers; and respecting the deductions to be made for the cultivation of such grounds from the annual time during which such prædial apprenticed labourers are hereinbefore declared liable to labour."

310. Lord Sandon.] Is not there a provision, also, in the 11th section of that Act?—"And in cases in which the food of any such prædial apprenticed labourer shall be supplied, not by the delivery to him or her of provisions, but by the cultivation, by such prædial apprenticed labourer, of ground set apart for the growth of provisions, the person or persons entitled to his or her services shall, and is or are hereby required to provide such prædial apprenticed labourer with ground adequate, both in quantity and quality, for his or her support, and within a reasonable distance"; and so forth. The 11th section has made it an enacting clause; and then the 16th section transfers to the local legislature the power of stating what might be the proper extent of the land, what should be a proper distance, and what was a fair time to be deducted from the 45 hours. Now with regard to the two first points, namely, the quantity of land and the distance, the local enactment states merely that it shall be "reasonable," which is quite insufficient. I refer now to the 45th and 46th sections: "And be it further enacted, that in cases in which the food of any such prædial apprenticed labourer is supplied, not by the delivery to him or her of provisions, but by the cultivation, by such prædial apprenticed labourer, of grounds set apart for the growth of provisions, the persons entitled to their services shall, and are hereby required, during the term of such apprenticeship and no longer, to provide such prædial apprenticed labourer with ground adequate, both in quality and quantity, for his or her support, and within a reasonable distance from his or her usual place of abode."

311. Sir George Grey.] Does not that follow the terms of the Imperial Act?—Yes, but it does not follow the terms of the 16th section; it was clearly the intention of the 16th section that the local legislature, being perfectly acquainted with the statistics of the island, should affix a limit both in extent and distance; and they have done neither, but left it altogether as it was before.

312. Does the 45th purport to have any reference to the 16th section of the Act?—They neither of them purport to have any such reference.

313. Does not the 46th refer to the 16th clause of the Imperial Act, the 45th having referred to the 11th: "And whereas it is necessary that proper regulations should be made and established as to the extent of such provision-grounds hereinbefore mentioned; and as to the distance at which such grounds may be so allotted from the ordinary place of abode of such prædial apprenticed labourer." Are not those words a transcript from the 16th clause of the Imperial Act?—They do amount to that.

314. Are they not a literal transcript?—I have not referred to that; I presume they will have been, for they have carefully studied the words.

315. Beginning with the words "all proper regulations?"—There is merely an omission of the words "provision-grounds hereinbefore mentioned;" it is substantially a transcript, but it is the enacting clause.

316. Does not the 46th clause prescribe the quantity, quality and locality of the provision-grounds?—No.

317. Will you point out in what respects that is deficient?—There is no reciprocity here; the negro must rest satisfied with what he had when in slavery, but the proprietor shall not be compelled to give him what he had when in slavery.

318. It may be inadequate, but does it not purport to define the quantity, quality and locality of the provision-grounds?—I believe I stated at first that the words were inadequate, calling the attention of the Committee to the 45th and 46th clause; according to my humble opinion it is very inadequate; there is a declaration in the 45th which, according to my view of it, signifies little or nothing; and the 46th, where further provision appears to have been intended to be made, does not bind the master to anything specific; it binds the apprentice, in so far as it requires he should be satisfied with what he had before; but the master may take away the half of that, and there is nothing in the 46th clause to prevent his doing so if he thinks fit.

John Jeremie, Esq.

319. Do not the 11th clause of our Imperial Act and the 45th clause of the local Act declare that the apprentice shall be provided with adequate ground?—Yes, the 11th more immediately.

320. Does not the 46th clause of the Colonial Act declare what shall be deemed adequate?—It declares that all grounds hitherto allotted shall be deemed adequate and proper.

321. If a question of adequacy was to arise before a special magistrate, would he not necessarily refer to the 46th clause, and if the land enjoyed by the apprentice were less than that enjoyed by him in a state of slavery, would he not be bound to say that that was inadequate?—No.

322. Is not your objection to the Act that there is not a sufficient criterion of adequacy?—That is one of the objections.

323. Mr. Gladstone.] Then by the 45th clause taken alone, and without reference to the quantity the apprentice had when under a state of slavery, directing that the apprentice's allowance of provision-ground shall be adequate for his support, is not the special magistrate the judge of its adequacy, and has he not the power of inflicting a penalty for its inadequacy?—He has the power of inflicting an inadequate penalty: I consider it the intention of the Legislature to specify what shall be considered an adequate provision, and I consider the 45th section defective, because the penalty is in itself inadequate, and that it is too vague as to the quantity and the distance.

324. Lord Sandon.] You consider that the 46th clause does not point out that specifically?—It does not point out anything as to a whole class, those who had no provision-grounds before. It says also, that the apprentice shall be satisfied with that: "Be it enacted that, for the purposes of this Act, all grounds hitherto allotted to every slave during such his or her state of slavery, for his maintenance and support, shall, during the term of his or her apprenticeship, in quantity, quality and locality, be deemed adequate and proper for the maintenance and support of every prædial apprenticed labourer, unless good and sufficient cause be shown to the contrary."

325. They shall be deemed to fulfil the intention of the Legislature?—Yes, unless the contrary be proved; but now, as regards the proprietor, if he were to make a diminution of a certain portion; there are many of them who have given a large quantity of provision-grounds, particularly in the islands not very generally cultivated, and where land is exceedingly cheap; there a proprietor has given several acres of land to his negroes; he did not want them. Now should he cut them down to one acre, or, we will say, to a quarter of an acre, or any less proportion, which would be evidently inadequate, there is nothing in the 46th section which would apply to this, though the 45th might; and, therefore, the 45th is the only one under which the special magistrate can proceed against the master; and the 45th being defective, from the causes above stated, I consider the objection well taken to the Act.

326. You think the 46th might have been expected to confirm to the negro that which he had before?—No; it establishes and supposes a maximum that he shall be satisfied with, and it fixes a vague, and, in many respects, unmeaning criterion.

327. Mr. Gladstone.] If an apprentice does not conceive that there is sufficient, cause may be shown to the contrary, if it can be made to appear to a special magistrate that the provision-ground in the time of slavery was inadequate to his support?—If he shows that it is inadequate, to the satisfaction of the special magistrate, there is no doubt that the employer is bound to supply him; but it is under the 45th rather than the 46th, the latter being merely a vague definition.

328. Is the effect of that clause virtually to throw us back on the 45th clause?—That is exactly the view I have taken.

329. You have stated that the enactment of the 46th is very vague, but does not it rest in the power of the special magistrate to reduce that vague enactment to a definite form, and is he not constituted a judge of what is adequate in quantity and quality for the support of the labourer?—To the extent of a penalty of 5*l.*, he is.

330. Supposing a case in which the apprentice complains of the inadequacy of the provision-ground, and the penalty is inflicted, and the master fails to furnish the apprentice with an adequate provision-ground; may not that penalty be exacted again and again by a special magistrate at his discretion, on the complaint of the apprentice, under the 45th clause?—Then the 48th clause might be made to apply, where the master has the option of supplying an ample maintenance, under the penalty of 40 s. for each offence, that would bring down the 5 l. to 40 s.

331. Still he would be liable to the same condition, which might be exacted again and again, as often as the offence was repeated?—It might be exacted again and again as often as the offence was repeated, provided a judgment were given on each occasion, which would set them always at variance.

332. The question refers not to the practice, but to the law?—Yes, but the question is how the law can be evaded or perverted.

333. The option would remain with the apprentice?—Yes, which would produce a spirit of ill-will and enmity, which might have been prevented by a proper enactment.

334. Lord Sandon.] Do you not think that, considering the difference in the quality as well as the great difference in the distance at which the provision-grounds are situate, that some of them are mountainous grounds and others flat, it would have been impossible to have laid down those provisions which would apply to each case in special words, and that the Legislature must have left the discretion in somebody, and that if that is to be left to somebody, it can be left to no one so safe as to the special justice unconnected with the localities?—I conceive, if the object had been merely to repeat the word “reasonable” or the word “adequate,” the 16th section of the Imperial Act would not have been framed; but that the intention was that some specific rule should be laid down, leaving a large discretion, but not a discretion of this kind to this public officer; for though the island of Jamaica is extremely extensive, and there are a vast number of negroes there, I see no reason why they should not have fixed a minimum of land, or a maximum of distance; for instance, why not have provided that the provision-grounds shall be within one mile, or within half a mile, or even they might have made a distinction as to the counties or parishes.

335. What would have been the advantage of so large a range; would it have been a real protection to the negro, or any protection at all; how was it possible to lay down any rule which might not have been abused, unless the special magistrate were to have the discretion which is here given to him?—I think a discretion so large as to afford no protection at all, could not have entered into the view of the Imperial Legislature.

336. Take an acre of mountain land, and an acre of fine alluvial land; you would not wish to say that they should have the same amount of each, as they are probably in the proportion of one to three?—I would have fixed a minimum in all cases.

337. What would have been the fairness to the negro of giving him one acre of mountain land, which would have been within the letter of the Act as laid down for the government of the magistrates?—It would have been undoubtedly within the letter of the law, but a minimum quantity might have been provided; but it is now so completely left to the discretion of the special magistrates that they can allow him ever so small a quantity.

338. What would have been the benefit to the negro of giving him a range within which the special magistrate might have given him ground hardly adequate as having no limitation at all?—It appears to me the object was to lay down certain specific rules for the conduct of an officer invested with very unpopular duties, and watched with extreme jealousy; and it was necessary, for the sake of the special justice, the negro, and the manager, that some kind of limit should be put on his discretion; it might be done with regard to counties, parishes, or districts; one district may be a flat country with a fine soil, or the reverse; in either case a minimum might have been fixed, say one for the parish of St. Ann’s, another for any other parish or county. There could have been no difficulty in establishing a scale here as in all other cases. I would not have bound them down tightly in quantity or quality, any more than I would a judge with regard to penal enactments, but some kind of maximum or minimum in certain cases, should, I think, have been affixed; for this discretion, I conceive, brings the manager immediately into collision with the special magistrate, whilst the enactment may be inadequate to afford a protection to the negro and others; but my chief complaint always resolves itself into a want of reciprocity, especially as regards the penalties.

John Jermie, Esq.

339. Mr. Gladstone.] May there not be cases where the subject matter in discussion is necessarily involved to a large extent, in which the fixing a minimum has a positive tendency to bring down the allowances and to keep down the allowances to that minimum?—There are many cases in which it will have that tendency.

340. Supposing the opinion to be well founded that this is one of those cases, the fixing a minimum might have been an absolute injury to the negroes?—If that was the opinion entertained by the framers of this Act, they were perhaps observing the spirit of the Act, but they were not observing its letter, which required that some kind of regulation should be drawn up, fixing bounds both as to extent and quality, that the negro should not be left solely to the special justice, nor the special justice, for his own sake, left in possession of so large a discretion. I consider the objection particularly important from knowing the value the negro sets upon his provision-grounds, and I know from experience the importance of specification in all these regulations.

341. Lord Sandon.] You think, under this Act, he could be deprived of some part of the provision-grounds he has hitherto enjoyed?—Yes, undoubtedly.

342. Do you mean at the discretion of the proprietor?—No, at the discretion of the special magistrate.

343. Mr. Buxton.] What is the next point to which you would call the attention of the Committee?—That the Act in Aid sanctions, indirectly, female flogging, even for prædial and domestic offences; that it strikes at the very spirit of the Imperial enactment.

344. Will you proceed to show in what manner it has that effect?—The Imperial Act, by the 17th clause, prohibits the whipping or beating of females for any offences whatever, except under some law or police regulation in force against and applicable to all other persons of free condition. It appears that the whipping of free females is allowed in houses of correction and workhouses; but on such occasions it is, of course, restricted to persons confined in those places by virtue of some general law, and not by virtue of laws relating to apprentices; but an apprenticed female, who has merely violated an apprenticeship enactment, may also be sent to the workhouse; and the moment she enters it she is subjected to the general regulations of that workhouse, and has been flogged, as I understand, in many cases, in consequence, so that the effect of these two enactments, taken together, is to subject females to flogging for domestic offences.

345. Lord Sandon.] You mean for the infraction of her duties as an apprentice?—Yes; by taking the 22d section of the Act in Aid (at the bottom of page 285), in conjunction with the 17th section of the Imperial Act; and on the point of practice, in this particular, my information is such as perfectly to satisfy me.

346. Chairman.] Do you mean to state that a female apprenticed negro, who is committed to the workhouse for an infraction of the apprenticeship law, is liable to be flogged in that workhouse without having committed any subsequent fault against the discipline of the workhouse?—Against the assumed discipline of the workhouse; the law having authorized her being sent to the workhouse, she is then subject to the discipline of the workhouse, and may be flogged, either at the discretion of the colonial magistrate or the superintendent, but for an assumed infraction of the discipline of the workhouse of course.

347. Is she, in that respect, placed on precisely the same footing as a free female would be if she was committed to the workhouse for any other fault?—Yes, she is placed on precisely the same footing, therefore it is an evasion of the spirit, but not the letter of the enactment; but I would observe, a free female could be sent to the workhouse only for an infraction of the general laws of the country, whereas this enactment authorizes the special justice to send an apprenticed female to the workhouse for any infraction of the laws between manager and labourer, and the moment she enters the workhouse she is subject to flogging.

348. Though it may be said in a certain sense she is flogged in consequence of having infringed the apprenticeship law, yet it cannot be said that her flogging is the punishment of having so infringed the apprenticeship law?—The moment she enters the workhouse she is no longer under the jurisdiction of the special magistrate; she enters immediately into the power of the magistrates of the district, who are planters; and having thus fallen into their hands, as it were, she is subject to all those abuses of power which (the very circumstance that laws of this kind have been enacted proves) they are supposed occasionally capable of committing.

349. Your objection is against the power of inflicting those punishments in the workhouse for breaches of the workhouse discipline?—It is against the power given given to the special magistrates of commuting the other punishments for incarceration in the workhouse.

John Jeremie, Esq.

23 April 1836.

350. Sir George Grey.] You think that clause of the Act, with the consequences that attach to it, is in great repugnance to the 17th clause of the Imperial Act?—It is an evasion of that clause; I have two objections to this clause: “And be it further enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for any special justice, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to substitute any given number of hours of work on the tread-mill in any house of correction, or otherwise, for any of the punishments imposed by this or any other Act on apprenticed labourers, as he in his discretion shall consider necessary and proper.” He may thus inflict an unlimited number of hours on the tread-mill for the most trivial offences. It gives him an immense discretion.

351. You state that the apprenticed female, by means of this clause of the Act in Aid, may be subjected to corporal punishment; are you able to point out the provisions of any gaol or police Act of Jamaica under which any female may be subject to corporal punishment?—I have among the Parliamentary Papers, at page 41, the speech of the Governor of Jamaica on the prorogation of the legislature of Jamaica on the 2d of February 1836. The Governor addressed them thus: “The whipping of females, you were informed by me officially, was in practice; and I called upon you to make enactments to put an end to conduct so repugnant to humanity, so contrary to law. So far from passing an Act to prevent the recurrence of such cruelty, you have in no way expressed your disapprobation of it; you have not even denied the truth of my assertion, and therefore must have credited it, notwithstanding you have taken no steps to put an end to the practice.”

352. Have you looked into the Gaol and Police Acts, and do you think that the punishment may be legally inflicted?—I have had them in my hands, but have no recollection of having examined them with that particular view. I cannot say positively whether there are regulations of that kind or not. I presume them to exist, from that declaration of the Governor of Jamaica to the colonial legislature.

353. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you conceive it would have been practicable altogether to do without some Act similar to that giving a power to substitute imprisonment in the house of correction for other punishments?—I think it might be expedient to authorize a special magistrate to substitute one punishment for another; but I should have two objections: first, that the power with which the special justice is invested is by far too vague and too extensive; and next, that if he were at liberty to substitute one punishment for another, it should have been that kind of punishment which would not have thrown the culprit into other hands, and thus rendered the punishment more severe than the original one.

354. Do you think that, in framing a sufficient punishment, you could altogether dispense with confinement in the workhouse or the house of correction?—With some species of confinement I think they could scarcely dispense; but I originally proposed that some place of confinement, exclusively intended for refractory apprentices, should be provided in every district, which would have been under the control of the special justices alone.

355. You would have it extended to providing a double system of gaols throughout the colonies?—Either to the providing a double system of gaols, or it might have been ordered that a female apprentice, when sent to the house of correction, should continue under the control of the special magistrate alone.

356. Mr. Buxton.] Might not a clause have been introduced declaring that no female sent to these houses of correction should be subject to corporal punishment?—No doubt it could; but now, as appears by the governor’s solemn declaration, the enactments of the Imperial Legislature on that particular point, a subject which produced such an effect on the public mind, are entirely set at nought.

357. Sir George Grey.] Are you competent to state, independently of that passage in the Marquis of Sligo’s despatch, that there is any law that does sanction the flogging of females in the gaols of Jamaica?—No; but I assume the law does exist from that part of the governor’s speech in which he calls upon the legislature to adopt regulations; for otherwise the governor could have himself prevented the practice.

358. Lord Sandon.] You are aware that the governor in his speech denominates the practice contrary to law?—I can have no conception of his motives for calling on the colonial legislature to remedy a practice which was contrary to law; he would have had the power himself to remedy it if was contrary to the local law; he evidently means contrary to the spirit of the Imperial enactment.

John Jeremie, Esq.

23 April 1836.

359. Sir George Grey.] Is your opinion of the practice being legal in Jamaica founded on that passage in Lord Sligo's speech entirely, or from an accurate examination of the Gaol and Police Acts?—Certainly not from an examination of the Gaol and Police Acts.

360. Mr. Burton.] What is the next point to which you would wish to call the attention of the Committee?—I believe I have gone through most of the points of general importance; there is another, which may be considered of minor consequence, though I think it as important as any in principle. I do not complain of the enactment as unreasonable in itself, though in my own opinion impolitic; but I object to the jurisdiction given to special magistrates in matters which have no immediate reference to the relation between manager and apprentice. I am aware that the subject matter of the enactment is a point which is much controverted by those who take an interest in these matters, and that even among the persons who generally take the same view of colonial questions which I have taken, a difference of opinion as to its propriety exists; I allude to the enactment by which special magistrates may remove apprentices forming themselves into a community. I do not bring this as matter of charge against the Jamaica legislature, but I object to the principle they have adopted; and I know that in other Acts in Jamaica this principle has been carried much farther, and therefore I raise an objection to the principle in the very first Act in which I see it set forth; the enactment is the 18th of the Act in Aid, which will be found at the bottom of page 284, Parliamentary Papers.

361. Sir George Grey.] To which part of the enactment do you object?—I object to the whole of the 19th and 20th sections, though if they referred to complaints by the masters or managers, I should see no objection to them; but that where the master makes no complaint, the special magistrate should be allowed of his own authority to inquire respecting the conduct of an apprentice in any particular, and that a penalty different from that which affects other free persons should be imposed upon them, for conduct which is not complained of by the manager, seems to me exceedingly wrong. If the manager claims no duty of them, why should not they be entitled to the same liberty in every respect as other persons.

362. Lord Sandon.] If there are no duties imposed upon them by law towards the manager, none which he prescribes them, would they be considered as neglecting their duty if the manager has not required them?—I should have said not, till I read this clause, but the object here evidently is to prevent their occupying waste land, even though the manager should not complain of it; and putting that construction upon it, I consider that the law, though perhaps the intention may have been good (which I do not admit), is injudicious, inasmuch as it gives a special justice powers which are beyond the purpose for which the office was created, and it places the apprentice under a sort of exceptional enactment. Now the apprentice, in all matters except those relating to his duty to his manager, should be on exactly the same footing as all His Majesty's remaining subjects in Jamaica; he should be tried by the same magistrates, subject only to the same laws. Then again, the Act itself ought to set forth only the relations between the negro and the manager; as an apprentice alone is he subject to the special justice.

363. What duties do you consider can be contemplated as abandoned, unless they are duties prescribed to him by the manager?—As long as the manager does not complain, I do not see why the special magistrate should interfere.

364. You conceive that his interference should be limited to the case in which the complaint should arise from the manager?—Yes.

365. If it shall be made to appear on the complaint of any manager, would that satisfy your objection?—Yes.

366. Sir George Grey.] You do not see how his duty can be neglected or abandoned, unless the manager does complain?—No; but the object here is to prevent those persons who have no immediate superintendent establishing themselves in a waste district in the interior. From my knowledge of the manner in which West Indian society is constituted, I see the effect intended to be produced; the purpose is to compel them to engage in a particular species of labour only, and to prevent them from employing their time in the manner they consider most advantageous to themselves, even though the manager should not interfere.

367. Lord Sandon.] You think a reference of this to the special justice is objectionable?—

objectionable?—Yes; because I consider that his interference should be confined to points arising between manager and apprentice. John Jeremie, Esq.

368. Would it not have been more objectionable if this discretion had been left to the colonial justice?—I conceive it would have been objectionable so long as any restriction was put upon the will of the apprentice, unless it arose from the complaint of the manager; I consider that the apprentice, except when the manager calls for his services, is as free a person as any other of His Majesty's subjects; that therefore he is at perfect liberty to establish himself in a "distinct community," if he thinks fit, provided his manager (the person having a claim on his services) does not complain.

23 April 1836.

369. Sir George Grey.] Do not you think that the absence of any complaint, upon the part of the manager, would afford an inference that the apprentices were not neglecting their duty?—Certainly not; in the manner in which this clause is worded, I conceive it means that any special justice, travelling through the country, and seeing a community formed of apprentices, may, of his own authority, without any previous complaint, disperse, arrest, and punish them, on the ground that they are neglecting to perform those habitual duties imposed by law on apprentices.

370. Chairman.] Can this take place without any evidence that they have such duties to perform?—There must be some means of ascertaining who are apprentices in Jamaica: then taking the first in conjunction with the second clause, "Any apprenticed labourers who shall without lawful authority have established themselves in a distinct community," may be dislodged by a justice of the peace, and then any "apprenticed labourer convicted of having been a member of any such community, may be punished by a special magistrate by imprisonment with hard labour for a period not exceeding six months, and if a male by flogging, not exceeding 50 stripes." Now I cannot imagine why a clause of this kind should be inserted, when it does not appear that the person entitled to the apprentice's services has complained.

371. Sir George Grey.] With regard to giving the jurisdiction to the special justice, do not you think it would have been more opposed to the spirit of the Imperial Act if they had given the jurisdiction to the colonial magistrate, bearing in mind the first words of the 4th clause of the Imperial Act, "And for ensuring the effectual superintendence of the said apprenticed labourers;" as this matter relates to the superintendence of the apprenticed labourer, do you not think, setting aside for a moment the expediency of the clause of enactment, it was more wisely conferred upon the special magistrate than the colonial magistrate?—If it was correctly conferred, certainly.

372. Lord Sandon.] It may be less liable to abuse?—It will be less liable to abuse. It is not to the nature of the enactment that I object, but to the principle laid down; it infringes on the rule that an apprentice, in all matters which have no reference to his master, should stand on exactly the same footing as a free man: this is the first exception to this rule which appears, and perhaps it is to be regretted that the objection arises in reference to an enactment which would be so little objectionable in any other sense; but if once an attempt be made to legislate exceptionally for this class of subjects, there is no knowing how far it will go, and perhaps slavery may thus be introduced in another form.

373. Chairman.] Have you now gone through all the material objections which you entertain to the Jamaica Acts, as being inconsistent, either in letter or in spirit, with the British Act on the subject of negro apprenticeship?—As regards the first and second Jamaica Acts, I have pointed out the principal and most material objections; but there are other objections, not so important in themselves, which I (under all circumstances) will not press upon the Committee myself. I concur in many of them; as to others, I do not see that they are so striking; but those I have submitted I consider exceedingly material, and some others which I have not urged, such as the power of imprisonment, are open to great abuse. If, therefore, I do not carry my objections farther, I beg it may not be understood that I see no farther objection.

374. Mr. Burton.] But in addition to the specific objections you have made, do you not think that there is one great objection against the Jamaica law; namely, that the insufficiency of the punishments awarded in the 49th section against the manager, goes far to vitiate the effect of the whole Act?—Undoubtedly I do; I consider that that 49th section alone has in a great measure changed the nature of the apprenticeship. I entertain the same objection to the present apprenticeship and to the office of a special magistrate, as at present established, that I did to the protectorship under the amelioration system; the special magistrate being deprived of sufficient power over the manager, becomes in some degree his mere agent. I objected to the protector, because he had no right to inflict a punishment on the negro; he could only inquire into the manager's delinquencies, passing over those committed by the labourer. I object to the special magistrate now, because he cannot visit with adequate punishment the offence of the manager, and that therefore he can only entertain effectually complaints against the negro; and as the protector was an object of terror to the manager alone, so, under these Acts, the special magistrate becomes an object of terror to the labourer alone.

John Jeremie, Esq.

23 April 1836.

375. Chairman.] Is it the inadequacy of any part of this punishment, or the want of reciprocity, of which you complain?—It resolves itself ultimately into a want of reciprocity. The special magistrate is invested with abundant power whenever he is called on to inflict punishment on the negro; but his powers are merely colourable whenever he is called on to inflict a punishment on the manager, and thus the middle course, which I think was intended by the Imperial Legislature to be taken, has not been taken. I conceive the intention of the Imperial Legislature was to place a person, invested with sufficient powers, between the manager and labourer; and therefore he should have possessed authority to inflict a sufficient punishment on either, as either might happen to be the delinquent.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

John Jeremie, Esq. called in; and further Examined.

25 April 1836.

376. Mr. Buxton.] AT your last examination you stated that the insufficiency of the penalties enacted in the 49th section of the Jamaica Act went far to nullify the whole Act; do you consider that if all the other clauses were rendered what would be in your contemplation perfect, the effect of the Act would be such as the British Parliament expected, if that 49th section were not also amended?—I should think that the insufficiency of the penalty contained in the 49th section deprives the Act of an executory principle; it is open to the objection so repeatedly urged from the days of Edmund Burke to these colonial enactments,—How is it to be executed with regard to the manager? You have the words but you have not the remedy; the language but not the substance. My objections to the 49th section are twofold: first, (as I have already ventured to submit to the Committee) there is a want of reciprocity, and that arises from a comparison of the clauses which affect the manager with those which affect the labourer; they inflict penalties on either, but in the one case they are adequate in the other inadequate. My second objection is, that as that clause recites all the obligations of the manager, or nearly so, and as the penalty enacted by that clause is the only one that can be inflicted on him, and is, according to my conception, exceedingly inadequate, it follows that you have no adequate means of enforcing the law in any case against the manager, except by having, in extreme cases, recourse to the common law.

There was also a question put to me by a Member of the Committee, who is not present at this moment, upon which I should wish to offer some explanation. This learned member, on my observing that a negro who had been worked for 42 hours in succession might proceed at common law for cruelty, even though the present Act

John Jeremie, Esq.

25 April 1836.

Act might not contain any prohibitory enactment on that point, put this question in so strong a light, that in my answer, my original opinion was, I confess, considerably shaken. I have now considered that point with all the attention it deserves, and it is my deliberate conviction that the first opinion I expressed was the correct one, and though differing from the very high legal authority which put those questions to me, I am, with all proper diffidence of course, prepared to maintain that first opinion.

377. Is there any proviso in any of the Jamaica Acts restricting the master from employing an apprentice for 45 hours in continued succession, except as to field labour?—None, except as to field labour.

378. Then, independent of being so employed as a punishment, you conceive he might be employed for 45 hours in succession in other than field work?—In other than field work, or for 45 hours in succession, or nearly in succession, partly in field work and partly in manufacturing labour, provided the field work does not exceed the nine hours within the 24.

379. Mr. Gladstone.] Why not entirely in succession?—Because when the negroes are employed in field labour, the clause which relates to field labour comes into operation, and it requires there shall be an intermission of about three hours for meals.

380. Sir George Grey.] You think if no part of that was constituted of field labour there might be that continuous labour, 45 hours, without time for rest or meals?—Under that Act; but I am also of opinion, that the common law as to cruelty, or immoderate coercion, would come into operation, which was the way in which I put it originally, as I have already explained.

381. Mr. Burton.] In the 11th clause of the Imperial Act it is enacted, "That during the continuance of any such apprenticeship as aforesaid, the person or persons for the time being entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer shall be, and is and are hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances, as by any law now in force in the colony to which such apprenticed labourer may belong, an owner is required." This is attempted to be carried into effect by the 16th clause of the first Jamaica Act, and the way in which it is done, is by requiring the owner "to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances, as by an Act, intitled, 'An Act for the government of Slaves,' now in force in this island, an owner is required to supply." Have you examined that Act denominated an Act for the government of Slaves?—Having been directed by the Committee at its last meeting to do so, I have examined it with some attention.

382. Do you conceive that that Act for the government of slaves accomplishes those objects which the Imperial Act intended to accomplish?—No.

383. Sir George Grey.] Was that Act for the government of slaves passed before or after the Imperial Act?—It was passed before the Imperial Act.

384. How can it carry into effect the intention of the Imperial Legislature, if passed before the intention was declared?—It certainly was not drawn up for the purpose of carrying into effect the intention of the Imperial Legislature, being antecedent; but the Jamaica Legislature by their subsequent Act, in which they professed to carry into effect their intention, having referred to and adopted this Act anew, it may in that case be considered as part of the second Act.

385. Was there any other Colonial Act which could be contemplated by the 11th section of the Imperial Act?—To be able to answer that question I must be acquainted with all the Jamaica Acts, and I am not so.

386. Are you enabled to state whether there was any other Act in force in Jamaica to which the 11th clause of the Imperial Act could refer?—I am unable to state that, but I should feel inclined to say that there was not. From the preamble to this, by which it is stated that "it is expedient that the laws now in force relating to slaves should be revised and consolidated," I should thence infer there was no other; but I cannot be positive without further reference.

387. Supposing there had been any such Colonial Act in force for the purpose at the time of passing the Imperial Act, would not that be comprised within the 11th section of the Imperial Act, so as to entitle the negro to such advantages as such Colonial Act would give?—I should think it would.

John Jeremie, Esq.

25 April 1836.

388. Consequently, must it not be assumed that the intention of the British Legislature had reference to the law now in your hand?—It had in view the confirmation of that law to a certain extent, but it was open to examination; and I should distinctly say, that it could hardly have had that law in view, taken alone.

389. Does it not appear that it must have had that law in view, taken alone, supposing that to be the only slave law then in existence, and that there was no other Colonial Act in reference to food, clothing, lodging, medicine and other articles, which could be referred to by the 11th clause?—As far as the 11th section of the Imperial Act alone goes, I should be inclined to think that the intention of the Imperial Legislature was merely to confirm, and to give its own sanction to the laws in existence at the time in the various colonies, and, therefore, to that extent it was so, if that was the only Act then in existence in Jamaica.

390. Mr. Buxton.] In the 16th clause of the Imperial Act there is a farther enactment, “And whereas it will also be necessary, for the protection of such apprenticed labourers as aforesaid, that various regulations should be framed and established in the said respective colonies, for securing punctuality and method in the supply to them of such food, clothing, lodging, medicines, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances as they are hereinbefore declared entitled to receive, and for regulating the amount and quality of all such articles, in cases where the laws at present existing in any such colony may not in the case of slaves have made any regulation, or any adequate regulation for that purpose. Do you consider, after examination of that Act, that adequate regulation is made for supplying them with food, clothing, lodging, and so forth?—No.

391. Be pleased to state your reasons?—The only clause I find with regard to clothing states that they shall provide and find for each slave proper and sufficient clothing, to be approved of by the justices and vestry of the parish. Here is a complete want of specification, and the justices and vestry of the parish are necessarily colonists, probably slave owners.

392. Mr. Gladstone.] Supposing an apprentice consequently, under that clause of the consolidated slave law as it was, complains that his clothing is not proper, or not sufficient, will it remain in the hands of the vestry to determine whether his complaint is justified or not, or will it not be referred, with other matters affecting his rights, to the special magistrate?—I think either construction may be fairly put upon the Acts taken conjointly. I should think by the 49th section, taken singly, that it would be within the province of the special justice; but when it is observed that the only local Act in which there is any mention of clothing designates distinctly a particular authority as the sole judge of the adequacy, then it may be fairly argued that the general authority of the special magistrate is narrowed to ascertaining whether the planter has given what the parochial vestry have declared to be sufficient. The 49th section is a general clause, investing the special magistrate with authority in all the relations that regard the master and the apprentice; and as the clothing is mentioned in it, among other matters, it may be a doubt whether the special magistrate's authority does not extend to deciding on the adequacy of the clothing; but as the only enactment in which the clothing is distinctly specified happens to be that by which the points of adequacy or sufficiency is exclusively referred to a particular authority, then arises the question (and a very important one it is) whether the power of the special magistrate is not narrowed to ascertaining if the clothing declared sufficient by the parish and vestry has been actually delivered.

393. That Act does not empower the vestry of the parish to lay down with the force of law the amount of clothing which should be considered proper and sufficient?—No, it does not direct the vestry of the parish to lay down that point with the force of law, but it refers to the vestry of the parish the question of sufficiency in each particular case.

394. Then where the jurisdiction of the vestry of the parish over apprentices is taken away by a subsequent Act in toto, and every kind of offence committed by the apprenticed labourer is transferred to the special magistrate, does not it necessarily follow that the cognizance of the offence under that clause must be also transferred?—I do not put a construction upon the Act which would authorize me in saying that every case of offence mentioned in the 49th section is necessary to be referred to the special magistrate; if I were to do so, a special magistrate only could take cognizance of a variety of cases, for which the apprentice has, in my opinion, recourse to a court of law.

25 April 1836.

395. Have the goodness to refer to the 20th section of the Jamaica Act; it is there stated that the special justices "shall solely and exclusively take cognizance of all offences committed, or alleged to have been committed, by any such apprenticed labourer, or by his or her employer, in such their relation to each other, or of the breach, violation or neglect of any of the obligations owed by them to each other." Now, adverting to the fact that the right of remedy in the superior courts is subsequently reserved to the apprentice, still for those minor complaints, does it not appear in the first instance that such a complaint as that relating to clothing can be considered only as one of the minor complaints, and cannot be followed out in one of the superior courts?—I should be unwilling to admit that that relating to clothing could be considered as a minor offence, if the offence were often repeated, in relation to a gang; but I should desire, in construing statutes, to give effect to both, if they can be reconciled; they are neither of them abrogated; now here I consider they both can be reconciled: the justice is to have jurisdiction, therefore an action can only be maintained before a special justice; but then if the owner produces a certificate from the vestry, declaring that the labourer has been adequately supplied with clothing, I do not think the special justice could overrule such a certificate, because the point of adequacy is specifically referred to this particular authority by the statute now in force.

396. You give that as your deliberate legal opinion?—I think it a fair question of doubt, and one of those questions which should have been settled beyond doubt.

397. Sir George Grey.] Will you look at the 19th section of the Imperial Act?—It is a repetition of the Jamaica section, very nearly.

398. Are not these words, "any law, custom or usage in any of the colonies to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding," additional?—My opinion is the same on both.

399. In your opinion that does not give the special magistrates power of judging of the adequacy of the clothing?—I do not say that does not give the special magistrates the power of judging; I say that where the clothing is not furnished they may levy a penalty, but that they may be bound to take the declaration of the vestry with regard to its sufficiency; that construction may I think be fairly put upon this Act.

400. Mr. Buxton.] You go no further than saying this was one of those dubious points which should have been settled satisfactorily?—That it was one of those points which the British Legislature intended should be settled; and further, I have the same objection to this clause that I have to all the others of the kind; I do not think that the intentions of the Imperial Legislature have been fulfilled by a clause so vague as this; the quantity of clothing should have been distinctly specified, a minimum and a maximum should have been pointed out; and I am the more inclined to put this construction on these enactments when I recollect how repeatedly these questions had been debated in the course of the West Indian controversy. It was then laid down as a principle that enactments which contained no distinct specification were easily evaded, and therefore that in all matters relating to this particular subject the specification should be distinct and complete.

401. Sir George Grey.] Is not that an objection rather to the Imperial Act than the Colonial?—No; I consider that it was for the purpose of obtaining that specification that the 16th section was inserted in the Imperial Act.

402. Do you not think that the 16th section includes cases in which specification was not made, as well as those in which it was made?—Undoubtedly; because there were colonies in which adequate provision had been made, and more than adequate provision, in my opinion; for instance, those governed by the Order in Council of November 1831.

403. Do you consider that this 16th clause applies to those governed by the Order in Council as well as by colonial legislation?—It applies to all.

404. Do you think that there were any legislative colonies where an adequate regulation was made at that time?—It is impossible I should give an answer to that question without having before me all the regulations of the colonies; but I rather think the Committee will find that in Antigua there was a specification,—I am speaking now from recollection, and very vague recollection indeed,—but my opinion is that there were colonies in which things of that kind were specified, indeed I am sure they were at Bahamas, whether adequately or not, I cannot say.

405. Your opinion is that the regulations could not be adequate unless such a specification was contained in the law?—That is my opinion.

John Jeremie, Esq.

25 April 1836.

406. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware whether there were any colonies in which no law at all regarding the clothing of the slaves was in existence?—There were colonies in which those laws were exceedingly vague; for instance, there was one in which it was stated the slaves should receive clothing proper and sufficient, “according to the custom of the colony.” It was to meet such cases, in my opinion, that the 16th clause was inserted; between the “custom of the colony” and the “decision of a vestry” in such matters I conceive there could be very little difference.

407. Sir George Grey.] Are you to be understood to say, that supposing the special magistrates have constituted themselves judges of the sufficiency of clothing, independently of the decision of the vestry, they have acted illegally, or merely that you express a doubt?—I put it in that way; that the Act may be fairly construed in either sense; that it is a case which might be brought into a court of law with strict propriety. Had I been a special magistrate of Jamaica, I would have felt inclined to assume jurisdiction; but I should not have been surprised at its being disputed, or at a court of law determining against it.

408. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think that it was the intention of the British Parliament that the colonial legislature should pass an Act confirming the maintenance and allowances given, if they were adequate, or giving, if they were inadequate, additional allowances?—If they were adequate, I consider that they were already confirmed by the Imperial Legislature, provided their adequacy was contained in some law which then governed the colony; but certainly, on the fullest examination I can make of the 16th clause, when I see the words quantity, quality, locality, method, punctuality so often repeated, with “it is necessary for their protection,” and so on, then I consider that some kind of specification was expected; and when I recollect that that was the great question between the colonists and the Government previous to this Act being passed, I conclude that the intention evidently was no longer to leave the negro and the magistrate, who are appointed to protect the negro, in doubt as to the exact nature of his rights.

409. What is the date of the slave consolidation law to which you refer?—The 19th of February 1831.

410. Lord Sandon.] Are you aware whether the inadequacy of the Jamaica law upon those points had been a subject of complaint before the emancipation of the slaves; was it not rather referred to as a standard of comparison in other colonies?—No; this Act was referred to in consequence of the large allowances made to prisoners, and it was a strong objection, often urged on the part of the abolitionists, that while prisoners in Jamaica were so well fed, they had not thought fit to give the same allowances to their slaves, who were not prisoners.

411. The contrast was between the slaves of Jamaica and the slaves of other colonies?—The enactment referring to prisoners was constantly quoted with respect to all the colonies whenever a scale appeared from any of them, and also with regard to the Jamaica planters, and they were asked why, when they could establish so satisfactorily a scale for their prisoners, they could not establish a similar scale for their slaves, who were not prisoners.

412. Are there any other points on this Act?—I have taken only the clothing yet; I make the same objection to the whole, the want of a specification.

413. Mr. Gladstone.] Is the sufficiency of the food and of medicines determinable under the Jamaica slave law by the same authority as the sufficiency of the clothing?—No.

414. To whom are they referred?—With regard to the negro grounds, (this relates to food,) as it may be said, their adequacy was referred to the manager, himself; this point now devolves on the special magistrate. The only clause I can find respecting negro ground is the 11th, merely stating, “that every master, owner, or possessor of any slave or slaves, or his or her overseer or chief manager, shall, under the penalty of 10*l.* for each neglect, cause the condition of the negro grounds to be inspected once in every month at least, in order to see that the same are cultivated and kept up in a proper manner, of which oath shall be made as in this Act is hereafter directed; and whereas in some parts of this island there may not be lands proper for the cultivation of provisions, or where by reason of long continuance of dry weather, or other casualty, the negro grounds may be rendered unproductive, then and in that case the masters, owners, or possessors do by some other ways and means make good and ample provision for all such slaves as they shall shall be possessed of, in order that they may be properly supported and maintained, under a penalty, not exceeding 20*l.*” That is the only clause with regard to the manager.

John Jeremie, Esq.

25 April 1836.

415. With respect to any default of duty on the part of the manager with reference to provision grounds, do you not conceive that would at once fall under the jurisdiction of the special magistrate, without any possible intervention of the vestry of the parish?—I should; but I also make the same objection to this, owing to a want of specification, and its being so exceedingly indefinite; besides, the penalty would then be reduced from 20*l.* to 5*l.*

416. Lord Sandon.] If you found that practically that vagueness had been interpreted in favour of the more protecting view, you would think the vagueness of the legislation was of little importance?—Combining the law with the practice, it is clear that many things which strike one as extraordinary in the law may not be practical grievances.

417. Mr. Gladstone.] The force of an objection of that kind depends in a great degree on the supposition of a partial magistracy?—The objection resolves itself into this, that the discretion of all magistrates should be limited by law. This should be the case with magistrates in every country, and doubly so when they are required to execute duties of this unpopular kind, and when their powers are of so partial a nature.

418. Mr. Buxton.] If, on the one hand, it turned out that the allowances were such as a more liberal system would require, your observations would lose much of their weight; so, on the other hand, if it turned out that an illiberal system were pursued, would not your observations gather additional force?—If I may be allowed to offer an opinion, I think my observations would be much the same in either case; for I should always have an objection to matters of clothing, food, medical attendance, and such others being dependant upon the pleasure of any single individual, who may change the allowances from those which his predecessor had given, and thus, in fact, alter the whole regime and management of an estate. I know nothing more likely to produce confusion and disorder among such communities than the exercise of a discretion of that kind, which ought not to be confided to any man, however respectable.

419. Lord Sandon.] At the same time, the importance of the practice, under a law to exist only five or six years, is not of the same amount as with respect to that under a law of longer continuance?—All these objections are, taken in relation to the great question of freedom, but of secondary importance. If I could see that the negro would have full protection hereafter, I should not be so anxious about his condition for three or four years, provided he were fairly protected from anything like extreme hardship or cruelty in this interval; but my main objection to the whole of these laws relating to the apprenticeship is, that with perhaps two exceptions, they seem to me to be nothing more than slavery under another name.

420. Sir George Grey.] What are the two exceptions?—The two exceptions are, that the period of probation is limited; a most important exception: the negro knows when this is to be over, which I consider in itself a great source of comfort to him, and likely to support his spirits under present harsh treatment. The second exception is, that though I consider the power conferred upon the special magistrates inadequate, still the circumstance of about 100 gentlemen being scattered over that country, men unconnected with slavery, and having a right to inquire into prædial management, will be likely to check ill-treatment in a great degree.

421. Are these the only two modifications of the former system of slavery, as existing in Jamaica, which you think exist at present?—I do not say that they are the only modifications, but that they are the only two to which, practically, I attach extreme importance.

422. You attach no importance to the fact of the negro having a considerable portion of time at his own disposal, when he may work for wages?—I consider that nearly counterbalanced by the fact that he may be employed for 45 hours in succession.

423. Should you not consider that counterbalanced by the fact, if you found that nine-tenths of the negroes were in possession of additional time, which they were now employing for their own benefit?—I believe my replies to the two first questions which have been put to me to-day were not heard by all the members of the Committee: they referred to this point, that not only negroes under punishment may be worked 42 hours in succession, but even the whole gang, provided they are not engaged in field labour only, may be so worked 45 hours; therefore the negro under punishment may be worked for 60 hours.

John Jeremic, Esq.

424. Assuming that that extreme case has never in one instance occurred; assuming, on the other hand, that nine-tenths of the negroes now in Jamaica do work for wages during their extra time, should you say that that is not an important modification of the former system of slavery?—It is a great modification undoubtedly, as a legal modification; but I believe that cruelty may be practically exercised, in consequence of the Jamaica Act not having provided adequate protection, and this one advantage be thus counterbalanced by another hardship; though it is still a valuable modification, but not of that importance that I consider the two others.

425. Do you not think the modification of importance as it affects the character of the negro and his future comfort?—I think the greatest modification is that which puts an end to slavery altogether within a limited time: it may be so, but in a minor degree.

426. You do not attach much importance to that?—Not much comparative or relative importance, because advantages of that kind may be counterbalanced by other disadvantages. There is another hardship which I have not mentioned, because I have not looked into the regulations sufficiently to ascertain its correctness; I have it only on the declaration of others: by the manner in which this Act is worded, the planter has the right, it is said, of almost unlimited imprisonment; and that, I conceive, would counterbalance many an advantage. The reasons I have not called the attention of the Committee to that are, first, that I had not fully ascertained the fact, and that now I consider it rather arises from an error of the transcriber than from intention on the part of the Legislature; though the law, as it now stands, is certainly open to a very dubious construction. It is contained in section 39 of the said Jamaica Act, p. 278 of the Parliamentary Papers: “And be it enacted, that on every plantation the special justices shall appoint one or more of the apprenticed labourers thereon, with the consent of the master or manager, to be constables, who shall be empowered to maintain peace and order on such plantation, under the directions of the proprietor or manager thereof, and to secure and place in confinement any apprenticed labourer who shall commit any offence on such plantation, or any apprenticed labourer not employed on such plantation who may be found loitering thereon without the knowledge or permission of the proprietor or manager thereof; such apprentice confined as aforesaid not to be kept in custody longer than shall be necessary to procure the attendance of the special justice: provided always, that if the attendance of a special justice cannot be procured within twenty-four hours, it shall and may be lawful for the proprietor or manager aforesaid to order the release of such apprentice so confined as aforesaid after the expiration of twenty-four hours.” Now, therefore, if the attendance of a special justice is not procured for a fortnight, the man may be kept in prison for that fortnight, though the object, as I would have supposed on reading this Act, was exactly the reverse. Instead of “it shall and may be lawful,” it should have been rendered “incumbent” upon the proprietor to do so; that is, I think, clearly the intention of the framers of the Act.

427. Have you referred to page 34 of the First Part of the Parliamentary Papers, and read the observations of Lord Stanley upon that very section?—I have read them.

428. Have you looked into the Act in Aid to see whether there is any alteration made with respect to those provisions?—I believe there is not; Mr. Bildam, who has looked through it carefully, informs me that he has not been able to find any alteration; but even Lord Stanley does not appear to have taken exactly the same objection; it is in substance perhaps the same, but not precisely the same on the score of time. Lord Stanley points out other defects and omissions, none of which appear to have been adopted; so that the clause giving an undue power of imprisonment to the manager over the negro, if he chooses to exercise it, I consider still open to objection.

429. Your objection would be met if periodical visits were made within a less period than you have stated by the special magistrate to every estate?—It would be diminished.

430. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you disposed to think that under this clause the manager is obliged to procure the attendance of a special justice as soon as possible:

sible; the words are "such apprentice confined as aforesaid not to be kept in custody longer than shall be necessary to procure the attendance of the special justice"?—The word "necessary" would go to that.

25 April 1836.

431. Sir George Grey.] Will you turn to page 43 of the first of the series of Parliamentary Papers; in the fourth paragraph of Lord Sligo's despatch you will find the construction he puts on that passage to which you refer; what is that construction?—The reverse of that I have mentioned: "Now the Abolition Act provides I think sufficiently against this, because it decrees that in no case shall an apprentice be confined more than 24 hours. If the attendance of a magistrate cannot be procured before the expiration of that time, the man must be released." He is mistaken; that was the intention, but I conceive that is not the usual construction of the words used; "and to prevent an abuse even of this limited power, the Act further provides that though the man must be released, the complaint must be preferred the first time a magistrate can be procured." I do not see anything of the kind in these words.

432. Are you aware that certain decisions of the Court of King's Bench in this country have declared that certain enactments in statutes shall be construed as imperative, particularly in favour of freedom?—I am aware that constructions of that kind have been put on Acts at different times, but even with that construction which has been given to certain statutes, I am not satisfied that this must be construed as imperative, it seems so strangely put; the intention, I agree with Lord Sligo to have been, that the negro should not in any case be in confinement for more than 24 hours.

433. Mr. Burton.] Are you to be understood to go so far as to say that the only two very important provisions you find are one that the time for the expiration of slavery is fixed, and the other that there are a number of persons of different habits and different connexions scattered throughout the island; do not you believe that, practically speaking, there are other very considerable improvements, one of which is that the negro cannot practically be worked the same length of hours he used to be?—That is a very great improvement, but yet there have been many things withdrawn from him, if it be true that the indulgences also have been withdrawn. I may remark, that though I laid due stress upon that, I should not consider it of that extraordinary importance I do the other two; for, if we are to take the report of the planters of Jamaica on this subject, we are to recollect that formerly the negroes had at least half a day in the week, besides the Sunday; 26 days in the year.

434. Lord Sandon.] Do you believe that those indulgences to which you have referred are so important as the improvement of moral character which is likely to arise in the new state of things, from their possessing a larger portion of time, which nine-tenths of them are in the habit of disposing of for wages?—No, I do not believe that they are.

435. You believe, on the contrary, that the more a man is able and compelled to provide for himself, the more beneficial it is to his moral character?—He is better suited to become an independent member of society.

436. Unquestionably you do practically consider that those two advantages which have been referred to are of great importance?—They are of great importance; but I apprehend also those I have previously mentioned are of far greater importance. There are so many means by which the negro may be deprived of the time conceded to him by law, when nearly every offence, however trivial, is visited by the deprivation of such time.

437. Sir George Grey.] It may be?—It must be in some instances, as the master is to be indemnified.

438. Is there not a discretion vested in the special magistrate with respect to the administration of punishment?—I think the best way will be to state that, upon the whole, the third is a very great improvement also, and second only to the other two.

439. Mr. Burton.] Though you admit that very considerable improvements have taken place, as comparing apprenticeship with the former state of slavery, yet you complain that in carrying out the Act of the British Parliament adequate improvements have not taken place?—Just so; adequate provision has not been made by law.

440. Sir George Grey.] You are understood to disclaim any knowledge of the practice practice in Jamaica?—I do distinctly disclaim any personal knowledge of the practice in Jamaica.

John Jeremie, Esq.

441. Lord Sandon.] Do you not think it is practically more important to the Parliament to know how the condition of the population has practically been affected by the Legislature, than to know how, by the strictest possible interpretation of minute regulations, the condition of the population may be said to be affected by the Act of Parliament?—The great question which the public will feel to be important is the practical condition of the negro undoubtedly; but it seems to me also very important to ascertain his legal condition, because his practical condition will be in a great measure dependent upon that. The manager for years possessed an exorbitant degree of authority or power over the labourer; he has been deprived of this power, and therefore may be fairly considered as in a state of extreme excitement; then again, the manager formerly had a permanent interest in his negro, he has now but a very short-lived one. Under these circumstances, therefore, if ample provision be not made by law for his protection, those abuses of power which previously existed may be fairly supposed to have been renewed, and renewed with some intensity. Therefore I think it material, first, to ascertain his legal condition, and then, bearing in mind the former condition of the colonies, and the present “transitory” position (if I may use the phrase) of both master and manager, perhaps a clue may be afforded to his practical condition. It is in that light chiefly I was anxious to ascertain his legal condition.

442. The value of many of those provisions, which you think, as they are expressed, may be construed one way or another, will practically depend on the number and character and efficiency of the special magistrates?—In a great measure they may; but it may still be generally objected to those Acts, that whenever the special magistrates are called upon to act in behalf of the negro as against the manager, they are deprived of all power except to the amount of a miserable pittance of 3*l.* sterling, which 3*l.* accrue to the Crown. Take the case of provisions or clothing, or of provision grounds; the magistrate may have delivered a judgment declaring the clothing or the provision ground insufficient; the master will be fined 3*l.* sterling. Who will obtain that? the King. What becomes of the negro? he starves in the meantime. In short, the magistrates have no adequate authority, with regard to everything requisite, to render the negro state superior to that which existed whilst he was in slavery.

443. You conceive the state of the negro in one respect, from the diminished interest his proprietor has in his good condition, to be one requiring greater protection of law than existed before?—I do, and from the excitement that must prevail at a period of transition.

444. Mr. C. Lushington.] Will you refer to the 40th clause of the first Act; that clause provides for the punishment of the apprenticed labourer if he shall resort to a special justice on frivolous complaints. Looking to the 39th clause, which empowers masters “to secure and place in confinement any apprenticed labourer who shall commit any offence on such plantation, or any apprenticed labourer not employed on such plantation who may be found loitering thereon, without the knowledge or permission of the proprietor or manager thereof.” Supposing on an investigation by a special justice that the complaint of the proprietor or master appears frivolous, is there any clause which provides for granting redress to the negro for a frivolous complaint against him?—None; the negro may be charged by the manager, and he has no redress if he has made a frivolous complaint, except a frivolous complaint should be considered a wrong and injury under the 49th section.

445. Then in this instance there is no fair reciprocity between the parties?—In almost every instance which can be quoted. Taking the enactments applying to each of the parties, I can safely say there is not one in which a fair reciprocity is established.

Richard Robert Madden, M.D., called in; and Examined.

446. Mr. Buxton.] YOU were appointed a special magistrate of Jamaica?—
I was.

447. At what time did your appointment take place?—About 10 months previous to the 1st of August.

26 April 1836.

448. When did you arrive at the West Indies?—The beginning of November 1833.

449. And when did you arrive in England on your return from Jamaica?—I remained four months in America, having left Jamaica about the latter end of November 1835.

450. So that you were in Jamaica about 12 months?—Yes, and upwards.

451. As a special magistrate?—I was not in the exercise of the duties of a special magistrate more than three months, but as a local and special magistrate I was for nine months in the exercise of both duties, having been put in the general commission of the peace by Lord Mulgrave, about three months after my arrival.

452. Did you on your return to England address a letter to Mr. Hay, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, transmitting observations on the working of the Bill for the Abolition of Slavery in the West Indies?—I did.

453. Will you be kind enough to see if this is the letter. (Document handed to Witness.) Have you any objection to read that document?—None.

[The following Document was then put in:]

Copy of a LETTER from Dr. Madden to R. W. Hay, Esq., transmitting Observations on the Working of the Bill for the Abolition of Slavery in the West Indies.

7, Panton-square, 14 March 1835.

I BEG to lay the accompanying document before the Earl of Aberdeen for his Lordship's consideration. It contains a plain statement of the progress and prospects of the measure for the Abolition of Slavery in the island of Jamaica, where I resided, by Mr. Stanley's appointment, for the last year, and held the situation of special magistrate in Kingston since August, in which place the duties are considered of the first importance. In entering into explanations of the nature of the opposition the new measure has had to contend with, I am not insensible of the proprietors' embarrassments, and the angry feelings their difficulties must give rise to; nor am I ignorant that it is not in human nature to encounter depreciation of property without repugnance, perhaps resistance, even where resistance can only augment the evil. In alluding to the mischief that has arisen from the jealousy of the local magistrates, I am aware it is not to be expected that authority is to be relinquished with alacrity; and in the case of the overseers, whose conduct has not been favourable to the working of the new law, that the loss of power and the cessation of their influence might be forced to lead to acts of vexatious opposition. I believe, however, the fault lay more with the system they had to do with, which placed few limits to the exercise of their power, and the laws that sanctioned that latitude, than with those who took advantage of their protection for agricultural or commercial purposes. Connected nearly with Jamaica interests, and my nearest connexions depending wholly on their properties in that island, the welfare of the colony is one of my first wishes. So far the opinions I have expressed, I trust, are not ill considered or influenced by visionary theories. Should his Lordship think the observations I have put together for his consideration worthy of any attention, the nature of the alteration that they suggest in the present system would make the subject of another communication.

I have the honour, &c. &c.

The Working of the Bill for the Abolition of Slavery in the West Indies.

The apprenticeship system, I believe, would have answered the object it was meant to accomplish, had it met with a fair trial.

The difficulties, however, it had to encounter in the island where I had opportunities of observing its progress, did not admit of its obtaining that trial. These difficulties may be referred to six sources:—1st. The non-residence of the great majority of the proprietors on their estates. 2d. The inability of the majority of the resident proprietors to pay the negroes for their own time. 3d. The separate interests of the attorneys who manage the estates of the absentees from those of the owners. 4th. The importunity of the merchants at home, to whom the greater portion of the estates are mortgaged for large returns, while the means of obtaining them are diminished by the quantity of labour being decreased about one-third by the new law. 5th. The jealousy of the local magistrates, whose jurisdiction is superseded by the special justices. 6th. The angry feelings of the overseers, whose power over the slaves is transferred to the new magistracy. These I consider the chief sources of the opposition which the apprenticeship system is now encountering at the hands of the white population; and the nature and extent of that opposition I will point out presently.

The opposition on the part of the negroes may be referred to three heads:—1st. Incapacity, or at least unwillingness, to comprehend prospective advantages. 2d. Reluctance to labour without wages. 3d. Disposition to withhold their own time, and that of their children under six years of age, from their masters as a retaliation for past grievances, real or imaginary, or the recent deprivation of their old allowances. To these causes, the indolence that is natural to the negro character and the sudden cessation of field punishments might be added; but I have not done so, because wherever I have known the negro's own time paid for by a proprietor, in whom the negro had no mistrust, that indolence was overcome, and the stimulus of arbitrary punishment was not required. Individual exceptions there may be many; the major part of the body of negroes on such estates I speak of.

The principal sources of the difficulties, under the four heads first alluded to, are too obvious to need referring to; the fifth is one derived from the preceding ones, and its mischief is more immediately felt in the colony than perhaps any of the others.

In the absence of the extensive proprietors, the local magistrates are chiefly chosen from the body of attorneys, the small and perhaps embarrassed proprietors, and the political adherents of both, in large towns where clamour against the Government gives these persons an influence which the executive finds it necessary to conciliate as much as possible. The same observation applies a good deal to the choice of persons for the office of members for the House of Assembly. The large landed proprietors of Jamaica, generally speaking, are not represented in the House of Assembly. The magistracy of Kingston hold their commissions from the corporation. They are independent of the executive; and from the constitution of that body, it is far from desirable that they should be so. The corporation of Kingston is founded on the American model, and is a municipal democracy, totally unfitted for the state of society in Jamaica. I believe it is the opinion of the Governor, the Chief Justice, and the Attorney-general, that its existence is a great evil; and I know that most of the respectable inhabitants of Kingston think the removal of its privileges would be a public benefit.

Constituted as the local magistracy is generally, opposition to the apprenticeship system must be expected; there are a great number of the country magistrates, however, who, though averse to the new system, as far as humanity, honesty, and respectability go, might be safely entrusted with the administration of the new law; but I think there are many more who might not. As matters now are, the great majority of them feel injured by the appointment of special Justices, and their influence is exerted successfully on the press and the House of Assembly to thwart the Government, to oppose the special Justices, and to render the negroes discontented.

The overseers and book-keepers are not only adverse to the new measure, but they are interested in defeating it. It has deprived them of their authority; in a few years it must deprive them of their bread. Their irritation can no longer be vented in actual violence, but it is exhibited to the negroes on every trivial occasion in expressions of invective and abuse; and in the parish of St. Ann's, I might add, by the proprietors, in the language of extreme passion and virulence. The negroes resent this by a sullen spirit of indolence in the field, and a secret combination in their own huts, to carry "passive resistance" to the greatest possible extent. It cannot be denied they do not work as heretofore. They consider the treatment of their Bushas, and the loss of their former allowance, by no means counterbalanced by the advantages derived from the abridgement of the time of labour. Their conduct under this impression is provoking; nay, in many instances unreasonable; but forbearance is as requisite as firmness to overcome it.

In some instances they have gone to the extent of refusing to work at all; in others of hooting the special magistrate, who were brought to coerce them; and on one occasion of burning the workhouses, while the magistrate was investigating the complaints of the proprietor. In fact there is a bad spirit prevailing between the proprietors and the negroes. The old prejudices of the one, and the new privileges of the other, are at war; the special magistracy is interposed between them, and the issue depends on the prudence, the independence, and the numerical force of the latter, and on that force being protected strongly by the executive. Adequate protection I believe it is not in the power of the executive to give them; to increase their number to the extent required, would be to double the original number sent out previously to August; and to enable them to discharge their duties efficiently, would be to add considerably to their present salary. The harassing nature of the duties assigned to them by the alteration of the English Act in the House of Assembly, and the pecuniary embarrassments incidental to the discharge of these duties, are explained somewhat at large in the Document No. 2., a copy of a letter to his Excellency the Governor, on the subject of these difficulties.

R. R. Mudden, M.D.

26 April 1836.

The vexations the negroes now suffer may appear more trivial than they are in reality. Their rights, it may be considered, are sufficiently protected by the Abolition Law. It is very true they cannot be punished by their owners; their evidence cannot be refused in a court of law, their time of labour is abridged, they cannot be sold in the market-place, nor separated from their connexions and disposed of for an owner's debts or a gaoler's fees. These evils they are now exempt from, at least the law intends them to be so; but in all that respects the mode of administering their supplies, of apportioning their time of labour, of defining the extent of the jurisdiction of the special justice, the matter is so vaguely expressed in the amended Act, that loop-holes are left for innumerable vexations, which it is not in the power of the special justice to prevent or punish. These vexations consist in withholding the customary allowances of salted provisions, rum and sugar; or, where they are continued, of exacting from the negro such extra labour as the law has allotted him time for, for the necessary cultivation of his own grounds. It has been in vain that the spirit of the law has been invoked, where it has unfortunately proved deficient in the letter, to secure for the negro their usual allowances, and those privileges which the Slave Law afforded the female negro who had six children, living on an estate, of exemption from field labour; or the allotment of lighter work for those in the advanced months of pregnancy; or the abstraction of sufficient time from their masters, for the necessary performance of the offices of maternity, which was formerly allowed to the mother in the field.

To the negro, who looks on the deviation from an established custom as a deprivation of a right, these alterations in the management of a property are of no little moment. The aged and infirm people who formerly attended the working gangs in the capacity of cooks and nurses, are no longer allowed, or where they are, their services are paid out of the time of the labourers. There are exceptions; they are however but exceptions to the recent changes. The severity of a recent Act constitutes it an act of vagrancy for the apprentice of one property to be found in the negro hut of another, though persons connected by those ties which custom has sanctioned, though religion has not sanctified, are usually to be found on all adjoining properties; while the children under six years of age, whose parents may refuse to apprentice them to their former owners, (and the determination to refuse is almost universal,) may be taken before the special justice on the plea of destitution; or where deterred from that proceeding by the frequency of its failure, the parent is menaced with the dismissal of those children from the property which the law does not compel them to provide for. These vexations are in daily operation, and the special justice finds the attempt to repress them productive only of a spirit of resistance to his authority, and an opposition to the exercise of it, which acknowledges no control.

These things may be doubted, because the line of conduct described is opposed not only to the public tranquillity, but to self-interest and common sense; it is so, but where angry feelings are created in the Colonies, they predominate over all other considerations.

The public tranquillity cannot be served by the constant vituperation of the negroes in the House of Assembly, and the attempts made there by Mr. Batty and Mr. Barrett (the latter the indefatigable opponent of the new law) to defeat the abolition measure, and even to unsettle the terms of the compensation.

Self-interest is not promoted by the choice of a period like the present for the paltry saving in the items of the bill for the estate supplies, or by the exasperation of the apprentices at a time when the title to their services is held by the tenure of a bond that will not be in force, "under any circumstances," in six years.

Common sense cannot influence the conduct of the proprietors who fritter away the four and a half days which the law intended should be given at one time, and that time on Friday, by doing it out day by day, an hour at a time, an arrangement which renders it of no advantage to the negro for the cultivation of his grounds (the purpose expressed in the Act for which it was allowed); for these grounds are very often one hour's distance from their huts; and the Sunday market being abolished, the Saturday is necessarily devoted to that purpose. There is no other day therefore, but that half of Friday, for the cultivation of their grounds. They have come before me time after time, the whole body of the negroes of the President of the Council, of Mr. Grosset, the member for St. Thomas in the East, and very many others, and these negroes have told me their families would be starved if they did not get the half of Friday for their grounds; and I have had to tell them they could not have it, and to feel that the law intended that they should.

Common sense and humanity, which is its policy, did not suggest or sanction this arrangement, because if the estate gained four and a half hours of labour at one time, at the expense of the good-will and the wellbeing of the labourer, who in a little time will have the power of making his own terms with the employer, the temporary advantage was very foolishly exacted or required; and if this frittering away of the negro's time proceeds, as it too frequently does, from other motives than advantage to the estate, from a stupid desire for indulgence in vexatious measures which may solace the overseer for the loss of his authority, or the attorney for the prospective disadvantages to his office, or the book-keeper for the restraints on the exercise of hand or foot in his remonstrances with the negroes, the interests of the owner must suffer; nay, if this state of things continue, be eventually sacrificed. The tranquillity that now exists in Jamaica is of a very precarious kind; where it appears to prevail most, I have reason to know the dissatisfaction is most general; the danger of its proceeding to outrage most imminent.

But what dissatisfaction should prevail when the wrongs of the negro may be redressed by the special justice, and graver injuries be brought before a higher court and punished when they are proved?

So far from "the amended law" being sufficient for the protection of the negro, the special justice will hardly find the power of the executive (with every disposition to support him) strong enough to protect himself.

As to the protection of the higher courts, to glance at their constitution is at once to see their inadequacy to the protection of the negroes. (I speak of the Quarter Sessions Courts.) Who are the judges? the store-keepers and planters, who possess most political influence to procure their recommendation from the custos to the Governor. Legal knowledge is no requisite; the principles and the precedents of common law they receive from the clerks of the peace as emergencies require. Two of them preside as assistants in the Supreme Court even in the towns of their own residence, where a case cannot come before them in which they are not directly or indirectly influenced. Their salaries are 700*l.* a year currency! This evil of putting men ignorant of law in the highest legal offices is the greatest impediment to justice I know of in the colonies. The next in degree is that of selecting men for juries whose animosities and prejudices with regard to the negroes are so much a part and parcel of an overseer's creed, that impartiality cannot be expected. Yet the juries in the Quarter Sessions Courts, and very often in the Grand Court, are composed of Bushas, while the prisoners are negroes, and the very names cannot come in contact without suggesting ideas of mutual animosities.

The effects of these evils in the courts of justice in Jamaica I observed for upwards of one year in that island, and my impression is that they have increased in mischief very much

In my opinion this is a state of things not to be remedied under the present system. In this state of things, will the negroes in six years be in a fitter condition for freedom than they now are? It is greatly to be feared in that interval of restricted liberty, the relations between the master and the apprentice will be rendered wider every day, and more heart-burnings will arise than would probably have arisen between the owner and the slave.

Will the proprietor be in a better condition to pay wages to his labourer at the expiration of that term than he will be at the end of another year, when some part of the compensation-money may be at his disposal? The probability is he will not.

Is there a prospect of education becoming more diffused during the apprenticeship? or of the present system pursued by the Sectarian Missionaries becoming more calculated to elevate the intellectual character of the negro? or of the clergy of the Established Church rendering their instruction more available to the negroes, and better suited to their spiritual wants?

To each of these questions I have no reply but a negative to give. I wish it were otherwise.

But there is another question, and one of no little importance. Is the dissatisfaction of the negroes likely to proceed to serious disturbance; or is advantage possibly to be taken of their dissatisfaction to augment the clamour for martial law, which the press, that disgraces the island, and the insensate part of the community are now crying out for with so much vehemence?

It is most earnestly to be wished that such events may not take place. But were partial disturbances to arise, and the clamour which I speak of, which his Excellency the Governor has hitherto had the firmness and humanity to resist, were urged with still greater violence; how long might it take to goad discontent to some outrage, whose phrenzy might afford a pretext for a lawless retribution under the name of martial law.

It is fearful even to contemplate a repetition of the scenes of the last rebellion. I can conceive no calamity so great as the necessity for martial law in Jamaica, no security so dearly bought as its protection, no outrages so difficult to be repressed as its excesses.

It may not become me to express an opinion on the subject of the continuance of the apprenticeship system; but a strong persuasion of the insufficiency of that system for any useful purpose as a probationary term of improvement for the negro, or a prolonged period of unpaid labour for a temporary advantage to the proprietor, induces me to express the opinion I entertain, that with the opposition and difficulties it has to encounter there is no security for the rights of the negro, no improvement in his intellectual condition, and no adequate amount of remunerating labour for the proprietor under the present system to be expected.

454. Mr. Buxton.] Your report contains several specific cases of alleged cruelty?—No; there are very few cases of mine of alleged cruelty.

455. Mr. Thornely.] There are five cases?—None of them came under my own cognizance; I gave six cases to instance that nothing was to be expected from the Jamaica juries, when convictions could not be procured, or when they were procured adequate sentences could not be carried into effect. I have given the cases in my book without the names; for instance, where the men were acquitted, I do not think it would be quite fair to make a public use of these documents.

456. Mr.

456. Mr. W. Gladstone.] Are they not the basis of that entire conclusion?—R. R. Mudden, M.D.
No; I gave them six cases in proof of the assertion, that no justice was to be expected from a Jamaica jury against a white man. 26 April 1836.

457. Mr. Buxton.] There can be no objection on your part to Mr. Burge seeing the particular cases you allude to?—Certainly not.

458. Besides which, it appears from your book they are all taken from sworn information?—Yes.

459. The Chairman.] Are the cases in that paper precisely the same as those that are in your book?—Yes; I think precisely the same.

460. Mr. W. Gladstone.] There are five, you see; the cases in the paper are,
Dr. Jelly, Dr. Bruce, Mr. —, of Portland, Mr. Kennedy, and Mr. Brackenridge?
—The Government took steps, I understood, in some of these cases.

461. Mr. Buxton.] Do you see any reason to alter the opinions you have given in this paper?—I have been told that the allowances in a great many instances that came under my knowledge have been granted; that the allowance which had been withheld had been granted: I have heard so, I do not know it from my own experience.

462. Mr. A. Johnstone.] Do you mean generally, or in particular cases?—From what I have heard, I should say generally.

463. The Chairman.] Do you see any other reason to alter any opinion you have stated there?—I do not call to my memory any other reason.

464. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware that the Attorney-general's opinion was asked as to the negroes being entitled by law to the customary allowances?—Yes;
I know it was.

465. Are you aware that the opinion of the Attorney-general ran thus, [referring to Dr. Madden's book] ?—I believe it is accurately copied there.

466. Read it, if you please.—“The Slavery Abolition is a remedial act, and to be construed liberally in order to effectuate the benevolent intentions of the Legislature; the slaves, now apprentices, are not to be placed in a worse condition than they heretofore were; their allowances, some of them, were by custom, but so too was slavery, for it never at any time had any support save from custom, which, when universal, as it was in Jamaica, is law; slavery is, and was, however, contrary to common law; and as it invoked the aid of custom as making it valid, so I conceive may the apprentices invoke custom in the support of their usual allowances, even whilst they are in the intermediate state of apprentices. This refers to the non-working in the field women who have more than six children living; which besides, is sustained by the Apprenticeship Law, it declaring that apprentices shall have the usual allowances. This refers to the case of suckling infants, for which the slaves were allowed heretofore time, out of the time devoted to labour; and further, in all these cases I say that universal custom is law. As to by-paths, they must be permitted; no constable's oath either was intended to, or could control the law.
By-paths long time used cannot be stopped up. This was decided in England, in a celebrated case in which the highest personages in the realm were parties. I have also to state that the law never intended to prevent persons repairing to estates who had just cause so to do, though they did not belong to the estate. I conceive that an apprentice's wife has as good right (such having been the custom) to remain with her husband on the estate as the overseer himself has; his grounds for the time are as it were his, as truly as those of a cottier in the mother country are his, save that he cannot use them for any purpose than his immediate purposes of support.”

467. Mr. A. Johnstone.] Who is the attorney?—D. O'Reily.

468. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware the case was submitted to Mr. Batty, and that he gave his opinion thereupon?—I believe he gave an opinion directly contrary to that which I have read.

469. Turn to page 270; is that the case submitted to him?—Yes, and his answer to it. The following case was submitted to Mr. Batty, for his opinion on the subject of the allowances. “It has been the custom for a number of years past in the parish of Trelawney, as well as most other parishes in this island, to give the negroes upon the estates a weekly allowance of herrings and salt cod-fish, also oatmeal, flour, sugar, rum, &c., and sundry articles of clothing at crop-over and Christmas, as a reward for good conduct; and to women with six children a weekly or daily allowance (according to their respective cases) of rice, sugar, &c.

“It is submitted that these allowances were never compulsory on the master, by the Slave Law, or otherwise, (except as to the clothing) but have been granted to the negroes merely as indulgences, and always considered such by them; for the power of withholding these allowances has always been exercised by the master on occasions of misbehaviour or neglect of duty on the part of the negroes. The above mentioned indulgences have been granted only upon some properties; upon others the allowance of salt fish, at crop-over, has been stopped for some years past, and given only at Christmas; upon others it has been withheld altogether, and upon some properties they have never been given at all.

“From the abridgment of the time of labour of the apprentices under the new system, and from other causes, it may be anticipated that the emolument to proprietors of estates will even be less than it has of late been, consequently the indulgences or allowances above alluded to may of necessity be curtailed, or perhaps altogether withdrawn, if there is no law or obligation to the contrary to compel the owners to continue them.

“Under the new law, it is not clearly understood whether apprentices employed on estates in domestic occupation, such as cooking, washing, cleaning outhouses, &c., are to be considered prædials attached, or non-prædials; the females have their grounds, and cultivate their own provisions, and may be said occasionally to assist in the manufacture of produce. Youths, when they arrive at the age of 14 or 15, are sent from the house to learn trades or field cultivation; and females of weak constitutions are frequently relieved for a time from field labour, and employed as domestics. The cultivation and manufacture of produce cannot in fact be carried on, unless some of the labourers are employed to cook, wash, and perform other domestic offices.

“You are requested to advise generally, whether under the provisions of the Abolition Bill, the custom of occasionally or generally having granted the indulgences or allowances above mentioned has now become law; and if the apprentices are now entitled as a matter of right to them, and whether it is obligatory on the masters to grant their apprentices such allowances or not.

470. Will you now read Mr. Batty's opinion?—“I am of opinion that, under the Abolition Act, the apprentices are not entitled to the indulgences and allowances above alluded to. The 16th sec. of the Act gives them the same ‘food, clothing, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances,’ as the owner was required to supply a slave, by the Act for Government of Slaves, 1st William 4, cap. 25. Now on referring to this Act, it will be found that the only clauses in that Act on the subject are the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 17th, neither of which specify or require the allowances above mentioned to be given to the negroes; the 11th provides, that owners, &c. shall inspect the provision-grounds, and where the negro-grounds are unproductive, or there is no land proper for provisions, shall by some other ways and means make ‘good and ample provision for all such slaves as they shall be possessed of, in order that they may be properly maintained and supported, leaving the mode and nature of the support to the discretion of the owner.’ The 12th clause requires ‘every owner to provide proper and sufficient clothing, to be approved of by the vestry.’ The 13th requires an affidavit that the grounds have been inspected, and that every negro is ‘sufficiently provided with grounds,’ or ‘where there are no grounds, with ample provisions,’ as required by the 11th section. The 17th section compels every owner to provide infirm and disabled negroes ‘with sufficient clothing and wholesome necessaries of life.’ The 8th section of the Act in Aid of the Abolition Act, passed 2d July last, has no clause respecting allowances to the apprentices, except the 8th, relative to sick apprentices, who under it are to have the same medical care and attention as has heretofore been customary. It is clear therefore, that, by the Slave Act, an owner is not obliged to give any of the above allowances, but merely to provide sufficient grounds fit for the cultivation of provisions. The 11th section of the English Abolition Act, from which our Act is taken, makes this more clear, as it expressly says, in case of prædial apprentices, the owner shall provide them with ground adequate for his or her support.

“2nd. This has been an extremely doubtful point, and I fear will continue so until a further explanatory Act is passed. If the first part of the 4th clause of the English Act, and if our Act stood alone, it would be clear domestics on an estate would be prædials attached; as, although not ‘usually employed in agriculture, or in the manufacture of colonial produce,’ yet they are otherwise employed on lands lands belonging to their owners. But the proviso at the end creates the difficulty, as it omits the words 'or otherwise,' and substitutes 'habitually' for 'usually.' Although this proviso of an Act has been repealed, yet it in substance has been re-enacted by the 2d section of the Act in Aid of the Abolition Act, passed the 2d July last, which expressly enacts, that no person of 12 years or upwards shall be included in the prædial classes, unless such person shall for 12 calendar months next, previous to the 28th of August 1833, have been habitually employed in agriculture or the manufacture of produce. Such also appears to be the construction put on the Act by the English Government, as appears by Mr. Stanley's letter, of the 20th of February last, to the governor, communicated by him to the House of Assembly. On the whole I must state, that a court of law would construe the act to mean, that domestics and tradesmen, unconnected with the manufacture of produce during those 12 months, are to be considered as non-prædials."

471. Mr. Burton.] What do you consider to be the essential difference between apprenticeship and slavery?—I do not consider that there is any essential difference.

472. In page 113 of the 2d volume of your book, you have stated that slavery still virtually exists under the name of apprenticeship?—Yes, I have stated so I know.

473. And at page 163, you have said, "slavery is indeed scotched in our colonies, but is not killed; its name is changed, its character remains to be changed hereafter?"—Yes, I have said so.

474. Please explain to the Committee your reasons for entertaining those opinions?—I think the apprenticeship system has many relative advantages over slavery, and it has one great prospective advantage of freedom at the end of it, which in my opinion is the greatest advantage the new system has; the relative advantages are the limitation of labour and the limitation of punishment; so far as those limitations go the apprenticeship system has a decided advantage over slavery. The reason I do not think there is any essential difference between them is, that in both labour is compulsory, without wages; and corporal punishment is inflicted where labour is withheld; therefore I cannot think where such is the case there is anything like a perfect state of freedom.

475. At page 253, by the Imperial Act, the master you say is bound to maintain his negroes as heretofore; do you consider that to be the fact?—I do.

476. Explain the extent to which the allowances formerly made to the field negro were to be considered as necessaries rather than indulgences, and in what light they were regarded by the negro himself?—I consider they were not given as indulgences to the negro; the master had the power of withholding them as a punishment, and I have frequently seen them withheld as such; but I think if the master previous to the 1st of August had withheld them without cause of complaint on his part, he would have put his property in a state of rebellion.

477. Did the negroes consider them as rights to which they were entitled?—They considered them as rights, and as necessaries which they could not do without.

478. How far were the negroes during the time of the apprenticeship compelled to purchase their former allowances by the sacrifice of that time which the Imperial Act had allotted to the negro?—I have in many instances, previous to the 1st of August, heard the attornies tell the negroes they would be obliged to yield their own time on Friday, in consideration of getting their usual allowances; it was generally told them previous to the 1st of August.

479. So that your opinion is the Act contemplated the continuance of the allowances, and that the negro should have a portion of time for his own use; that, in point of fact, the negro has been obliged to sacrifice the assigned time in order to procure the accustomed necessaries?—I think he gave more than an equivalent for the allowances in his own time.

480. The Committee want the fact whether, in order to purchase those necessaries, he has been in many instances obliged to sacrifice his time?—He has, to my knowledge.

481. Is not the attendance of a nurse upon a sick negro an indulgence which must afterwards be repaid by the surrender of his time?—I disbelieve that that is the case, I never heard that it has been done. I never heard of a negro being called to pay time for the attendance of a nurse.

482. Did

R. R. Madden, M.D.

26 April 1836.

482. Did you ever hear that the time during which pregnant women are confined, previous or subsequent to delivery, is required to be paid for out of their own time?—No, I never heard it; nor have I ever heard any of the special magistrates complain of that; but I have known very great hardships suffered by pregnant women in consequence of being called on to work up to the last moment of their pregnancy, which before the 1st of August they were not called upon to do. I have had them frequently come before me complaining they were “in belly,” and that they could not work; and I made an order that they should not work up till within two months of their parturition, except at very light work.

483. Are the contracts for time regulated by the special justice or by arrangement between the parties?—They would not be binding on the negro without the sanction of the special justice; they are often made by the parties themselves; but the negroes might break the engagements if they chose, unless they were made before the special justice.

484. Is it your opinion that the value of the allowances is overrated, and that, besides the injustice of requiring any portion of the time of a negro in lieu of those allowances, they in point of fact require an undue portion of time as compensation for the indulgence given?—I think that the negro’s own time is usually worth more than the value of the allowances that are given for it.

485. You are aware that there are two systems, the eight-hour system and the nine-hour system; will you explain to the Committee the practical operation of the two?—The difference between the nine-hour and the eight-hour system was productive of very great disputes in the colony; in one clause of the Colonial Act, the 6th, it is distinctly stated that the negroes “shall not work more than 45 hours in the whole, in any one week;” in a subsequent clause, the 47th, the words are, “or five days, of nine hours each, in any one week;” but from the 45 hours it subsequently subtracts four and a half hours from the 45 hours labour for the negro’s own use, and leaves the time of labour 40½ hours, but says the master shall have the power of extending the four and a half hours of the negro’s own time over the whole week, instead of giving it him all at once, or the half of Friday; there are three references in the Act to this point; the first is that the negroes shall work 45 hours a week; and, in a subsequent clause, the Act says that “the time of labour shall not exceed 45 hours, or five days, of nine hours each, in one week.” It was the general opinion, from that, that the negro was called on to work on the nine-hours’ system; the governor, Lord Sligo, issued a proclamation, in which it was distinctly stated to the negroes that they were to labour four days and a half, and that they were to have the half of Friday to themselves. I may state also, that, immediately after that proclamation, another was issued, in consequence of the law officers of the Crown having given it as their opinion that, from the subsequent part of that 47th clause, the distribution of the four and a half hours was optional with the masters. That passage in the 47th clause I consider was completely at variance with two preceding clauses referred to in the Colonial Act. The governor issued another proclamation, telling the negroes they were not to have this half Friday; and that proclamation was almost the cause of a rebellion in the island. The first proclamation contains these words: “You will, on the 1st of August next, no longer be slaves.”

486. The first proclamation gave the negroes to understand that the nine-hours’ system was to be adopted, and that, in consequence, they were to have the half of Friday as their own?—Most distinctly.

487. Did the second proclamation give them to understand that they were to be deprived of that privilege?—Yes, it did.

488. What was the effect of the substitution of the eight-hours’ system for the nine-hours’ system on the minds of the negroes?—It had a bad effect generally.

489. Did they consider it a very great hardship then that they were deprived of their Friday afternoons?—They considered that they were wronged of them by their masters.

490. And may not that degree of obstinacy and sullenness, to which you have referred, be in some measure created by their being deprived of that portion of time which the governor assigned they should have?—I think that was the great occasion of it. I can give the Committee an explanation; I consider, in this instance, it was not the error of the governor, but the error of the law; there are three contradictions in the law itself on that clause; it depends on what construction the law officers of the Crown might give to it.

26 April 1836.

491. The law being open to two constructions, either being substantially the same to the planter, but one being in the eye of the negro much more favourable than the other, do you not consider that it has been injurious to the working of the apprenticeship system that the interpretation offensive to the negro has been put upon it?—I think it has been injurious to the working of the Act; the fault is in the Act.

492. Whichever system be adopted, whether that of the nine or the eight hours, are the hours strictly limited to eight or nine?—I have never seen a clock on the works of an estate; and where there are sun-dials, the negroes, I apprehend, would not know how to consult them, therefore it is likely they may be wronged as to the time; that depends on the driver.

493. Is the time in going to and returning from labour included in either case in the working hours?—No; the negro is subject to a great deal of wrong and injury from that; he is expected to give either eight or nine hours a day of labour, and that labour commences from the moment he has the hoe in hand until he is called off; but he may be at a considerable distance from the estate. I have known a case where the grounds of the negro were 10 or 12 miles from the estate, and there might be cases where the distance is a mile from his house to his provision-ground.

494. If the master exacts more than eight hours in one case, and nine in the other, what remedy has the apprentice?—He has his remedy by applying to the special magistrate. The apprentice labourer may apply in case of any cruelty or injustice, or any wrong or injustice done to or inflicted upon him, under 49th clause.

495. Is that remedy substantial or illusory?—It altogether depends upon the character of the special justice whether it is illusory or not; this Act is so vaguely expressed, whether the negro gets justice or not will depend upon the construction which is given to it.

496. Is the collection of the negroes by shell-blow sufficiently notorious as to make those punishable who do not attend?—That depends upon the driver, whether he is favourable to the negroes or not.

497. When the apprentices are employed in extra labour, whether for wages or punishment, what means is adopted for measuring the time he works?—If a punishment of 15 hours' additional labour is to be exacted from him, it is at the option of the master to distribute those 15 hours as he chooses in the week.

498. Then the master, if he is disposed to harass the negro, may scatter those 15 hours over a considerable space of time, and thus materially aggravate the punishment which was intended to be inflicted?—I think he has the power of scattering it over any time he chooses in the week.

499. Supposing he chooses to scatter the period assigned by way of punishment over a considerable space, how would each particular item or space of time be computed?—I do not understand the question.

500. Supposing the proprietor chose to scatter the punishment over a considerable space of time, say in half hours at different periods, how would each half hour be calculated, how would you measure it?—The measurement is quite arbitrary, and depends upon the proprietor.

501. Is extra labour exacted in any form after the conclusion of field labour?—Yes, I have heard the proprietors call on the negroes to cut grass, and to cull it after the labours of the day were done; and I have told the negroes they were not compelled to do so.

502. Have you known cases where the negro has refused to do it?—Yes.

503. Did you ever know of a case in which a negro refusing to do it was subjected to punishment?—I know of one instance in which a special magistrate differed with me upon the subject.

504. What was the ground of that magistrate's opinion?—He imagined that it was a customary practice, and that it was one of the essential duties required; that cattle could not be provided for on the estate unless they did so.

505. Did that same magistrate consider a custom as wanting the force of law with regard to the allowances of the negro?—He was one of the magistrates who took the same view that I did as to the customary allowances.

506. Does not the negro attach a peculiar importance to the value of his own time?—He does, a very great importance.

507. Was not one of the chief causes of revolt under the system of slavery, that the slave had been deprived of his customary holidays?—The cause of the late rebellion was the withdrawal of certain holidays.

508. And

R. R. Madden, M.D.

26 April 1836.

508. And does not this high estimate of the value of his own time, arise from that period of time enabling him to obtain the necessaries of life?—Does it disable him from obtaining them?

509. No; does it arise from that period when he is able to earn and obtain the necessaries of life?—Yes, I think it does.

510. Are the provision-grounds distant from the huts?—I know one instance where the huts were in another parish, 10 or 12 miles off; one was in St. George's, the other in St. Andrew's.

511. On whose property?—It was on the property of Dr. Spalding.

512. Do you recollect the name of the property?—That I do not recollect; I know it was on one of those properties which Dr. Spalding bought recently, within the last year of my residence in Jamaica; the negroes were in a state of rebellion nearly, on account of it.

513. Are the markets also in general a great distance from the negro huts?—I believe there are instances where they have to travel 25 miles to market.

514. Having regard to the distance in some cases of the negro-grounds from their huts, and the distance in other cases of the markets from their huts, is it not essential the apprentice should receive the allotment of his own time at once, instead of having it frittered away by an allowance of an additional hour every day?—I think in that case it would be of no use to him; it does not enable him to go to his grounds to cultivate them.

515. And so far it checks that industry which the negro might be disposed to employ?—I think it does.

516. Is not the essential evil of the eight-hours' system, that it distributes the apprentice's time over small portions, so as to leave him no day to work for his own support except Saturday?—It leaves him no time at all, for Saturday is the market-day, and any provisions he has he must take to market; and on Sunday, if he worked, the police might take him up.

517. Is not this a great evil to the negroes?—Yes, it is.

518. Is it not that which they have felt beyond all others?—Yes.

519. You concur with them in thinking it is a serious injury to them?—I think it a great injury to them.

520. Does it not in some cases compel them to work on the Sabbath?—When they can do it by stealth they will.

521. Is not the substitution of the eight for the nine-hours' system sometimes held out, in terrorem, over the negro as a punishment?—Held out as a threat of punishment?

522. Yes.—That I cannot say of my own knowledge.

523. Have the planters, generally speaking, acted on the eight-hours' system?—When I was there, generally on the eight-hours' system.

524. And do you think that that exhibited a disposition on the part of the planters to render what aid they could to the operation of the apprentice law?—I consider the adoption of that clause was not for the purpose of benefiting the estates so much as rendering the Act unworkable.

525. Under the system of slavery, what time was allowed to mothers for domestic engagements, either nursing the children or providing and dressing food for them, or for attendance upon them in the field?—Under the old slave law I do not think there was any time mentioned, but it was the universal system to employ old women, who acted as cooks and nurses in the field; those persons were withdrawn pretty generally after the introduction of the apprenticeship system.

526. Is the same indulgence now granted?—It was not when I was there.

527. Were the mothers of six children exempted from field labour under the old system of slavery, and are they subject to it now?—They were exempted by the slave law.

528. Are they subjected to it now?—They are subjected to labour now; I have seen them in second gangs.

529. Were not aged and infirm negroes relieved from hard work under the slavery system, and are they not subjected to it under the apprenticeship system?—I have heard them threatened with it; but I have never seen them in the field employed.

530. Did you perceive, generally speaking, on the part of the managers and agents, a disposition to make use of opportunities of curtailing the time of the apprentices?—It seemed to be the prevailing custom, as much as possible, to curtail the time of the apprentices.

531. Mr. W. Gladstone.] You said, when you were in Jamaica, the eight-hours' system was generally adopted, was it so on a great majority of the estates?—On most of the estates I was acquainted with in St. Andrew's.

532. Does your knowledge on that point extend beyond the fact of your personal experience?—Yes; for a great many of the special magistrates, from different parts of the island, used to assemble in my house, and I used to hear their opinions.

26 April 1836.

533. Will that observation apply generally, without attempting to bind you to the accounts you gave of the working of the system in the island?—Whether it was general I only know from that.

534. You said you had opportunities, from meeting other special magistrates, of learning what was the case in other districts; are the Committee to understand that you made use of those opportunities, and that the results of those opportunities are embodied in your remarks generally as to the working of the system?—Yes, they are.

535. According to the eight-hours' system, for how many days does the negro work in the week, and for how many hours on each of those days?—He is called on, by the 47th clause, to give  $40\frac{1}{2}$  hours of labour to his master in the week; but the  $4\frac{1}{2}$  of his own time, these his master may give him in any way he thinks proper.

536. He is called on to give  $40\frac{1}{2}$  hours, independently of the  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to which you refer?—Yes.

537. Then, under the eight-hours' system, he gives this  $4\frac{1}{2}$  in the five days?—Saturday cannot be interfered with in any case.

538. On the nine-hours' system?—He would work on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and half of Friday.

539. You consider the difference between these systems to be very material?—Yes.

540. Are you aware which of the two is in operation in Jamaica at the present moment?—I cannot say.

541. Of course the importance of it will depend principally on the distance of the provision-grounds and of the markets from the estates?—It must depend materially on that; but in no instance will the ground be so near the huts as to give any advantage to the negro from half an hour's time, because the time he would take in going and returning would be occupied entirely.

542. Supposing a negro works eight hours in the day, will he not be able, if disposed, to give a good deal of labour to his own provision-ground in addition?—The hours of labour are between sunrise and sunset. There is one hour given for breakfast, and two hours for dinner, that is not included in the time of labour; he will labour in the field till sunset.

543. Are you aware whether in the case of eight hours in the field they can employ an extra hour in their provision-grounds?—They never go to their provision-grounds after six at night.

544. The question is, whether the eight hours in the field is so filled up as to leave the negro no time for his provision-ground?—Sometimes the negro will apply to a special magistrate to get him off at four o'clock; if the master wishes to indulge him he will let him off, otherwise he must go on till six.

545. Was it not the case during your experience that they were off by four o'clock?—No, they were detained till sunset.

546. If they had been off the ground by four they would generally be able to employ themselves on their provision-grounds?—Yes, though they would be much fatigued after the day's labour.

547. There would be a difficulty in continuing labour in that climate for as long a time after sunset as in this, on account of the shortness of the twilight?—Yes.

548. Can you state to the Committee the average distance of the negro-grounds from the estate, or does it vary so much that there is no rule whatever?—On those points I am not so well competent to speak as a magistrate who had to do with prædial labourers; I had to do with non-prædial labourers.

549. In what district were you a special magistrate?—In Kingston, after the 1st of August; previous to that time I was in the parish of St. Andrew's as a general magistrate.

550. In point of fact, all the circumstances relating to the prædial labour are not the results of your experience, but of others assembled at your house?—From my own personal experience generally, and I was in the habit weekly of going for one or two days to St. Andrew's and Fort Royal. I have been at St. Thomas's in the East, and St. David's during the apprenticeship.
0.58. or

R. R. Madden, M.D.

26 April 1836.

551. They are not in the sphere of your official duty?—Not as a magistrate in the places I went to, I was there merely as an observer.

552. Mr. Buxton.] Can you speak positively to the facts you have stated?—Yes.

553. Mr. W. Gladstone.] You are not competent to say generally what is the distance of the provision-grounds from the estate?—In the parish of St. Andrew's they did not exceed a mile and a half.

554. Do they come up to that?—They do not exceed that, from a mile to one and a half.

555. You mentioned a case in which the provision-grounds were 25 miles distant from any market, is that case common?—That case I had from Captain Oldrey, that was in St. Elizabeth.

556. Do you think that is a common case?—I should think it is common, for the distance they have to go to the market. I know that from St. George's they come down to Kingston, a distance of 25 miles.

557. Have they no nearer market?—Yes, but it is not so good a market as at Kingston.

558. You say the negroes depend on the driver for ascertaining the time at which their hours of work expire; are they entirely dependant on the driver?—The overseer rides down at shell-blow; if he does not come down, the driver tells from the sun what hour it is.

559. Clocks are uncommon?—I never saw one immediately on the grounds; the clock was generally in the overseer's house.

560. You say the driver judged by the altitude of the sun?—Yes.

561. Have not the negroes the same faculty of judging?—I should say they judged by that.

562. Have not the negroes the means of correcting the driver and judging for themselves?—Yes, I should think so; and I think they are very observant of their rights.

563. Is it a subject of complaint in general between the negroes and the drivers, that they are ever kept beyond their due time of work?—Before the 1st of August it was a frequent cause of complaint.

564. Since the 1st of August has there been any?—None within my experience.

565. A case was put to you, in which it was supposed that 15 hours of extra labour during the week was to be scattered in half hours over the apprentice's time; though such a case might occur, is such a case likely to occur, or is it practicable?—I do not think a special magistrate ought to sanction it.

566. Mr. Buxton.] Have you known instances in which in point of fact it has been scattered in different periods of the week, though not in such small portions of time?—Yes, I have known it distributed over the week.

567. Can you state a case of that kind?—No, I cannot; I do not remember any.

568. Mr. W. Gladstone.] In the case where the provision-ground was 10 or 12 miles from the estate, were there any peculiar circumstances which could be supposed to account for that arrangement?—Yes; the master had bought the estate latterly, and he wanted to transfer the negroes from one property to another.

569. Was it by way of making the estate disagreeable, or in order that they might become reconciled to the transition?—I do not think it was in that case to annoy the negroes, though there was a great deal of hardship and cruelty exercised towards them, which induced them to apply to the governor.

570. They were almost in a state of rebellion?—Yes.

571. To what date do you wish that observation to apply?—What I mean by "rebellion" is, they were in a state of confusion.

572. To what time do you wish that observation to apply?—I do not remember the date of it.

573. Was it during the apprenticeship, or under slavery?—I am not quite certain if it was not just previous to August or not.

574. Are you aware if any redress was afforded in the case?—I think no efficient redress.

575. Was any complaint made by the negroes to any magistrate?—Their complaints were made to me.

576. Had you no means, or did you not conceive yourself to have means under the Abolition Act, of giving them redress?—That makes me remember it was just just previous to August, when I had not the means except by bringing the case before the governor. R. R. Madden, M.D.

26 April 1836.

577. The Chairman.] If special circumstances had occurred, and special complaints had been made subsequent to the Abolition Act, would not the special magistrates have the means of doing justice?—It would depend on the character of the special magistrate. A special magistrate who is interested for the negro would have insisted on the time being allowed for the negro's going to the plantation at the rate of two or three miles an hour.

578. Mr. W. Gladstone.] Would he be allowed that time out of the master's hours?—Yes, I have allowed it myself; but I expect many special magistrates might not.

579. You, judging from your experience and practice, think that the obscurity of that law is one great cause of complaint?—I think it is a very great cause of complaint.

580. As you suppose that the complaint on the score of the distance of these provision-grounds was before the 1st of August, are you aware if anything was done on it subsequently to that date, or does it continue to this day?—I think by this time it must be redressed, for they were building huts for the negroes.

581. Before you left the island were they building huts?—Yes.

582. Was that in consequence of a representation of the governor, or from the instruction of the special magistrate?—I think it was in consequence of the strong representations I made to the governor.

583. But the evil was in the course of redress before you left the island?—Yes, on this property.

584. You have spoken of the willingness of the negroes to work on the Sabbath; you did not give a direct answer to the question which was put to you, whether in any case when labour was exacted from them in order to provide for their own subsistence they would work on the Sabbath?—If they do not get half the Friday the only time they have is on the Sabbath.

585. Therefore it is not a necessary consequence, but only a general concomitant?—Consequent upon their being kept in the field till sunset.

586. Do the Committee understand you to say that the practice had been discontinued of the old women being nurses?—I have heard the attornies tell the negroes that they would not be allowed any more nurses in the field to take care of their children, and water-carriers.

587. To what purposes have the services of these old women been applied?—I cannot say.

588. Are you aware they were no longer employed as nurses when you were in the island?—When I was in the island, on many properties they were discontinued.

589. Can you suggest to the Committee any motive that the proprietor or manager could have for discontinuing them, or any means by which he could make the services of such persons so employed more available to himself?—The great motive in it was to get an additional quantity of time from the negro.

590. In that case you would not represent it as an object desirable in itself to remove these old women employed as nurses, but as a means and instrument in their hands to enforce the performance of the task by the negroes?—I think they were most essential in the field to the comfort of the negro.

591. Do the Committee understand you to ascribe to the managers or proprietors the desire of increasing the accommodation they afford to the negro, as a means of inducing the negro to perform his task faithfully?—I think it was a means to exact more time from the negro.

592. You ascribe to the managers of estates generally, in Jamaica, the disposition to exact time beyond that which the Act allows?—When I speak of proprietors and attornies, I would wish to make a broad distinction.

593. Those actually in the management of properties have a disposition to exact more time than the law allows?—I think so.

594. You thought the eight-hours' system was adopted, not on account of any advantages to the estate above what the nine-hours' system would afford?—I think much greater advantage will be got from the content of the negro.

595. Does it appear that, supposing you make no allowance for it, in point of physical labour, the eight-hours' system would give any greater advantage to the estate than the nine-hours' system?—That I cannot say from my own experience.

596. You

R. R. Madden, M.D.

26 April 1836.

596. You said you thought the eight-hours' system was adopted in order to render the Act incapable of working?—It is, perhaps, a strong phrase to use, "incapable of working;" but I think it was adopted, in many instances, from vexatious motives.

597. Do you think the vexatious motives were so far deliberate as to be characterised by the phraseology you used, namely, "a desire to render the Act incapable of working"?—I would rather say it was adopted for the sake of a vexatious opposition to the apprenticeship system.

598. Are you disposed to ascribe it more to momentary irritation than to a premeditated determination?—I should rather say momentary irritation.

599. Mr. Buxton.] Do the Committee understand you correctly, that notwithstanding the estate would be benefited, and notwithstanding the comfort of the negro would be promoted by the nine-hours' system in preference to the eight, yet according to your experience the eight-hours' system was adopted for the purpose of extorting from the negro a portion of that time which the Imperial Law had assigned to him?—My own opinion is, it was adopted for the sake of getting the negro's own time on the easiest terms to the owner.

600. In point of fact, were the negro females under the necessity of carrying their own children in the field?—That I never saw, but I heard from special magistrates that they were; but that I have not seen.

601. Mr. W. Gladstone.] Was that from not having nurses at home?—They were obliged to carry them to the field, and lay them down by the side of the place where they worked.

602. Not that they were obliged to carry them on their backs while at work?—I never saw that.

603. You have seen them carrying them to the field and lay them down?—Yes.

604. Mr. Buxton.] Have you heard of them being strapped to their backs?—No; I have heard of them being brought to the field, and laid down beside the trenches where they were digging; and I have heard the women complained loudly that their children were in danger of being eaten by the dogs.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

Richard Robert Madden, M.D., called in; and further Examined.

605. Mr. Buxton.] WHO are the persons who are usually selected as hot-house doctors?—They are generally infirm negroes, generally selected for being persons incapable of working in the field, and being thought superior in intelligence to the generality of negroes.

606. How are they usually paid for their services?—I believe they are not paid anything more than by some additional allowances, and that they are not expected to work in the field.

607. Who appoints them, and on whom do they depend for their situations?—I think they are wholly dependent on the attorneys and overseers.

608. Can they be removed at the pleasure of the overseer?—Certainly.

609. Or at the pleasure of the attorney?—Undoubtedly; when I say at the pleasure of either, I mean to say that if any complaint against the hot-house doctor were made to the attorney by the overseer, he would be dismissed.

610. Who compounds and administers the medicines to the sick negroes?—Generally the hot-house doctor.

611. Is there any other medical attendance?—On every estate there is a medical man appointed, who receives generally about a dollar a head a year for his attendance.

612. Can he satisfactorily perform his duties to the negroes?—I think not.

613. Why so?—I do not think one medical man would be sufficient to attend on an estate that has perhaps 300 negroes; and perhaps that medical man may have the the charge of a dozen properties with that number of negroes on each estate; if he was even so inclined he could not give sufficient attendance. R. R. Madden, M.D.

614. If he devoted his whole time to the number of negroes he had to attend, he would be incapable of giving them the attention they required?—I think so.

29 April 1836.

615. What is the nature of the discipline and punishment in use at the hot-houses?—Previous to August 1834, there was generally the stocks in the hot-houses; since August they have not been allowed to confine them in the stocks. I have seen sick people who had been refractory confined in the stocks before August 1834, subsequently to that time I do not think that would be allowed; I think the master would be punished if he did it.

616. You do not think there is any peculiar punishment in the hot-houses?—I think there is a great hardship in being sent to the hot-houses at all; the negroes live there on certainly very insufficient diet, what Mr. Abernethy would call a very low diet; so that a negro would bear almost any endurable amount of sickness sooner than go into the hot-house.

617. How are the negroes supplied with food, nurses and other particulars they may require in the hot-house?—They are shut up in the hot-house; they are locked up usually at night; the food is generally plantains or corn flour, a very low diet.

618. Are nurses appointed to attend them?—There is generally some old person; the hot-house doctor also is an attendant.

619. Sir George Grey.] Do they perform any work while they are there?—No.

620. Mr. Buxton.] Have you known apprentices really sick who have preferred continuing at their work rather than receive relief from the hot-house?—Yes; I have known cases where a negro has come to me complaining of sickness, and when I have desired him to go to the hot-house, he has said he would do anything rather than go to the hot-house.

621. Sir George Grey.] Has that been since the apprenticeship?—Yes; the only difference in their treatment there I know of, is in the bilboes, the stocks being removed from the hot-house.

622. Lord Viscount Sandon.] In regard to nourishment in the hot-house, the system is exactly the same?—I think it is exactly the same.

623. Sir George Grey.] Is the treatment of sick negroes the same in the town parishes and in the country?—No; there is no hot-house in the towns.

624. You were a superintendent of a town district?—Yes; I am speaking more from my observations as a casual observer, rather than in the exercise of my official duty.

625. You state that the negroes have come to you, being really ill, and have declined going to the hot-house; do you mean that that has occurred in a considerable district?—Previous to August in a considerable district, but since that period on a few properties that had prædial labourers which were within my special jurisdiction.

626. What was the mode of treatment of sick negroes in town districts?—They had a right, by the old slave law, to medical attendance; the master was obliged to supply them with it.

627. What is the system now?—It is the same.

628. What was the practice during the period you were a special magistrate?—The non-prædials are entitled to medical attendance from their master, as they were entitled to it by the old slave law.

629. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think adequate provision is made for medicine and medical attendance of the sick negroes?—Most certainly not, either for the prædials or the non-prædials.

630. Sir George Grey.] As compared with what they had before the apprenticeship was introduced?—I do not think they are in a worse condition than they were before.

631. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think they are in a better state except with respect to the bilboes?—I do not think they are at all better off there, because for their attendance medical men now get a smaller sum; it is something less than a dollar, generally speaking, now I believe.

632. Chairman.] Do you mean to say the pay has been diminished since the apprenticeship system has been substituted for that of slavery?—It was formerly a dollar a-head, and it is now reduced to less than a dollar.

633. Lord Viscount Sandon.] Under the practice, or any law?—I believe there is no law to regulate that.

634. Mr. Buxton.] Your evidence as to treatment is substantially this: that

R. R. Madden, M.D. the condition of the sick negroes is improved so far as the removal of the bilboes, but is worse so far as the reduction of the doctor goes, but that, upon the whole, there is not adequate provision made for medicine and medical attendance?—
 29 April 1836. I do not think in the way the doctors visit the estates they can give sufficient medical attendance to the sick.

635. Chairman.] Do you think the reduction of pay of the doctor has led to any material difference in that respect?—I do not think it has.

636. Mr. Buxton.] Have any negroes applied to you to be permitted to purchase the residue of their term?—A great number.

637. What number?—The applications in Kingston were innumerable.

638. Sir George Grey.] You mean during the three months you were a special magistrate?—Yes; I suppose there were more applications in Kingston than in all the other parishes besides; the number that obtained their freedom before me, I think, was 85 during the three months.

639. What proportion did that bear to the number of applications?—I should suppose there was not a day there were not from three to four applications for freedom.

640. What was the course that was taken when an application was made?—The negro came to the special magistrate and demanded to purchase the unexpired term of his apprenticeship; the special magistrate then applied to the agent to appoint a local magistrate to act with him, and in doing that, I believe, the special magistrate acted illegally; the agent appoints a local magistrate, then the special magistrate and the local magistrate meet, and they appoint another local magistrate; there is a fortnight then allowed to them to assemble; they assemble at the special magistrate's court, and proceed to the valuation of the negro; it is very evident that the course is unfavourable to the negro, for there are two local magistrates and one special.

641. Lord Sandon.] The choice of the second magistrate is made conjointly by the first local magistrate and the special?—Yes.

642. Chairman.] Why do you say that this course is illegal?—It will be found, by the 9th clause of the Colonial Act, "that when any apprentice under this Act shall be able and willing to purchase his or her discharge, and the party entitled to the services of such apprentice shall refuse or be unwilling to sell such discharge, such apprentice shall be at liberty to apply to the nearest magistrate appointed by special commission, who shall thereupon give notice to the person entitled to the service of such apprentice, or to his or their representative or agent, and such last-mentioned person shall thereupon appoint a justice of the peace of the parish in which the apprentice shall reside." It is evident from this clause that it is only where the manager refuses or is unwilling to sell the apprentice, the party has a right of calling for the appointment of a local magistrate: it says here "when the party entitled to the services of such apprentice shall refuse or be unwilling to sell such discharge." It is only in that case that the apprentice is at liberty to apply to the nearest magistrate to be appointed; by that clause, it appears to me, it is merely on the refusal of the master the apprentice has a right to apply to the magistrate.

643. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that there were cases of applications made to you in which the master had not refused or been unwilling?—I never knew a case in which the special magistrate did not at once call on the agent to act.

644. On this application how did the special magistrate proceed?—On the application of the apprentice he went immediately to the agent.

645. You conceive that he exceeded his power, for that he ought first to have ascertained that the master had refused or was unwilling to sell?—I think so under the literal construction of this clause.

646. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you conceive, supposing the apprentice to apply to his master for his discharge, and the master to be willing to give the discharge, but to ask an exorbitant price, the apprentice was then at liberty, under the 9th clause, to apply to the special magistrate?—I think he was.

647. If he showed an unwillingness to sell the discharge?—Yes.

648. Mr. Buxton.] Have you found that any apprentices that so applied have been illegally detained in slavery?—A great many.

649. What became of the negroes upon your ascertaining the fact that they were illegally detained in slavery?—Generally speaking, when I could not succeed in procuring their freedom myself, I referred them to the attorney-general; he used to institute some proceedings; but in a great many instances those persons did not obtain their freedom. R. R. Madden, M.D.

650. Sir George Grey.] On what grounds do you conceive they were entitled to their freedom?—There were a great number of Indians which had been imported from the Mosquito Shore; the descendants of those persons were declared free by law; there were a great number in Kingston that I was well assured were illegally held in slavery. 29 April 1836

651. Do you mean that applications were made to you by those persons to purchase their freedom, and that the evidence in the individual case satisfied you they were entitled to their freedom?—Those were not cases of applications to purchase their freedom, but to procure their freedom on grounds of being entitled to it.

652. Did you go into evidence on those cases?—I did invariably.

653. On satisfying yourself that the party was illegally detained in apprenticeship, did you feel yourself justified in administering the law as between master and apprentice?—I did not, and I incurred a vast deal of odium on that account. When an apprentice came to me, claiming his freedom on the ground of being held illegally in slavery, the master generally employed a lawyer to come before me; the lawyer used to contend that I had no right to establish the claim of the apprentice by any defect in his title, but that I was to establish his claim by the goodness of the negro's title, and I believe that was the opinion of the Crown lawyers.

654. Lord Sandon.] That the presumption was in favour of slavery?—Yes, under such circumstances.

655. Sir George Grey.] In those cases in which you came to a conclusion in favour of the slave, what course did you take?—I thought that the spirit of the Act empowered me to refuse to give their services to their masters till they had satisfactorily established their title. The Act says, that the special magistrate shall act between slave and master, and I had a right, I thought, to be satisfied I did not exceed my jurisdiction.

656. In those cases in which an individual was considered by the magistrate not to be an apprentice, was he from that time released from active labour to his master?—Many since I left the island, whose cases had been before me, but not decided, I understand have become apprentices, having been claimed over again.

657. In cases brought before you, and adjudicated upon by you, was the immediate practical effect to release the party from active servitude?—They could not punish them for not labouring, except through me, and I would not punish them while I had a doubt.

658. Chairman.] So that, in fact, the result was, they became practically free on your deciding that they ought to be so?—They became practically free so far as abstinence from labour, but then they might be brought up before me every day for a re-hearing, and that was constantly done; there would be warrants constantly out against them; they could not be said to enjoy a state of freedom.

659. Sir George Grey.] In cases in which, on the evidence, you entertained too much doubt to come to a decision yourself, what course did you adopt?—When I had great doubts I generally referred them to the attorney-general.

660. Do you know what proceedings were taken in any such cases?—The proceeding I generally understood the attorney-general would adopt was that of the writ of homine replegiando, but I do not know in any instance whether that writ was sued out.

661. Can you state a specific instance, or have you reason to believe there was any instance in which it was sued out?—I do not know any one instance.

662. Mr. Gladstone.] Would not the limited period during which you remained in Jamaica sufficiently account for that circumstance?—Certainly.

663. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to say that such a writ was refused to be sued out in your time?—No, I do not know a single instance on the part of the attorney-general in which there was a refusal.

664. Mr. Gladstone.] As to the final issue, was it likely to take place after you left Jamaica, and therefore not to fall within your cognizance?—Yes, it very probably might.

665. Sir George Grey.] In the meantime did the apprentice remain subject to coercive labour?—Since I left the island I have seen a reward for an absconded female apprentice who had been repeatedly brought up to me, and I refused to award her services as belonging to a Mr. Fisher. I have recently seen her advertised with a reward, as a runaway.

R. R. Madden, M.D.

29 April 1836.

666. In the instances in which you had no doubt the party was not an apprentice, you so decided; but when you referred it to the attorney-general, did you exact, or refuse to exact, the labour in the meantime?—I generally gave those persons a paper, commonly called a pass, declaring that such a process on the negro's application for freedom was pending, and that they should be let go back to Spanish Town, or between Spanish Town and Kingston, to make out their claim, but that pass, in many instances, was held not to be legally binding on the master.

667. In the case of an apprentice so circumstanced brought up to you on the complaint of the master for not performing the labour to which other apprentices were subject, did you free the individuals from labour or require the labour?—I felt myself obliged, by the spirit of the Act, not to require labour from them.

668. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated, that in cases where the negro conceived himself entitled to his freedom, the master attended and brought his lawyer with him; was there a lawyer also on the part of the negro?—No; but I must do this justice to the solicitors at Kingston: I never applied to them to come forward on behalf of a negro for whom I wanted their legal assistance that they did not do so, so that the negroes never could be said in any court to be without legal defence when it was essential to them.

669. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you believe these cases were common all over Jamaica, or that they prevailed particularly in Kingston?—They prevailed particularly in Kingston.

670. Do you believe they were common elsewhere?—I believe they were not.

671. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe, independently of those who came under your cognizance, there are a number of other apprentices in Jamaica under the same circumstances?—There were, when I was there, a vast number of apprentices not duly registered.

672. Sir George Grey.] In what respect were they not duly registered?—I take it, the words "duly registered," in the Act, mean, formally registered at a certain period; but if you go beyond that, and inquire into the previous registrations, you would find very many who were not duly registered.

673. Do you know a class of cases in which persons were held in apprenticeship when you were in Jamaica, who had been duly registered at a former period, but omitted in subsequent registrations?—I do not.

674. You are not aware of that question having been referred to Lord Sligo?—I heard of its being referred, but I do not know the decision.

675. You do not know whether those parties have been all liberated or not?—No.

676. Mr. Buxton.] Can the question, whether the negro is duly registered or not, be forced upon the attention of any court competent to release him?—The courts of law are open to him as they are to all men; but the question is, whether he has the means of going into them.

677–8. Sir George Grey.] Suppose the case of an apprentice arising before a special magistrate, in answer to a complaint that he was not an apprentice because not duly registered, would the special magistrate be bound to satisfy himself that the apprentice was duly registered, and therefore an apprentice?—I think he would; but were he strongly opposed I think he would not have the means, without entailing vast trouble and expense upon himself, of going into a court of law with the negro; there is no legal protector for the negro now.

679. Would he have the means of ascertaining the fact of a due register?—I should think he could do that easily.

680. Would he not have the power, then, of abstaining from exacting coercive labour?—Yes; in such a case he would ascertain the fact at once; he would not have to refer the case to the attorney-general.

681. You say he would be bound to abstain from exacting coercive labour in case of his being satisfied he was not properly registered; if the attorney-general was to institute proceedings, and those proceedings tended to the same result, would it then be in the power of the master to repeat the application to the special magistrate, and to call upon him to hear that case?—No; the attorney-general would have the power to protect the negro during the action.

682. And after the action was brought to a successful issue?—Yes.

683. Lord Sandon.] But, till the case had been brought to a judicial hearing, the master might bring up the negro for a re-hearing any number of times?—

Yes;

Yes; so long as it was before the special justice, if he denied the power of the special justice to inquire into such questions of title. R. R. Madden, M.D.

684. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you believe a large number of apprentices were detained without being duly registered?—I think there were a great number in Kingston particularly, belonging to the brown people. 29 April 1836.

685. To what do you ascribe that?—To ignorance of the law.

686. Do you ascribe it to the desire of the master to avoid registering them?—I think it was generally an ignorance of the law on the part of the brown people.

687. They have no title to their services without their being registered?—No; even in the cases where I was told they would be allowed compensation, I told them they were not entitled to their services.

688. Sir George Grey.] You conceive the question of the compensation and the right of the master to their services to be distinct?—Yes.

689. Lord Sandon.] Are the negroes in general aware whether they are registered or not?—They generally know whether or not they are actually registered; there is always some negro lawyer who will put them up to that.

690. Sir George Grey.] Do you know an instance in which, after the right was determined by a competent tribunal, they were detained in their apprenticeship?—No, I do not.

691. Was not the immediate effect their liberation?—Yes.

692. Mr. Buxton.] You stated that there were considerable difficulties in the way of the negro establishing his right of freedom?—Yes; in the first place, if he had witnesses to produce they might be scattered over the island, they might be negroes on different estates, and he would find a great difficulty in bringing them up, and there would be difficulty in their going into a court of law unless the attorney-general were to undertake his case.

693. In case of conflicting claims for compensation, is it not the interest of both the contracting parties to admit the accuracy of the registration?—Most decidedly, for they would not get compensation unless they were duly registered.

694. Are you sufficiently acquainted with the practice of the commissioners of compensation either at home or abroad, to say whether, at home or abroad, they will inquire into the fact of registration, if neither the claimant nor the counter claimant raises the question?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with their practice to answer that.

695. Mr. Buxton.] May the register appear perfectly accurate, and yet be founded on erroneous or fraudulent returns?—That would be taking the consideration of that question beyond the point you are empowered to do by law, for the Act says, if they are found to be duly registered as slaves "on or before the 1st of August 1834," they shall become apprentices, and the last registration I suppose would be the one looked to.

696. Sir George Grey.] Is not that a legal question, whether they are duly registered?—Yes, I understand it to mean if they are formally registered.

697. Mr. Buxton.] Did it come to your knowledge that any who had been slaves had slaves of their own?—I knew of slaves to possess slaves in St. Thomas in the East, belonging to Mr. M'Cornac.

698. Could they have been legally held in slavery as the property of slaves?—That is a question I am not competent to answer.

699. You cannot answer whether they could have been duly registered?—That would be a question of law as to the kind of property they were entitled to hold.

700. Do you know practically whether that point was decided?—I do not know any case of the kind.

701. Mr. Gladstone.] You have stated that there were very numerous applications to you by apprentices to procure their discharge, and there were about 85 discharged under your auspices?—The total number, I see by this memorandum, is 80.

702. Can you give an idea of the number who applied to you, and who failed in obtaining their discharge?—I can only say a considerably greater number than those who obtained their freedom.

703. To what cause do you ascribe that failure?—Many of them not having sufficient means, when the magistrate came to inquire into the case, to meet the award that was likely to be made; but in many cases, when they heard of the magistrates associated with the special magistrate, fearing the amount would be much greater than they could pay.

R. R. Madden, M.D.

29 April 1836.

704. You think that they desisted from urging their application in consequence of that apprehension?—Very often.

705. Did you yourself practically feel that the mode of providing for the discharge enacted in the Jamaica Act operated unfavourably for the negro?—I thought it did.

706. You think that where those proceedings were resorted to they prevented the apprentices being discharged on fair terms?—I can only say, my apprehension of the value of the unexpired term of apprenticeship was very different from that of the local magistrates.

707. Mr. O'Connell.] By apprehension, you mean your estimate?—Yes.

708. Mr. Gladstone.] By what rule did you estimate the term of apprenticeship, and of what class were they?—The class I had to do with were the non-prædials, or apprentices for the term of four years, and these I generally estimated at about 25*l.* currency.

709. That was your estimate of the services of a domestic negro for the term of apprenticeship of four years?—That was, generally speaking, the average.

710. Upon what principle did you arrive at that estimate?—The term first of all was for four years; I think Mr. Bryan Edwards laid it down in his book, that the services of the negro were worth about 10*l.* a year to his master in the best times of Jamaica; but there are various deductions to be made for medical attendance, lodging, food, clothing, and interest of the money for the four years, and the risk of life during that interval. The particulars of the various deductions are specified in my work.

711. Then you conceive that the residue of the 10*l.*, multiplied by four, after the deductions on those different accounts, amounted to about 25*l.* currency?—Yes, that is my opinion; I think the value of the service was less than in the time of Edwards, when it was 10*l.*; the non-prædial work less than one of the prædial labourers by two years' purchase.

712. Is the estimate Mr. Bryan Edwards lays down 10*l.* currency or sterling?—I think currency.

713. You say you conceive the value of a domestic was less than that of a prædial labourer; are you aware of any cases in which, under the system of slavery, they had been sold under their relative values, and bought in the market?—I saw a number of negroes sold during the previous eight or nine months I was in the island; the average prices were from 25*l.* to 30*l.* in Kingston.

714. Twenty-five to 30*l.* currency?—Yes; those were generally negroes taken in execution for debt, or negroes taken from workhouses, but that was the average.

715. Were not negroes taken in execution generally sold lower than others?—That might be when there was an agreement made between the persons who attended the sale and the master.

716. Were not they generally sold lower, in point of fact, than others?—I know that the last slave I saw put up to sale was sold for 5*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

717. When you say they sold at an average of 25*l.*, do you mean aged men, women, and children, or able-bodied field labourers?—I mean adult labourers.

718. Did you observe a distinction made between field labourers and others?—I never noticed any distinction in the value between them; I cannot say that there was a distinction made.

719. Do you think their value was about equal?—I think there was no great difference.

720. Mr. O'Connell.] By value you mean price?—Yes.

721. Mr. Lushington.] In the case of the man sold for 5*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, was he an infirm man?—It was an able-bodied young woman; the very last day that a slave could be sold at all; she was the last slave sold, perhaps, in Jamaica.

722. Are you aware of any cases under the apprenticeship in which the services of apprentices were transferred by sale?—A great number of those cases I know. Dr. Spalding bought properties, just previous to August, at merely the expected amount of the compensation.

723. Do you conceive those sales were a fair criterion of the value of the services in question, or were they not rather effected under the influence of exaggerated and unreasonable apprehensions of a transitory nature?—I think many persons who bought them then were speculating on the fears of the proprietors.

724. Consequently they would form no criterion of their value?—No; but the average price of slaves I saw sold was from 25*l.* to 30*l.*

725. Referring as well to the three months of the apprenticeship as to the previous time?—Yes, to the whole time.

726. Are you aware the sum you have mentioned is very much below the average given by the commissioners of compensation?—I believe it is somewhat less.

727. Are you aware that it is greatly less?—No, I am not.

728. The question refers to transfers in the market?—There they have sold at from 25 l. to 30 l. currency just previous to the termination of slavery.

729. Sir George Grey.] Was there any uniform course pursued by the special magistrates in respect of appraisement?—There was not during the three months I was on the island.

730. Have you known any instances where the appraisement was completed, and that the money was not paid, in consequence of its being beyond the means of the negro to pay it?—I generally made it a practice, in my court, to make an inquiry of the negro whether he had the sum he would be likely to be required to pay; and if he had not I would not go into the case.

731. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you think that, if you had acted alone, and had alone to determine the appraisement of the negroes, many more would have been manumitted by you during the time you were a special magistrate?—I think many more.

732. Sir George Grey.] You think an obstacle was raised to the fair appraisement by the junction of local magistrates with you?—The local magistrates would often value the same negro at, perhaps, 60 l. or more, that I valued at 25 l.

733. Lord Sandon.] In those cases in which another valuation took place, what was the sum to which the three arbitrators agreed?—The sums are here in my statement.

734. What were the sums at which they were actually assessed?—The average about 25 l., I think.

735. What was the highest?—I have allowed as much as 80 l. for one man, a coppersmith.

736. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe that the price was higher than you would have estimated, where the local magistrate was united with you?—Yes.

737. Lord Sandon.] There appeared to be 80 of those on which you agreed?—In some cases we could not agree, and the negro did not get his freedom.

738. Sir George Grey.] You say, in some instances you could not agree; was the opinion prevalent in Jamaica that all the three magistrates must concur, or that the appraisement was to be fixed by the majority?—That was what I considered the great defect in the Act, that there was nothing specified in the law on that subject.

739. Was the construction you put upon the Act, and on which you acted, that all three must concur, or that the majority must decide?—Many of the special justices, I believe, thought that the majority should decide; I did not think so.

740. In those cases in which you dissented from the other two magistrates, the appraisement remained incomplete?—Yes.

741. Mr. Buxton.] The result was that the negro was not manumitted in such cases, or if manumitted, it was at a price higher than you considered right?—No, I will not say that he was manumitted at a higher price, for I generally stuck out for the sum I have mentioned; but I have cases here before me of men having been valued by us at 60 l. and 80 l., but those were coppersmiths and tradesmen, of great value to their employers.

742. Have you known any instances of apprentices being accused of shamming sick when, in point of fact, they have been really unwell?—That is the source of the greatest hardship and cruelty to the negro I have known in the colony; in the way of cruelty, or what is generally considered such, very few cases came before me, where negroes had been punished with great cruelty; but a great many cases came before me, of people being charged as shammers, when in my judgment, as a medical man, they were really ill.

743. Sir George Grey.] A good many complaints came before you of that nature?—Yes, very many.

744. What course did you pursue?—There were, no doubt, some cases of shamming, but in many it was not so; I found a woman, in one case, accused of shamming, that was labouring under one of the most severe diseases that a woman can suffer under.

745. That woman was accused of shamming sick?—She was brought before me for

R. R. Madden, M.D. for shamming; she was a sullen, sulky person; she would not tell me what was the matter with her; I found she had a protrusion of the uterus.

29 April 1836. 746. You satisfied yourself there was a substantial disease, which ought to have exempted her from labour?—Yes.

747. What was the result?—The overseer took her back, saying, that if he had known what had happened he would not have had her punished, and she was to work about the premises, to sweep the yard, or some such light employment.

748. Was she capable of doing that work?—Barely capable of doing it.

749. Did she get substantial redress by her application to you as a magistrate?—At that time she did.

750. Mr. Buxton.] You were able to afford her relief because, as a medical man, you ascertained she was labouring under that complaint?—Yes; if I were not a medical man I should not have known it.

751. Lord Sandon.] If you had not been a medical man, as a special magistrate, in such a case, should you have called in the attendance of a medical man?—I do not think, in that instance, I should, for the woman appeared a sullen, sulky person.

752. Mr. Gladstone.] Except for that circumstance, would not any special magistrate, in such circumstances, naturally resort to the opinion of a medical man?—In that case he must do it at his own expense; the law does not allow any payment for the medical man.

753. How do you conceive they do generally adjudicate in such cases?—That must depend on the individual character of the special magistrate.

754. Sir George Grey.] Do not you conceive the efficient conduct of justice must depend on the efficient character of the special magistrate in a great measure?—I think it must in a great measure.

755. Mr. Gladstone.] Was not such a class of cases common, as complaints against negroes, as feigning to be ill?—It is a constant cause of complaint.

756. Did you never hear the question mooted among the special magistrates whom you met with and conversed with how that ought to be dealt with?—I think they would deal with it effectively; if they had any suspicion that the patient was labouring under a severe illness, they would request the attendance of a medical man, but I think not generally.

757. Would they require the proprietor to bring a certificate of the medical man before they enforced the labour?—I do not think in many instances that ought to satisfy the magistrate, if the medical man of the estate only gave such certificate.

758. Would they require that to be done?—Yes, they do frequently bring a certificate from the medical man. In the particular case I allude to the woman had been examined by the medical man of the estate.

759. Had the medical man declared the woman to be in a state fit for labour?—Yes; but he had not found out the complaint.

760. You attribute that to a defect of skill on his part?—No; to his not being able to pay sufficient attention to all the sick negroes on the estate, he had so much to do.

761. Lord Sandon.] This resolves itself into your former complaint of their having too much to do?—Yes.

762. If there were sufficient medical attendance, perhaps no better evidence could be afforded to the special magistrate than the medical man on the estate?—I would rather have that of a man not connected with the estate.

763. Would not that be somewhat difficult in a rural part of the island?—It would be sometimes.

764. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you prepared to say from your knowledge and experience, that, generally speaking, medical men have more to do than they can manage, or do you make that matter of inference from knowing they have a great number under them?—It resolves itself into this, I think they are insufficiently paid.

765. Have you ever compared the payment to medical men in Jamaica with the common practice of retaining a doctor to take care of and attend the poor of a parish in England?—No.

766. Are you aware of the amount of the invoice of medicines generally sent out from England to every estate in the island relatively to the number upon it?—I suppose where there are 300 negroes it may be from 20*l.* to 30*l.* a year.

767. Mr.

767. Mr. O'Connell.] You have spoken of the apprehension of injustice to the negro from the prejudices and interests of magistrates connected with the colony; are not the stipendiary magistrates liable to be influenced in that way?—It depends a great deal upon their intimacy with the proprietors whether they may be so influenced or not.

768. They cannot be intimate with the negroes?—No, they only come before them either as complainants or defendants.

769. The influence of society must be altogether tending towards the favour of the proprietors?—Most decidedly so, where the special magistrate is on good terms with the proprietors.

770. You are of opinion that the number of special magistrates is insufficient for the duty?—During my time they were considerably less than they are now.

771. What was the whole number at that time?—Thirty-six, I think.

772. What is the number now?—I believe it is nearly doubled.

773. Do you consider 72 as sufficient, considering the local circumstances and the travelling necessary, to attend to all the reasonable complaints of the negroes?—So far as numbers go now, I think if they had a proper protection from the colonial government they would be sufficient.

774. What protection do you think they want?—I think the two cases which have lately occurred, of Mr. Bourne, who was fined 200*l.*, and of Captain Oldrey, who was fined to the amount, with costs, of about 500*l.*, are clear proofs that the special magistrates are not duly protected in the exercise of their duties.

775. Sir George Grey.] Are you acquainted with the particulars of both those cases?—With Captain Oldrey's case I am.

776. Are you not aware that the colonial government gave Captain Oldrey all the protection they could, and that the attorney-general was instructed to defend him?—When I spoke of the colonial government, I was in error, I meant the colonial judicatures.

777. You do not refer to the executive government?—No, certainly not.

778. Are you aware what the government have done to protect Captain Oldrey?—I believe the government did everything they could to protect him, and that is his own opinion.

779. Are you aware that a new trial has been moved for?—I believe that a new trial has been moved for, for Captain Oldrey, but that in consequence of the manner in which the charge was opened, limiting the amount of the fine to something under 300*l.*, the cause could not be brought into the Court of Error.

780. Are you aware of the result of the application for a new trial?—Captain Oldrey told me a new trial had been moved for.

781. The result is not yet known?—No.

782. Are you aware what is the state of things in Mr. Bourne's case?—I cannot say.

783. Both the cases are very recent cases?—Yes.

784. Mr. O'Connell.] It is the constitution of the courts you consider so unfavourable to the stipendiary magistrates?—I think it is very unfavourable to them.

785. In the constitution of the courts, do you mean the judges?—I think the judges of the court of assize were highly prejudiced against the special magistrates generally.

786. Sir George Grey.]—Do you apply that to the chief justice as well as the other judges?—He does not preside in those courts I allude to; I mean the local judges who assist in them.

787. Do you distinguish, in the opinion you have expressed, between the colonial judges and the chief justice?—Most decidedly I do; I believe the chief justice gives every protection he can.

788. Are you aware whether the chief justice is appointed by this country, and selected from the English or the Irish bar?—I am aware that he is appointed by this country, but that he derives part of his salary from the colonial legislature.

789. Mr. O'Connell.] Are you aware of the qualification necessary for the other judges?—There is no legal qualification necessary.

790. You mean no legal education?—Yes.

791. They are planters?—They are.

792. Mr. Gladstone.] You say the chief justice is dependent for a part of his salary on the colonial legislature?—When he was sent out, the House of Assembly kept back his salary a year and a half in consequence of his appointment not being satisfactory to the proprietors.

R. R. Madden, M.D.

29 April 1836.

793. Mr. Buxton.] Have you read a letter, dated the 30th of August 1834, which appeared in the Kingston Chronicle, in which the writer describes the magistrates as our 30 tyrants, describes the British Government as exercising the omnipotence of an earthly government to plunder and destroy, but says that the Jamaica inhabitants have a remedy for all this in the constitution of their own courts and their own juries?—I have.

794. Mr. O'Connell.] Have you a copy of that letter?—Yes.

795. Mr. Gladstone.] By whom was it signed?—There is no signature to it.

796. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you know by whom it was written?—It is not known with any certainty.

797. To whom is it attributed?—I have heard it attributed to the speaker, Mr. Barrett.

798. Was that alleged in the Kingston newspapers?—It was not.

799. Was it merely alleged by rumour?—It was merely alleged by rumour. I have no certainty of it.

800. Mr. Buxton.] Was it matter of notoriety that Mr. Barrett wrote that letter?—I do not think there was any certain knowledge of his having written it; it was the rumour.

801. Have you not in print intimated that Mr. Barrett was the writer of that letter?—I have said it was written by a great speaker as well as writer, or something of that sort.

802. Was the word "speaker" put in Italics so as to intimate that it was Mr. Barrett?—I have not said it was written by Mr. Barrett, and I do not say so now; I cannot say it was written by him.

803. Mr. O'Connell.] In what paper was it printed?—In the Kingston Chronicle.

804. Is that a paper of much circulation in the island?—It has a considerable circulation.

805. Is that a paper under the patronage of the colonists, or opposed to their interest?—It is considered the advocate of the colonial interest.

806. The question respects not its views towards the mother-country, but its views as between the planters and the negroes?—It is the advocate of the planters.

807. Is it your opinion that that letter conveys a fair sample, or an exaggeration of the prevalent opinions among the planters and better classes?—I think it is a very fair sample of the general feeling entertained.

808. Sir George Grey.] Would not you conceive that letter as showing that it was conceived that the special magistrates would afford protection to the negroes so far as it was in their power?—I think the letter fairly proves that if the great body of the special magistrates were what they are considered to be, they would have been thought much better of by the colonists.

809. Mr. O'Connell.] What do you mean by what they are considered to be?—I have heard them accused of being altogether in the planters' interest; when I was there, the great body of them were not so.

810. Would they call them tyrants if they believed them to be so?—I should say they would not be abused if they were not generally supposed to do their duty towards the negro.

811. Lord Sandon.] Do you conceive the expressions used by an anonymous writer in a time of very great excitement and apprehension, can be taken as a test of the permanent feeling of the planters?—Up to the time I left the island, the special magistrates never ceased to be vilified by the Jamaica press.

812. Mr. Gladstone.] Does not very great intemperance habitually prevail in the press in Jamaica on both sides?—I believe it is the most intemperate press in the world.

813. Mr. O'Connell.] Independent of any authority you attach to what is contained in the newspapers, are those sentiments, according to your knowledge, the sentiments entertained by the general class of planters?—I have already stated, I believe, in my first day's evidence, that I conceived there was a prevailing disposition to oppose the apprenticeship system, and that was intended to be effected through the sides of the special magistracy.

814. Lord Sandon.] Have you any reason to believe that the state of the colonial feeling in the first three months of the apprenticeship is a fair sample of that which has prevailed since, and is now prevailing?—I should consider, in the ordinary nary course of things, the irritation would be the greater at the earlier stages of the measure in question. R. R. Madden, M.D.

815. Your evidence then is not to be taken as conclusive upon the existing state of feeling in the island?—From all I have heard since I left the island, I should infer that the feeling towards the special magistrates is not improved.

816. Mr. O'Connell.] What is the ordinary routine of duty of a special magistrate?—The duty of the special magistrate who takes care of the prædial labourers would be to visit every estate having 40 negroes upon it once a fortnight; in a large parish he would have to travel from 30 to 40 miles a day in the exercise of his duties.

817. Do you mean every day?—Every day except Sunday, and one day that he would hold a special court in his own house or the Court House; he would, independently of that, wherever there was any discontent on a property, be liable to be called to it, and be expected to go to it within 24 hours of the time.

818. Sir George Grey.] You speak of the duties which would devolve on a special magistrate with the small number which existed; would they not much decrease with the considerable increase which has since taken place?—I am speaking in allusion to the time when I was there.

819. The increase of number would of course decrease the number of miles which were to be travelled each day?—Yes.

820. Mr. O'Connell.] Have you stated in your answer the entire duty?—That is the whole routine of their duty.

821. They have to hear the complaints once a fortnight on every estate having 40 negroes upon it; they would have their petty sessions once a week, either at their own house or some public station; and they would have to attend on properties when they were called?—That is the ordinary routine of their duties.

822. Is it your opinion that that gives the apprentices a sufficient opportunity of making their complaints?—In their own days they could go to the nearest special magistrate and make their complaints, if the special magistrate was not on the property, or they might go to whatever station they heard he was at in their neighbourhood on their own days.

823. Is it your opinion, that between the one opportunity and the other, namely, the visit of the magistrate and the employment of the free day, the negro has substantially a fair and reasonable opportunity of making a complaint?—My opinion is that he has ample opportunity; and that there is perhaps too much opportunity both to master and to man for litigation.

824. Is it your opinion that complaints are withheld from the apprehension of not having justice done?—That again depends upon the character of the special magistrate; if he has the character of being a severe special magistrate, the negroes would decline making their complaints to him.

825. Chairman.] By severe, you mean if he is supposed to have a feeling against the negro?—If he is what is called a Busha's magistrate.

826. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of any district where there is more than one special magistrate?—In St. Elizabeth's there were two when I was there; but there are many instances of that kind now.

827. Mr. O'Connell.] In the district in which you were, were there many local magistrates?—All the members of the corporation belong to the magistracy.

828. Did you attend the quarter sessions in any other parish besides Kingston?—I was appointed to the district of Kingston, and also to take charge, as far as I could, of Port Royal and the lower part of St. Andrew's parish; I found my duties in Kingston infinitely more than I could attend to. I only went occasionally to the other parishes; they were close to Kingston.

829. Sir George Grey.] Had any other special magistrates jurisdiction in those parishes?—There were special magistrates in both.

830. Mr. O'Connell.] In your parish what was the class of life and occupation of the local magistrates?—Those in Kingston were all store-keepers or merchants, with the exception of some lawyers and doctors.

831. Many were storekeepers?—Almost all, I think.

832. By storekeepers do you mean persons who keep what we call shops on their own account, or for others?—They were chiefly merchants; all the merchants keep stores generally.

833. In a general way did you find the disposition of the negro to be unruly or kindly under good treatment?—I think there is no person in the world more sensible of good treatment than the negro.

R. R. Madden, M.D.

29 April 1836.

834. By sensible, do you mean showing gratitude in his conduct for it?— I think he is eminently grateful for good treatment, and by his nature well disposed to appreciate it.

835. Have you found them inclined to work for wages?—I never knew an instance of their refusing to work for wages where they had not some grievance to complain of. I might state a curious instance of that. There was a committee of the House of Assembly, of which Mr. Berry was chairman, and who was well known to be the promoter of that committee. I was summoned to attend; the wording of the summons runs thus: "By virtue of an order of the House you are hereby requested to attend the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the general discontent among the apprentices, their reluctance to work as formerly even during the limited time prescribed by law, and the almost universal determination on their parts not to work for wages during their own time."

836. That is their description of the objects of the committee?—Yes; but it is an assumption of the fact, that they would not work for wages. At the very time that committee was going on, I was informed by a member of the House of Assembly, now in England, that in passing Mr. Berry's estate at that very time, he saw the whole of the negroes of Mr. Berry at work during their own time; he was surprised, and inquired the reason of their working; they said they were working for their master, who was good and kind to them, because he paid them good wages.

837. In point of fact, have you known that, when they laboured for wages, they gave reasonable value as labourers for wages?—Yes, I believe they did; I believe they worked better for wages than they worked before.

838. Sir George Grey.] Were you examined before that committee?—I was not examined before it, though I was kept some weeks in Spanish Town waiting to be examined.

839. Mr. Gladstone.] How many apprentices were there in your district?—The slaves of the parish of Kingston were 5,265, according to the book I have before me; I cannot speak to the accuracy of that.

840. Sir George Grey.] Did you decline to be examined before that committee?—I did not. I had publicly stated what the nature of my evidence would be, and I was not called upon to be examined; but I ought to state, that immediately after I waited on Mr. Berry, and told him how long I had been waiting, he said he would turn me over to another committee, which was to inquire into the conduct of the special magistrates. I waited for about a week for that, and finding I was not called, I left.

841. Mr. Burton.] Do you think the reason you were not called before the first committee was, that the nature of the evidence you could give was known?—That is my impression.

842. Sir George Grey.] Have you read the evidence before that committee?—Of several persons; not the whole.

843. You are not able to say whether you think the evidence takes a fair view of the subject?—From what I heard of the evidence at the time I would say it does not give a fair estimate of the question.

844. Chairman.] You mean that the witnesses were partially selected?—Almost the whole of the witnesses were in favour of the colonial view of the subject.

845. Sir George Grey.] You think other evidence might have been acquired?—They might have had a great deal of evidence to rebut that which was given.

846. Mr. O'Connell.] You yourself would have rebutted it?—I would, as far as I could do so.

847. Will you state whether the power of removing the apprentices from one estate to another has come within your observation?—Yes, I have been applied to to remove them.

848. Can they be removed without their own consent?—Yes, they can, but not without the consent of two special justices; and the special justices must be assured they are not severing any relations, separating children from their mothers, and so on.

849. Lord Sandon.] Did many cases arise under your notice?—Very few cases of that kind came before me; they would be more likely to arise in other districts.

850. Mr. O'Connell.] What do you conceive to be the grounds for removal; would the convenience of their master be a ground?—On the properties Dr. Spalding purchased he removed them for his own interest; he thought the slaves would be more beneficial to him on one property than another. I cannot conceive they would be removed merely as a punishment from one property to another.

851. Do

851. Do you think it would be a great punishment?—It would be one of the greatest punishments that could be inflicted; there is nothing they are so much attached to as the place they have long resided in. R. R. Maaden, M.D.

29 April 1836.

852. Do you understand many families were removed in Dr. Spalding's instance?—They were removed as slaves; I find, by reference to the representation sent to the Governor, I was in error in stating the distance was 15 miles, as it was from 10 to 12.

853. What class of apprentices do you think are liable to most hardships; for example, do you think that the jobbing gangs are subject to more hardships than any other class?—They are.

854. Can you specify what the additional hardships are?—They are subject to be sent from one part of the island to another; on the estates to which they are sent there are generally no huts for them; they frequently erect huts covered with reeds and leaves; they are insufficiently provided with food, in consequence of not being able to cultivate their grounds, and they have not the comfort of a settled home.

855. What is your opinion as to the fitness of the negroes for an immediate emancipation?—I think, from the best consideration I have been able to give the subject, they are quite qualified for their immediate freedom.

856. Have you any apprehension that their immediate freedom would have any tendency to riot or rebellion?—There would be great apprehension of it if some permanent legal measures were not taken for their benefit, and if they were left subject to a vagrancy law, such as was contemplated some time ago; if a permanent law was not made to supply the infirm, and those not able to work, I think rebellion would be the consequence.

857. If there was not some poor-law for the infirm and aged?—Yes; for all those the masters are obliged by law to support at this time, and whom they will no longer be obliged to support after the year 1840.

858. You look upon a poor-law as essentially necessary for the tranquillity of the island?—Yes.

859. As to a vagrancy law, you apprehend it would act with much hardship on them, or they would consider it such a hardship as to endanger a rebellion?—It would be more than harshness; it would be virtually re-enslaving the apprentices.

860. You speak of a law which actually passed the local legislature?—Yes, but which was disallowed at home.

861. Chairman.] You are of opinion a very effective police would be necessary?—Yes, I think a much better police than exists now in the island.

862. Your objection is to the nature of the system proposed, but not to the establishment of a system of police?—An efficient police would be a most necessary thing in the event of the abolition of slavery.

863. Mr. O'Connell.] What is your opinion of the facility of organising such a system of police; would it be greater or less by the emancipation?—That would depend altogether on the tone of the House of Assembly; it is difficult to answer for that.

864. Chairman.] Do you believe it would be possible to establish an effectual system of police without endangering in any degree the complete freedom of the negroes?—I think there might be a very efficient police, without in any way affecting the freedom of the negro.

865. Of what nature would be the system of police you would suppose so desirable?—I would say some modification of the system of police which has been proposed for Ireland, and on a much less expensive scale; the present police is wholly insufficient for the purpose.

866. You think it would not be necessary to place any restraints upon the negroes if they were free?—I would not have the least fear for the conduct of the negroes, provided those measures were carried to which I have adverted.

867. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think a vagrancy law, founded on the principles of the law which was passed, would be in fact the re-enslavement of the negro?—That was most decidedly the object and intention of it; it prohibited the negroes of one property from visiting those on another; and it is generally known that the wives and families of those persons are separated and scattered over various properties.

868. Your opinion is that it would not be necessary to provide at that time against great assemblages of the negro population?—I think the police laws, without any other acts than those of the island now in force, would be sufficient if the police was on a good footing.

R. R. Madden, M.D.

29 April 1836.

869. In your opinion the prevention of great assemblages of negroes would be an infringement of a state of perfect and complete liberty?—I should think the common police laws and the criminal laws of the country would be sufficient to preserve order.

870. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of there being a great quantity of unoccupied land in the central part of Jamaica?—I believe there is.

871. Do you think there would be no danger of negroes, without some specific provision, settling on that land and cultivating it without contributing to the general interest of the colony?—I know the negroes had a general opinion that they might settle on any unoccupied land; they were under a great error in that respect; they thought themselves entitled, for instance, to settle on the unappropriated Crown lands.

872. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think that evil would be sufficiently met by making regulations, by which any persons were permitted by law to purchase whatever land they wanted to occupy, at a fair rate?—I think regulations of that kind would have the necessary effect.

873. Sir George Grey.] That being rendered applicable to all the negroes as well as to the whites?—Yes; and that that would prevent it: I think the negroes would be as well disposed to abide by any law of the kind as white people.

874. Do you think that if that regulation were made, it would be a stimulus to them to work for wages?—It would be a great stimulus to their industry, I have no doubt.

875. Mr. O'Connell.] The scale of punishment of course is changed with the altered condition of the negro?—I am not aware that it has been effectually changed by any law since I was in the island.

876. The alteration of the law, from slavery into qualified freedom, has altered the scale of punishment?—Yes, very much.

877. Are you aware of the system of punishment while you were in the island, and from hearsay since?—I am aware of the system of punishment which prevailed at the time I was there.

878. The power of flogging has been taken away by positive enactment?—It has, from the owners.

879. Did the owners substitute any other punishment in its room?—They had no power of inflicting any other corporal punishment.

880. Have there been any other punishments inflicted in its room?—No other corporal punishment by law; there is solitary confinement and small allowances of food, which may be authorised by a special magistrate.

881. Is there any other punishment authorised by law?—Yes, there is one other, the treadmill.

882. Sir George Grey.] Is it the owner or the magistrate who has the power of inflicting?—Only the special magistrate.

883. Has the owner, without the intervention of the special magistrate, the power of inflicting any punishment?—None whatever; he may punish them by discontinuing their allowances, but not with corporal punishment.

884. Mr. O'Connell.] The power of punishment is altogether transferred to the special magistrate?—Yes.

885. Mr. Gladstone.] Is he able to punish him by withholding his legal allowances without reference to the special magistrate? It depends upon what the allowances are, I mean the allowances which were discontinued; he could not discontinue any legal allowances.

886. Mr. O'Connell.] There are certain allowances defined?—There are.

887. Can you specify those which are so defined?—Amplly sufficient grounds for giving the negro food, clothing, medical attendance; those are defined by the new law.

888. Those are all which are mentioned, and the quantity is not defined otherwise than by the general words “amplly sufficient?”—That is the way they are defined.

889. Who is to decide the sufficiency?—With regard to clothing, the vestry decided upon that; there must be a representation made to them once a year, specifying the amount of clothing, and they decided upon it; then, as to the provision-grounds, the special magistrate has the power of examining those grounds, by a clause in the Act, to see they are sufficient.

890. Beyond those denominated allowances, have there been other allowances usually or frequently made while they were slaves?—There was an allowance of sugar, sugar, herrings, and rum; those have been discontinued; they were discontinued very generally when I was there.

29 April 1836.

891. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean universally discontinued, or only in your jurisdiction?—Within my knowledge of the parish of St. Andrews they were generally discontinued, but I understand they have been allowed since.

892. When you speak of the power remaining in the hands of the owners to punish by the discontinuance of those allowances, you suppose they are generally continued?—I understand they have been pretty generally allowed again.

893. Then, under that altered state of things the power is in the hands of the managers or owners to punish by withholding them?—It was done for the purpose of getting the additional labour they claimed for those allowances. On the first of August, I understand the attorneys, generally, said, for those allowances you will have to give so much of your own time; the half of Friday, for instance.

894. Were those allowances generally in operation during the period of slavery?—My opinion was, that they were general; that they were necessities the negro could not do without; but the master certainly had the power, as a punishment, of withholding them.

895. Mr. Gladstone.] With reference to clothing; were any complaints made before you judicially of the withholding of legal clothing?—In the parish of Kingston complaints of this kind were very common.

896. What did you consider as your jurisdiction in giving a sufficient allowance?—I conceive that I had the power of ordering the master to give it, and fining him if he did not.

897. What do you consider a criterion of sufficient clothing?—That he should get clothing once a year.

898. Did you conceive you had a right to inquire into the sufficient quality of the clothing, or that that was already determined by the parish vestry, and that you were only to see, as a magistrate, that the man got that which was necessary?—That had not been the custom in Kingston; they were allowed, in many cases, a certain sum for their clothing.

899. Where the clothing was not commuted for a sum of money, did you consider you had the power of fixing the amount to be given?—I think so, with reference to what the custom was.

900. Mr. O'Connell.] Is there any corporal punishment which the owner may inflict himself; is not solitary imprisonment one?—There was one mode of corporal punishment which he had the power of inflicting in Kingston, and which was, ultimately, the cause of my leaving; there was a punishment of seizing apprentices where there was resistance, and dragging them before me. That was generally done until I endeavoured to put a stop to the practice by establishing warrants, and I did not often hear of it afterwards.

901. Is the power of inflicting solitary imprisonment used?—It is used, and very much abused I think.

902. The owner can use that power, can he?—No.

903. Sir George Grey.] Is there any power given as to the extent of imprisonment by the clause?—No, not on the apprehension of a negro; it says the master, at the expiration of 24 hours, may take him out of confinement; but it does not make it compulsory on him to do so.

904. Mr. O'Connell.] Does not the clause make it necessary for the manager to procure the attendance of a special magistrate?—As soon as possible; but the version of that rests with the owner, what he means by "as soon as possible."

905. It might be made a subject of complaint, and cognizable by the special magistrate, might it not?—Yes, if for any lengthened imprisonment.

906. And with regard to that violent seizure, in carrying apprentices before the magistrate, ought not you to describe that as a matter of vexation instead of a matter of punishment?—Yes; I was wrong in describing it a punishment.

907. Sir George Grey.] Does not the clause which gives this power of apprehension, also require (whether the negro is liberated afterwards or not) the owner to report to the special magistrate the fact of his having apprehended him?—Yes, and it is a very important one; if it was not for that, great injustice would be done to the negroes; but by that clause he is obliged to report to the special magistrate; and, if he has let him be there longer than is absolutely necessary, he would be liable to punishment.

908. Mr. O'Connell.] You are aware, are you not, that many instances have occurred of confinement for 24 hours, and longer, of a negro, without any charge being

R. R. Madden, M.D. being made against him?—In the beginning it was frequently done, and in consequence I have fined persons.

29 April 1836.

909. Sir George Grey.] You have yourself fined individuals for having unreasonably detained negroes in imprisonment?—Yes, for keeping them longer than 24 hours; sending them into imprisonment on Saturday, and keeping them there until Monday, when they might have been brought before me on the Saturday.

910. Does that information come to you upon the complaint of the managers or the complaint of the apprentices?—Generally they were brought up before me by the owners; and when I have inquired how long they have been in imprisonment, and I have found they were imprisoned unnecessarily beyond the specified time, I have made those persons make a complaint against the master; but this was in Kingston, where the magistrate sat daily.

911. Mr. O'Connell.] What are the offences for which flogging is administered?—For absence from work, and for insubordination; it may be inflicted for what is called impertinence or insolence to the master, and it is a great difficulty to know what insolence means often; for every species of misdemeanor which is brought before a magistrate in this country, and for any of these the special justice may inflict corporal punishment.

912. For everything that may be called insubordination?—Yes, insubordination; it is one of the things distinctly mentioned.

913. Sir George Grey.] The law gives the power of inflicting corporal punishment, does it, to the magistrates?—Yes; but it also gives them the power of commuting that punishment for solitary confinement, the commuting of which must rest with the character of the magistrate.

914. Mr. O'Connell.] Is there a wider range of offences, for which the tread-mill or confinement is substituted for that of flogging?—That is at the option of the special magistrate, whether he will substitute it or not.

915. There is not a distinct clause for that, so that he cannot help himself; but he may order them to be sent to the tread-mill, may he not?—For instance, all women who cannot be corporally punished; they are generally sent to the tread-mill.

916. Have you not heard of instances of women being flogged?—I have heard of instances since I have left the island; but I have not heard of any, except of particular cases, where women have been illegally flogged.

917. Have you heard of any instances where women have been legally flogged?—No.

918. Chairman.] Do you mean striking, or flogging?—I remember a case of illegally flogging a woman with a rope, and I fined the owner.

919. Mr. O'Connell.] Those were cases of illegal punishments, were they not?—Yes, they were illegal punishments; but they were not general.

920. You have heard cases, I suppose, not of that description, but of flogging in workhouses, have you not?—I have heard of women being illegally flogged in the workhouses; I believe the governor has lately alluded to them.

921. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of the flogging of women being sanctioned by any law in Jamaica?—I know there is no such practice; I never heard of a free woman being flogged; I know the practice does not exist; I do not think it would be tolerated.

922. Under what law can an apprentice woman be flogged?—The new law most distinctly says, "that no female apprentice shall be flogged or punished at all by corporal punishment."

923. Chairman.] Then a female apprentice, when flogged in a workhouse, is not that contrary to law?—Yes, it is distinctly so.

924. Mr. O'Connell.] Must not you have some magistrate to direct that flogging to be inflicted?—No, I should think it was the workhouse superintendent who did it upon his responsibility.

925. Mr. Gladstone.] Is there any local power by which masters are allowed to flog female apprentices?—I am not aware of any free woman being flogged at all.

926. Chairman.] Did you ever hear of any free woman being flogged?—No.

927. Mr. O'Connell.] Is there any remedy or clause in favour of an apprentice whom a special justice directs to be flogged?—Yes, if he was unjustly flogged.

928. Is there any redress?—His redress would then be upon his coming before a special magistrate.

929. Suppose a special magistrate adjudicates upon the matter, and orders him to be flogged, has he any redress?—I do not think he has any other redress except going before another special magistrate. R. R. Madden, M.D.

to

930. Is there any kind of appeal from one special magistrate to another?—They do so frequently. 29 April 1836.

931. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean there is an appeal in the interval between the sentence and the execution of the sentence?—No.

932. Mr. Gladstone.] Is the appeal to an individual magistrate, or to a board?—I never heard of an instance of a negro having so complained between sentence and punishment.

933. Sir George Grey.] Have you never heard, do you mean, of an instance of a negro having complained of arbitrary conduct on the part of a special magistrate?—Yes, I have.

934. Have you known of a magistrate being removed from his office on the ground of such a complaint?—Yes.

935. But the punishment must be inflicted, in the first instance, before he can appeal?—Yes.

936. Can he appeal to the government?—Yes, I think he might appeal to the government; but he would have great difficulty in doing so between sentence and punishment.

937. Mr. Gladstone.] In point of law, the parties have an appeal to the superior courts, have they not?—I do not think they have.

938. Chairman.] You have said that apprentice women have been flogged?—I said I had of late heard so; but those cases I do not know of my own knowledge.

939. Have you heard of them in a way which makes you certain that such cases have occurred?—I do not think that the governor would have alluded to it in his speech to the House of Assembly unless he believed it.

940. Sir George Grey.] Do you know whether the governor said, in that speech, it was contrary to law?—Yes.

941. Mr. Gladstone.] You say the appeal to the governor is to the governor direct?—Yes.

942. Is there any facility for a person to adopt that course?—I think he would have very great difficulty between the sentence and the punishment.

943. Are the people encouraged to send petitions to the governor?—The governor would not refuse to receive petitions in cases of hardship, but I think he would order the special magistrates first to inquire into the case.

944. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of investigations having taken place founded upon complaints made of the conduct of a special magistrate?—Yes, I remember special magistrates having been appointed to inquire into such cases.

945. Have you heard, since you came away from the island, of several investigations of that nature having taken place?—I have not heard of them, but they may have taken place.

946. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you know what interval took place between the time of the magistrate so conducting himself and his having been dismissed, in the case spoken of?—He was in the island in the exercise of his duty when I left.

947. How long before had he committed the offence?—I do not think it was for a particular offence.

948. Mr. Lushington.] Are you aware that the Governor-general of India has issued orders that the greatest facility might be afforded to the presentation of petitions to himself, from the humblest of the native population; that his aides-de-camp are particularly cautioned to receive every petition from the lowest individual; does a practice similar to that exist in Jamaica?—I should say it did not exist to the same extent.

949. If an apprentice, complaining of ill-treatment, had been able to make his way to another part of the colony, to the palace of the governor, or rather the Government-house, would he find ready access to him for the purpose of submitting his application?—I think decidedly he would.

950. Chairman.] Has there been any public notification given to the negro population of the readiness of the governor to receive their petitions?—No, certainly not; it would not be desirable to give such a public notification, for if you did you would have all the negroes in the island flocking to Spanish Town.

951. Mr. Gladstone.] Such petition having been received, to what authority would it be referred to obtain an explanation?—In the first case, if there were any serious circumstances in it, it would be referred to the Attorney-general, by whom it would be duly attended to; if one of less interest it would be referred back to the

R. R. Madden, M.D.

29 April 1830.

the special justice, and the governor would order him to communicate with him, and tell him what steps he had taken; and if not satisfied that he had taken the proper steps, he would order two justices of the adjoining district to inquire into the matter.

952. So that, in a case of real hardship, you think that the road to redress would be fairly open?—I think if it was more open it would be still better.

953. Lord Sandon.] Did not you say a notification had been issued that application should be made to a special justice, and then, on failure there, appeal should be had to the governor?—Yes, I have had as many as 140 negroes at my house in Kingston, from various properties in St. Thomas's in the East and St. David's, complaining of something on the part of the proprietor which was felt to be a great hardship; sometimes their complaints might be frivolous, to be sure, but I must say they very often were not frivolous when they came down from a great distance to me; but it was to prevent their coming down in great bodies and inconveniencing their masters this order was given.

954. It was then the order was given?—Yes; the order was made for them to prefer their complaints, in the first instance, to a justice in their own district.

955. And then was it ordered that they might subsequently apply to the governor?—I do not remember that was specified in the order, but it was so understood.

956. Mr. O'Connell.] But you know, do you not, of instances of trials of negroes being conducted by the stipendiary magistrates in a partial manner, so as to exclude the justice of the case, or render it difficult to establish it?—It is very difficult for a negro to procure witnesses; in the first place, if a magistrate were to insist on his procuring all the necessary witnesses, it would be a matter of the greatest difficulty; he might have to take them from the adjoining properties, and he would incur a great deal of odium from so doing.

957. Then that is one difficulty?—Yes.

958. Sir George Grey.] That would not be a difficulty arising out of any defect of the law as administered by the special magistrates. Do you mean that the magistrates have unduly required evidence which was not accessible?—No; the difficulty I speak of is, that of procuring evidence which might be necessary.

959. You mean that the magistrates have failed in procuring witnesses for the party?—I think the difficulty I speak of might be a ground for complaint rather with the negroes.

960. Mr. O'Connell.] Is that difficulty applicable at all in the case of a prosecution on the part of an owner?—No; I am alluding to complaints on the part of a negro, where, to substantiate his complaint, he would have to bring witnesses from adjoining properties.

961. Then if a planter complains he can easily get witnesses, can he?—He can command all the witnesses he finds necessary.

962. Mr. Gladstone.] Is it your opinion that a planter has a right to appeal from the decision of a special magistrate which the apprentice has not, in point of law?—I do not think he has any appeal against his decision, except a representation to the governor or an action at law.

963. Do you mean that answer to refer to the planter, or the negro?—The planter; he may bring an action against the special magistrate.

964. Mr. O'Connell.] Is the negro necessarily present at his trial for those offences?—I never knew an instance in which he was not present.

965. Have you heard of instances in which he has not been present?—I have.

966. Since you were there?—Yes; I have only heard of it in one instance.

967. Sir George Grey.] In that particular instance, was the name of the individual given?—Yes.

968. Should you be able to designate it as an instance on which an investigation could take place?—The gentleman is not living.

969. Do you believe the precise evidence as to that would be substantiated?—I have only heard of it from other persons.

970. Are the magistrates upon oath in cases of applications for the valuation of apprentices?—They are not.

971. Do they adjudicate upon a statement taken upon oath?—Yes.

972. In all cases?—No, at the commencement of the operation of the act, it was not so generally.

973. Does not the act require that it should be a statement upon oath?—It was a matter a matter of some doubt, I know, at the commencement, whether all the evidence should be taken on oath. R. R. Madden, M.D.

974. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you know whether the apprentice is punished upon the evidence of the master alone?—Yes, he may be. 29 April 1836.

975. Does that occur where the master has an interest in the punishment, the punishment being additional labour?—Generally considered, it is supposed that the master making his complaint upon oath, unless the special magistrate sees some reason to doubt that evidence, it is sufficient to convict the negro.

976. Is the evidence of the negro taken against the master upon his complaint?—Yes; but I think the balance is rather in favour of the white man always.

977. Sir George Grey.] In the case of a negro making a complaint against his master, is the negro competent to give evidence against the master?—Yes; just as competent as the white man to prefer his complaint.

978. Mr. O'Connell.] And to prefer it on oath?—Yes.

979. But still you think there is a general bias in favour of the master?—Yes, in favour of his evidence.

980. Do you know that in some of these punishments the time is appropriated to the master, the negro being punished by being obliged to give additional labour?—He may have 15 hours in each week of the time of the negro.

981. Do you know whether there has been any decision or adjudication, by means of those punishments, to continue the apprenticeship after 1840?—Yes, I do know of such cases.

982. Sir George Grey.] Is not there a specific clause respecting that point? Yes; there is in the Colonial Act.

983. And is not the term of apprenticeship expressly limited by that Act as well as the Imperial Act?—Yes.

984. But it is not discretionary?—Yes; the first clause of the Act says slavery shall expire in 1840; and the subsequent clause says, you may continue the apprenticeship for one year after 1840.

985. And not for more than one offence, absence from the employ of his master?—Yes.

986. He may make up the time?—Yes.

987. Chairman.] What opinion did you form of the accuracy and veracity of negro evidence?—That is unfortunately one of the greatest defects in the slave character, the prevalence of falsehood among them; it is one of the vices which in every country I have been in, and where I have had opportunities of judging of the slave character, belongs especially to slavery.

988. Mr. Buxton.] You said for very trifling offences the apprenticeship might be prolonged beyond 1840?—Yes, for occasional absence may be so regarded in some cases as to be a trifling offence, and yet the apprenticeship might be continued after 1840.

989. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you consider that the apprenticeship might be prolonged beyond 1840, for any absence except any one which has lasted for a considerable time?—I think the Act allows it for a portion of time, not proportionate to the prolongation of the term of apprenticeship.

990. Are you aware of any case in point which has occurred, in which the apprenticeship has been so prolonged?—I am aware that there were general instructions to the special magistrates from the executive, reminding them of the power to continue the apprenticeship beyond 1840 in cases of absence.

991. Without limit or reference to the duration of that absence?—I think with reference to the course laid down by the Colonial Act.

992. Mr. O'Connell.] With this single exception, of removing the flogging from the hands of the owners to the hands of the special magistrates, can you state any very decided advantage the negro has got, under the new Act, in point of punishment and labour?—He has gained an advantage in point of labour and in point of punishment, especially with regard to punishment not following on passion; perhaps a day or two of confinement intervening between the day of the offence and the punishment, which is a very great advantage.

993. You think that the negro apprentice must consider himself to live under better circumstances than as a slave?—I consider that his situation is better than under the administration of the law by special justices; but where the special justice may not be disposed to take an active part in his favour, I do not think him much better off.

R. R. Madden, M.D.

29 April 1836.

994. Mr. Gladstone.] With regard to the special justice, with all the means you had of forming an opinion, is it your opinion that the special magistrates, as a body, are disposed to afford adequate protection and attention towards the negroes?—I can only speak of those I knew; I think that, as a body, they were disposed to do so when I was in Jamaica; but the majority of the gentlemen I knew, who were then in the island, are dead.

995. You said the influence of society, acting upon the special magistrates, would be against the negroes, and in favour of the planters; is not that a system which will apply generally, when they who are the accusers are taken from a higher state of society, and those accused are of the lower?—I do not think it is a difference of classes merely, but a difference of castes, on account of complexional distinctions which makes the difference.

996. Mr. O'Connell.] The magistrates being naturally in the society and in the scope of all the courtesies of life of the one class, and not of the other?—That is an advantage which the master has decidedly; for the special magistrate is in the habit of meeting the gentlemen of the county, the planters, and, of course, he must be on intimate terms with them.

997. And if he excited their displeasure, he would find himself very uncomfortable in society, I suppose?—Yes, I think very much so.

998. Then are you to be understood that the great difference between the negro in a state of slavery apprenticeship will be found in the integrity and impartiality of the special magistrate?—It all depends upon that.

999. Mr. Lushington.] The special magistrate is the great hinge upon which it all turns?—Yes.

1000. Sir George Grey.] Do not you think that the effect of any bias on the part of any special magistrate, such as you have referred to, will be in a great measure checked by the superintendence of that body by the executive government?—I think it might be checked to a great extent, and I know Lord Mulgrave used every means to prevent any bias of this sort, even before the operation of the new law.

1001. Mr. Buxton.] Are you able to form any opinion, as to the capabilities of the negro, and his readiness to receive proper religious instruction?—Yes; I have had opportunities, both in the east and in the west, to form some opinion on this subject, and my most decided persuasion is, that the negro is not inferior to the white man, either in his intellectual or moral capacity; he may and must, by his condition, be inferior to him in his endowments; but he is not in his capacity for these. I think he has a great desire for religious instruction, and that he gets that; but I cannot say that any opportunities for intellectual improvement are afforded to him.

1002. You mean that he has a moral capacity, and a desire for religious instruction?—He has all the capacity that the white man has.

1003. Lord Sandon.] Have you acquired any knowledge of the intercourse between the missionaries and the negroes?—I had ample opportunities of witnessing the communication between them.

1004. Is that effect beneficial with the view of promoting order and good behaviour between the planters and the negroes?—I think it would have been impossible to have kept slavery together without it.

1005. Are you aware that any estates were improved by the presence of the missionaries?—I think wherever the missionaries took the most active steps in teaching the negroes, there they did that most effectually.

1006. Did you ever hear of any particular estates, the agents upon which ascribed in an eminent degree its prosperity to the instructions of the Moravian missionaries imparted to the natives upon that estate?—I never knew of any such instance myself, but I know from others, that the exertions of the Moravian missionaries were considered more successful than those of any other class of persons.

1007. Mr. O'Connell.] You are a Roman-catholic, are you not?—I am.

1008. Mr. Gladstone.] Do not the masters generally concur in that opinion of yours, as to the Moravian missionaries?—Yes, I believe they do.

1009. I want to ask how many estates there were in your district?—Very few indeed.

1010. How many?—I do not think there were more than two or three having non-prædials.

1011. Were

1011. Were they sugar plantations?—I do not think there is any sugar plantation in Kingston. R. R. Madden, M.D.

1012. Consequently, you would not have personal opportunities of ascertaining what went on in connexion with the cultivation of the country?—No; I am not competent to speak to that. 29 April 1836.

1013. And most of the facts you have stated, which bear upon the working of the estates, are facts, the knowledge of which you have derived through special magistrates who were in the habit of resorting to your house?—Yes, first of all; and, secondly, from their representation, confirmed by my own observations.

1014. What was the exact date of your departure from Jamaica?—On the 18th or 20th November 1834.

1015. I understand you to say, that the unfavourable opinion you had formed as to the probable working of the apprentices, had not been changed, though it had been in some degree modified by what you had learnt since leaving the island?—Yes.

1016. Did I understand you the main feature of the apprentice system, which induced you to conclude unfavourably of it, was a general withdrawing of allowances?—Yes; and also a general absence of contracts for wages, and the insufficient number of special magistrates; these were three very principal causes.

1017. I state these as the symptoms, without asking you the causes of those particular circumstances; were these the main features?—I think they were.

1018. Supposing you were apprised that the working for wages was now a general rule, and not working for wages the exception; that the special magistrates, as you have been apprised, have been doubled in number, allowances were generally given, and punishments were very much on the decrease. Assuming those circumstances, would your opinion as to the probable issue of the apprenticeship be ultimately changed?—It would be very materially changed if I ceased to consider upon the constitution of the House of Assembly, and its influence upon the conduct of the proprietors and overseers generally.

1019. These are admitted facts respecting the constitution of the House of Assembly, and your opinions are fixed respecting the temper of that house; but, taking these as they are, and supposing them to remain as they were, and these improvements, which I have described, had taken place under the influence of the House of Assembly, is it from that state of feeling and temper you would despair altogether respecting the operation of the system of apprenticeship?—If these improvements had taken place, to the extent you have stated, it would alter my opinion.

1020. You said just now, that most of the special magistrates who were there when you were in Jamaica are dead, and their places have been supplied by others; have you reason to believe that those who have supplied those places are of different principles?—I have no reasons to know that they are.

1021. Do you think that they are disposed to give more protection to the negroes?—Most of those that I was intimate with were disposed to do their duty towards the negro.

1022. Are you aware of any special preparations having been made on any estate in Jamaica before the 1st of August, to prepare the way for the emancipation of the negroes?—It was one of the greatest causes of complaint, that no adequate provision or preparation was made for that event.

1023. Are you aware of any estates where it was brought about voluntarily by the proprietors?—In fact, where that was done, it was done by the proprietors; not by the attorneys, but the resident proprietors, or those who had gone out recently; by gentlemen who came from England to look after their properties.

1024. Could you name any of their estates?—I know it was done upon Mr. Shuley's, and I believe it was done upon Sir Henry Lushington's, under the superintendance of Captain Lushington.

1025. Are you aware whether, upon those estates, the results were beneficial?—Most decidedly so, I understood.

1026. Sir George Grey.] You have spoken of the evils which you attribute to the House of Assembly; do you consider those evils as necessarily connected with the apprenticeship system, or having arisen out of the state of slavery; are the evils likely to exist after the apprenticeship system shall have terminated?—I see no possibility of an alteration in the House of Assembly until the elective franchise is enlarged, which must be the case when apprenticeship ceases in 1840. I think a great

R. R. Madden, M.D. a great many who are now apprentices will then become electors, and they will have an influence over the tone and temper of the House of Assembly.

29 April 1836.

1027. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you ascribe to the whites a deliberate determination of working the apprentices after the term is expired; do you think obstinacy or prejudice would render them incompetent instruments for carrying the provisions beneficially into effect?—I think there are great allowances to be made for the irritation which has arisen; I do not think it possible to take power away from men who have had it without control without their feeling great reluctance to part with it.

1028. Are you likely to attribute that to irritation, and not to deliberate intention to frustrate the object of the provision?—A great deal to irritation, and an attachment to old prejudices, creating an opposition especially on the part of the embarrassed proprietors in the island; and I think there was something like a settled purpose to prevent the working of the measure.

1029. You do not apprehend that from the other party, the unembarrassed proprietors?—No, decidedly not; the less embarrassed they are, the less disposed they are to oppose the new measure.

1030. Mr. O'Connell.] Then upon the estates of substantial proprietors you do not think that result would occur?—I think the estates which are under the management of the attorneys are likely to be those upon which it would take place.

1031. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware of many estates in which the system was introduced before the 1st of August?—Very few; I was intimate with Lord Mulgrave at the time of the act passing the assembly, and had opportunities of hearing from those about him on this subject, and I would say that they did not exceed 12 or 14 estates in the island; but I cannot remember the names.

1032. Then one of the causes which you assigned for the probable failure of the apprenticeship system was the importunity of merchants at home for large returns: is that a general opinion. Are you aware of any specific fact of demands for increased returns upon which you founded that remark?—I founded the remark upon a particular instance.

1033. Will you describe the circumstance?—I know that upon properties where an attorney is the acting person, he represents that the merchant at home is not satisfied with the turns which he gets; and that is one reason for his using additional means for getting labour. It is a very common assertion that the merchant at home expects large returns.

1034. I would wish to direct your attention as to whether there has been increased urgency in that respect?—I do not say there was increased urgency since August; I say there was such an alleged demand.

1035. In how many parishes in Jamaica have you been?—Kingston, Port Royal, St. David's, St. Thomas' in the East, St. Andrew's, St. George's, St. Mary's, and St. John's.

1036. Mr. Buxton.] Have you received letters of instruction from Lord Sligo as to the discharge of your duty?—Yes.

1037. Will you put those letters of instruction in? (The witness produced them.)

1038. Sir George Grey.] Are they letters directed to you personally, or those printed in the Parliamentary Papers?—They were general instructions sent to all the magistrates in the island, and I believe are printed.

[The Letters of Instruction were put in, and read as follows:]

Sir,

King's House, 15 July 1834.

The near approach of the 1st of August renders it expedient that I should address you on the important duties which it falls to your lot on that day to enter upon. On the manner in which you shall perform the functions which will be on that day committed to your charge depends, in a great measure, the happy completion of one of the noblest measures ever devised by the heart and feeling of man; great, therefore, is your responsibility. The proprietors throughout the island have been publicly exhorted by me to make such domestic arrangements as will, under the change, be of as much advantage to one class and as little detrimental to the other as its extraordinary character will admit of. That some have in compliance with my recommendation I have personal knowledge, that many more have done so, I have reason to think, and have besides been informed that active and seasonable preparations have been made over the greatest part of the island. These arrangements are of the first importance to the future prosperity of Jamaica, and their success must in a great measure depend on the zeal and discretion with which you shall support the proprietors prietors of estates and other properties in carrying these measures into effect. Let your zeal, however, be tempered with extreme caution; and when you recollect that I have used that word, do not forget, that I have recommended to you in the most serious manner also discretion. Let your zeal be shown in the readiness with which you attend to the calls and suggestions of the proprietors and gentry of the country. Let your caution be exhibited in the consideration you give to those suggestions and to the cases which may be submitted to you. Human strength cannot go farther than a certain point, and therefore there may be some difficulty in your meeting the numerous calls which may be made upon you for your attendances. Prefer always to take sufficient time at each place to decide properly what may be submitted to you rather than hurry from place to place to hear a greater number of cases. You will take a note of the calls which are made on you for your attendance, and visit in succession those places where your services are required, as far as their position renders it convenient. In many cases, however, you will be able to get through much more business by varying from this general rule. It would be expedient that you should give notices, when possible, in what direction you mean to go each day, in order that any person requiring your advice and presence may come up to the principal place where it is your intention to stop. You will appoint an early hour on some one day in each week when you will hold a session at your own house to dispose of such business as may come before you. On other days when you have time you will, of course, decide at home such incidental cases, provided that your doing so does not interfere with any previous appointments. An appointment, however, once made, you should never, unless in very urgent cases, fail to keep. You will, when it is possible or convenient to you to do so, hold your session at the place on the day that the petit sessions for your district are held, but at an earlier hour. It would be advisable that you should, when you have time enough, attend those petit sessions, in order that you may learn the usual application of the law in your district; but in such cases remember you are always the junior magistrate. Should you differ in opinion with the bench, you will, after expressing the reason of your dissent, withdraw from it till the decision on that particular case shall have been given. You will recollect the extreme importance to the public of the good behaviour of the police force; you will, therefore, pay close attention to all its proceedings in your district, and I shall expect from you confidential reports respecting their conduct and habits, whether officers or men. Should you see them acting in any manner you do not approve of, as that body is under the direction of magistrates, you will order them to stop, unless they show you superior instructions. You will, in case you should meet the county inspectors or the inspector-general, convey to them your remarks on the conduct of the police. You will recollect that on the 1st of August you become a magistrate for every part of the island, as far as all dealings between master and apprentice are concerned. You will not, therefore, hesitate on any emergency to go out of your own district to a neighbouring parish, if the urgency is greater there. You will consider your own district more generally in your charge; but you must not confine your services to it, if you judge that they are more requisite out of it for the moment. You will brief in a book for future reference a regular diary, containing the whole of your proceedings, the places you have visited, the names of the owners, the cases decided, the names of plaintiffs and defendants, witnesses, and results, as well as any general remarks you may wish. To make out each week up to the day before the Spanish Town post leaves your office, a regular diary taken from such book, specifying the proceedings of each seven preceding days, leaving out only the names of the witnesses, and any memoranda you may have taken of the evidence; this, however, if you see no reason why I should be made acquainted with the evidence. Should anything appear to you worthy of notice in what has transpired before you, you will not hesitate to communicate it. You will direct your Report to Colonel Doyle, indorsing the top of it as "Special Magistrate's Report," and placing your name at the lower corner.

Anything of a private nature you can communicate to me direct or to Colonel Doyle, on a separate sheet, marked private. In conclusion, allow me to give you your principal instructions, and to supersede all others, that you shall always have the law under which you act before you, and in every case be guided entirely by it in the execution of your duty.

I have the honour to remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

Sligo,

To Dr. R. R. Madden,
Special Magistrate, Kingston.

Sir,—I am commanded by his Excellency the Governor to make for your guidance the following observations:—In cases of habitual runaways they ought to be condemned to additional labour as to their own time now, and to a prolongation of their apprenticeship for some period after the expiration of the present legal term. In cases of second running away, half diet, of the lowest description, when in confinement; and if no tread-wheel, hard labour in the penal gang will be a proper punishment. Where a proper proportion of work is not performed in the hours allotted for work, it may be advisable, instead of confining apprentices, to order them to make up the lost time, or give an adequate quantum of labour out of their own time. I take this opportunity of observing to you that the number of miles required to be stated in your weekly report, is to show the distance travelled by you each day, and not the distance between the several properties and your own residence in the parish.

I am, &c.

R. G. Nunes, Secretary.

Sir Stratford Canning.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

John Jeremie, Esq., called in; and further Examined.John Jeremie, Esq.

3 May 1836.

1039. Mr. Buxton.] ARE you prepared to state anything further relative to the Jamaica Acts?—Yes.

1040. State what further occurs to you?—I find among these papers several Acts, three or four at least, which require to be laid before the Committee. The first Act to which I shall take the liberty of calling attention is the Act “for making further provision for the building, repairing and regulating of gaols, houses of correction, hospitals, and asylums.”

1041. Is that in this blue book?—Yes, page 294, it is No. 6. The first point with regard to this Act is the date and the time for which it was passed. It was passed on the 4th of July 1834, and is to continue in force only until the 31st of December 1840, the exact period of the apprenticeship.

1042. Chairman.] What inference do you draw from that?—That its object is directed principally to that body of the community who are in apprenticeship; it commences by directing that the three county gaols shall be improved, and that a gaol and house of correction shall be built in every parish, and the expense of building is to be paid by a tax on each parish. It then lays down certain rules for the regulation of those prisons, to which I find no objection; but a general power is granted subsequently to the “common council of Kingston, and five justices of the peace in quarter or special sessions assembled in the other parishes, to make further and additional rules for the government of such prisons, provided that such rules shall be consistent with and conformable to the rules and regulations in the Act contained, which rules and regulations they shall, as soon as may be convenient, transmit to the governor a copy of.” Now a power of this kind delegated exclusively to colonial magistrates, and exercised by them without the previous sanction of the governor, where especially the rules are only “as soon as may be convenient,” to be transmitted to the governor, seems not only liable to great abuse, but in direct opposition to the enactments that have been framed in England in pari materia, by which, if I am not mistaken, all such rules and regulations are to be previously approved by the Secretary of State.

1043. Mr. Gladstone.] What are the regulations in pari materia?—In all public prisons and gaols; and the Act to which I allude is the 5 & 6 Will. IV. cap. 38.

1044. Does that Act, or the other Acts with which you are acquainted with reference to English prisons, go as much into detail as to the rules to be observed as this Act does?—I am not aware that it does; but by that Act inspectors are appointed to visit prisons who are not even magistrates, so that it has been found necessary even to establish a controlling power over magistrates of counties in England; and yet over colonial magistrates, at a period so important and exciting as this, no effective control of any kind is established.

1045. At what period was that system of inspectorship recognised; was not it in 1835?—It is very recent.

1046. Subsequently to this Act?—Yes.

1047. Consequently, as to the system of inspectorship, there was no model in the mother country from which it could be copied?—Even then I find there is an omission. Some efficient control might have been confided to the governor, and special magistrates might have been named as visitors; but instead of that the whole of the management is placed in the hands of colonial magistrates, and

3 May 1826.

1048. Has this Act any reference to apprentices only, or is it general?—It is general, but it bears peculiarly hard upon apprentices; it was passed just at the time the apprenticeship began, and is to close when the apprenticeship ceases; it is under this Act, as I shall prove, that the flogging of females has taken place, and therefore have I been induced to study it more particularly.

1049. You said you would call the attention of the Committee to the duration of the Act in the first instance, but you did not specify any objection you meant to take upon that ground?—The Chairman put a question to me as to the inference I drew from it, and I said my inference was, that it was intended to apply to the system of apprenticeship; a system just created when the Act was passed, and about to expire when the Act expires.

1050. Chairman.] Do you know what is the usual practice in Jamaica with regard to the duration of Acts of the Legislature?—I believe in all the colonies it is a very ordinary practice to introduce a clause by which local regulations are only to endure for stated periods.

1051. Mr. Buxton.] But in this case the Act commences within a few days of the period when the apprenticeship system commenced, and is to close about the same time that the apprenticeship is to close?—Yes; it was passed on the 4th of July 1834; the apprenticeship was to commence the 1st of August of that year: it expires the 31st of December 1840, and the apprenticeship expires the 1st of August 1840, just time enough for the apprentices to have undergone their punishment.

1052. Mr. Gladstone.] Were not there some very special reasons that might suggest the assigning that particular termination to the Act?—A very strong reason indeed, the fact of the apprenticeship being in existence. I know of no other; but that I think a very excellent reason in itself. I do not blame them for the Act being made to expire at that time, but I scrutinise it the more closely for that reason; nor do I blame them for having a gaol in every parish.

1053. Does the Act impose any financial burthens?—Yes, it does.

1054. Then the doubts in the minds of the residents in Jamaica as to the cultivation of the island continuing after the apprenticeship, might be in itself a sufficient reason for assigning that termination?—There were very many excellent reasons for assigning that termination; the cultivation of the island among others. The Act in aid of this Act expires in 1840 also.

1055. That has special reference to the gaols?—Yes, and to the apprenticeship also; but the present Act is of great importance on this account, that the Apprenticeship Act in aid enables the special justices to commit apprentices, offending against the discipline of estates, to the common gaol or the house of correction. Now it is necessary to ascertain under whose management the apprentices will be when thus sent, for an unlimited time, by the special justices to the houses of correction; and if I find Lord Sligo's declaration, addressed to the House of Assembly in Jamaica, with respect to the flogging of females, fully confirmed by this Act, then I conceive that it is directly repugnant to the Imperial Act, and open to observation when ascertaining the condition, both legally and practically, of apprentices in Jamaica.

1056. Chairman.] Do I rightly understand you, that your main objection to the system of these houses of correction consists in their being exclusively under the management of the colonial magistrates?—My main objection certainly is, that they are under the exclusive control of the colonial magistrates, and that apprentices sent there are withdrawn from the control of the special magistrates.

By the next clause, the first clause in page 297, "The mayor, aldermen, and common councilmen of Kingston, and the custodes and justices of several towns and parishes, are required to nominate two or more justices, who are personally to visit and inspect each prison and house of correction once every day, if it should be practicable and expedient. Those justices are authorised to examine into the behaviour and conduct of the respective officers, and the treatment, behaviour, and condition of the prisoners and inmates, and in matters of pressing necessity, within the power of their commission as justices, they shall take cognisance thereof, and proceed to regulate and redress the same." Now, by virtue of this clause, one colonial magistrate, at least, may be expected to visit each prison every day, and there take cognisance of the behaviour of the prisoners, and proceed to redress the same. Here is at once jurisdiction given to them, immediate jurisdiction,

John Jeremie, Esq. over every inmate, without exception, of the workhouse; a jurisdiction which is without appeal.

3 May 1836.

1057. Chairman.] Is power given by this clause to any visiting justice to increase any punishment?—This clause relates to the behaviour of the prisoners within the house of correction, and therefore they have no right to increase any punishment awarded by the special justice; but they have authority to inquire into the conduct of every prisoner within the prison, including apprentices sent there by the special justice for domestic offences.

1058. And to punish any breach of discipline?—Yes, within the workhouse.

1059. What observations do you wish to make upon that clause?—That it transfers the care of the apprentice, when sent to the workhouse, from the special justice to the colonial magistrate; and then I shall proceed to show that the authority of the colonial magistrate extends to the personal correction of such persons.

1060. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you think that the enactment you have adverted to amounts to a contravention of the spirit of the Imperial Act, or of the spirit and the letter also?—Of the spirit alone; but it is a most complete contravention of the spirit, if it has the effect of indirectly authorising female apprentices to be flogged in consequence of a breach of the discipline of the plantations.

1061. I do not allude to the particular enactment, I allude to the system of enactments, by which apprentices are brought under the cognizance of the general magistrates, in respect to offences against the discipline of the prison; and I would ask you, with reference to the general principle that places the apprentices under the cognizance of the colonial magistrates in the prison, what are the precise limits of your objection upon that score?—I object to the apprentice being withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the special magistrate in any case where the original offence is purely of a domestic nature.

The next is the only clause that authorises the special justice to enter the workhouse; and I conclude that the special justice is allowed to enter it from the very general wording of the clause: "Provided that it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, of his own free will and pleasure, without being appointed a visitor, to enter into and examine every prison, house of correction, hospital or asylum of such parish for which he is a justice, at such time or times, or as often as he shall see fit, and if he shall discover any abuse or abuses therein, he is hereby required to report them in writing, at the next meeting of the common council of Kingston, if he be a member thereof, or to the quarter or special sessions of the several other parishes respectively;" so that the special justice may undoubtedly visit the house of correction, but all he can do is to "report" to the colonial magistrates.

1062. Do you conceive that special justices may be chosen visitors under the preceding clause?—I see nothing to prevent it; but as there is only one special justice in a parish, he is not likely to be chosen by a body of colonial magistrates.

1064. It appears that the jurisdiction of the magistrates in the prison, is limited by the terms at the end of the clause, that they shall take cognizance thereof, "and in matters of pressing necessity, and within the powers of their commission as justices;" having special regard to those qualifying words, is it your opinion that the general magistrates of Jamaica could administer punishment to apprentices for offences against the discipline of the prison?—Yes, unquestionably.

To proceed; the next clause merely authorizes the mayor of Kingston, and justices, and so on, to nominate the keeper, which shows that the keeper is entirely in the power of those colonial magistrates; that he is merely their servant.

The 2nd clause, at page 298, then authorizes the keeper "to hear complaints contrary to the rules of the prison, and to punish the offenders by close confinement in the refractory or solitary cells, and by keeping such offenders upon bread and water only for any term not exceeding six days, provided the visiting justice shall confirm such decision, or for such time within the said six days as the said justice shall by a written order determine." Now if there could be any doubt as to the power of the visiting justice, though not a special justice, over all the inmates, that doubt would be removed by the last words of this clause; it is perfectly clear that the keeper has power over all the inmates, and that the keeper's decision is to be confirmed in writing by the visiting justices.

1065. If it were your opinion, under the clause last mentioned, that the terms "within the power of their commission," limited the interference of the general justices justices to the prisoners not apprentices, would you still hold, under the clause to which you now advert, that the visiting justice had a power over all the inmates of the prison?—I consider that these clauses can only be interpreted the one by the other; and if there was any doubt in my mind, as to the word “within the power of their commission,” it would be removed by the last clause; but I conceive that these words do not apply to the case pointed out. The clause in which they are inserted, is so very extensive, and the powers given to the visiting magistrates so large, that I think we shall find another interpretation for the words “within the power of their commission.” They are at liberty to “examine into the state of the building,” so as to form a judgment “as to the repairs, additions or alterations which may appear necessary.” Now the word “additions” alone may at once explain the limitation intended by the words “within the power of their commission as justices,” their powers would otherwise be exceedingly extensive indeed. Then they shall examine into the behaviour and conduct of the respective officers, and “the treatment, behaviour, and condition of the prisoners and inmates, the means of setting them to work;” all those powers are conferred upon them generally; but when they come to exercise them in particular cases of pressing necessity, they are not to exceed “the powers of their commissions as justices.”

My attention is particularly drawn to the words “as justices,” but the above explanation would offer a very satisfactory construction of those words. Abuses and misconduct may have occurred, that would require severer treatment, whether as regards an apprentice or any other individual, than the justice by virtue of his commission would be warranted in inflicting; and the intention is that he shall only inflict within the prison such punishment as he could by virtue of his commission inflict beyond its precincts. I therefore apply the words to all prisoners; but I affix a limit to the infliction of the punishment, and to their powers in ordering other matters that are placed generally under their control as visitors.

1066. Did you ever see the commission of a justice of the peace in Jamaica?—

No.

The next clause to which I shall call the attention of the Committee, is the third clause, in page 300, numbered 15: “And be it further enacted, that in case any criminal, prisoner, or inmate shall be guilty of any repeated offence against the rules of the prison, house of correction, or hospital or asylum, or shall be guilty of any greater offence than the gaoler or keeper is by this Act empowered to punish, the said gaoler or keeper shall forthwith report the same to the visiting justices, or one of them, for the time being; and any one such justice, or any other justice of the parish to which such prison, house of correction, hospital or asylum belongs, shall have the power to inquire upon oath, and to determine concerning any such matter so reported to him or them, and to order the offender to be punished by close confinement for any term not exceeding one month, or by personal correction, as in the case of prisoners convicted of felony or sentenced to hard labour.” Here, then, a “repeated offence” against any of the rules of the prison, or any “greater offence” than the gaoler is empowered to punish, is treated as a felony, to be followed by personal punishment, as in the case of prisoners convicted of felony; so that there is no doubt any one of the justices of the parish has a right to inflict any kind of “personal correction” awarded by the law of the island in cases of felony; a most arbitrary and extraordinary power.

1067. Chairman.] There must be some misprint in that clause?—Here is another copy of the Act published in Jamaica, and it is the same there; it gives them the same power as if he, the delinquent, were a “felon”; in other words, power to flog; the words “personal correction” bearing that construction.

1068. Mr. Buxton.] Three points are clear, that, for an offence “repeated,” any justice, whether the one selected is the visitor or not, belonging to the parish, may order personal correction upon any prisoner, male or female?—Yes, that is clear, according to my view; and I cannot imagine how any other construction can be put upon it.

1069. Chairman.] That is, taking for granted that, in the case of a prisoner, male or female, sentenced to hard labour, he has the power of inflicting personal correction, it is quite clear that personal correction is limited to prisoners sentenced to hard labour; and unless the justices can do it on male or female prisoners sentenced to hard labour, they cannot do it upon males or females in the workhouse?—I take it to be clear that, by the law of Jamaica, the punishment of flogging may be inflicted upon felons.

1070. Upon

John Jeremie, Esq.

3 May 1836.

1070. Upon females?—Yes, if convicted of felony or sentenced to hard labour; if it be not so, then they will not be liable to flogging under this Act.

I should beg to call attention to the fact, that this clause applies to the inmates of an hospital or asylum, but I take it to be also clear that this can only apply to persons sent there for an offence or crime. I think the word "criminal" governs both prisoner and inmate of an asylum; when prisoners are unwell they are sent to the hospital or asylum.

1071. Mr. Buxton.] Does not this sentence, in the message of the governor to the House of Assembly, dated the 17th of November 1835, throw light upon the construction put in Jamaica upon this Act: "His excellency understands that the power of inflicting corporal punishment, at their own discretion, has been trusted to the supervisors of workhouses; these persons, however respectable they may be, are not, in his excellency's opinion, of the class of life to justify such confidence. Instances which have recently come before the public show that this is not a loose assertion; and the fact that the magistracy, where the spirit of the British constitution entrusts with the power of summary punishments, are chosen out of another class, confirms him in the sentiment"?—I think the whole of Lord Sligo's speech throws light upon the construction put upon this Act; I believe he mentions the whipping of females as being practised, and adds, that this power has been entrusted to the supervisors of houses of correction.

1072. A much more serious breach, not only of the spirit, but even of the letter of the law, has been committed under the supposed authority of the Act in question. His excellency alludes to the rule permitting the use of the whip upon women by the superintendents of tread-mills?—So he states; and this it is which has led to my examining this Act. I find, by the governor's speech, that the whipping of females and corporal punishment, to a great extent, had been inflicted at the discretion of colonial magistrates in houses of correction; whether this fact be true or otherwise I know not, but I find it stated upon the highest possible authority, the speech of the governor to the legislature of Jamaica. Now, in consequence of my having quoted this passage on a preceding occasion, I was distinctly asked whether I could point out, in any laws or regulations of the Jamaica legislature, any clause that authorized colonial justices to inflict any such punishment. At that time I had only examined those Acts that applied immediately to the apprenticeship system; but, on further examination, and looking into the Workhouse Act, I find a clause which, upon the fairest construction I can give it, confers that very power upon the magistrate which has been so seriously complained of by the governor.

1073. Mr. Gladstone.] What class of persons do you conceive Lord Sligo designates by supervisors; do you apprehend he means those termed visitors in this Act?—I should infer from the language of Lord Sligo's speech he meant the keepers, and that the magistrates who had this summary power had, in some degree, delegated it to the keepers, who are, in fact, their mere agents; but "supervisors" might be taken as the synonyme of "visitors;" for there is nothing that would warrant the keeper, of his own authority, in inflicting this punishment.

1074. If Lord Sligo meant the keeper, he was under a misapprehension?—Undoubtedly, of the law.

1075. The same remark will apply to the subsequent use of the term superintendent?—Yes, fully.

1076. It is your opinion, then, that this clause we have been discussing justifies the whipping of females in prisons in Jamaica, with this single exception, unless the law of the island forbade it, with reference to prisoners convicted of felony or sentenced to hard labour?—Just so.

1077. In that case, and as an inference from what you have already said, I conclude it is your opinion that this clause is in contravention of the 21st clause of the Abolition Act of Jamaica?—Of the whole spirit of the Act, and particularly of that clause.

1078. Which forbids the whipping of female apprentices?—Not the 21st clause.

1079. Yes, the 21st clause of the Jamaica Act?—Hardly; for it comes within the proviso.

1080. Is not that proviso copied from the 17th clause of the Imperial Act?—Yes.

1081. Consequently that case is included in the proviso of the Imperial Act?—Yes.

1082. Therefore

1082. Therefore your objection would rather lie against the original formation of the Imperial Act than as an objection against the legislature of Jamaica?—It will lie partly against the framing of the Imperial Act, but not wholly: it appears to lie against the clause of the Act in aid, by which the special justices are allowed to transfer their control over the apprentices to the colonial magistrates, by sending them to the house of correction. It will lie also against the principle of both Acts, for I consider it an indirect mode of re-establishing that particular kind of punishment which it was intended clearly by the British Legislature, and even originally by their own legislature, to abolish.

1083. I can see very plainly that your objection against the enactment may assume several forms, and be valid in all of them; but as to the illegality, how do you apply that expression having regard to the words of Lord Sligo?—I do not say it is illegal, I say it is contrary to the spirit of the Act of Emancipation; therefore my complaint would be rather against this Act of the Legislature against this statute, than against the infliction of the punishment under the statute.

1084. You are restrained from considering it illegal by the proviso in the 17th clause?—Yes, the effect of this clause in the statute should have been more closely considered by its framers; but at the same time it establishes the fact that female apprentices may (if female felons are liable to be so) be corrected indirectly for domestic offences in Jamaica.

1085. By domestic offences you mean offences against the discipline of the workhouse?—It is for a strictly domestic offence that the special magistrate sends them there; and then any colonial magistrate may, upon any offence against the rules of the house, order them to be flogged, on a complaint from the keeper, who is, in fact, their servant.

1086. Supposing the flogging to be inflicted in such a case for an alleged offence which is not a real offence against the rules of the prison, that is legal upon your own construction, because the magistrate cannot order a punishment that is illegal?—In examining these Acts I have always borne in mind the just jealousy with which every interference of the local magistrate in these matters was viewed by the British Legislature; and here they are invested with a power liable to the greatest abuse.

1087. Have you considered the specific form of remedy you would propose, and the limitation under which you would allow special justices to interfere in the management of the workhouses?—As it appears to me that those workhouses were erected, perhaps expressly, to enforce discipline and to confine apprentices in, I see no reason why the consent of the special magistrate should not have been required as to these punishments. I believe in some of the other Acts (I have not, however, looked through them purposely to ascertain that point, and I will not state it positively, but I believe in some of the other Acts,) a proviso of that kind has been introduced.

1088. Is it your opinion that that regulation would give adequate protection to the apprentices, so far forth as offences against the discipline of the prison are concerned?—It would give the same protection to the apprentices in the house of correction that they have upon the estate. I consider the protection given to the apprentices under the Jamaica Acts as entirely insufficient; but since it would be the same protection as on the estate, then it would be sufficient in the eye of the Jamaica legislature.

1089. Mr. Buxton.] Would you not think it necessary that the special magistrates should not only be empowered but compelled to visit the gaols in which those apprentices were confined?—Undoubtedly, they should be required to do so.

1090. Mr. Gladstone.] Directing your attention to the 1st clause of the Act, No. 7, does not it appear, from the language of that clause, that the term supervisor, and superintendent of the workhouses, is meant to designate, not the visiting magistrate, but the keeper?—By that clause there can be no question about it; but the words of Lord Sligo are, "You are reminded that the infliction of corporal punishment has been deputed to the supervisors and managers;" so that it appears the magistrates had transferred their powers illegally to their subordinates. It seems that the same thing had occurred at Barbadoes under a similar Act: it is so stated by Sir Lionel Smith.

1091. Supposing it to be true that the magistrates had deputed that power to the keepers, the law of Jamaica is not chargeable with that, as it does not entrust them with that power?—I should think not; the law of Jamaica is defective in many respects, but there is no power to do that.

John Jeremie, Esq.

3 May 1836.

John Jeremie, Esq.
3 May 1836.

1092. Mr. Buxton.] Does it make the matter at all better, that the power is given to the magistrates, and they have transferred it to the superintendents of tread-mills?—It shows that the Home Legislature were justified in looking with great jealousy to the whole of the proceedings of the colonial magistrates.

1093. Ought not the special magistrates to have a voice in the appointment of the master of the prison or workhouse?—I am of opinion that the supervisors, superintendents, or keepers should be appointed by the governor; but this has nothing to do with the Act. I find that the law of the island is different.

Then assuming the fact to have occurred, and that the magistrates have delegated their power to the superintendent, a construction might be put upon that clause of the Act which authorizes them to enact certain rules and regulations, by which they would, perhaps, have been warranted in so doing; but I consider such a construction would be very erroneous, and hardly a plausible one.

There is now another Act which I must take the liberty of drawing attention to. I do not find it in this collection, but I have seen it; it passed on the 4th of July 1834; in short, on that day a vast number of Acts seem to have been passed, having an indirect reference to the subject of apprenticeship; two in particular. One is intituled “An Act to enlarge the powers of justices in determining complaints between masters and servants, and between masters, apprentices, artificers, and others;” and another is intituled “An Act to register fire-arms, and to enforce the several laws relating to arms and gunpowder, and for the protection of property and person.”

1094. Mr. A. Johnstone.] To continue for what space of time?—It is limited to 1840; here is a certified copy of it. The second is only to endure to the 31st of December, 1838. I beg leave to draw attention to the fourth section of this Act, and in doing so, must take the liberty of reminding the Committee, that though in the General Jamaica Act regulating the duties of apprentices, very fair enactments have been introduced with regard to task-work generally, yet it is defective in this, that no remedy is granted to the labourer for the infringement of any contract for additional labour, entered into with the manager; that the special justice has no authority in that case, and therefore the labourer is referred for his remedy to the ordinary courts of the country.

1095. Mr. Gladstone.] With reference to the 49th clause of the Jamaica Abolition Act, do we not find in that clause, that among the offences against the apprentice punishable by the special justice, are included imposing task-work on any apprenticed labourer, contrary to the provisions of this Act, or of breach of any contract on the part of any person engaging the voluntary services of any apprenticed labourer, or of any cruelty, injustice, or other wrong or injury done to, or inflicted upon any apprenticed labourer, by the person entitled to his or her services; does not it appear to you, under these latter very general words, that a breach of contract might be punished by the special justice?—Yes, it might be punished. I merely state that the apprentice has no civil remedy; the master might be fined 3*l.* to the Crown; but the wages will not be forthcoming to the apprentice.

1096. That is one portion of the objection you previously alleged against this clause, not only that the remedies were insufficient, but none of them went to give personal redress to the apprentice injured?—Yes; and it applies immediately to the Act to which I now object. I shall observe, that the three first sections of this Act distinctly exclude apprentices “within the meaning of the Emancipation Act;” but the fourth section, to which I beg leave to call attention, is so worded as to embrace the whole: here are the words of this section, “any servants in husbandry, or any mechanic, artificer, handicraftsman, labourers, persons employed in droggers, body, or house servants, or other person without exception, who shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever.”

1097. Are not those words you have just read to the Committee, subject themselves to limitation from the first clause of the Act, which excepts all apprentices coming within the meaning of the Abolition Act?—I should infer not, and I should hope not; for if they have not a remedy under this Act, they have no remedy at all. The first section relates to apprentices not within the meaning of the Emancipation Act; but I conceive that this clause is so general, and the necessity for a clause of that kind is so apparent, from the fact of no remedy having been granted by the other Act, that it clearly extends to all persons whatever; and if it is made to extend to them, then the remedy is inadequate, for it places the apprentice again in the hands of the colonial magistrate. That is my objection to the Act: if it applies, the remedy is inadequate; if it does not apply, the apprentice has none, except by action in the colonial courts.

1098. Mr. A. Johnstone.] Are you of opinion it applies to the relation of master and apprentice?—Yes, that clause, I should think, applies to the relation of master and apprentice.

1099. Are you not rather of opinion it may be held to apply when an apprentice contracts with another to give any portion of his spare time?—It would undoubtedly apply to that case; but I conceive it also applies to the relation between manager and apprentice, where the apprentice engages to give extra labour; not as to the usual labour, but where he engages for extra wages to give additional labour beyond the stipulated period fixed by the Imperial Statute; and I beg to repeat that, if it does not apply to that, then the apprentice under the Act is left without any remedy whatever, except the usual remedy through the courts of law.

1100. Mr. Gladstone.] When you speak of remedy, you mean without any reimbursement?—I mean without any summary remedy. I now beg to proceed to the second Act, to which I have alluded, the Act said to relate to firearms, &c. It contains a section, No. 13, which seems to me to have no relation to the heading of the Act, certainly none to firearms. The 13th, 14th, and 15th sections run thus: "And whereas trespasses upon property by idle and mischievous persons have recently become frequent, and have in many cases been attended by acts of violence and intimidation, for the repression of which the laws now in force provide no sufficient remedy; and it is therefore expedient that more effectual and summary remedies should be provided: Be it therefore enacted, that if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering upon the premises of any private residence, or upon any land, without the leave of the proprietor, in search or pursuit of game, animals, or birds of any kind, or of anything whatsoever, such person shall, on being summarily convicted thereof before two justices of the peace, on proof on oath by one or more credible witness or witnesses, or confession of the offence, or upon other legal evidence, forfeit and pay such sum of money not exceeding 10*l.* as to any two justices of the peace shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction, or be committed to the house of correction for a space not exceeding one month." The 14th is, "That where any person shall be trespassing on the premises of any private residence, or on any land in search or pursuit of anything whatsoever, it shall be lawful for the occupier of the premises or of the land, or servant of either of them, or for any person authorized by either of them, to require the person so trespassing forthwith to quit the premises or land whereon he shall be so trespassing, and also to tell his christian name, surname, and place of abode; and in case such person shall, after being so required, offend by refusing to tell his real name, or place of abode, or by giving such a general description of his place of abode as shall be illusory for the purpose of discovery, or by wilfully continuing or returning upon the premises or the land, it shall be lawful for the party so requiring as aforesaid, and also for any person acting by his order, and in his aid, to apprehend such offender, and to convey him or cause him to be conveyed, as soon as conveniently may be, before a justice of the peace; and such offender (whether so apprehended or not) upon being summarily convicted of any such offence before two justices of the peace, at the instance of the owner or occupier of such premises or land, on proof on oath, by one or more credible witness or witnesses, or confession of the offence, or upon other legal evidence, shall forfeit and pay such sum of money not exceeding 20*l.* as to the convicting justices shall seem meet, together with expenses of process, or be committed to the house of correction for a space not exceeding three months." The 15th is, "That if any person being in the commission of a trespass, shall assault or obstruct any person occupying private premises, or land, or the servant of either of them, or any person authorized by either of them, such person on being convicted thereof before two justices of the peace, on proof on oath, by one or more credible witness or witnesses, or confession of the offence, or upon other legal evidence, shall forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding 100*l.* over and above any penalty which he may have incurred by contravening this Act, and in default of payment thereof at such time as to the said justices may seem fit, shall be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction (with or without hard labour) for a period not exceeding three months." Now when it is recollected that on numberless estates in Jamaica there are perhaps 100 or 200 apprentices located, that those apprentices very often have their wives and children on a neighbouring plantation, and that either of those persons coming upon the estate for any lawful object, are subject to these enormous enormous penalties, it amounts to a severance of these ties between them as effectually as legislation can separate them. Pray observe the very general terms of these enactments: "Any person" whomsoever entering upon "any land, in search or pursuit of anything whatever," without the leave of the owner, may, without any previous notice, be convicted of a trespass, and fined to any extent not exceeding 10*l.*, or imprisoned for any time not exceeding one month. Then, by the 14th section, the occupier or his servant, or any person authorized even by the servant for that purpose, may (without producing any written authority) order any such trespasser to quit the premises, and tell his name; and if he refuses altogether, or states his place of abode too generally, or wilfully continues on or returns to the premises of the person so requiring his address, "he, or any person acting by his order, and in his aid, may apprehend such offender and convey him, or cause him to be conveyed, as soon as conveniently may be, before a justice of the peace," (not even the nearest) and on conviction before such justices, the party shall pay a sum of money not exceeding 20*l.*, or be committed to the house of correction for a space not exceeding three months. And, by section 15, the trespasser, if he assaults or obstructs the apprehender (or obstructs simply) without any evidence of his authority, is, on conviction, liable to the penalty as a trespasser, and also to a farther penalty not exceeding 100*l.*, or imprisonment not exceeding three months. Not to dwell upon the unwarrantable severity of such penalties, even in cases of actual guilt, it cannot surely be intended that persons visiting estates on errands of friendship, or mercy, or at reasonable times, or under a reasonable supposition of having a right to be there, should be exposed to such proceedings.

1101. Chairman.] Would anybody who came on the property of another be subject to these penalties without the intention of committing a trespass?—On any land.

1102. Not on a public footway or road; if a negro passing from one estate to another kept the footway, he would not be subject to these penalties?—No, not if it is a public road; but if it is the road of the estate he would.

1103. Mr. Buxton.] If he visits the house that is upon the property?—Yes; if he visits his wife, or a clergyman, visiting for instruction; and I cannot do better than quote the words of Lord Glenelg upon the Act of the Legislature of Tortola, page 133: "The 12th and 13th sections of the Act, No. 88, forbid the apprentice to receive any person in his own hut, if within the employer's estate, except with the employer's consent, the case of a husband or wife being excepted only, if the applicant for the indulgence be of good character, and if the request for conjugal society be preferred in a proper manner, and even then the parties are to meet at the home of the apprentice only at proper times, and as long as they shall conduct themselves in a proper manner. There is an uncertainty and harshness in these rules which I forbear to dwell upon, since their illegality is a still more conclusive objection to them. The apprentice is the tenant at will of the hut he occupies, paying rent in the form of services, and entitled to admit into his home whatever person he shall think proper, provided that his guests or inmates do not infringe the police regulations of the colony, or the good discipline of the plantation. To debar husbands and wives of each other's society, or even, in the present state of West Indian manners, to forbid an apprenticed labourer to receive his concubine under his roof, is an invasion of the rights of the apprentice, for which no compensation could be found in any consequent increase of good order, or of good morals." Now this merely applies to one case, whereas the Jamaica Act applies to any case, even that of a clergyman.

1104. Mr. Gladstone.] Is it your opinion then, under the clauses 13, 14, and 15 of the Jamaica Act to which you have referred, that an apprentice, for example, visiting his wife on a neighbouring estate, would be liable to punishment for trespass?—He would be liable to be warned off; and if he did not go, he would be liable to punishment.

1106. The liability is to punishment for whatever may be judged to fall within the term trespass?—Yes.

1107. Do you consider that within the legal meaning of the term trespass, would be included such a visit as I have described?—According to the wording of this Act it would; but nothing at home would be a trespass, if the object was proved to be lawful.

1108. If the party thus trespassing was guilty of an offence, do you consider it would

two justices of the peace.

1109. Applying to any person, will not it be liable to the regulations of the Act, which provides that the offence shall be taken cognizance of by the special justices?—Not as to the complaint between the apprentice and another person; here it would be the apprentice visiting his wife upon another estate.

1110. On that account you think the offence would be cognizable before the general justices?—Yes.

1111. You used the expression, “An Act purporting to relate to arms;” do you not think the title is sufficiently large to embrace all the clauses contained in it?—Yes, but not very distinctly.

1112. Mr. A. Johnstone.] Do you hold that a clergyman visiting an apprentice upon a plantation, without the leave of the owner, would come within the scope of the Act?—Beyond all doubt or question; there is a specific Act to that effect.

1113. Mr. Gladstone.] What inference do you draw from the circumstance that appears clear, that the 13th section first enacted liability to punishment for trespass, without warning, and the 14th clearly enacts a liability only subsequent to warning?—The first was intended to be as general as possible and reach all possible cases.

1114. Does not the 13th clause, à fortiori, comprehend the 14th?—There is a difference in the penalty, and then the right of seizing and conveying in this summary way should be applied only, according to the British statute, to “suspected persons and reputed thieves;” but here it extends to any one, and the persons are to be taken to any justice, and finable even to the amount of 100*l.*, or three months’ hard labour.

1115. The interest of both parties would concur generally in referring to the nearest justice?—Yes, certainly; but if it is maliciously or vexatiously applied it may be otherwise.

1116. Mr. A. Johnstone.] It is in the power of the person so apprehending to conduct the person so apprehended to a justice at the other end of the island?—Perhaps so; certainly they may choose any justice who happens to be in the neighbourhood.

1117. Mr. Gladstone.] Would there be any remedy under the general law of the island for an act so unfair, by apprehending a man at one end of the island and conveying him to the other end?—I should think that any act absolutely malicious will find a remedy in the law of every country.

1118. Anything in itself so preposterously unreasonable as that, being at the same time hurtful to another, would be considered malicious?—I should think so.

1119. Besides that, is not the jurisdiction of each magistrate limited by the commission to the parish in which he resides?—I have not seen the commission; probably it is to the county, and perhaps to the parish: it seems it is so.

1120. Mr. A. Johnstone.] But in such a case as I have put, an individual coming upon the plantation, without the leave of the owner, might be put to great hardship and trouble and expense in obtaining a remedy for any malicious abuse of the Act I have alluded to?—Every apprentice would be without a remedy almost; he would not have the means of enforcing it. If the word trespass was there alone, it would exclude an immense number of occasions; but mark the very general terms that succeed; they say, “in pursuit of anything whatever;” they say, “any trespass by entering;” so that the entering upon the premises is a trespass under this Act, “in pursuit of anything whatsoever.” These are all the objections I have to make to the enactments of the Jamaica legislature.

1121. Mr. Buxton.] Be pleased to give to the Committee a summary of what you consider the most substantial objections which exist against the Jamaica Act?—The apprentice in Jamaica may be worked by day in the field, by night in the boiling-house, for 45 hours in succession, excepting the short time allowed by day for meals, when employed in the field; may be mulcted to the full amount of his time for the benefit of his employer, though no prejudice may have been suffered by the latter, and flogged on making a complaint. He can recover nothing from his employer, by any available remedy, nor has any protection against complaints, however frivolous. He has a day to himself, during which he may be imprisoned by an estate-constable under the control of the manager. If wages are promised him for extra work, if task-work contracts are violated, he has no available remedy. He can be apprehended at pleasure by any man he meets, who is rewarded for doing so. His wife, his sister, his daughter, may be sent to the tread-mill at the discretion of a special magistrate, for any length of time, and for any offence; and there they fall under the control of the colonial magistrate, who may order them all, men, women, and children, to be flogged at his discretion, for any breach of the workhouse discipline. His provisions, food, clothing, he may be deprived of, and is without any remedy which is not illusory for an indemnification. He cannot proceed beyond the limits of the plantation, except in a few stipulated cases, without a pass from his employer, except under a liability to be arrested and taken before a magistrate. The pregnant wife, the nursing mother, are unprovided with even nominal additional protection. His children born free for the last eight years, with those born free the next four years, may be subjected to this treatment for 21 years. Supposing him to have committed no possible offence, to have laboured as industriously in his own time, with the view of improving his condition, as in his manager's in performance of his duty, still must he labour on throughout the period assigned, or purchase off the remaining term, at a price to be affixed by colonial magistrates. Subject principally to these liabilities he is free.

1122. Chairman.] You intend that the statement you have just put in is the state of things to which the negro may, by possibility, under the present law, be subjected to, rather than as a direct representation of what is actually the state of the negro?—I put it merely as my opinion of what he may be subjected to under these Acts, but not as an express representation of his actual condition, which I am utterly ignorant of; and I beg leave to state that this is not only my own opinion, but those of the friends, Messrs. Beldam and Matthews, who have gone through the whole of this inquiry with me.

Joseph Beldam, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

Joseph Beldam, Esq.

1123. Chairman.] YOU have been present during Mr. Jeremie's examination, are you desirous of adding anything to what you have yourself before stated to the Committee upon the subject of the Jamaica Acts?—I have one or two observations to make. I state that I concur in the legal objections that have already been taken by Mr. Jeremie, as will appear on reference to the analysis I have already put in to the Committee. There are some minor, and what, perhaps, may be considered technical objections stated in that analysis, to which my friend, Mr. Jeremie, has not thought it necessary to refer; neither shall I think it necessary now, because the analysis itself is already before the Committee. I should, however, beg to recal the attention of the Committee to the several replies that were made by me to questions put on the first day; I refer more particularly to the question put to me by Sir George Grey as to the power of the agent with regard to compulsory manumission. I had taken this objection, that there was an omission in all the Jamaica Acts of several classes of owners, from whom the apprentice had not the power to claim a compulsory manumission in the manner intended by the Imperial Act. Among those classes I stated the class of absentees; and I confess I stated that class rather more generally than I ought to have done, having taken that objection somewhat too generally; my attention was called suddenly to the ninth clause of the Jamaica Act, and to the general words in that clause, giving to the agent, in the case of certain absentees, the powers therein mentioned. I was asked whether I thought that the power therein given to the agent was sufficient to enable him to act in cases of compulsory manumission. I was then diverted, to a certain extent, from the object I had in view; and I gave some answers with respect to the power of an agent, which I feel no disposition to retract, so far as English law upon the subject is concerned, because I am certain it is the policy of the English law to limit the power of agents generally for the benefit of the proprietor; and I was convinced that so far to extend that clause, unless the sense made it necessary, was only to let in a provision indirectly, which I thought ought to have been expressly made by the Act in favour of the apprentices. However, upon looking to that clause again, I find it was unnecessary for me to consider what are the general powers of agents, because where there are representatives or agents in the colony, the clause itself is quite sufficient to invest them with the power requisite for that purpose; but my objection still holds with reference to a considerable number of persons (I should suppose a numerous class, having property in the colonies), I mean absentees, who are unrepresented; those who have small properties in the colonies probably leave no agents at all, at least those whose property consists chiefly of domestic apprentices; it is not for the mere purpose of providing for the rights of manumission that such persons, if they left the colony, would be likely to invest a person expressly with the power of an agent.

1124. Mr. Gladstone.] How is it possible that an absentee proprietor can derive any advantage whatever from the possession of apprentices, unless he has some agent resident there?—I am not stating that he would derive any benefit from it; I believe there may be many individual cases in which no benefit would be derived from it; but it is sufficient for me to take the objection that there may be individuals so situated (and there may likewise be persons whose owners are not known, but that is beside the present point); there may be persons absent from the colony, having left no agent behind to represent them.

1125. Do you conceive that a probable case?—Yes (not that I am personally acquainted with the West Indies), but I conceive it probable where a proprietor has very few negroes, and those negroes domestics, and unattached to any property.

1126. If he was an absentee from the colony, and had no agent there, would it not be abandoning his property?—Suppose it were, that would not relieve the apprentice. I am insisting upon a special provision for his benefit, and I am authorised to do so by reference to other provisions made in other colonies under the direction of the Government at home. There are other cases of absentees who may not be so represented in the colony; as, for instance, the agency may be revoked by the death of the party who makes it, or it may never be fully accredited, or there may be cases of dispute as to who is agent, or the agent himself may be for a time absent; there may, in short, be many cases in which the proprietor of those negroes is not represented by any individual in the colony, and it was with respect to such cases as these I wished to press upon the attention of the Committee the necessity of some express provision. Now that I was authorised so to do, the Committee will be of opinion when I refer them to Mr. Stanley's despatch, which appears in page 4 of the Parliamentary Papers; for, if I understand it correctly, among the few objections that Mr. Stanley thought fit to take to this enactment, he has taken the one in question; the 9th and following clauses of the Jamaica Act, which purport to carry into operation the intention of the Imperial Act, do not effect it to its full extent; for although they provide for cases where the party is able to consent, they do not provide for the very frequent cases in which the party is unable, either by reason of mental incapacity, absence, or any other cause. Mr. Stanley himself takes this very objection that I now take as one of the cases that are not adequately provided for, though, to a certain extent, a provision has certainly been made. I support my objection, likewise, by a reference to the Trinidad Order of Council, cap. 8, section 5, page 450, where it will be found that an express provision is made for such cases. By that order, if I mistake not, the chief civil judge is the person appointed; it runs thus: "Or if the employer or any other person having a charge upon, or interest in, any such apprenticed labourer, shall be a minor or a married woman, or idiot, or lunatic, or if the real employer of any such apprenticed labourer shall be absent from the said colony, or shall not be known, or if any suit or action shall be depending in any court of justice in the said colony wherein the right to the service of such apprenticed labourer shall, or may be, in controversy;" a case not provided for here, and which, therefore, I ought to have taken; "or if the employer of any such apprenticed labourer shall demand," and so forth, more than the just value then, by section 6, the chief civil judge of the colony is authorised to do that which, if there had been an agent or a proprietor present, it would have been his duty to do. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the fact, that there is an express provision made in that order which would apply to the cases I have already stated to be omitted in the Jamaica Acts.

1127. Mr. Gladstone.] Would the objection you have urged apply to any case except there has been, on the part of the proprietor, a virtual abandonment of the property?—It would apply to all cases where there was no agent, or a disputed agency; in such cases there should be some officer in the colony to whom the apprentice might refer, without that delay which is a grievance of itself, and which must occur in finding out the agent of absent parties.

1128. Supposing the owner incapable, or a lunatic, is it not the fact that, under the general law of the island, an agent will be provided in those cases?—My objection objection applies to absentees, and there is no law to appoint an agent to an absentee.

Joseph Beldam, Esq.

Joseph Beldam, Esq.

1129. Is it not quite clear that all absentees who have property, and are capable, will appoint agents, and do appoint agents?—In many cases I should think not.

1130. In those cases will not there be a virtual abandonment of the property?—I apprehend not; I have stated that the agency may be revoked by the death of the party who makes it, and some time must elapse before that fact is communicated, and before the new agency goes out, and in the meantime the apprentice is deprived of his right.

1131. Do you apprehend that a man, the agent of A, is not the agent of A's heir until otherwise constituted?—I find it to be a principle of the English law, and not disputed, that the death of a party creating an agency is, ipso facto, a revocation of the agency.

1132. I ask you as to the colonial law, and not the English law?—I am not prepared to state the exceptions of colonial law.

1133. If you are not aware whether an agent still continues the agent, you are not aware whether the objection has any relevancy?—I submit to the Committee the pertinency of the objection that I have taken.

1134. Then you submit to the Committee the pertinency of an objection founded upon English law, without knowing whether the colonial law is analogous?—I take the objection upon the English law.

1135. Do you consider that sufficient without making further inquiry into the colonial law?—If any important rights of property depended upon it, I should have made further inquiry.

1136. But surely these rights are extremely important; and in the case before us the whole question depends upon the fact, whether an agency in Jamaica coincides with an agency in England?—On the first day of the Committee meeting, I stated I was not acquainted with the peculiarities of West India agency; but conceiving that the general principles of law applied to the colonies, I felt myself authorized to refer to that particular class of absentees as coming within a class that appears to be unrepresented, and with respect to which no adequate provision has been made.

1137. Mr. Buxton.] I understand your statement to be, that you know that the power of the agent ceases in England at the death of the party granting it; and that you infer such is the rule in the West Indies, because it seems to be the rule of common sense as well as English law?—Yes; I conceive it to be absolutely a personal power, it is so treated in the books upon English law.

1138. Would it not be very easy, if you are in error upon this point, for the express colonial statute to be pointed out that makes a difference between the law of the colony and the law of England?—I should say that the colonial statute is the exception, and it is sufficient for me to refer to the general law of the empire; but I have just learned, on sufficient authority, that no such exception exists in the law of Jamaica.

1139. Mr. Gladstone.] You have supposed a case in which a power of attorney shall determine, in consequence of the death of the grantor of the power. Understanding it to be the general practice in Jamaica, under such circumstances, that the person named in the power usually applies for letters of administration, by which he is still continued as the legal agent of the estate, does not it appear that in case he decline so to apply, he loses his agency, and with it the profits of his agency?—That inference may be fairly drawn; and to this extent it appears to me that the inference applies to what I have stated. It lessens the extent of the omission, but does not dispose of it. It appears, however, from information I have just received, that in such case the apprentice could not compel the agent to act, which is one of the cases I complain of.

1140. Are you of opinion that, so far as regards any avoidance of the agency, it remains a probable case, or one worth taking into consideration?—I am of opinion that every probability ought to be taken into consideration; and there ought not to be any case where an apprentice, with the money in his hand, should go unredressed.

1141. Do you think this is worthy of the name of a probability, so far as depends upon the termination of the agency by the demise of the grantor?—Yes, that that is one of the cases certainly; and there are others. But if that had been the only case, I should have felt it my duty to have noticed it.

1142. Will you specify the other cases?—Another case has been where the agent was not properly accredited, or there might be a dispute about his right to act as an agent.

1143. At all events, would it not appear wherever the receipts of the property are made available, and wherever the machinery of the property is in action; there must be an accredited person, and, by consequence, a person capable of discharging the apprentice?—If there is an accredited agent, he must be able to perform the duty of an agent.

1144. Supposing there is no accredited agent, is there any person entitled to exact from the apprentice his services?—If there be no person to represent the proprietor, no other person has a right to interfere.

1145. Consequently, does not the apprentice become a free man, independently of the machinery of manumission?—So long as there is no person to represent the proprietor, it may be so; but I am supposing an interval of time, during which the apprentice is not able to exercise his right of manumission.

1146. During such an interval, be it probable or not probable, he remains a free man, there being no person to exact his services; and when that person comes into existence, does not his right arise, and the regular mode be pursued?—The regular mode may be pursued when the agent appears; but that is no compensation for the loss of the right during the interval.

1147. Does not it appear that, during the period the right is thus in abeyance, the apprentice must be, in the eye of the law, practically free?—Certainly not in the eye of the law, nor practically free; for, in the first instance, it is scarcely probable that the apprentice will know the secrets of the estate, or know when the agency is revoked; and if he were aware of that fact, there would be a sufficient force upon the estate to prevent him taking any advantage of it.

1148. You have said that the apprentice would probably not be aware when the agency was revoked, or in abeyance; would not the apprentice taking the first step on his own behalf under the regulation in the Act, arrive at a knowledge of the fact whether there was an accredited agent or not?—He might or might not know; a special justice might not know the fact; but I do not think that such arguments, if I may be permitted to use the expression, at all dispose of the objection where there is a possibility of his being deprived of his right.

1149. Does not it appear from the clause, that an apprentice wishing to be manumitted, is to apply to the nearest special justice, and that that special justice is to give notice to the person entitled to his service, or the agent; does not it appear therefore the special justice must know whether there is such an accredited person; and if there is such an accredited agent to exact the service, is there not such an agent upon whom the law may be put in motion?—Yes, but a great deal of time may be lost in the inquiry, and that is the evil.

1150. Do you think a great deal of time can be lost in the ascertaining whether there is an agent or not?—I am not supposing the case of a large estate; but there are cases where there are proprietors who are possessed of very few negroes, not more than one or two, perhaps; in Barbadoes especially that is the case, and probably it is the same in Jamaica; it is to that class of cases that the objection more particularly applies; there the special justice may be long in making the inquiries, and after all he may be unable to find out the agent, and during the whole of this period the apprentice is deprived of the exercise of that right which the Imperial Act intended to bestow upon him.

1151. My question was occasioned by your having said, that you supposed the combination of other parties to prevent an apprentice knowing whether there was an agent?—I beg pardon, I have not alluded to any combination; I said a sufficient force, by which I meant, that the ordinary routine of business would compel a man to work, just as though the agency had been in existence.

1152. You again suppose the case of a property where an agent was employed, and we were supposing a case where there was no agent, and few persons employed?—I was replying to the question put to me, and shaped my answer to it, but my original observation referred to properties where there were very few apprentices.

1153. Do you apprehend where there is no property at all, that the apprentice may remain in ignorance whether there is a person entitled to his service?—It is impossible

Joseph Beldam, Esq.
3 May 1836. impossible for me to say, but I imagine it is a question that might be solved before any very long period has elapsed, provided facilities were afforded to the apprentice to make inquiries. Will the Committee allow me now to put in my analysis of the other Jamaica Acts, upon which the Committee have been taking evidence to-day?

John Jeremie, Esq.

6 May 1836.

1154. Chairman.] BEFORE the Committee proceed to the other Acts, is there anything you wish to add to what you have stated in regard to the Jamaica Acts?—There is an objection I have noticed, but I omitted to point out the sections of the Act referred to. It regards the right of all persons to apprehend runaways, though they are neither constables nor members of the police; this inference I draw from the Act, No. 7, page 301, of the Parliamentary Papers, the sections are the 2d and the 4th; the 2d section runs thus, “And be it further enacted that every constable, or other person, the permanent police excepted, who shall apprehend a runaway apprentice, knowing him or her to be such, shall be entitled to receive from his or her master, employer, or manager, the sum of 10s., besides mile-money, at the rate of 6d. per mile, and no more.” It is therefore clear that the permanent police and every constable or other person, knowing an apprentice to be a runaway, has a right to arrest him, and is remunerated with 10s.; and if the 4th section of the Act be looked into, it will be seen that the permanent police have in effect a right to arrest a negro, though they do not know the manager; and when therefore they cannot know whether he is an apprentice or not, still less a runaway. “And be it further enacted, that every supervisor or superintendent of a workhouse or house of correction in this island shall, once in every week for four successive weeks, advertise in the Royal and St. Jago Gazettes and Cornwall Chronicle the names and sex of each and every runaway apprentice in custody, and the names of the masters, employers, or managers, if known, under a penalty,” and so on. Now taking these two clauses in conjunction, as it is clear constables or other persons are only authorized to receive a remuneration on apprehending runaway apprentices, knowing them to be such, and as there must be some authority empowered to arrest apprentices, though the managers be not known, I take it that the permanent police has that right, and therefore an apprentice is in this position, that he is liable to be arrested at any time by the permanent police; and if any “other person,” though not a policeman or constable, considers him a runaway, he also may arrest him, and may be remunerated to the amount of 10s.

1155. Mr. Gladstone.] Would you say that the apprentice was liable to be arrested at any time by a permanent policeman?—If the policeman has a suspicion of his being a runaway, though he should not know the name of the master or manager.

1156. Is he more exposed to that under this law than he would be independently of this law, or is it not in such a case the general system that he would be punished in the same way as any other subject?—If the apprenticeship did not exist there would be no ground for punishing him as an apprentice.

1157. Have the goodness to state the precise objection you bring against those sections?—My objection is, first, that “any person” has a right to apprehend a runaway apprentice, knowing him to be such.

1158. Mr. Thornely.] It allows any person, knowing him or her to be a runaway apprentice, to arrest the individual?—Yes, though he has no public authority, though he is not invested with any public character; it is recurring to the old Colonial principle, that, as regarded slaves, every man was a constable.

1159. Mr. Gladstone.] Supposing a constable or other person should apprehend a person as a runaway apprentice who was proved not to be such, or he should be proved not to have sufficient grounds for supposing him to be such, the apprentice would have his remedy, as he would against any other person committing injustice towards him, be that remedy what it might?—He would have his remedy, but my objection is to the making every one a constable as against apprentices.

1160. Taking the apprehension of runaway apprentices to be the object, do you think it necessarily implies a violation of the principle of the Act of the British Legislature, considering the extremely small proportion which the white and entirely free population bears to the great mass of apprentices?—I do most certainly.

1161. Mr. Buxton.] You consider that except as to the time guaranteed to the masters, the apprentices are to have all the rights and privileges of freemen?—Exactly; and above all, are to be protected against the arbitrary interference of a perfect stranger to them: the special magistrates, the manager, the constables, and all the police appear to be quite sufficient to maintain the peace and tranquillity of the country, and to maintain order and discipline on estates, without authorizing every man to lay his hands on an apprentice.

1162. Mr. Gladstone.] Considering the great extent of Jamaica, the small number of the police, the quantity of unoccupied ground, and the habit of absenting themselves, as far as it has prevailed, do you not think any means are necessary for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of that practice?—I do not think such means are requisite, though I consider that may be a sufficient ground for establishing a numerous police.

1163. You consider that the remedy of the apprentice is a very imperfect one; if instead of that you considered it a very summary and perfect one, should you consider this an objectionable enactment, that he might be arrested by any person on the ground that he was a runaway apprentice?—I would not entertain the strong objection I do now, but still I would entertain an objection of the same kind.

1164. Mr. Buxton.] Would not you entertain the strongest objection in principle to allowing any law to be established in Jamaica affecting the apprentices in their own time, and distinguishing the deeds of apprentices from the deeds of white men under similar circumstances?—In principle, I undoubtedly would; the principle would be always erroneous; the objection practically would be in a great measure removed if I saw that the apprentice had a satisfactory remedy; but still in principle it would always lie; but even as to the remedy, this objection I am now taking strongly illustrates another which I have made before, as to the want of reciprocity; the power of a magistrate as regards an apprentice extends by the general Jamaica Act to offences committed by him against the manager, "or any other person;" but the 49th clause, which does give him a remedy, though an inadequate one, against the manager, does not extend to "any other person;" so that "another person" offending against the apprentice, a stranger apprehending him under this clause is not even liable to the 5*l.* penalty under the 49th clause of the Jamaica Act.

1165. He is liable to an action?—Yes, and that is all.

1166. You were asked, in a previous part of your examination, whether you saw any practicable means for affording a remedy to the apprentice, and you suggested that the special magistrates might hold special sessions, and at those special sessions try a higher class of offences than they can now do singly; does any alteration of the powers of the special magistrate suggest itself to your mind, by which the apprentice might proceed against his master for wrongs done to him in the character of an apprentice?—No; I should feel great delicacy in entrusting a special magistrate with a power of that kind, but yet there should be a reciprocity; either he should have a remedy against other persons, or they should have none against him. I should prefer neither party having a remedy against each other before the special magistrate, except the manager on the one hand and the apprentice on the other.

1167. Of the two alternatives, that neither should have a remedy against each other, or that both should have a remedy against each other, is not the latter the preferable one?—No, I think not.

1168. Would not that leave offences likely constantly to arise without any remedy?—I would give a summary remedy; I would put the apprentice, for all things not immediately arising from his situation of an apprentice, on the same footing as all other parties whatever; and I would give the general magistrate a summary remedy in cases of assault, and so forth ; but then again, with regard to persons who are managers of apprentices, I see very great danger likely to arise also if you give the general magistrate jurisdiction over them, either as regards their offences towards apprentices, or the offences of the apprentices towards them.

John Jeremie, Esq.

6 May 1836.

1169. Are you aware whether the general magistrates have such jurisdiction as you have adverted to at present?—I do not know ; but I conceive there must be a summary jurisdiction in reference to assaults in all countries.

1170. Mr. Johnston.] Have you any remarks on the fourth section?—No ; except that it shows how the old practice of arresting persons, when they cannot be known to be runaways, is sanctioned by this Act, so that both the old abuses are directly sanctioned ; first, the making every man a constable, and next, the arresting a negro though not known to be an apprentice.

1171. Mr. Gladstone.] May not a person know that such a man is an apprentice, though he does not know who is his manager?—I should think that was not probable ; it is a power very open to abuse.

1172. Are not all cases which proceed on indirect evidence open to abuse more than those which proceed on direct evidence?—Not to the extent which attaches to this.

Joseph Beldam, Esq., called in ; and further Examined.

Joseph Beldam,
Esq.

1173. Chairman.] HAVE you any addition to make to the evidence you have already given?—I had intended to make various observations on the different clauses in the three Jamaica Acts, but as I shall be followed by another gentleman so well informed upon this subject, I shall confine myself simply to remarking upon the 16th section of the first Jamaica Act, as it refers to the 11th section of the Imperial Act. That part of the Imperial Act to which I refer is as follows : “ And be it further enacted, that during the continuance of any such apprenticeship as aforesaid, the person or persons for the time being entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer shall be and are and is hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances as by any law now in force in the colony to which such apprenticed labourer may belong, an owner is required to supply to and for any slave being of the same age and sex as any such apprenticed labourer shall be.” The Imperial Act is a British law, and requires therefore to be construed according to the ordinary method in which British laws are construed. It appears to me that the word “ law ” here is used designedly, and for the express purpose of letting in the generic sense of that term ; if the Imperial Act had intended merely a single colonial Act or ordinance, it would have used the words “ Colonial Act ” or “ Colonial Ordinance ; ” but the word “ law ” having been employed, it must be understood to import whatever rules or regulations, or customs of an immemorial and reasonable character have existed in the colony. The word “ law ” in British Acts of Parliament, so far as I understand the meaning of that word, when used without qualification, is to be taken in its generic sense, and I think it will be found that that word is so employed here, and not for the purpose of designating merely some particular Act or ordinance ; besides which, a custom is expressly designated in books of English law by the term “ law,” and therefore a reasonable and immemorial custom must be understood to be included in the very expression employed by the Imperial Act. I need not encumber the Committee with authorities to prove this, they are so numerous that it would be a waste of time to dwell upon them. It will be found in “ Comyn’s Digest,” under the title “ Custom ; ” and likewise in 5th “ Term Reports,” p. 470, in a case decided by Lord Mansfield and Mr. Justice Buller, (persons of great authority in the courts of law) that a custom is expressly designated lex loci. I shall not further trespass upon the attention of the Committee, for it appears to me to be a point so well known that it needs no further proof.

1174. Mr. Buxton.] You mean to infer that all those allowances which had been given by long and immemorial usage, are to be continued to the slaves as part of the law of the land?—I mean that all immemorial and reasonable customs are to be continued as a part of the law of the land ; there are cases in the English law to show that it is not at all necessary that they should be certain. In point of fact customs are seldom absolutely so ; copyhold fines (and the connexion between the lord and the vassal presents the nearest analogy to this case) are left, to a certain extent, to the option of the lord or the steward ; it is true that in such cases the maximum is fixed ; here it would be requisite that the minimum should be fixed ; but the principle is the same in both cases, namely, that it should be a reasonable fine or custom ; and the reasonableness is to be decided in all cases before a competent tribunal. Joseph Beldam, Esq.

6 May 1836.

1175. Do you concur in opinion with Mr. Jeremie in the various objections which he has, in the course of this inquiry, made to the Jamaica laws?—I do concur in every one of the objections which have been made by Mr. Jeremie, though, perhaps, my mode of explaining those objections might have been somewhat different from his ; I have, however, so comprehensively, although succinctly, stated my opinions on those different points of objection, in the analysis already laid before this Committee, that it will be unnecessary for me to dwell more at large upon them in my visá voce examination.

1176. Mr. Buxton.] YOU are a barrister-at-law?—I am.

1177. Do you concur in opinion with Mr. Jeremie in the various objections he took to the Jamaica laws in the course of this inquiry?—I do ; and as I have the honour of being associated with him and my friend Mr. Beldam in looking into those laws, and preparing the materials for the Analysis of the Papers on this subject which has been put in, I think it right also to tender to the Committee a short summary, stating generally the objections taken, and also my concurrence as to those points. It appeared to me to be quite unnecessary to go over the same ground again, which will be a great waste of time, and that a summary statement of those points, and my concurrence in them, would both save the time of the Committee and equally answer the purpose. If the Committee wish to ask me any questions upon this subject, I shall be perfectly ready to answer those questions. R. Matthews, Esq.

[The same was delivered in, and read as follows:]

R. Matthews, Esq.
6 May 1836.

"Having assisted in the examination of the Imperial and Jamaica Abolition Acts, which gave rise to the analysis of Mr. Beldam, and to the observations of Mr. Jeremie, already laid before the Committee, though I deem it unnecessary to tender separately and in detail, observations which would be little else than a repetition of theirs, I think it right to say, that I fully concur in the views they have taken, and, leaving points of less moment, particularly in regard to the following matters :

1st. To the want of reciprocity in the fines and penalties imposed respectively upon the master and the apprentice, their inadequacy when inflicted upon the former, and their strangely constricted appropriation as to both ; those imposed upon the master being awarded to the use of the public, and those imposed upon the apprentice being awarded to the use of the master.

2d. The impunity with which the apprentices may be deprived of large portions of their own time under colour of law—1st Jam. Act ss. 22-26.

3d. The want of proper regulations "for securing punctuality and method in the supply to them of such food, clothing, lodging, medicines, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances," as they are by the Imperial Act declared entitled to receive, "and for regulating the amount and quality of all such articles ;" all which regulations the Imperial Act declares to be "necessary," s. 16. The equitable construction of this clause has been principally insisted upon by Mr. Jeremie in his evidence, but on referring to the Imperial Act, it will appear that the word law has been designedly employed in order to include the case now in dispute ; for otherwise the words "Colonial Act," or "Statute," would have been introduced instead. The word law, in my opinion, must be understood in its generic sense, in which sense alone it is commonly employed in Acts of Parliament. And there can be no doubt but that reasonable and immemorial customs are designated and known by the word "law." They are, in fact, called "leges locorum."

4th. The unjust mode of appraisal adopted by the Jamaica Act (ss. 7-12) by which the compulsory manumission clause of the Imperial Act (s. 8) is rendered in a very great degree nugatory.

The following table of the average value in sterling money of slaves in each colony, during eight years from 1822 to 1830, issued by the Commissioners of Compensation July 7th, 1835, may be compared with the value set upon the residue of the apprenticeship term since the 1st August 1834 :

5th. The continuous labour to which prædial apprentices may be subjected, and the total want of any enactment to secure to them the enjoyment of any number of consecutive hours of rest daily.

6th. The summary power of imprisonment given to estate constables, acting under the direction of the master or manager, and which may continue for an indefinite period, Jam. Act, s. 39, and also by other persons of arrest under Act No. 7, ss. 2 and 4. See Parliamentary Papers, Part II. p. 301.

7th. The severe corporal punishment for comparatively trifling offences, as 39 stripes for "indolence" (s. 29) ; fifty stripes, or three months' hard labour in the house of correction, or in the penal gang, for simply "endangering" property, even though it be his own, by the mere "careless" use of fire, and that though no injury actually occur. On the other hand, the only remedy practically within reach of the apprentice for injury done to his person or property by his employer, as for shooting or otherwise destroying his hogs and poultry, is a fine not exceeding 5 l. currency, (3 l. 6 s. 8 d. sterling) to the use of the public, or in default, &c. imprisonment not exceeding five days ; if indeed the words "any cruelty, injustice, or other wrong" or injury done to or inflicted upon any apprenticed labourer by the person entitled to his or her services," be held to extend to his property as well as his person. In the proviso at the end of this clause, saving to the apprentice his rights to proceed in the courts of law, the word "property,"

6 May 1836.

“property,” as well as “person,” is expressly used. At all events, as to any other than the person entitled to his services, as, for instance, a book-keeper acting with the knowledge and connivance of his employer, the apprentice has no other remedy than the impracticable one pointed out by the proviso, except the Malicious Trespass Act, passed the 12th December 1833, which seems to have been framed rather for his correction than for his advantage; and where he is remitted to the jurisdiction of an ordinary justice. A complaint under this clause to the special magistrate against a book-keeper, or any other than the person entitled to his services, and even against him, unless the former part of the clause be held to extend to the property as well as to the person of the apprentice, would be “groundless,” and would subject him to punishment under s. 40.

8th. The manner in which the apprentice is, in law, all but imprisoned within the bounds of the estate upon which he is located, and the prejudicial effect which this must produce upon wages for extra labour.

9th. His inability to enter any other estate without making himself a trespasser, though it be for the purpose of moral and religious instruction, or even to visit his wife and children.

10th. The want of sufficient power for clergymen and other ministers of religion, and medical attendants, to visit the apprentices in gaols, workhouses, hospitals, and on the estates, the importance of which is admitted by an Order in Council of the 21st December 1835.

11th. No specific classification of apprentices in pursuance of s. 4 of the Imperial Abolition Act, appears yet to have been made in Jamaica. The importance attached to this subject at home may, in some measure, be presumed from a reference to the Trinidad Order in Council of the 5th June 1834, c. 3.

I also think the Jamaica Acts defective in not having provided proper forms of summonses, warrants, corrections, commitments, recognizances, &c. &c., which would afford great assistance, and probably in many instances protection also to special magistrates, as well as greatly promote regularity and certainty in the administration of justice.

In addition to these particulars, I take the liberty to observe that, in considering the legal provisions and omissions in question, I am in nowise influenced by the practice which may exist in Jamaica, whatever that practice may be. The apprentice has a right to be adequately protected by law. It was for that end, and not to leave him dependent in any degree upon the good-will of his master, that the Imperial Abolition Act was passed.

I also strongly assert the principle that wherever the master and apprentice come into legal contact, whether it be under acts and regulations which relate solely to the state of apprenticeship, or to those laws which affect the community in general, every person in any way interested in the apprenticeship condition ought to be absolutely shut out from adjudicating upon his case, directly or indirectly, in any manner howsoever. The importance attached to this subject by His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies may be gathered from a circular despatch of Lord Glenelg, dated June 15th, 1835, in which he writes, “I feel that the time has arrived, when it is necessary to revert to the spirit of the intentions by which Parliament was governed in passing the Act for the Abolition of Slavery, and especially those clauses of it which provided for the establishment of a stipendiary magistracy.

“It is not consistent with those intentions that the powers of a special magistrate should continue to be exercised by any person who has an interest in apprenticed labour, and it is only with great circumspection, and in peculiar cases, that the special commission should be given to parties who, though not interested in apprenticed labour, have been habitually resident in the colonies, and are in consequence unavoidably much connected with the colonial society.”

There is another class of laws, namely, those relating to marriage and marital rights, and to moral and religious instruction, of which, as they are few in each colony, I propose to put in a general analysis at a future period.

1178. Are you the author of a Treatise on Criminal Law?—I am.

1179. What is the designation of that Treatise?—It is a digest of the law relating to offences punishable by indictment and by information in the Crown Office.

1180 to 2653.—[This intermediate Evidence was directed by the Committee not to be presented to The House, as it related to other Colonies, on which they were unable to institute a full inquiry.]

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

10 June 1836.

2654. YOU have stated that it would, in your opinion, have been better, had the Government at home taken into its own hands legislation, in respect of the detail necessary for giving full effect to the Act of Emancipation, but do you not think that that course might have been attended with the following serious difficulties; first, the difficulty in principle of the supersession of constitutional privileges long possessed and legally guaranteed; secondly, the difficulty in practice, inasmuch as you would have incurred the risk of greatly exasperating the resident free population throughout those legislative colonies, and might thereby have entailed upon the experiment of emancipation greater disadvantages than you would have gained advantages in respect of positive improvements in those enactments?—I am by no means insensible to the advantage derivable in matters of detail from the consent of all parties to this experiment, nor to the inconvenience arising from the exasperation of persons who possessed the former power of the planters as regards the labourers, and occupying their relative station in society; but all points considered, it struck me then that the boon, the very ample boon granted by this country to that portion of the subjects of the Crown, was sufficient in itself to remove every feeling of exasperation, and also sufficient to warrant the Legislature in affixing such conditions to the grant as would ensure the due protection of the apprenticed labourers, by the adoption of an efficient legislation.

2655. I have one more question to put as to the colonial legislatures; looking to the general spirit of their proceedings during the period of slavery, as far back as your knowledge of them extends, looking to the legislation at the period of emancipation, and to those continued since (I do not now speak of any one in particular, but looking to the whole, and indeed I would say to the spirit of the resident free population in the West Indies), do you think that, upon the whole, there is a mitigation and softening of spirit perceptible, which induces you to hope it may proceed still further and with more beneficial effects for the future?—Looking to the conduct of these legislatures, I confess my expectations on that subject are but slight, for I look in vain for any ameliorative measure of importance that has been either practically or legislatively adopted in the West Indian colonies, from the period that they obtained possession of the British grant; though up to that time, I readily admit that they had introduced enactments greatly ameliorative of the condition of the negro, as compared with the position he held in slavery.

2657. Upon the whole, however, though you say it contained much obnoxious matter, I think you informed the Committee it contained improvements on the previous Jamaica Act?—It constitutes a very great improvement in this, that it affords sufficient protection to the special magistrates, to enable them to execute the laws of Jamaica, such as they are, and therefore it is a very valuable enactment.

2658. The next question I have to put is this, whether the passing of the Act in Aid was made by the Government at home, the condition of the colony entitling itself to receive its share of the compensation, or rather, whether it is not an undisputed fact, that it was not made a necessary condition?—The original Jamaica Emancipation Act was passed on the 12th of December 1833. Lord Stanley's despatch, announcing the opinion of Government that sufficient provision had been made, is dated somewhere about the month of February, I believe on the 26th, and the Order in Council regarding Jamaica appeared very shortly afterwards; whilst the Act in Aid is dated in July of the same year; it is, therefore, subsequent in date to the Order in Council, and its passing cannot therefore be considered an indefeasible condition required from the Jamaica Legislature. But it is not the less certain that no vote had been taken at the time from Parliament with regard to the compensation; a form required by the home Legislature (see the 25th section of the Imperial Act), by the latter clause of which there is affixed something like a limit to the discretion of Government, for it stated distinctly, "that no contract or agreement for raising any sum or sums by annuities as aforesaid, shall be entered into, except during the sitting of Parliament, and when the same shall have been entered into, all proceedings, tenders and contracts respecting the same shall be forthwith laid before Parliament;" so that, as no proceeding could be taken except during the sitting of Parliament, there evidently existed a power in the Legislature to withhold the money, if they felt convinced that adequate provision had not been made by the colonists, and that the contract on the other side had not been fulfilled.

2659. Does not the imperial Act for the Abolition of Slavery empower Government to raise a sum, and pay it without a fresh application to Parliament for its authority to do so?—Yes.

2660. And did not the Government, when, in the case of Jamaica, they declared that adequate and sufficient provision had been made for giving effect to emancipation, pledge themselves to make use of that power in respect of Jamaica?—It may be fairly considered as amounting to that.

2661. Are you strictly just in saying, in the instance of Jamaica, that though the legislatures of the colony did much to improve the condition of the negro by their Abolition Acts, in the hope of getting the compensation; yet when it once became secure, the colonial legislature became such as you can see in it no indication of an improved temper and spirit?—I think so, for I do not think this payment was secure so long as those who entertain the same opinion, which I do not hesitate to say I do with regard to these Acts, had an opportunity of appealing to the Legislature, and on showing that the contract had not been fulfilled, superseding the powers of the Government. It seems to me that a large sum of money having been voted by the Legislature of this country for a certain purpose, it was within the power of the Legislature, previous to the actual payment of the money, to ascertain that the intended purpose had been attained; and in case of a breach of faith, or conduct amounting in its estimation to a breach of faith in the colonies, to withhold the payment of that money, notwithstanding the Government might have viewed the conduct of the planters in a light more favourable to them.

2662. Did not the Legislature of this country delegate away from itself that power which on general principles it possessed, of determining whether the contract had been fulfilled or not, inasmuch as they appointed an exclusive criterion in the contract, in enabling the Government to declare whether adequate and satisfactory provision had been made, and in rendering the payment contingent upon that declaration and on that declaration alone?—There can be no doubt that the Imperial Legislature threw a very great responsibility on the Government in that respect; perhaps the legal right of the colonies was established the moment the Order in Council, specified in the 44th clause of the Act of Parliament, was promulgated; but yet the Legislature reserved to itself on this, as on all other occasions, authority to superintend the proceedings of the executive, and if dissatisfied, to cause such a collision between the Legislature and this Government as it was exceedingly advisable for the inhabitants of Jamaica to avert, by making timely concessions.

2663. And therefore, that in the event of that superintendence being found unsatisfactory, the Legislature did reserve to itself, notwithstanding the delegation to which I have adverted, a contingent power of interposition?—Perhaps, in strictness, the proceedings of the Legislature would rather have affected the Government who had promulgated the Order in Council, on which the payment depended, than the colonists themselves; but still it was one of those points which it appeared to me, and which it eventually appeared to the Jamaica people, judicious for them to avoid mooted.

2664. I would ask you whether, looking to the entire conduct of the white population as a whole, and taking into your view the conduct of the Legislature of Antigua in particular, without wishing to commit you beyond any general opinion in the first place, if you can form a general opinion on the subject; and secondly, if you can, do you think the indications which have taken place in the West Indies are so favourable as to induce a hope that the two classes of white and black may fuse and blend into a community which may be more harmonious?—I think, under vigilant superintendence and control from home, there can be little doubt that the West Indies may hereafter become as happy communities as any in being; but I also think, except this superintendence, this vigilance and control be most carefully exercised, those communities will, in an incomparably short space of time, relapse into most of the abuses of slavery. I consider that there is not that spirit manifest in the planting portion of the population of the West Indies, which would induce me to rely on their endeavours for the future happiness of those communities.
o.58. opinion

2665. The only question I would ask you, with reference to the spirit of the planting portion of the population of the West Indies is, whether you think that an improved spirit, as compared with the past?—That there was an improved spirit immediately on the passing of the measure of emancipation, I believe; but that that spirit is wearing itself away rather than increasing or extending, I also believe. Take Antigua for instance, and refer particularly to Lord Aberdeen's despatch to that colony, and we shall find that it was owing to his exertions, that within 12 months after the passing of their Emancipation Bill, something very like slavery was not in effect re-established at Antigua; I allude to Lord Aberdeen's despatch on the Contract Bill, one of the ablest papers I have read, No. 171, in page 34.

2666. Mr. Buxton.] Adverting to the despatch of Mr. Secretary Stanley to the Marquis of Sligo, dated February 1834?—That is not among these papers.

2668. In one word, do you think they would have been perfectly safe in receiving this money, if they had not passed the Act in Aid?—I can scarcely say they would; probably not.

COMPARATIVE VALUE OF SLAVE and APPRENTICESHIP LABOUR, on data furnished by the Returns in Parliamentary Papers, No. 278, p. 20, et seq.

If 18,159 hogsheads of sugar are produced in 17,551 hours, then only 11,440 hogsheads should be produced in 11,057 hours. Whereas it appears by the returns, that 15,672 hogsheads were made in the shorter period, giving an excess of 4,232 hogsheads in a year.

At the same rate of labour, it would require 4,090 hours to produce 4,232 hogsheads.

Hence it follows that as 4,090 is nearly one-fourth of 17,551, the labour of the negro under the new system exceeds the labour of the slave nearly as five to four.

But if in consequence of the slave working six days in the week, one-sixth is added to the time of labour in 1834, then the excess of apprenticeship labour will be 5,203 hogsheads, or reduced into time, 5,866 hours, which will make the apprenticeship labour exceed the slave labour by considerably more than one-fourth. The proportion will be nearly represented by 131 to 102.

This calculation (which is not given with minute accuracy) will prove either the superior energy of free labour or the very coercive character of the apprenticeship system.

Mr. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

William Burge, Esq. called in; and Examined.

2669. Chairman.] YOU are the agent for Jamaica?—I am.

2670. Have you had an opportunity of seeing the evidence which Mr. Jeremie has given upon the subject of the local Acts of the colony of Jamaica, with reference to the condition of the apprentices?—Yes, I have.

2671. Are there any observations which you are desirous of making to the Committee upon that evidence?—There are; I beg, however, to state to the Committee, that although I hold the office of agent of Jamaica, yet it is not in that character I make the observations which I am now about to offer. If the objections which Mr. Jeremie and the other gentlemen have made to the Acts of the Jamaica Legislature had been confined to the Acts themselves, and had not proceeded on matters extrinsic of those Acts, I should have felt that it was not compatible with my duty as agent, because it would have been a derogation from the rights which the Legislature of Jamaica possesses to have made any statement, which, being an answer to such objections, might have the appearance of being a vindication of the Acts of that legislature. The colony of Jamaica has, for 200 years, enjoyed a free constitution, having the right of making laws. The Acts of the Jamaica Legislature, when they have received the assent of the three branches of which it is composed, acquire and possess all the sanctions and all the obligations of laws, subject only to a disallowance by His Majesty in Council; that disallowance being signified to the colony, either under the King's sign manual, or by an Order in Council. The Acts against which these objections had been made, having been disallowed, are the laws of the colony. I ought not to impair their authority by undertaking to vindicate; but I ought to leave them where the constitution has left them. But there are certain objections made by Mr. Jeremie and his learned coadjutors, which are founded upon matters of law and of fact extrinsic of the Acts. With respect to these, it appears to me that the learned gentlemen have not been well informed. It is with reference to objections of that class that I wish to make a statement to the Committee. The interval which has elapsed since the Committee first sat, has not been sufficient to admit of my receiving from my constituents any instructions or directions as to the course which I should take. In the observations which I submit to the Committee, I am acting solely upon my own responsibility, and upon my own judgment. The legislature, whose agent I am, cannot be, and I ask that it should not be bound or prejudiced by any statement I may offer to the Committee; and I further ask, that its rights as a legislative body may not be compromised or in any degree affected by the course I am taking. I now proceed to address myself to the subjects which are contained in the papers delivered by Mr. Jeremie and Mr. Beldam, and at the same time to the evidence which is applicable to those subjects. I begin with the observation which is made relative to voluntary manumissions. It is said, nothing has been said as to fees; "are any and what fees leviable on manumissions?" Now I beg to call the attention of the Committee to the 69th clause of the Jamaica Abolition Act, by which the Committee will perceive that the legislature has taken care to exempt from the operation of the Stamp Act any document required under the abolition law, in page 282 of this first series of papers; "And be it further enacted, that no duty or stamp shall be imposed on any document or proceeding required by this Act." I need scarcely say, that if there is no fee imposed by the law, there can be no fee claimed by any public officer. The Legislature of Jamaica, with a view of protecting the apprentice against any injury from the loss of the document which gave him his discharge from the apprenticeship, enables him to put that document upon record in the secretary's office. This provision has the effect, not only of preserving the evidence of his title to his discharge from the apprenticeship, but of enabling him to produce secondary evidence of it; namely, a copy of the recorded instrument in the secretary's office. If there had not been this provision, he would have been under the disadvantage of being deprived of evidence of his discharge from the apprenticeship, because under none of the recording Acts of the island of Jamaica could a copy of the record of his discharge from the apprenticeship be received in evidence. If there be any fee for the service thus rendered, it is a fee to the secretary for recording the instrument, which I believe is 2 s. 6 d. currency. The next subject in the papers of Mr. Jeremie and Mr. Beldam relates to compulsory manumissions and the mode of appraisement. In connexion with this subject, I will also refer to the evidence given by Doctor Madden. If I understand the effect of the evidence of those gentlemen, and the nature of the objection, it is this, that by uniting two local magistrates with the special magistrate, there is a preponderance given to the local magistrates, and that it prevents the special magistrate from repressing any extravagant appraisement which might be made by the local magistrates; in short, that the appraisement would be made according to the alleged exaggerated and improper views of colonial magistrates, and that the single voice of the special magistrate would not be sufficient to control it. Now, it seems to have escaped the learned gentleman that the clause distinctly requires the concurrence of the three magistrates in making the appraisement, and in giving the certificate discharging the negro from his apprenticeship. In the first instance, a person applying for his discharge from the apprenticeship, and the party entitled to his services not being willing to grant it, notice is given to the party or his or their representative or agent, who is then to appoint a justice of the peace of the parish or precinct in which the apprentice shall reside; this justice is to associate himself with such special justice of the peace, and the local justice and the special justice must concur in the selection of a third justice to be associated with them; and in case the said special justice and said justice of the peace cannot agree on the selection of this other magistrate, then the selection is to fall upon the custos, or in case the custos or senior magistrate should have any interest in the question, then on the next magistrate in seniority. The tenth section then goes on to enact, "That the three justices shall meet at the usual place of public business, and proceed to fix a value upon such apprentice, which shall be binding and conclusive upon all parties; and upon the amount being paid to the person entitled to receive the same, or to the receiver-general; such apprentice shall be absolutely discharged from the remainder of his term of apprenticeship; and the three justices shall grant a certificate under their hands in the form following: 'We do certify and declare that A. B. is the apprentice of C. D. and so forth, is discharged from his apprenticeship.'" It is scarcely possible, unless you were to exclude altogether from this subject the local magistrate, to conceive an appointment in which there is greater care taken to secure a fair valuation; there is one and one person only in the character of magistrate, who is nominated on the part of the individual entitled to the service of the apprentice; the nomination of the third magistrate is the joint act of the one so appointed by the individual entitled to the service of the apprentice and the special magistrate; the appointment is so made as to secure, at all events, the local knowledge requisite in forming a just estimate of the value of the apprentice's services, and at the same time be a check upon anything like extravagance in the mode of ascertaining the value, because if it should happen that either of the two magistrates propose too high a valuation, in which the special magistrate himself should not concur, the valuation could not take place against the consent of the special magistrate. The effect of the proceeding then would be that the selection which had originally been made was inoperative, and the apprentice did not procure the certificate of discharge, another selection must be made. The supreme court would have the power of controlling improper conduct on the part of the magistrate. I cannot have a stronger illustration of the necessity of joining a local magistrate with the special magistrate in fixing this valuation, than that which is afforded by the evidence of Dr. Madden himself, to which I now refer, because, if after having resided in the island of Jamaica during the time he mentions, he can still retain his opinion that 10 l. (he does not know whether it was sterling or currency, but taking it to be 10 l. sterling) was a proper average value of the negro, even at the time when Mr. Bryan Edwards wrote his book; it is quite clear that he has formed a most erroneous and imperfect notion of what is a fair and proper valuation; he has quite misunderstood the whole of the passage in Mr. Bryan Edwards' book, and which he assumes as the authority for considering his own valuation to be correct, and the valuation of the local magistrates as too high. The statement of Mr. Bryan Edwards, to which Dr. Madden refers, is in the second volume of his History of the West Indies, and in page 301 of the edition from which I am reading. The author is giving the value of an estate in Jamaica, and the various elements or items which constitute the estate, and in the note B. he has the following passage: "In Jamaica the usual mode of calculating, in a general way, the average profits of a sugar estate is, to allow 10 l. sterling per annum for every negro, young and old, employed in this line of cultivation." Now, the Committee will at once perceive that in this passage Mr. Edwards is speaking, not of the annual value of a single negro, or a negro per se and absolutely, but to the negro as a component part of, and in relation to, the whole capital of the estate, and more especially in connexion with, and in relation to, all the other negroes on the estate, some of whom being infants, and some being aged and infirm, their services are of no value at all, but on the contrary they entail an expense on the estate. It is quite clear that Dr. Madden was under a mistake in representing that Mr. Bryan Edwards considered 10 l. to be the annual value of a negro considered by himself, and not in the relation or connexion which I have pointed out. In fact, such an estimate of the value of a negro per annum is contradicted by the experience of any man who has the slightest acquaintance with the rent which is paid, not merely for field negroes, to whom alone the passage in Mr. Edwards' book applies, but especially to those to whom the jurisdiction of Dr. Madden extended, for he was the special magistrate for Kingston, where there are no field negroes but domestics or non-prædials. The hire of an ordinary domestic is certainly not less than at the rate of two dollars per week, or 34 l. 13 s. 4 d. currency per annum. I am not aware of any instance in which you could obtain a domestic of any description, for any purpose, for a sum less than 10 s. per week, or 25 l. currency per annum. With respect to domestics of a higher description, as cooks, butlers, coachmen, &c., their wages are from three to four dollars per week, or 52 l., or 69 l. 6 s. 8 d. currency per annum. I speak from having frequently myself paid that rate of wages for the domestics I hired. With respect to field negroes, I can speak also of those whom for many years I hired, at certainly not less than 25 l. a year, and sometimes more. As to the introduction of the local magistrates into the tribunal, by whom the valuation is to be made, I say that it is essential for the purpose of affixing a fair valuation of the apprentice's services, and that if there be a possible mischief which might result from any supposed bias on the part of the local magistrates, it is counteracted by the new selection which may be made, and by the controlling power which the supreme court would possess, in case there was, on the part of either of the local magistrates, a determination not to concur in the certificate of discharge, or not to concur in a valuation which was fair and reasonable; that I say is a complete answer to the objection which is made to the introduction of local magistrates into the tribunal appointed for the valuation of the apprentice's services.

2672. Sir George Grey.] Suppose this case, that the two general magistrates fix what in the opinion of the special justice is an unfair valuation, and the special justice refuses to concur with them and to sign the certificate, what remedy has the apprentice, so as to entitle him to the obtaining of the manumission which the Act professes to give him a right to?—The course which I conceive would be adopted in such a case would be this, the special magistrate would make an application to the supreme court, which possesses all the powers of the Court of King's Bench in England; it would receive affidavits upon the subject of that valuation, and if there appeared just ground, would appoint another magistrate or two more magistrates in the room of those who have been guilty of an improper adherence to an extravagant valuation.

21 June 1836.

2673. Suppose that the supreme court should not be sitting at that time when the original valuation took place, what would be done?—Of course then nothing could be done till the supreme court did sit; but the supreme court sits three times a year, in February, June and October.

2674. For what period does it sit at each of those sittings?—Three weeks.

2675. Nine weeks in the course of the year?—Yes.

2676. Then during the interval there would be no immediate court open to the apprentice against the excessive valuation made by the two justices?—No.

2677. Mr. Gladstone.] Suppose the valuation made by the two general justices were such as, though not too exorbitant, went beyond the mark; would the supreme court, in such a case, upon a mere question of opinion, be likely to dismiss those two general justices, and to substitute two others for them, there being no such discrepancy as to justify the imputation of bad motives to them?—Certainly not; I am supposing a case in which the appeal would be from a valuation so extravagant as to infer an endeavour on the part of the local magistracy to prevent the apprentice from obtaining his discharge; but if it were merely a difference of opinion between the local magistrates and the special magistrate, there would be no ground to interfere.

2678. They would not be able to interfere then upon the simple fact that there was a difference in opinion between the special magistrate and the other magistrates?—I should think not.

2680. Mr. Buxton.] What are the precise words which you think make it necessary that all the three magistrates should unite in fixing the valuation?—The whole of the 10th section contemplates that the act should be done by the three; the three must concur in granting and signing the certificate; the words of the clause require this construction of it, and of course the three would not sign the certificate if either of them dissented from the valuation.

2681. Then what, according to your interpretation of this clause, would be the effect of one magistrate refusing to sign the certificate?—The supreme court would compel him by a mandamus to sign it.

2682. So that it would be necessary either to incur the expense and the delay of an application to the supreme court, or the negro must go on until the expiration of the apprenticeship?—Yes, if you could suppose a case of this kind to occur; as to the expense incident to the application for a mandamus, they are Crown proceedings, and no expense would be incurred; it would be undertaken by the Attorney-General.

2683. Mr. Gladstone.] What would be the average period of delay?—About two months, supposing the case to occur immediately after the termination of the grand court, as for instance, at the end of June, would be the interval between the end of June and the meeting of the grand court in the first Monday in October.

2684. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that no manumission could take place if the three did not concur in signing the certificate?—I apprehend, in that case, the special magistrate would have it in his power to take proceedings by which another magistrate might be selected. He would call upon the person who was entitled to the services of the apprentices to make another appointment, the first appointment having become inoperative in consequence of their refusal to concur. The magistrate thus appointed, together with the special magistrate, would make choice of the third, in the same manner as if there had been no previous appointment. I apprehend there is nothing in the Act which should prevent prevent the special magistrate, in such a case as that which is supposed, from uniting with another magistrate for the purpose of forming this tribunal.

2685. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think that there is anything which renders it necessary that they should proceed in case the magistrates could not agree to appoint other magistrates who should be likely to agree?—I apprehend that if the first appointment had been made by the person entitled to appoint his magistrate, and another magistrate had been appointed concurrently by him and the special magistrate, but both or either of the two local magistrates remained inflexible as to a high valuation, so that no certificate could be given by the three, it would be competent for the special magistrate to give notice to the person entitled to the services of the apprentice, to name some other magistrate. I cannot conceive that there would have been a fair compliance with the law, if a magistrate who is named prevented the certificate being given, by insisting on a valuation so high that the other local magistrate and special magistrate or either of them would not concur. It would be a mode of defeating the law, and it would not have been a discharge of the duty delegated to him if he so conducted himself as to prevent the provision of the law from taking effect.

2686. Would not the owner have an equal right to apply to the apprentice and say, your valuer, this special magistrate, undervalues you exceedingly, and therefore you must appoint a new special magistrate?—No, he could not say that, because the special magistrate must be the nearest magistrate appointed by special commission. The law directs that the application is to be made to the nearest magistrate who is appointed by special commission.

2687. Then do you consider the argument being that the negro ought to appoint his own arbitrator, magistrate or no magistrate, that your statement is a reply to that?—Yes, I do. It was considered that by interposing a special magistrate as one of the valuers, the interest of the apprentice was protected, so that it should not be wholly left to the local magistrates to make the valuation of his services.

2688. And you are of opinion that there being two of one party, namely, ordinary magistrates and one of a third party, namely, a special magistrate, that between those three he would be sure of obtaining a just valuation?—I consider that there would be security for him in the control exercised over those local magistrates if they made a valuation so improper as either to manifest a desire to prevent the negro from obtaining his discharge from the apprenticeship, or to oblige the latter to pay an unjust value.

2690. But put a case in which there was some small over-valuation, and therefore insignificant as a sum, but of great importance to the negro, and in that mitigated case would be sure of obtaining justice?—When one is speaking of sums of relative value, I feel that a difficulty might arise, because the judgments of persons might differ as to amount, which would be so high as to call for an interposition on the part of the Governor, or on the part of the supreme court of the colony.

2691. Then you think that in extravagant cases there is redress, but you cannot say whether in minor cases that redress would be applied?—No, I can carry it no further than I have stated; I believe if a case of the sort occurred, affording a fair ground of complaint of the mode of appraisement, that there are means of redress in the power of the Governor to remove the magistrate, and in the power of the special magistrate, if he considered the valuation by other magistrates too high, to call for the appointment of another magistrate.

2692. You say, that in case of an over-valuation, redress may be expected of the superior court; of whom does the superior court consist?—Of the Chief Justice, a gentleman at the English bar, and of two other judges.

2693. Who are they?—They are not generally barristers.

2694. Are they planters?—Some are planters, and some are merchants.

2695. So that we should come at last to seeking redress from the discretion of a court, the majority of which consisted of persons connected with one side of the question?—If you suppose that a connexion with one side of the question would bias the judgment of those persons who are sworn to administer justice faithfully between His Majesty's subjects, of course I am bound to say, that there may be some of the judges who have that connexion with one side of the question, if by connexion it is meant that they have apprentices, whose services may become the subject of valuation.

2696. Mr. Gladstone.] Would you not say, that there is another mode of redress opened by the interposition of the Governor?—By his removal of the magistrate.

2697. Do you think that the Governor, supposing himself satisfied in his own mind in a particular case, that the over-valuation by a particular magistrate, whether sufficient or insufficient to justify the imputation of corrupt motives, yet was sufficient to inflict substantial hardship, would in that case be justified in removing the magistrate?—It is difficult to answer that question. It would depend, I conceive, very much upon what was the previous general conduct of the magistrate in making valuations, whether he had been accustomed on other occasions to make an extravagant appraisement; but if there was a substantial wrong done to the apprentice, I should not think that the Governor would hesitate in removing the magistrate.

2698. In the case of a substantial wrong being done to the negro, even by a sum insignificant in itself, to the minds of those who are accustomed to deal with money in larger quantities, would the Governor have the power of giving a remedy by removing the magistrate?—Certainly.

2699. Sir George Grey.] That would not be retrospective, but prospective, to set aside that valuation?—Yes.

2700. But supposing neither of the magistrates had concurred, and that it had become inoperative by the non-payment of the money, the remedy would be so far applicable to the past case, that that case would come under a new tribunal?—Yes, and in the case which was just now put of a special magistrate considering that it was an improper sum, and refusing to sign the certificate, if the Governor removed the magistrate, there must of course be another magistrate selected to take part in the valuation.

2701. Do you think that that would be practically an effective remedy, if the Governor had the power of removing a magistrate for making an excessive valuation, do you think that that power could be exercised if a sufficient case were made out for lowering any excessive valuation that they might otherwise be disposed to make?—I think so.

2702. Chairman.] Do you think it probable that the Governor would exercise this power, except in a very extreme case?—He would not, except in those cases where it was evident that there had been a wrong done to the apprentice.

2703. Do you think, therefore, that this would be a practical check to the system of over-valuation, if such could be supposed to exist, which might be a very great hardship to the negro, though it might not amount to such a case as would justify the Governor in interfering?—I think the knowledge that in those valuations, and in a case of practical hardship inflicted on the apprentice by the amount of the valuation, the Governor would interpose and supersede the magistrate, would operate to restrain and prevent those evils.

2704. Do you think it likely that the Governor would feel himself justified in resorting to so strong a measure as to supersede a magistrate, unless the error committed by the magistrate was of a gross description?—A mere error in judgment in the estimate formed of the service of the apprentice, would certainly not present a case in which a Governor would be justified in resorting to so strong a measure as the removal of the magistrate; but the knowledge that it was in the power of the Governor to restrain any attempt to defeat this law, by extravagant valuations, or to subject the apprentice to a pecuniary hardship, in paying a larger sum than was reasonable, would, I think, check a disposition to make extravagant valuations, if such a disposition existed. I am all along assuming that such a disposition does exist, and that the valuation which has been generally put upon the apprentices has been improper; but, judging from the testimony of Dr. Madden, or from anything I have heard, I am not warranted in assuming that such disposition does exist, or that the valuations have been improper. If Dr. Madden desired valuations to be made upon his principle, he would be clearly wrong, for those are too low.

2705. Mr. Buxton.] Do you consider that a Governor would feel himself justified in removing a magistrate from his office, and by that means holding out an example which should deter magistrates from over-valuation in cases which might be considered as error of judgment, but in which no corrupt motive could be established?—I have said before, that in those cases the Governor would naturally look to the previous character and conduct of the magistrate in relation to valuations; he would obtain the estimate of other persons who were acquainted with the value of the services of the apprentices, and and would judge what would be a fair value; these are some of the means by which he would assist himself in determining whether there were grounds for imputing to the magistrate improper motives in the valuation he had made.

2706. Do you think that the Governor would feel himself justified in removing the magistrate without such an investigation into his conduct?—If you ask me whether a Governor is bound to investigate the conduct of a magistrate before he supersedes him, I answer that he is; I take it for granted the Governor would ascertain from experienced persons the value of the services of the negro whose valuation was deemed too high; he would endeavour to obtain the best information.

2707. During the time that these various investigations were going on, what would become of the apprentice?—The apprentice would still remain subject to his apprenticeship.

2709. Supposing that valuation to be subject to a tribunal perfectly unimpeachable, what would become of the apprentice in the interval between the disputed valuation and the decision of the appeal; would he be subject to apprenticeship or be entitled to freedom as if the valuation was complete?—I apprehend, in such a case, the court to whom the appeal was made would extend protection to the negro, so as to place him in the same situation as if the apprenticeship had actually determined; an apprentice whilst prosecuting his remedy for the purpose of having his certificate granted to him would not be treated as an apprentice.

2710. Do you think that, supposing the special magistrate to differ from the other magistrates as to the value, and to refuse to sign this certificate and to give notice of his intention to apply to the supreme court, that that special magistrate would not be authorized to compel the apprentice to labour in the meantime?—I think not; I think the apprentice would be protected in the meantime.

2711. You think that the special magistrate, being the special magistrate of the district, would not be authorized to compel his labour in the meantime?—I think not, under those circumstances.

2712. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think that, during this time of suspension, if the negro absconded he would be liable to penalties for so doing?—I should think the provisions of the law would not attach to him under those circumstances; he is in the situation of a person prosecuting a right, and the successful acquisition of that right is defeated by causes over which the apprentice has no control, and my own individual opinion would be, that the law would throw around him a protection, so that in the meantime he will be perfectly free; I should certainly, as a special magistrate, not feel any hesitation in taking care that the negro should be protected during that time.

2713. On what do you found this opinion of yours?—On the power which must, I apprehend, be incident to the duty with which the special magistrate is charged in relation to the application which the apprentice is entitled to make for the purchase of his discharge from the apprenticeship, and which application is defeated by an Act over which he has no control and which he could not prevent.

2714. In your view of the case you think he would be protected, but do you believe before a court of the colony it would be so?—It may be difficult to speak of the probable decision of any court; I do not participate in any distrust of the inclination of a colonial court to do what is just and right.

2715. Sir George Grey.] Do you think this protection ought to be afforded to the special magistrate if the money was not lodged to abide the event of the appeal?—I apprehend the special magistrate would require a sum of money to be deposited with the receiver-general.

2716. That sum of money which he conceived the valuation ought to have been?—Yes.

2717. Therefore the apprentice would not be entitled to this protection unless he had this money to deposit?—I am intimating an opinion very much upon what would be my own feeling as a special magistrate having to administer this law law; and taking care that effect should be given to the provision enabling the apprentice to acquire his right to his discharge from his apprenticeship, I apprehend if that provision were defeated by such acts as are supposed, the special magistrate must possess some means by which he can enable the apprentice to obtain redress from the superior court, and at the time he is seeking that redress, protect him from remaining in the same situation as if he were not availing himself of that provision of the law for his discharge; and I am speaking rather as to powers incident to the duty of the special magistrate and implied, than as to anything that is in terms expressed by the Act; I can only hazard a conjecture whether the special magistrate would require the whole amount of valuation or that which was something short of it.

W. Burge, Esq.

2718. You conceive this authority to be vested in the special magistrate, not by virtue of any specific enactments applicable to the individuals on this subject, but by virtue of the office, looking at the purpose for which that office was created, is that your opinion?—Exactly so.

to have some one as an agent or representative there to receive the amount of the wages; if he were in the United Kingdom, notice might be served upon him here; eight or nine weeks would suffice to bring out proof to the special magistrate that the notice had been served on the party entitled to the services of the apprentice of the intention to proceed to make the valuation. I have said it is an extremely improbable case that the party should not be represented; so far from its being common that persons shall be unrepresented in the colony where there are few negroes, I beg to state that it is very unusual in Jamaica. Even during the existence of slavery, if there was not in the island any person claiming by himself or by his representative the possession of the negro, the latter might, in consequence of his having been allowed for a certain time to go at-large without any claim on his services, have acquired a title to freedom. I have known an instance where a negro has acquired his freedom by the decision of a court of law, upon the single ground that he had been allowed for a period of 15 years to enjoy himself as a free person, there being no person claiming any service from him.

2720. Sir George Grey.] Supposing that case to exist, would there be any person in the colony capable to compel the services of the negro?—Certainly not.

2721. Would not the case you have put be a practical dissolution of the apprenticeship, or a suspension of the apprenticeship?—Exactly so, there would be no person who would be entitled to the services of the apprentice. If you have a person entitled to the services of the apprentice, either on his own account or on behalf of another, you have immediately in him an agent and representative upon whom a notice could be served.

2722. Chairman.] You have stated that, in this extreme case there would be a suspension of any ownership of the apprentice; would there not also be a suspension of the power that the apprentice would have of purchasing his freedom if he was desirous of doing so during the same period?—I cannot understand the term apprentice, without reference to some person who must be entitled to his services; either the party entitled to his services is in the island himself, or there is some person who claims those services to whom the apprentice accounted for his wages; in either of those cases there is an individual upon whom the notice would be served.

2723. You have given a case in which the ownership is suspended, that is to say, in which the individual is practically free, but in which the owner may return and may resume his right over the services of that apprentice; supposing during that interval the apprentice is desirous of purchasing his unqualified freedom, would the absence of any owner during that time suspend the power which the apprentice would have of so acquiring his freedom?—In such a case as that the notice would be served, I apprehend, upon the person who was last in the possession, or last receiving the wages of that apprentice.

2724. Supposing that person to be absent, and to have left no one who represented him in the colony, what would be the course of the apprentice in that case?—In the case which the Chairman has put, the person who has quitted the island having been in possession previously of the apprentice, but having left no one to represent him, which is an extremely improbable case, I apprehend that that person who is left in charge of that individual's general affairs, would be considered as representing him for this particular apprentice.

2725. But, suppose the case which you apprehend to be possible, though you conceive it not to be likely frequently to occur, of an owner who has the legal right to the services of the apprentice leaving the island and no one behind him to represent him?—In such a case as that, there would seem to be no one upon whom notice could be served.

2726. But, on the other hand, it appears, from what you have said, that you conceive that the moment that the right to the services of the apprentice began, from that period would begin the power on the part of the apprentice of purchasing his freedom?—Decidedly so; the moment that any one was claiming his service as an apprentice, instantly there is the person upon whom the notice could be served.

2727. Sir George Grey.] With reference to the practice of the courts of Jamaica, could the supreme court order a service of the notice at the last place of residence of the persons entitled under any circumstances, as they do in the Court of Chancery here?—There are many instances in which notice of that description is deemed sufficient, upon a previous application to the court, and I should conceive that in such a case as this the court would authorize such a service.

2728. Suppose the owner absent, means having been taken to find him, but unsuccessfully, could an order be made by the court to justify the service of the notice at the last place of residence of the person entitled?—I think so. In those cases in which the party leaves the island, without appointing an attorney or agent, the service of process on his property or place of residence has been established. I do not doubt that the court would establish as good service the delivery of the notice at his estate or at his house.

2729. Chairman.] Will you have the goodness to proceed to the next point?—It appears to me that there is a misapprehension of the effect of the clauses 14 and 15, respecting the separation of families; clause 14, it is said in Mr. Jeremie's paper, "does not provide a remedy for the parent or child or other relation, who by any mistake or omission of the special magistrates shall have been separated from his family, an omission of great practical importance, which is believed to have caused much litigation elsewhere." Upon a fair view of the 14th clause, I consider this is an unfounded objection. By the clause 14, page 274, it is enacted, that "no apprenticed labourer should be subject or liable to be removed from this island, and that no prædial apprenticed labourer who may, in manner aforesaid, become attached to the soil, shall be subject or liable to perform any labour in the service of his or her employer or employers, except upon, in or about the works and business of the plantations or estates to which such prædial apprenticed labourer shall have been attached, or on which he or she shall have been usually employed on or previously to the said first day of August 1834, provided nevertheless, that with the consent in writing of any two or more justices of the peace holding special commission, it shall be lawful for the person or persons entitled to the services of any such attached prædial apprenticed labourer or labourers to transfer his or their services to any other plantation or estate within this island to such person or persons belonging, which written consent shall in no case be given or be of any validity, unless any of such justices of the peace shall first have ascertained that such transfer would not have the effect of separating any such attached prædial apprenticed labourer from his or her wife or husband." Now, according to the obvious import of this clause, if it turned out that there had been separation, the removal became absolutely void. It is a misapprehension of it to state, that there is no remedy where such separation has taken place by mistake or omission of the special magistrate; the separation of the family would render the consent given for the removal to another plantation absolutely void, because the clause has in expressed terms said, that such written consent shall in no case be of any validity, unless it has been first ascertained that such transfer would not have the effect of separating the members of the family. The language of the clause is so strong as to invalidate any consent which has the effect of separating the members of the family; this clause cannot, I conceive, admit of the least doubt. The next subject is that which relates to the allowances, provisions, grounds, the clothing and medical attendance. I have a very short observation to make to a great deal which has been very ingeniously used respecting what may be correctly called indulgences or allowances. If I understand the argument of Mr. Jeremie and his coadjutors, it is this, that those articles which are furnished at some particular seasons, which are called indulgences, have acquired so much the character of custom, as to have given the apprentices a right to their continuance; that they are as much guaranteed to them by law as if they had been the subject of an express legislative enactment. Now, with great respect for Mr. Jeremie and his learned coadjutors, I must say that it would surprise an English lawyer very much indeed to be told that an allowance which, according to the very terms in which it is stated, is neither certain nor compulsory upon the party, nor uninterruptedly continued, can so far partake of the quality and incidents of a custom, as to confer a right to demand that allowance. The essential qualities of a custom, I need scarcely say, are that it should be certain, that it should not rest upon the will of the party giving the thing, and that it should be uninterrupted in its enjoyment; now not one of those qualities can be predicated of those allowances.

2730. Chairman.] Is it quite fair to apply the same rule to the customs existing in England to customs existing in a state of society so different from that of England, as was the case in Jamaica during the period of slavery?—With great submission, submission, those allowances have been brought forward in the evidence of Mr. Jeremie, as being clothed with all the sanctions and legal obligations which belong to a custom as it exists in England; and it has been urged that this custom had acquired the force of law. Now I was about to say, with respect to the allowance, that the statement made on the part of many planters in the parish of Trelawney, and which forms the case laid before Mr. Batty and the Attorney-General, represents the allowances to be, as in fact they were, not uniformly given throughout the whole island at all; not uniform as to the quantity given; not uniform as to the time when they were given and withdrawn by the master, when he saw occasion to withdraw them, either in consequence of the conduct of the negro or his own inability to provide them. Upon that statement Mr. Batty gave his opinion, that in point of law, the negro had no right to those indulgences; and I beg leave to say, that I entirely concur with Mr. Batty in that opinion. Moreover I think that a more mischievous measure, as regards the real welfare of the negro population could not be devised, than to have made it imperative upon the master to have given those indulgences. You would have deprived him of the means not only of supplying a powerful motive for good conduct in his apprentices, but of creating and preserving all those feelings of reciprocal confidence and attachment which must subsist between those who dispense and those who receive benefits, which are voluntary and unconstrained gifts. I conceive that the whole system of indulgences operated upon the negro population as a stimulus to good conduct, because they were withheld whenever their conduct was not good; but further, this system made the negro always feel, and it is very desirable that he should continue to feel, an interest in the prosperity of his employer, because upon that prosperity depended the ability to grant the indulgences. That feeling cannot exist without producing other kind and friendly feelings towards his employer. I think it would have been most injudicious to have incurred the risk of destroying or disturbing this feeling by making it imperative upon the master to give those allowances to negroes under all circumstances. I give the Committee, candidly, my view of this subject as a measure of policy, independently of the very strong opinion which I have, that under the law of Jamaica, it was utterly impossible to regard those indulgences as having acquired the force of custom, entitling the negroes to regard them as matter of right. I believe it would turn out, as is stated by Doctor Madden in the course of the evidence, that there are very few instances indeed in which those indulgences have been withdrawn; yet still to have told the negroes that they should, at all events and under all circumstances, receive those indulgences as matters of right, and not as proceeding from the kindness of their employers, would have been most unwise. It would have been little calculated to promote that relation which it is so desirable to cultivate between them and their employers during the apprenticeship, and which it is so desirable also should exist when the apprenticeship terminates. The real interests of all require that there should be the best possible feelings subsisting between them and the persons in whose service they engage.

2731. You have stated that you considered the practice of giving indulgence to negroes not to have been an uninterrupted practice?—Certainly not.

2732. If you put out of the question the cases of this kind on the part of the negroes, the instances in which those allowances were stopped for any misconduct, do you conceive that in other respects it may be considered to be an uninterrupted practice?—Certainly not; there have been periods when from utter inability on the part of the owner to provide them, those allowances were not given. I might refer to the period when the Berlin and Milan Decrees prevented the sale, on the Continent, of coffee, and when there was an enormous quantity of coffee remaining in the warehouses of London unsold; a numerous body of coffee planters had not the means of granting the indulgences.

2733. Are you able to state to the Committee, since the passing of the Abolition Act, whether the habit of granting them indulgences has been restricted, compared with what it was before?—Speaking from my own experience, and from that which I have heard from others, I am not aware that they have been restricted; if you were to ask London merchants as to the supplies sent to Jamaica, I believe they would tell you that the amount of their invoices of supplies sent to the colony had not been diminished, but had exceeded that of former years.

2734. Will

2734. Will you turn to the 11th section of the imperial Act, commonly called the Emancipation Act; it is there stated, "That during the continuance of any such apprenticeship as aforesaid, the person or persons for the time being entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer shall be, and is and are hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances as by any law now in force in the colony, to which such apprenticed labourer may belong; an owner is required to supply to and for any slave being of the same age and sex as such apprenticed labourer shall be." What do you conceive was meant by the Legislature by the words "maintenance and allowances?"—The "maintenance and allowances" which the owner was required to provide for the negro under the Slave Act then in force, because I see in this section words which by no possibility could refer to customs of the description which have been mentioned. The words are, "as by any law now in force is required;" those are expressions which would not be used in speaking of the allowances which it was in the power of the master to withhold, and which were neither uniform or defined in quantity or quality.

2735. Was there any law in Jamaica which guaranteed to the slave a certain quantity of food and clothing independently of those allowances which have been spoken of?—No, the sole law which relates both to the provision ground and maintenance and allowances, is that Act which is called the Slave Act, which was in force at the time the Emancipation Act was passed.

2736. Does that Act guarantee to the slave a certain quantity of food and clothing?—Yes; that Act regulates the food and clothing to be provided.

2739. Did you hear the very able and eloquent speech of Mr. Patrick Stewart, in which he impressed upon the House so strongly that the slaves would be in a wonderfully improved condition, because they would have all the allowances to which they were habituated before hand, and they would have a certain number of hours in the week into the bargain?—I take great demerit to myself at not being able to recollect every word of the admirable speech which Mr. Patrick Stewart made upon that occasion; but I am not able to bring to my recollection the passage to which you refer.

2740. Mr. Gladstone.] Is it true, or is it not, that they have those allowances?—Decidedly so; that is my impression.

2741. Mr. Buxton.] You confidently say that they do not pay for those indulgences by working in the time which Parliament had given them?—I am not aware of any instances of the kind.

2742. Are you aware that the Governor, in papers that have been laid before Parliament, has repeatedly said, that the negroes gave up their extra time for allowances, by the recommendation of the special magistrates?—I do not immediately recollect any paper in which that is said by Lord Sligo; I would much rather, upon the actual details of what has taken place since the emancipation, refer to the testimony of gentlemen who have recently come from the colony, because I must only give you information at second and third hand.

2743. Are you acquainted with Mr. Shand's evidence before the House of Lords?—I am not quite certain whether I have read Mr. Shand's evidence since the time it was given before the House of Lords, and I am not even sure that I have read the whole of his evidence as given there; certainly not since the Committee sat.

2744. He states, in page 188, "Did the slaves possess property? Yes.—Of what description? They had their provision grounds, in the first place, which were considered as sacred, although not their immediate property, but the property of their master; no one interfered with their ground."—Again, "Their property, though not sanctioned by law, was nevertheless not interfered with by the proprietor; there was nothing more sacred than the negro's property; this was the case when I first went to Jamaica, and it was a common saying among the negroes in the parish of Vine, where I lived shortly after going to the island of Jamaica, the property on Kelleys, 'What is my master's is for me, but what is is for me is not for my master; meaning that they have a right to their master's property as well as their own, but that their masters had no right to theirs." Was salt fish considered part of the allowance of the negro?—Not an allowance prescribed by the Slave Act; it was one of those articles with respect to its amount, and so on, which fall within the description of what I call indulgences; that is my conception of it.

2745. You do not think that salt fish comes under the head of maintenances and allowances granted by law?—No, I believe not under the law.

2746. Do you concur in opinion with Mr. Shand as to the sacredness of the property referred to?—I believe I stated as much myself in the course of my evidence respecting the negro grounds, referring particularly to them, and I remember alluding to an anecdote that was told me of negroes upon the property of Mr. Watson Taylor. It has been considered by negroes that their grounds and their houses and their lands formed, in fact, a property which the master was not to interfere with. I have known instances in which the master had given them compensation for damage done to their grounds by dragging timber through a part of them.

2747. Have you not formerly stated that the property of the negro was as sacred to him as if it had been guaranteed to him by law?—I believe my evidence upon that subject with reference to what I was then speaking of, namely, negroes' grounds, and so on, is very much to that effect; the passage in my examination I should prefer referring to; it is in page 974: "Before the law of 1826, which gave the right of property to the slave, was property always from usage held sacred when possessed by a slave?—Always; in the course of my 20 years' residence in Jamaica, in continued communication with the slaves, frequently referred to by them whenever they had any cause of grievance, I never heard an instance of an owner or any other person depriving a slave of his property or withholding from him any property belonging to him; this is one of the peculiar features of colonial society, which I would select as the best illustration of the force of usage, for I believe if any proprietor, if any person, whatever was his station or condition, withheld from his slave the property belonging to that slave, it would have been an outrage completely revolting to the feelings of the community. Of this I speak with perfect confidence.—In respect of their provision grounds, has it not been usual for proprietors and managers to leave them in undisturbed possession, and to permit the possession of such provision grounds to descend to their posterity, or to such persons as they wish to enjoy them after them?—Exactly so; a slave being once put into possession of his provision grounds, considers them completely his own property, and he is allowed to dispose of them to such of his family as he pleases; in short, those acquainted with Jamaica know that if from any cause it becomes necessary to remove the slaves from one property to another, or even change their provision grounds on the same property, the greatest difficulty is found in reconciling them to the removal or change; very considerable sums are paid to them by way of compensation for their former grounds. A person having to remove slaves must first of all furnish them with new houses and plant new grounds for them, and give them a compensation for the grounds they have already, independently of their being at liberty to go back and take all the provisions remaining in those grounds. I heard from the late Mr. Simon Taylor, that adjoining the houses and gardens of the negroes on one of his estates were some cocoa-nut trees which had grown up, and were supposed to render their habitations unhealthy; but it was with the greatest difficulty, and after a length of time, and by giving them money, he could prevail upon them to allow him to cut them down. I mention this as an instance of the great respect paid to their grounds and their property." Now I have no hesitation in adhering to that representation which I gave them.

2748. You still think that usage has the force of law?—With respect to the subjects to which my evidence referred, one of the instances of usage which I mentioned was that of their being possessed of horses, which was for many years in distinct opposition to the law; but, in point of fact, they were in possession of them and kept them upon their masters' grounds, and I never heard of an attempt on the part of the masters to take from them that property.

2749. You found, as far as provision grounds were concerned and property was concerned, that usage had the force of law?—Yes.

21 June 1836.

2750. Did you mean to say at that time, that with regard to allowances it had not the force of law?—I do not know that I expressed an opinion on the subject of allowances; but if the question was put to me, whether I considered that allowances were a matter of right, which the negro could claim as matter of right, and which if the master withheld, that master could be compelled to deliver to him; I do not think I should have expressed ~~that~~ opinion.

2751. Chairman.] But you would not have said that the negro held his provision ground as matter of right?—No.

2752. Do you mean to draw a distinction between the species of right which the negro had, or the custom equivalent to right which the negro had in his provision ground, and in his personal property and allowances?—Yes, and for this reason, that the law compels the allowance of the negro grounds by the master.

2753. In the case of horses, they have the horses against the law?—Yes.

2754. What distinction do you draw?—I should have said, with respect to a property of this description, that as the master had permitted the negro to have horses, he must enable the negro to dispose of them, if he did not like that the negro should continue to keep them on his pasture; that the master could not take them as his own.

2755. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think that there is that distinction?—I really do; I think it is important that there should be this distinction, for the reason I have just given.

2756. Do you think that the allowance which they held by usage had not the same force as the provisions that they held by usage?—I am speaking of those allowances which the master could withhold, as stated in the case laid before Mr. Batty, which are given in some parishes and not in others, which are given in different times, and which varied in quantity and quality, as to the times when they were given; I do not believe I ever stated that with respect to these the negro could ever claim them as matter of right.

2757. Claim them as matter of right you did not state; but did you state that he could claim them by usage, and that usage had the force of law?—I do not think I ever said he could claim them by usage.

2758. This is the paragraph in your evidence, in page 970; “If your lordships looked merely at the written laws which regard the condition of the slaves, you would do great injustice to the colony; you must inquire, not only for the written law, but the usage; I apprehend it will be found in every slave colony, certainly in Jamaica, that the usage goes infinitely beyond the written law in favour of the slave; in some instances enlarging those provisions which are beneficial to him; in others mitigating; in others superseding enactments of discipline;” and so on?—The term “provisions,” there used, has no relation whatever to articles of food; it is used as synonymous with “enactments.” I have not read the whole of the evidence since I gave it in 1832; but I do not think you will find that I have stated that the negroes had a right to these allowances founded on any usage.

24 June 1836.

2758*. Chairman.] HAVE you anything to add upon the subject of allowances?—I would call the attention of the Committee to the law of Jamaica respecting the provisions, the grounds, the clothing, &c. which were required to be furnished by the owner, as it existed at the time the Slavery Abolition Act was passed; the Committee will then perceive that at this time the distinction between between what the written law of Jamaica required, and the usage of the nature I have defined, must have been perfectly well known to His Majesty's Government, and to all those who were taking a part in the enactments which should be introduced into the Abolition Act. The consolidated law was that particular law which imposed on the owner the obligation to provide the necessary grounds, clothing, &c. for the slaves; I will not refer to any earlier consolidated slave law than that of 1816; that Act contained all the legislative enactments which imposed upon the owner of slaves the obligation of providing those grounds, food, maintenance and so on. That Act received the express approbation of the Government of that day. In 1826, that consolidated slave law passed under the revision of the Legislature, with a view of introducing further changes more immediately affecting the personal condition of the slaves; it enforced the regulations of the Act of 1816, respecting provisions. In the observations which Mr. Huskisson, the then Secretary of State, communicated to the then Governor of Jamaica, respecting that Act, there was no disapprobation of this part of the Act. The clauses which caused its rejection had no relation to this subject. The Act, in all other particulars, received the approbation of the Government. The slave law of 1831, which was that in force when the Slavery Abolition Acts of the Imperial Parliament and of the Jamaica Legislature were passed, and is that to which the Jamaica Abolition Act refers; its enactments imposing the obligation on the master to provide maintenance, grounds, clothing, &c., were the same as those of the preceding slave laws of 1816 and 1826. They had never been complained of by any of the Governments of this country. Lord Stanley, in his despatch, which I am now about to read, expressly recognizes the adequacy and sufficiency of the enactments respecting the necessary clothing and maintenance, &c. of the slave population.

2759. Mr. Johnston.] What is the date of that?—The date of the despatch is the 20th of February 1834, which communicates the order of His Majesty in Council, declaring that adequate and satisfactory provision have been made by the Jamaica Abolition Act; the passage in his letter is in these words: "I would advert to one other point, rather with a view of calling the attention of the Legislature of Jamaica to the subject, than of stating my opinion that the Act as it stands is defective. The British Act requires that the apprenticed labourer should receive from his employer such supplies of food, clothing, medicine and medical attendance as the slave might have claimed by law in each respective colony, and that regulations should be made on these heads where the existing law is either silent or inadequate. I am happy to admit that I do not find the inadequacy of the law of Jamaica on these subjects made matter of remonstrance by any of my predecessors in commenting upon the several provisions of successive slave laws, nor do I find that complaints of their insufficiency have been made by the slaves in any single case; I am bound therefore to consider them as adequate for the purpose." Now, I read this passage for the purpose of showing that the Government has looked always at the enactments of the slave law, and to those enactments only, as imposing on the owner the obligation of providing requisite maintenance for his slaves; and in looking to those enactments, Lord Stanley himself admits that his predecessors had never found fault with those enactments, and that no complaint of their inefficiency had been made on the part of the slave population. Now, it is evident that the Jamaica Slave Act has been considered as the only law obligatory upon the owner as to supplying his slave or his apprentice now with grounds, provisions, clothing, maintenance, &c., and that it never entered into the consideration of the Government to require that those articles which are called indulgences, and which are of the nature stated in the case laid before Mr. Batty and the Attorney-General, should be made the subject of an express enactment, and be imposed imperatively upon the master.

2760. Have you any objection to put in the remainder of the paragraph?—None at all. I intended to read it, and I have marked it, as you may see, with an observation as to the medicine, and a reference to the enactment, in compliance with Lord Stanley's suggestion: "But looking to the very loose terms in which they are couched, especially in respect of medical attendance in case of sickness, I think it right not to pass over this subject without reminding the Legislature, that as the interest of the master in the recovery of the sick apprentice, more especially towards the close of the period, will be much weaker than it would have been in the corresponding case of the slave, it may deserve consideration whether a proportionate strictness of legal obligation may not be desirable." Now, I have noted opposite to this, that this suggestion of Lord Stanley's was attended to, as the Committee will perceive in the enactment since made by the Jamaica Legislature, and which is to be found in page 283. It expressly imposes upon the master the obligation "of furnishing the same medical attention and care as had been heretofore customary, and that the negro should, in like manner, be subject to all such necessary sanatory restraint and control, as the medical attendant shall direct." I have no hesitation in stating, that even independently of that clause, the enactments which were contained in the former Act imposed upon the owner the obligation to provide requisite medical attendance for his slave, that I should have felt no hesitation in indicting a person for withholding necessary medical attendance, as much as I should have felt myself justified in indicting him for withholding necessary food or support; and if I had seen the clerk of the Crown between the last meeting of the Committee, I should have been able, perhaps, to have distinctly mentioned an instance where I had indicted a person for having neglected to provide requisite medical attendance for one of his negroes. The only objection, therefore, which is made by Lord Stanley, in commenting on the enactments of the slave law, as to the maintenance &c., of the negro, respects the medical attendance, and that was completely removed by the provision in the Act to which I have referred.

2761. The Committee observe, in page 283, that it is stated "that the apprenticed labourer, in sickness, shall receive the same medical care and attention as has heretofore been customary;" do you mean to say, that this clause of the Act has fulfilled the wish or expression of Lord Stanley, contained in the despatch?—I do mean to say that it has completely fulfilled it. With the exception of the case to which I have just referred, in which there was a prosecution, I had never heard, during the 20 years I was in Jamaica, a complaint respecting the neglect to afford proper medical attendance on any slave. I am quite satisfied, that if a such a neglect had occurred, it would have been treated as an indictable offence, and that the party would have been punished for it.

2762. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you think that the immediate pecuniary interests of the employer very obviously coincide, in this case, with the dictates of humanity and justice, under what you conceive to be the law?—Clearly so. During the continuance of the apprenticeship, the person entitled to the services of the apprentice has an interest that he should be in a state of bodily health to render those services effectively.

2763. Do you think that that consideration is materially weakened by the circumstance, that the negroes are for the most part under the care, not of their masters, but of intermediate persons?—Previously to the passing of the Act, I never saw any indisposition, but in the single instance I referred to, to provide requisite medical attendance. If such an indisposition should exist, the special magistrate has full authority to interpose, because it is impossible to read the clauses of the Abolition Act and not see that the special magistrate is directly required, upon all occasions, to enforce the obligations which attach upon the master towards the apprentice.

2764. The particular point to which the Committee meant to direct your attention was this, whether you thought that the managers were alive, as well as the employers, to that coincidence of the interest of the employer with the health of the apprentice?—I think quite so.

2766. How is the same medical care and attention which had been given in a state of slavery defined, because the objection that Lord Stanley makes seems to be to the loose terms in which the obligation was couched in the law; his objection does not appear to have been to the adequacy, but to the want of sufficient accuracy in the terms in which the law expressed the obligation?—I apprehend that the question in every case would be, whether medical attendance adequate to the state of health of the negro had been bestowed; I do not know how it is possible to define it. The adequacy or inadequacy of the medical assistance, assistance, in other words, the number of the medical practitioner's visits, the length of time he remained on the plantation, must necessarily depend upon the state of the disease of the patient. I am not aware of any language in which the enactment could be more explicit.

2767. Do you conceive that the test by which the special magistrate would now try the sufficiency, would be the previous custom during slavery of medical attendance and medical care?—Not merely the previous custom, but also the sufficiency of it with reference to the state of the negro in each case; the law would not be satisfied if it could be proved that, from the state of the negro's health, there was not sufficient medical attendance given him by the medical practitioner.

2768. Then you think that the effect of the law at present is to give the special magistrate the power to determine as to whether he has sufficient medical attendance?—Clearly so; the preamble to the 19th section is to this effect: "And for securing the effectual superintendence of the said apprenticed labourers and the execution of this Act, be it further enacted, that the Governor may, and is hereby empowered to issue, under the public seal of this island, special commissions to one or more person or persons, constituting him or them a justice or justices of the peace for the whole of the island, or for any parish, precinct, quarter or other district within the same, for the special purpose of giving effect to this present Act, and to any laws which may hereafter be made for giving more complete effect to the same, and every person to or in favour of whom any such commission may be issued, shall, by force and virtue thereof and without any other qualification, be entitled and competent to act as a justice of the peace within the limits prescribed by such his commission, for such special purposes as aforesaid but for no other purposes." Then comes the proviso, that the Governor may call a special committee; then comes clause 20: "That the special commissions as aforesaid (and no other magistrate or justice of the peace in the island) shall have, exercise and enjoy a sole and exclusive jurisdiction over, and shall solely and exclusively take cognizance of all offences committed or alleged to have been committed by any such apprenticed labourer, or by his or her employer, in such their relation to each other, or of the breach, violation or neglect of any of the obligations owed by them to each other, or of any question, matter or thing incident to or arising out of the relations subsisting between such apprenticed labourers and the persons respectively entitled to their services."

2769. Are the plantation hospitals open to the inspection of the special magistrates?—I never heard of hospitals upon an estate being closed against any magistrate; I should consider it an extremely suspicious circumstance if the manager upon an estate refused to let the special magistrate enter an hospital if he asked to do so.

2770. Do you think that by law the special magistrate has a right to insist upon visiting plantation hospitals, in order to see that this clause is carried into effect, and sufficient care and attention bestowed upon the apprentices?—I consider that the special magistrate would have a right to call before him the medical person who attended the estate, the person who had the care and the charge of the hot-house, and he would also call for the book which was kept in the hospital by the medical person, and in which his visits, prescriptions, and the state of the patient on each visit are entered by him; this book is kept in the hospital of every plantation.

2771. Do you conceive that there is any place in the estate to which the special magistrate has not a right to have access, for the purpose of seeing the apprenticed labourers who may be in that place at the time of his visit to the estate?—I apprehend there is no place upon the estate to which he might not, in the execution of his commission and for the discharge of his duties, resort to see the apprentices, whether in the hot-house or in their houses.

2772. Mr. Gladstone.] And you think further that a special magistrate has the power to summon parties before him with reference to the general welfare of the apprentices, without any particular complaints having been made before him by a particular party?—I think so.

2772*. In fact there he may be the initiatory in the proceeding?—I think so.

2773. Mr. Johnston.] Have you any recollection of the evidence given before the House of Lords, immediately before the abolition of slavery?—Yes; I had

24 June 1836.

I had not read the evidence for a considerable length of time, till I had my attention called to it on the last day of the Committee's meeting.

2774. Were Messrs. Baillie & Shand, who gave evidence before the Lords' Committee, experienced planters?—They were.

2775. The Committee would call your attention to two answers to questions that were put at the foot of page 149; will you be so good as to read them to the Committee?—The following is the passage in the evidence:—

“The remainder of the 365 days in the year the slave works exclusively for his owner, what other compensation has he for his labour than his hut and his clothing?—I observed before that there is no such thing, as a hut for residence in Jamaica now; he has his house, his clothes, his privilege of keeping his stock and feeding it upon his master's property, and during crop using the cane-tops for his pigs; his family have access to the boiling-house, and have the use of hot liquor during crop.—That is the half-made sugar, is it not?—It is before it comes to half; it is warm liquor, not syrup. Then he has a medical man to attend him, the use of an hospital and nurses when sick; the use of provision ground that costs me 15*l.* an acre; garden ground, in which there are fruit trees; meat and port wine provided when they are sick, and whatever other necessaries they may require, which are ordered by the doctor; blankets for the sick, salt fish at Christmas and at harvest-home; herrings once a-week; oatmeal, as I stated before, for the children; and a pot boiled every day in the year, with the exception of Sunday, for the children, when any adult negro may call for a mess, if he chooses; then in breaking in corn there is generally a proportion given to the gang.”

2776. Will you be so good as to turn to page 236 of the same evidence. This is the evidence of Mr. Shand; will you be so good as to read from the middle of the page?—

“What is the cost of clothing for each grown slave at present?—I have no reference to invoices, and may be mistaken; but I reckon that the herrings would come to 30*s.* per barrel, 10*s.* for each negro. An able negro gets upon my estate at least 12 yards of Osnaburghs,—I said 10 in my former evidence, but that is the average quantity I send out,—five yards of baize; a woman, five yards of long-ells, besides the allowance to men, a cap, a hat, a handkerchief, needles, thread, thimbles and scissors; they receive tools and pots when they have occasion for them, locks frequently. I have reckoned the Osnaburghs 6*s.* for each person; baize, 7*s.*; long-ells, 7*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.*; hat, cap, handkerchief, knife, &c., 1*s.*; comforts and medicines, 2*s.*; herrings, 10*s.*; salt, 1*s.*; locks and pots, 1*s.* on the average. I do not reckon supplies furnished in the island in the above, such as rice and flour.”

2778. Is there any difference, in reference to those allowances, between the law and the custom; and if so, will you be so good as to point it out?—None of those articles are enjoined to be given by the consolidated slave law, except such as may be considered to fall under the description of “ample and sufficient provision,” in that particular clause of the Act which refers to the case of the owner not being able to furnish grounds. With respect to all those things which are mentioned in the reasons of Mr. Shand and of Mr. Baillie, which they represent to have been prevalent upon the different estates in which they are concerned, they rest upon the foundation, not of there being a positive law enjoining those things to be given, but upon its being the custom of the proprietor to give them, but a custom which he may discontinue, and which he exercised the power of discontinuing.

2779. Will you be so good as to turn to page 235 of the same evidence, the last line but two?—The answer is as follows:

“Should a proprietor be under the necessity of abandoning his estate, would he still be liable to support whatever negroes might be at the time upon upon his estate?—He is obliged to support his negroes; he is obliged to import a certain portion of pickled fish, or something in the room of this article; I think a barrel for three negroes, great and small. I send out more than this quantity. He is obliged to furnish them with a certain quantity of clothing, and to have a specific proportion of good provisions as a reserve, in the event of drought or hurricane.”

Now, if it be intended by this expression to imply that there was any express law imposing this obligation, I distinctly state that Mr. Shand was mistaken; but he is speaking there of the obligation resulting from his considering that those are the things which he should give so long as the negroes conducted themselves well, and so long as he or any other proprietor was in a situation to be able to give them.

2780. Will you be so good as to read the next question?—

“ In case he should be obliged to abandon the cultivation, what would be done with the negroes?—He cannot abandon them; the law still remains in force.”

What law remains in force?

2781. Sir George Grey.] What was the legal obligation upon the owner of the slave; was it a general one, that he should make “ ample and sufficient provision ” for his negroes, or a particular one, prescribing certain articles of provision and clothing, and other things?—He was under the obligation imposed by the law, of furnishing “ ample and sufficient provision for his negroes,” but not under the obligation to furnish for them those particular articles. I have found no law imposing such an obligation upon him, and when the question is asked, “ In case he should be obliged to abandon the cultivation, what would be done with the negroes?” and the answer is given, “ He cannot abandon them; the law still remains in force;” what else is meant but that the consolidated slave law and all its provisions still remain in force, binding upon the owner; that although he should be unable to continue the cultivation of his estate, he is not discharged from providing for his slaves; he cannot leave them upon the community; the law obliged the owner to provide for his slaves, not because he was proprietor of a plantation, but because he was the owner of the slaves; he must provide not only for those in health and strength, but for those who were aged and infirm; and there is an express provision in the law upon the subject; the owner could not release himself from that.

2782. He might substitute other food for herrings, if that afforded an equally ample provision?—Clearly so; and when herrings were at a high price, it was utterly impossible for many proprietors to import them into Jamaica; and instead of herrings, they gave salt fish imported from the North American possessions.

2783. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you suppose that Mr. Shand means that the owner was bound by the law in as far as it related to making an ample provision?—Clearly so.

2784. Mr. Johnston.] Will you refer to the consolidated law of 1831; will you read the 11th clause?—

“ Be it enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that every master, owner or possessor of any slave or slaves, or his or her overseer or chief manager shall, under the penalty of 10*l.* for each neglect, cause the condition and the negro grounds to be inspected once in every month at least, in order to see that the same are cultivated and kept up in a proper manner, of which oath shall be made, as in this Act is hereafter directed: and whereas in some parts of this island there may not be lands proper for the cultivation of provisions, or where by reason of long continuance of dry weather or other casualty, the negro grounds may be rendered unproductive, then and in that case the masters, owners or possessors, do by some other ways and means make good and ample provision for all such slaves as they shall be possessed of, in order that they may be properly supported and maintained, under a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*”

2785. Was not the evidence given by Messrs. Baillie & Shand, an interpretation put upon the section of the Act which you have now read, by experienced planters, with regard to the terms “ an ample provision?”—I do not know what construction Mr. Baillie or Mr. Shand may have put upon that Act, but I am answerable only for my own construction of that Act. I do not know that they ever gave such a construction; I should hardly think that they could have given the construction that under these terms in the Act it was incumbent on the owner to provide those specific articles which are mentioned in their evidence.

24 June 1836.

2786. Mr. Gladstone.] Though Mr. Baillie and Mr. Shand, being planters of considerable experience, might be considered as good authority as planters in Jamaica, should you admit their authority as to the legal interpretation of the law, which must be determined by its own language and not by practice?—Certainly not.

2787. Mr. Johnston.] Who would have put an interpretation upon the terms here mentioned; what authorities in Jamaica would have put the right interpretation?—Those who are sworn to administer justice in any complaint made before them; that is, the local magistrates, before the exclusive cognizance of anything respecting apprentices was committed to the special magistrates; and in case of any neglect or breach of duty by the local magistrates, then the supreme court and assize court.

2788. But in the face of the terms to which the Committee have called your attention, “good and ample provision,” is it your opinion that the allowances could have been conceived as customary, and not as legal?—I retain the opinion I have before expressed, that those allowances, both as to quality and as to quantity, and as to the time when they might be delivered, and as to the continued enjoyment of them, have no one character which may entitle the negro to insist upon receiving them as a matter of right; that is my construction of the law of Jamaica. I will state, that during the 20 years that I was in Jamaica, I never heard complaints made of a negro being in want of adequate maintenance and support. Lord Stanley tells you, in his despatch, that no such instance had been found in the Colonial Office.

2789. But then is it not a fact, according to your own knowledge, that previous to the abolition of slavery, the negroes received all the allowances which have been stated by Messrs. Baillie & Shand?—Not uniformly. Many of the articles mentioned by them were sent out as part of the supplies to the colony; for instance, scissors and knives, and thread and needles, for the purpose of making up their clothing, are considered as falling under the description of clothing; but there are other articles which are sent by some of the proprietors, but not by others.

2790. Chairman.] Do you conceive that without those allowances the negro is clothed and fed in an adequate manner?—The clothing, of course, the owner is obliged to furnish; he is required to furnish it by the express provisions of the law; the question refers to various other things, such as salt fish, herrings and several other articles.

2791. But do you consider with respect to food, that if the allowance is stopped, the negro would be sufficiently and properly provided with food?—He has his ground, which is in point of extent adequate, not only for a supply quite abundant for himself, but would furnish him with the means of going to market, and of buying those particular articles; the grounds are of ample extent; the negro population throughout the whole island of Jamaica received negro grounds, affording them the means by which they could provide themselves with all those articles. I would say this, that no person who had local knowledge of the colony of Jamaica, and of the state of the population there, and whose notions were not derived from his experience of the small colony in which he had been accustomed to live, would put questions implying a doubt of the sufficiency of the maintenance and provision which the negro population of Jamaica would derive even from the grounds which are allowed to them.

2792. Sir George Grey.] Setting aside anything which does not rest upon strict legal right, what does the law require the employer to furnish the apprentice with?—The Jamaica Abolition Act adopts the terms of the 11th clause of the English Act; it enacts, that during the continuance of the apprenticeship “the person entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer shall be and is hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance and such other maintenance and allowances as by an Act, intituled, ‘An Act for the Government of Slaves,’ now in force in this island, an owner is required to supply to and for any slave being of the same age and sex as any such apprenticed labourer shall be.” The 12th clause enacts, that the master shall “once in every year provide and give to each slave they shall be possessed of, proper and sufficient clothing, to be approved of by the justices justices and vestry of the parish where such master, owner or possessor of such slave shall reside." The 13th clause requires "That every master, owner, proprietor or possessor of slaves, his or her overseer or chief manager, at their giving in an account of their slaves and stock to the justices and vestry on the 28th day of March in every year, or at the vestry which shall be held next after that day, shall, under a penalty not exceeding 20*l.* for every neglect, give in an account on oath of the nature and quantity of clothing actually served to each slave on such plantation, pen or other settlement, for the approbation of the justices and vestry as aforesaid, and shall likewise at the same time declare on oath, that he has inspected or caused to be inspected the negro grounds (where such negro grounds are allotted) of such plantation, pen or settlement according to the directions of this Act, and that every negro on the property has been allowed 26 days during the preceding twelve months, as directed by the 8th clause of this Act, and is sufficiently provided with grounds, or where there are no negro grounds, such ample provision as hereinbefore directed." Then I turn to the 17th, which is that which provides, and which is the explanation which may be given of that part of Mr. Shand's evidence with respect to the ability of the owner to discharge himself from the obligation to provide for his negroes, "That no master, owner or possessor of any slave or slaves, whether in his or her own right, or as attorney, guardian, trustee, executor or otherwise, shall discard or turn away any such slave or slaves on account or by reason of such slave or slaves being rendered incapable of labour or service to such master, owner or possessor, by means of sickness, age or infirmity, nor wilfully permit any diseased slave to go at large and travel about; but every such master, owner or possessor as aforesaid, shall be and he is hereby obliged to keep all such slave or slaves upon his, her or their properties, and to find and provide him, her or them with sufficient clothing, and wholesome necessaries of life, and not suffer such slave or slaves to wander about," under certain penalties. Then in clause 51, is a direction respecting the manner in which they are to be supplied when they are admitted to the workhouse, and where of course they cannot have the benefit of their grounds: "That the keeper of every workhouse or gaol in this island shall, under the penalty of 10*l.* for every neglect, provide and give to every slave confined in such workhouse or gaol, a sufficient quantity of good and wholesome provisions daily; that is to say, not less than one quart of unground Guinea or Indian corn, or three pints of the flour or meal of either, or three pints of wheat flour, or eight full grown plantains, or eight pounds of cocoas or yams, and also one herring or shad, or other salted provisions equal thereto; and shall also, under the like penalty, provide and supply every slave confined as aforesaid with good and sufficient clothing where necessary." Those are the different clauses in the consolidated Slave Act imposing an obligation upon the master to provide requisite food, clothing and maintenance for his negroes.

2793. With reference to those clauses of that Act, and to the clauses of the Jamaica Act, 45 to 48, do you conceive that any provision made for the apprentices, which is not good and ample, would be a compliance with the strictest letter of the law now in force?—Clearly not.

2794. Do you think that it is possible that the law can sanction any provision which is not ample?—Clearly not.

2795. Who is the judge of that provision?—The special magistrate, under the two clauses of the Abolition Act, which I have read, is to determine upon that sufficiency. I refer particularly to those clauses, because there seems to have been a misapprehension respecting the exclusive cognizance which the justices and vestry would have of the provision which was made for old and infirm apprentices; it seems to be supposed that the special magistrate would not have cognizance of the sufficiency of that provision, but it will be found, on reference to those clauses, that the special magistrate has the sole and exclusive cognizance of the breach or violation or neglect of any of the obligations owed by them to each other. Now, if it be an obligation, as it clearly is, by the abolition law, to provide ample and sufficient clothing and provision, not merely for the apprentices in health, but for those that are aged and infirm, a violation of that obligation, whatever may have been the decision of the justices and vestry, falls under the exclusive cognizance of the special magistrate, so that you have not only the check of the justices and vestry in the first instance, but if they come to a wrong conclusion, you have the judgment of the special magistrate, determining, whatever may have been their decision, whether it is sufficient or not.
0.58. magistrate,

2796. Mr. Gladstone.] Previous to the abolition of slavery, did it belong to the magistrates to determine what clothing was ample and sufficient?—Yes.

2797. Do you conceive, since the abolition of slavery, that it still devolves upon the magistrates and vestry to determine what clothing is ample and sufficient, and that the special magistrate has only the ministerial office of enforcing their award, or that it now belongs to the special magistrate to determine, in the first instance, what clothing is ample and sufficient?—I am quite clear that the special magistrate has a perfectly independent cognizance of the sufficiency of the provision; but I do not think it clear that that question might not have been under the previous decision of the justices and vestry, because it might be extremely difficult to lay down any general rule as to the extent of provision grounds or the reasonableness of the distance; and that therefore all those things might, with great advantage, fall under the previous inquiry and decision of justices and vestry; if they come to a wrong decision, it is perfectly competent for the special magistrate to determine that that is a wrong decision, and though they have reported the provision to be ample and sufficient, when in fact it is not so, the special magistrate had full cognizance of the question, and his decision may be wholly independent of and directly the reverse of that of the justices and vestry. I do not conceive that under the terms of this Act the special magistrate is bound at all to consider whether it has been under the cognizance of the local magistrates.

2798. In the last resort, the special magistrate is absolutely the judge of the ample sufficiency?—Clearly the only judge; in fact the other could only be a direction to the party.

2799. Mr. Johnston.] Do you consider that the special magistrate then has the power to order the old allowances to be given to the apprentices?—I do not consider that he has the power to order the old allowances to be given, for the reason that I have stated, that I do not consider that those allowances could be claimed as matter of right; but if he saw that there was any insufficiency in the provision which was supplied by the master, he would be entitled to call for that provision being made up by him.

2800. Then you intend to convey the impression that the old allowances were more than what was amply sufficient?—I do consider them so.

2801. Did it belong to the magistrates and vestry to determine the clothing under the old law?—"Justices and vestry," under the language of that clause I have read, had cognizance of the sufficiency of provision grounds and of clothing, but if you mean to ask whether their decision was final, I say under the old law it was not.

2802. Were there not vestrymen who were not justices?—Clearly so; they must be freeholders, but they might not be magistrates.

2803. Was it a conjoint board of justices and vestrymen?—Yes; I have not immediately before me the Act which regulates the appointment of justices and vestry, so as to state the exact number of justices who must be present to constitute a legal board, but clearly there must be a certain number of justices at the vestry.

2804. In what manner can the special magistrate enforce his adjudication as to allowances?—The Act has provided the different penalties which are incurred by the party, who should make default in supplying the apprentice with that provision which, in the opinion of the special magistrate, was adequate and satisfactory.

2805. Sir George Grey.] What are those penalties; are they penalties comprized in the 45th to the 48th clauses of the first Jamaica Act?—Yes, beginning at 45 and continuing to 49; then the 49th clause directs "That all complaints made by any apprenticed labourer against the person entitled to his or her services, touching any fraud practised, or refusal to furnish any such apprenticed labourer with sufficiency of provision ground, or of other means of maintenance and support in cases where such apprentice hath no provision ground, or of illegally and improperly withholding from such apprentice any portion of the time allowed him or her to cultivate such ground, or of imposing task-work on any apprenticed labourer, contrary to the provisions of this Act, or of breach of any contract on the part of any person engaging the voluntary services of any apprenticed labourer, or of any cruelty, injustice or other wrong or injury done to to or inflicted upon any apprenticed labourer by the person entitled to his or her services, shall be heard, adjudged and determined before any one more special justice or justices, and he or they is or are empowered to punish any offender in any of these respects last-mentioned, with a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, and for default of goods and chattels whereon to levy such fine, the offender shall be committed to gaol until he or she shall pay or satisfy the same, but such imprisonment shall not exceed five days, provided that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or taken to bar or destroy the right of any apprenticed labourer to proceed in the supreme or assize courts or the courts of quarter session, or common pleas, for any wrong or injury done to or committed against his or her property or person." I would take the liberty of mentioning here, in answer to the question as to the manner in which this clause would be enforced, that the 45th clause enables a special magistrate, in case there has not been ground adequate both in quality and quantity for the support of the apprentice, or if it be not of reasonable distance from his or her place of abode, to subject the party who is bound to furnish such grounds to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* for each offence; but as it would be a continuous offence, there would be a series of penalties amounting to a very large sum, and the Committee will find the same observation equally apply to other penalties.

2806. Mr. Johnston.] To whom do the penalties accrue?—The clause in the Act states the appropriation of the penalties.

2807. The Committee will call your attention to clause 68, in page 282?—Yes, they are appropriated to the use of the island, and I will take the liberty of referring to the observation which Lord Sligo made upon that subject; that was one of the subjects to which Lord Stanley called the attention of Lord Sligo. Lord Stanley in the despatch, dated 20th February 1834, refers to this: "The 68th clause directs that these fines shall be applied to the use of the public of the island; as the Act has provided that the apprentice should compensate by labour the loss which his employer may sustain from indolence, neglect, non-performance of work or absence, it seems but reasonable that the special magistrate should have the power of compensating out of the fine the apprentice for the injury which he may have sustained from his employer; and I think that a clause should be introduced to that effect." Now here is Lord Sligo's answer to this observation, upon that which is called the eighth objection: "With respect to the eighth objection, the House of Assembly at once negatived any amendment, and I hope that on mature consideration you will have no reason to regret this. I must confess that were I an independent member of the legislature, I should not have consented to remove it. I am confident that where the character of the negro is known, it must be thought that it would not be an expedient alteration; at all events, it is not my fault that it was not altered."

2808. Then in fact the alteration has not been made?—That alteration has not been made.

2809. Has the special justice any other authority now than the three justices had under the 12th clause of the Act of 1831, regarding clothing?—By the 16th clause the law transfers to the special magistrate the duty of ascertaining whether the obligation imposed on the owner of providing clothing has been discharged by him, and of punishing him in case it has not been discharged; this is the effect of the two clauses, the 19th and 20th.

2810. The question is, as to any additional power conferred upon the special magistrate to that which the three justices had under the 12th clause of the consolidation Act of 1831; that Act being alluded to in the 16th clause of the Act which you have quoted, what is the language in the 16th clause as to clothing?—That clause commits to the special magistrate that duty which previously to the Abolition Act had devolved on the justices and vestry.

2811. Does the 16th clause do more than continue the obligation on the employer to provide the same amount of clothing for the apprentice which he had hitherto been bound to do for the slave?—No, I apprehend not.

2812. Sir George Grey.] Suppose the case of an apprentice complaining to a special justice of insufficiency of clothing, how can the special justice under the existing code proceed?—He would exercise an original jurisdiction upon the subject, quite exclusive of that which the justices and vestry might have done.

2813. Supposing that he were of opinion that it was inefficient, but the justices and vestry had certified it to be sufficient, could he punish the master for not providing sufficient clothing?—I conceive that he could.

24 June 1836.

2814. Under what clause of this Act?—Under the 19th and 20th clauses. The 20th clause gives to the several justices of peace having special commission the sole and exclusive jurisdiction over “all offences committed or alleged to have been committed by any such apprenticed labourer, or by his or her employer in such their relation to each other, or of the breach, violation or neglect of any of the obligations owed by them to each other, or of any question, matter or thing incident to or arising out of the relations subsisting between such apprenticed labourers and the persons respectively entitled to their services; provided that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to abrogate or take away the powers by law vested in the supreme courts of record, or to the superior courts of civil and criminal justice in this island.”

2815. You think that clause would give him jurisdiction in the case which has been put?—Yes.

2816. What clause would give him the power of imposing a specific penalty?—The 49th.

2817. You think the case which has been put would be that of “wrong or injury done to the apprenticed labourer?”—Yes.

2818. Which the special magistrate might punish the master for?—Yes, clearly; I have not a doubt about it. “Any wrong or injury done to or inflicted upon any apprenticed labourer by the person entitled to his or her services shall be heard, adjudged and determined before any one or more special justice or justices.” I have not the slightest doubt that, under the 49th clause, notwithstanding all the justices and vestry should have certified upon the subject of clothing, the special magistrate has the sole and exclusive cognizance to consider that wrong or injury.

2820. From your own experience were the allowances alluded to by Messrs. Baillie & Shand general throughout the island of Jamaica?—I do not profess to have any experience of the internal management of estates; my professional and official occupations did not afford me time for visiting many estates. I would much rather that you would obtain information as to the details connected with estates from planters who are in this country. My belief is that those allowances were very generally given, but that there were times when they were, in fact, withheld. The question under the law would really be, whether the apprentice had sufficient grounds and provisions; whether he had adequate and sufficient maintenance, clothing, &c.

2821. Did you ever know any case where the allowance of herrings was withheld?—Certainly, there are continual instances in which, in consequence of the high price, herrings have been withheld, and there are as many estates in which herrings are not given, as those in which they are.

2822. And in those cases was any substitute given?—Salt fish, I have stated in a former answer, was sometimes given and sometimes not.

2823. Will you turn to the evidence of Mr. Shand, in page 188, commencing “How many properties were you concerned for?” will you be so good as to read that?—[Witness reads].—

“How many properties were you concerned for?—I was concerned at one time for upwards of 100 properties of different descriptions, and upwards of 60 sugar estates.”

2824. Sir George Grey.] Have you any knowledge of Mr. Shand personally?—Perfectly.

2825. Are you aware of his having had the management of many estates?—A great many. I suppose that he has had the management of that number, from the answer he gives.

2826. Mr. Johnston.] You read from the evidence of Mr. Shand, that he was concerned for 100 estates in Jamaica, and upwards of 60 which were sugar estates?—That appears in Mr. Shand's evidence.

“ Out of 20,000 slaves I was then concerned for, I cannot be expected to give the names of the families.”

2828. Chairman.] Have you any observations to make to the Committee upon the subject of the provision grounds of the negroes?—In the observations which I have already made respecting the allowances, I have adverted to the negro grounds. There is, however, a remark which I have to make on a statement to be found in Mr. Jeremie's paper; it is a comment upon clause 48, it is the second paragraph in page 20 in this paper. Mr. Jeremie says, “ Section 48, provides that where the grounds hitherto appropriated to the negro are ‘ unproductive,’ the master may withdraw them, provided he consents to make good and ample provision by some other way and means. Ought the bountiful rewards of Providence on the negro's private toil, with all the civil advantages derivable from the acquired habits arising out of fairly compensated labour, to be thus arbitrarily withdrawn? And if so, by whom, under the wording of this Act, is the adequacy of this substituted provision to be decided; by the special magistrate or his master? Then follows a proviso, ‘ That in such case no diminution of the 45 hours, as hereinbefore mentioned, shall take place.’ This enactment, therefore, leaves the negro in such cases, with regard to the four hours and a half said to have been secured to him, entirely at the manager's discretion.” It is with reference to the first part of this statement that I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the enactment itself, because it does seem to me that, without meaning any offence to the gentleman who wrote this paper, there is a singular misapprehension of this enactment and of its object,—a misapprehension which I should have scarcely thought it possible could have entered the mind of any one. It could not have been made unless there had been the impression on the mind of the writer that there was to be a presumption against the bonâ fide of the Jamaica Legislature that this Act of the Jamaica Legislature was not intended to fulfil the provisions of the Abolition Act. The preamble of the clause of the Jamaica Slave Act is omitted in Mr. Jeremie's statement. It was impossible to have stated it, and at the same time retain his observation. I now read the preamble: “ And whereas in certain parts of this island there may not be lands proper for the cultivation of provisions, or by reason of long continuance of dry weather or other casualty the grounds hitherto appropriated for negro grounds may be rendered unproductive; be it enacted, that in such case the master, owner or other person, entitled to the services of such apprenticed labourer, shall by some other ways and means make good and ample provision for all such apprenticed labourers, to whose services they shall be entitled, in order that they may be properly supported and maintained, under a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for each offence.” Now, this is the clause which is supposed to justify an observation in Mr. Jeremie's paper, which implies that this clause had been introduced for the express purpose of furnishing a pretext for the master to withhold from the negro those grounds which had been previously allowed to him. What is really the object of this clause? why, that instead of the negro being obliged to retain grounds which, from the length of time they have been in possession, or from other causes, may not be sufficiently productive, the master shall be obliged again to furnish him with other grounds, or an ample and sufficient provision; that the master shall not excuse himself from doing so by alleging that he had already allotted grounds which he deemed sufficient. Mr. Jeremie's paper represents this as “ arbitrarily withdrawing grounds, to the prejudice of the negro.” It is a provision introduced for the benefit of the negro, and for the express purpose of preventing him from sustaining any loss or prejudice from any casualty rendering that land which had been granted unproductive. Now, I do say that that statement could not have been made if the writer, in spite of his struggle against good feeling and good sense, had not been overpowered by the stronger feeling of prejudice against the Legislature of Jamaica. I would put my finger upon that clause as containing evidence of the intention of the Jamaica Legislature to remove every possible pretext of its being urged, as it might have been urged, that however ample and sufficient the grounds originally allotted allotted to him were, they had ceased to be so, and he was then injured. "Who is to judge of this; who is to determine whether this obligation has been faithfully performed?" The special magistrate. This clause cannot come into operation but at the instance of the negro, and where it is his direct interest to avail himself of it, namely, where the grounds originally allotted to him had ceased to furnish a sufficient provision. It is only in this case that the necessity for furnishing other grounds or provisions could arise. I think the answers given by the witness show the utter impossibility, in a colony like Jamaica, of fixing the minimum of land which should be allotted to the negro as his grounds, or of fixing the particular distance at which those grounds should be from the place of his accustomed residence. It may be practicable in a very small colony, and where there were no inequalities of soil and situation, but it would be quite impossible, in a colony like Jamaica, to fix it; it might be attended with the greatest possible injury to the negro if any one definite rule were laid down as to what should be the smallest possible quantity of ground allotted to him. But then it is supposed that you may lay down some general rule applicable to the particular parishes. You could not even do that, because I could name parishes in the island of Jamaica in which there would be a different rule applicable to different parts of that parish. I confess that I am quite unable to suggest any mode by which the Legislature, without injustice to the negro, could have defined with certainty the least possible allowance of negro land to be given in any case to the negro. It must necessarily be left to the superintending control which the special magistrate exercises, under the authority vested in him by the Abolition Acts.

2829. Chairman.] How would fixing a minimum act in any case unfavourably to the negro?—In one particular situation, three acres of land would not be equal to one acre in another situation; there is a great variety of soils. In the districts of the coffee settlements, there would be found land so rocky as to have an allowance made on that account. Again, in other places, the grounds which may be allotted to negroes may be, from having been long applied to that purpose, not so productive as one-sixth.

2830. Does not that argument rather go against fixing a maximum quantity of land, than to there being a minimum quantity fixed?—I took that very much from the suggestion which was made by a witness in the course of his evidence; he says, "At all events there should be some quantity."

2831. Is your objection to a minimum quantity of land fixed, of this nature; that it would probably act as a guide in fixing the quantity of land to the negro, and thus, in many cases, might act disadvantageously to him?—I think that this would be the natural tendency of it. Supposing this case, that the Legislature had said that every proprietor should allot three acres of land as provision grounds to his negro, that might be perfectly abundant in one parish or in one part of the parish, and ten miles off it might not be enough, and the difficulty would be in any legislative enactment to adopt a specific quantity, which should be equally sufficient in all parts of the island.

2832. That would be clearly a very bad principle; but do you think that there would be any practical evil arising from fixing as the minimum that quantity of land which, under the most favourable circumstances, would be sufficient for the provision ground of the negro?—How are you to try that minimum quantity? Must not each case be still a question, whether the circumstances are so favourable as to justify so small a quantity being allowed? If there be not a consideration for the particular circumstances of each case, the quantity fixed as the minimum on one spot may in another be wholly ruinous to the negro.

2833. If adhered to?—Yes.

2834. Could not the special magistrate prevent the principle of minimum being thus applied injuriously to the negro?—If the Legislature had prescribed a certain quantity of land which should be allotted to the negro, the special magistrate would have nothing more to do than to see that it was given.

2835. Mr. Gladstone.] Supposing that a minimum was fixed, and supposing the case of poor land in which that minimum would be insufficient, would the special magistrate be more likely to do justice to the negro upon a minimum being fixed against the master, than he would be if there were no minimum affixed at all?—No; the difficulty would be if it were fixed. If the exact quantity be not fixed, I take it that every special magistrate has the right to see whether whether, with due regard to the sterility of the soil and other circumstances, that particular quantity of ground is sufficient for the negro, and I think it is better for the negro than to have prescribed a definite quantity. I really believe that that would be the feeling of any practical man in Jamaica, who was asked the question. I am quite sure that it is thus left by the law, not with a view to any particular advantage to the proprietor, but rather with a consideration for the interest of the negro himself.

2836. Sir Stratford Canning.] Do you think that would be the case if the negro should have a certain quantity of land, upon the supposition of its being of such a price, and if the special magistrate, upon inquiry, might make the quantity vary, according to the value of the land?—I do not think so. You only introduce another criterion, or rather the same criterion under another name, for determining whether the allotments be equal. I do not think it would afford a greater security to the negro than that he now has: the special magistrate has now to look at every thing which enters into the question, whether the allotment is or is not sufficient for the negro; he is unfettered as to the amount, the value and quantity, and every thing else; he has to gain all the evidence in his power, to see whether a sufficient provision can be raised upon those grounds. I think, with great submission, that it is left in a position much more advantageous to the negro as it now stands, than if there were any attempt to prescribe either value or quantity.

2838. Mr. Gladstone.] From what you know of Trinidad, do you think that any such great inequalities of soil exist there as exist in Jamaica?—From what I know of Trinidad, there are not such inequalities of land there; the system may be feasible there, but if it were adopted in Jamaica you would have the whole negro population in arms, because in a great variety of instances the quantity would not be sufficient for them.

2840. Mr. Gladstone.] Are the negroes in the habit of growing plantains in Jamaica largely for their own consumption?—Yes, in all situations where the soil is suited for plantains; the plantain is one of the articles they also raise for sale at the market and to the proprietors.

2841. Are not plantains an exhausting production to the soil?—Very much so.

2842. Therefore may they not require change of provision grounds on that account?—No doubt.

2843. Mr. Johnston.] Would you have any objection to its being made the duty of the special magistrate to fix the minimum quantity and the maximum distance distance without waiting for any complaint by the apprenticed labourer?—I think the objection would still exist which I have already pointed out, that what might be very proper for a minimum quantity to-day may become this time twelve-month not sufficient; and when I know that if the negro is not supplied with sufficient provision, he can at once make his complaint to the special magistrate and at once obtain redress, I think it is better, with the view of promoting kind feelings between the master and apprentice, that you should not impose upon the special magistrate more duties ex officio than are indispensably necessary. I do not, as I have already stated, consider that the interest of the negro requires that the interposition of the special magistrate to fix the minimum of grounds should take place. If the ground be insufficient, the apprentice can at once apply to the special magistrate for redress, and that would be afforded him; it would be a gratuitous and an unnecessary intrusion and interference of the special magistrate upon the property, which might and ought to be avoided, because the object could be attained without that.

24 June 1836.

2844. Do you think that there could be much objection, and that there would be any great intrusion in the special magistrate declaring what should be the minimum quantity and maximum distance in any given situation, leaving it to the planter to give as much additional ground as he chose?—I have stated my objection to it; I do not think that it would answer, even for the negro.

2845. Sir George Grey.] Would it not be necessary in that case for the negro to make a complaint, if an injury had been done to him by an insufficient allotment, and he required redress?—Exactly so. I have adverted to the evidence with respect to medical attendance, given by Dr. Madden. I collect the tendency of his evidence to be, that it was not in the power of medical men in the colony of Jamaica to bestow sufficient attendance upon estates; and he adverted particularly to the allowance which was made to those medical men for their attendance. I will state this, which did not seem to have fallen within the observation of Dr. Madden, that besides the allowance of so much for every negro on the estate, whether in health or sickness, to the medical man, he is bound to attend upon the estate whenever he is sent for, and to remain on the estate, in cases which require his constant personal attendance, the whole night he does so; that besides that allowance which I have mentioned, he is paid for all surgical operations which are performed; and, generally speaking, the medical men in the country reside in so central a situation, that they have an opportunity of visiting the estates, not merely once a week, as is supposed, but that there are few estates in which it is not required that, whether there are persons sick or not, the medical man should visit the estate, sometimes four and sometimes three times a week. I am not aware that it is a correct representation of the state of medical attendance in Jamaica, to describe it as at all insufficient. The diseases which are incident to a tropical climate are comparatively very few; and the medical men in Jamaica, as far as my observation has gone, are persons fully equal to the trust which has been committed to them. The same medical man who attends the negroes on a plantation, attends the proprietor, attorney or manager, if he is sick.

2846. Chairman.] In the event of the medical man being required to remain the whole night upon the estate, would he receive any extra remuneration for that?—No.

2847. Mr. Johnston.] Do you mean these observations as to the medical attendance to apply to the law, or to the present practice?—To both. The law requires that the proper medical attendance should be supplied, and the practice, as far as my own observation went, was, that there was proper medical attendance.

2848. In those observations you alluded to Dr. Madden?—I rather think that it is in Dr. Madden's evidence alone that the allusion is made to the character of medical men in Jamaica.

2849. Have you given your evidence as acquainted with the present practice?—I have given my evidence with reference to the practice as it existed where it fell under my own personal knowledge; and I am not aware that in that space of time the character and qualification of the medical men have altered.

2850. You do not mean your evidence to apply to the present practice?—Not to my personal knowledge of the present practice; but I mean that my observations should convey my belief that the present practice has not deviated from that which existed in the island of Jamaica when I was on it; I have no objection, upon a question of that kind, to pledge my belief that the practice is the same.

2851. Sir Stratford Canning.] Is that impression stated by you founded upon any positive information, or upon an ignorance of any change having taken place?—Upon an ignorance of any change having taken place, and my knowledge that there are many of the medical men remaining in Jamaica now who were there when I resided in that colony.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

Captain William Oldrey, called in; and Examined.

Captain W. Oldrey.
28 June 1836.

2852. Chairman.] YOU are an officer in the navy?—I am a commander in His Majesty's navy.

2853. Were you one of the special magistrates appointed for Jamaica?—I was.

2854. When did you go there in that capacity?—I left England in October 1833, and arrived in Jamaica on the 4th of December in the same year, and in March I was appointed a local magistrate to St. Elizabeth and also to Manchester.

2855. How long did you continue to perform the duties of a special magistrate in Jamaica?—My duties commenced on the 1st of August 1834, and I continued till the 20th of April following.

2856. Mr. Gladstone.] How were you occupied during the interval; you arrived on the 4th of December, had you any official duty to perform till the 1st of August 1834?—I had.

2857. Of what nature?—I was employed in most parts of the parish where there were apprentices, from forty and upwards in number, for the purpose of reading the different proclamations from Lord Mulgrave and from Lord Sligo, and to explain the law; I did all I possibly could to prepare the negro mind for the new state that they were about to enter into.

2858. Were you also employed in making yourself acquainted with the general circumstances and condition of the negro population?—I was.

2859. In what parishes were you?—St. Elizabeth.

2860. Was your experience confined to St. Elizabeth?—Principally.

2861. Mr. Buxton.] Are there many sugar estates in St. Elizabeth?—There are a great number.

2862. Then your experience was principally directed to the negroes in those districts where there was a good deal of sugar cultivation?—I should have added breeding pens for cattle, likewise sugar, coffee, pimento, ginger and other colonial produce.

2863. Chairman.] Is it a very large parish?—Very large.

2864. Do you know the extent of the parish?—I do, its extreme is about thirty-six miles from north to south, and about thirty-two from east to west.

2865. Do you know how many apprentices there were in that parish?—Between eighteen and twenty thousand, I believe.

2866. Do you know how many plantations there were?—I cannot exactly recollect the number, there were a great number.

2867. Mr. Buxton.] What were the circumstances which led to your resignation?—I found the duties too onerous, that was one reason. Secondly, the salary was not equal to the expense that was entailed upon me, even for travelling expenses. The third, ill health; and the fourth, from the persecution that I met with.

2868. From whom?—One in particular was Mr. Mason.

2869. Was

Captain W. Oldrey.

2869. Was that persecution from the planters or from the Governor?—From the planters.

2870. Mr. Gladstone.] When you say that you found the duties too onerous, are the Committee to understand that you mean that they were too onerous with reference to the weak state of your own health or beyond the average strength of men in general?—Beyond the strength of any man.

2871. Mr. Burton.] What were the circumstances that you allude to when you say that you were exposed to persecution?—Several actions were commenced by Mr. Mason against me for trespass, that trespass arose from my having issued a summons or summonses for his apprentices to appear before a court that was ordered by the Governor, and further, in consequence of my having brought his conduct before the public tribunals.

2872. Proceed, if you please, to state the circumstances which led to your resignation, as to the circumstances of persecution to which you have been exposed.—Mr. Mason commenced various actions against me; fourteen I was threatened with at first, which, I believe, were condensed ultimately into three; one for 2,000*l.*, a second for 2,000*l.*, a third for 5,000*l.* currency, all for alleged injuries that he sustained by that trespass.

2874. At what time?—About the 12th of August 1834. I had also received complaints from one of his apprentices, that they had neither medicine nor medical attendance; that they had not their legal clothing, and that one of the apprentices would die, unless medical attendance was given to her. On my going upon the property, on the 20th of August, I intended to have sworn in the constables; I asked Mr. Mason for a Bible, and he handed me a bundle of leaves, apparently in Hebrew; it might have been a small part of a Hebrew Bible or Hebrew Testament for aught I know; he said it contained a part of the Holy Scriptures. I told him it was not sufficient to have a part, but that I must have the whole. He then gave me a small duodecimo volume in Greek, one of the Greek poets, I believe. I told him, “that I could not swear his constables on a profane work.” He said, “that it was immaterial; that it would do.” I told him, “that it might do for him, but it would not do for me.” Mr. Mason was a local magistrate at the time, and I told him, that as a magistrate, I was surprised at his offering me a work of the kind; the consequence was, that I could not swear in his constables, neither could I try his people, not having a Bible with me.

2875. Mr. Gladstone.] He refused to produce any other?—He had not a Bible in the house, which is not a very uncommon thing either in that country.

2876. Excepting this Hebrew Bible?—It was a bundle of leaves; he told me that it was a part of the Holy Scriptures; probably it might have been one of the books of Leviticus; I do not understand Hebrew; it was a loose bundle of leaves.

2877. Mr. Johnston.] What were you requiring at that time; did you require a New Testament or the whole Scriptures?—I required the whole Scriptures to swear the apprentices upon; I should have preferred having the Bible and Testament together, because many of the apprentices may not be altogether thorough Christians; they may believe in a God only, and therefore I preferred the Bible and Testament collected together, and I used to carry one with me in general; but on that day I had left it at home.

2878. Then it was your usual practice to use the whole Scriptures?—I had a Bible and Testament, which I used to carry with me.

2879. Mr. Burton.] And you did not like to swear the apprentices upon a Greek poet?—No.

2880. Chairman.] How do you know that it was a Greek poet?—Seeing what I took to be epistles at the top of it, and seeing that it was not in the form of a Testament or a Bible either.

2881. Do you know Greek sufficiently to know that it was not a Greek Testament?—I thought it was not, and I am convinced that it was not.

2882. Do you know Greek sufficiently to say?—I only know some of the characters; Mr. Mason did not pretend that it was a Bible.

2883. Did you ask the question of Mr. Mason, "Is this a Testament, or another book?"—I said, "This is certainly one of the Greek poets," and he did not deny it. Captain W. Oldrey.

2884. Mr. Gladstone.] Did you see from the way in which the lines were written, that the book was in poetry and not in prose?—I merely saw the characters at the top, which I took notice of, and I could not make out anything in the shape of one of the Evangelists, neither Matthew, Mark, Luke or John, or any thing of the kind.

2885. Did you see "Epistle" written at the top of the page?—I thought it was; but it might have been Aristophanes, or one of the Greek plays; he never denied that it was a Greek poet.

2886. Mr. Buxton.] But you are sure that it was in Greek, and he admitted it was not a copy of the Scriptures?—He seemed to agree with me when I told him that it was not the Scriptures.

2887. Chairman.] Did he distinctly admit to you, that this was not the New Testament?—When I objected to it, he did not say, "This is the Holy Scriptures, Captain Oldrey; if you are not acquainted with Greek, I can tell you that this is the New Testament;" but, on the contrary, he said, "Anything will do;" I replied, "No, it will not do for me."

2888. Mr. Buxton.] Proceed with the other circumstances which took place?—A poor woman named Sarah Williams presented herself before me.

2889. Mr. Gladstone.] What is the name of the property?—Content Hall pen, St. Elizabeth. She complained to me that her mother was lying very ill; that she had neither medicine nor medical attendance, nor nourishment, nor any one to take care of her; and that on one of these days, on her return home from the field, she was sure she should find her dead. All the time that she was making this complaint she was crying, she wept bitterly. During the time she was making this complaint a scream announced the death of her mother, and I never witnessed such a scene in my life; the women joined in her cries, and the men drooped their heads; I never witnessed so much grief depicted on the countenances of so many people, for the loss of an individual to whom most of them were not at all related or connected, in my life.

2890. Were there many present?—All, I believe, belonging to the property; I should think so; I presume they were ordered up.

2891. Were you close to the place where the mother lay?—I went afterwards to the place where she lay.

2892. You said that the scream was heard which announced her death?—Yes; some one left the hut in which the mother died, and came rushing towards the place where the apprentices were, and where I was hearing the complaint, and cried out that "Granny (the old woman) was dead."

2893. Can you mention the name?—Tabitha Hewitt.

2894. Are you aware what her age was?—Very old, between 70 and 80, I think. I told Mr. Mason that it was a most extraordinary circumstance, and that I should feel it my duty immediately to visit the hut, and see the state in which the poor woman was. He told me she was an old woman, and that it was quite unnecessary; that he did not consider it at all necessary. I told him that it was my duty, and I should do it. With reluctance he accompanied me a part of the way. As I was going to the hut, a young woman named Susan Johnston, covered over with the yaws, a shocking disease, complained of want of medical attendance, and want of proper care, and she told me her master drove her from the negro houses, from the property to the river side; she told me that there was neither hut nor shelter there for her, and that he would neither give her medicine, medical attendance or any assistance. A poor negro woman offered in the kindest manner to attend to this poor creature, and to assist in her cure; and she also voluntarily offered in my presence, to pay back every part of the time that she might lose in attending upon this poor creature; this offer was refused in the most brutal manner, I am sorry to say.

2895. Did the negro woman offer to take this poor diseased person into her hut?—She offered to take her under her care, I suppose she would have taken her into her hut, for she seemed to have a great regard for her.

2896. What was the name of the woman who offered this?—I do not recollect.

2897. What description of negro was this?—She was a field negro, I should say, from her appearance; and very nearly 40 years of age, about 40.

2898. You do not recollect her name?—No, I do not; I went to the hut afterwards, wards, and saw an emaciated creature lying on some boards, with a mat, I think; the daughter and granddaughter told me that frequently on their return from the field they had found their mother or grandmother in her fæces (in her nastiness they called it), and she had not strength to remove out of it; that there was no one even to give her a little soup or a little nourishment, from the time they went to the field till they returned, and to that they ascribed her premature end.

Captain W. Oldrey.

2899. Then she was in the house alone, was she, and not in the sick house?—She was not in the sick house, but she was in a hut alone, whether belonging to her or to her daughter, I do not know.

2900. Was there any appearance of any one having been in attendance upon her?—I should imagine some one had been when she died, from the cry that had announced her death. I saw several other persons on the property, who were also in want of medical aid, which they had not got. I told Mr. Mason that it was my intention to send a surgeon upon the property to examine into the state of his negroes, and to report to me the state that he might find them in. I wrote to Dr. Dewar and to Dr. Anderson, and requested that one of them would proceed to the property; the first that could start for the purpose of inspecting the negroes. The following day I met, at Lacovia Estate, the coroner of the parish. I stated to him what had happened during the time that I had visited Content Hall plantation, and requested that he would proceed immediately thither, and hold an inquest upon the body. I thought it would be an act of justice to all parties to ascertain whether she had come to her death in a natural manner or not, and it would then be ascertained; and any impression that was on my mind, from the circumstances that had occurred during my visit to the property, might then be removed; at all events it would establish either Mr. Mason's innocence or his guilt. The coroner went on the property and visited the body, merely looked at it, and asked a few questions of Sarah Williams, a granddaughter also, and her son. Because they stated to the coroner that their mother had died from want of medical attendance, medicine, nourishment, and some one to take care of her, he threatened to get them punished or flogged for making this natural complaint.

2901. The coroner did?—Yes, he threatened to get them punished or flogged for their insolence.

2902. Chairman.] How do you know this?—It came out in evidence; I was not upon the property at the time, but it came out in evidence afterwards.

2903. Mr. Gladstone.] In the evidence of the apprentices themselves?—Yes.

2904. Did they state that he threatened to have them flogged simply on account of their making this allegation, or was his threat based upon some real or supposed impropriety in their manner and language?—They stated on oath that it was on account of their having complained of their master; the evidence is here, and the Committee can see it, if they please, or I will read it.

2905. Chairman.] What was the occasion on which this evidence was given, and before what court?—Mr. Mason was to have been tried by a special court, before justices Clinch and Ramsay, for cruelty and neglect to his apprentices, for not granting time to them to cultivate their grounds and to mend their fences, for withholding their legal clothing, and for having sent one part of their hogs to the pound, and the other part he ordered to be confined to a house on the property.

2906. Mr. Gladstone.] Is this evidence taken before yourself?—When I was present before the special magistrates Ramsay and Clinch.

2908. Into the particular circumstances which you have detailed, with their sequel?—Yes; the coroner said that he considered that she had died from old age; I believe no further proceedings were ever taken by him.

2909. Was there an inquest held?—There was no inquest held, and he threatened the daughter and granddaughter and the son with punishment, for having made the complaint that their mother had died from want.

2910. Chairman.] You said that you were persecuted by Mr. Mason; will you proceed with the narrative?—I will show the cause of it; first, with respect to the clothing, the negroes complained that they had not their legal clothing issued to them; their clothing was due in February 1834, and that Mr. Mason had not then issued it. Mr. Mason told me that he would not issue their clothing, that the law prescribed that the clothing was to be issued once in a year, and if the clothing was issued in February 1833, and issued in December 1834, that he then should comply with the law; whereas Mr. Burge, and every body else, well know that the clothing was intended by the slave law for 12 months. By this means, a great many of the planters, I have been told, used to deprive their apprentices of their legal clothing. Captain W. Oldrey.

2911. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean before their apprenticeship?—Formerly, I can state how it used to be done. Mr. Mason gave in his returns. I thought he had been guilty of perjury before I had referred to the parish returns. The managers are obliged to give in the returns once a year, the first vestry after March. I overhauled the returns, and found that Mr. Mason had not taken the usual affidavit prescribed by law, but had merely signed the giving in of the returns, and where the magistrate's name ought to have been, it was not signed; similar frauds, I believe, have been frequently committed. I have heard so from different respectable planters, who by such means deprived the negroes of their legal clothing.

2912. Mr. Gladstone.] Will you explain how the negroes can be defrauded of their clothing by the means you have mentioned?—If clothing were to be given in February, and it is postponed to December the following year, there would be nearly 12 months' clothing withheld from the apprentices.

2913. When will it be obligatory to give clothing next?—It ought to be given regularly once a year, and they should swear to their giving in; but on account of the careless manner in which the business of vestries was conducted, they used to receive the returns without properly scrutinizing into their contents.

2914. Sir George Grey.] Are you speaking now from your own observation under the apprenticeship system, or of what the practice was in former times?—From my own observation, and from having communicated with respectable planters on the subject, I have been informed by them that it was too often the case.

2915. Do you mean to say that you know that the negroes were kept without clothing for a period of 12 months in more instances than this of Mr. Mason, or that you know of this instance, and heard that a similar practice had been adopted in former times?—In the first case of my own knowledge, and secondly from report.

2916. Chairman.] Would the effect of this practice which you have alluded to be more than this, that it would, during the first year, defraud an apprentice of his clothing, but after that the negro must regularly receive his clothing, only the period would be December instead of January?—In the first place the negro would be deprived of his clothing from February to December, and his clothing would be due in February to make up for the negro's loss.

2917. Sir George Grey.] According to your construction of the law is it so?—It is, but their construction of the law is, that if they issue clothing in January one year, and in December in the year following, they comply with the law.

2918. According to this, what month in the next year will the clothing become due if the clothing is issued in December 1833; what would be the proper period, according to your construction of the law, at which they could issue it again?—December 1834; but if this question refers to the present case, the clothing would be legally due again in February to make up for the loss to the negro.

2919. Mr. Buxton.] Might not this happen, supposing a planter to be disposed to deprive the negro as much as possible of the advantages of clothing, that he might give the clothing on the 31st of December for the year that is passed, and on the 1st of January for the year that is to come, and then give no more clothing for two years?—I should think that would not be done.

2920. Sir George Grey.] We have been speaking of their construction of the law, do you believe that construction to be a correct construction?—Certainly not.

2921. Then as a magistrate authorized to administer the law according to your construction of it, what course did you take upon the negroes complaining to you of the injustice of Mr. Mason?—He was at my instance proceeded against first by a special session, who found sufficient grounds for a further trial by a Court of Protection. The Court of Protection voted itself incompetent to try the case. Justice Colebrook and myself subsequently tried Mr. Mason and found him guilty.

2922. As special magistrate you considered yourself authorized to investigate the complaint and adjudicate upon it?—Yes, most certainly.

2923. What was your adjudication upon that complaint, after hearing the evidence?—That he had been guilty of violating the law, and he would have been fined for that violation had not Mr. Hilton, Mr. Mason's solicitor, raised a question on a point of the slave law relative to the clothing, which induced Mr. Justice Colebrook to request that I would allow it to be referred to the Governor for his excellency's decision. As to the intent of the law I was satisfied in my own mind, and would have carried the sentence immediately into effect, but my brother magistrate had his doubts on account of the objections raised by Mr. Hilton the solicitor.

2924. Mr. Buxton.] What was the legal objection which was raised?—That if clothing was given in February one year, and issued in December the following year, that the law would then be complied with, consequently that his client was not amenable to any fine.

2925. Sir George Grey.] The objection was that the clothing might be issued once in any part of the year, and that it need not be issued once in every twelve months?—It was, sir.

2926. Was it referred to the Governor?—Yes.

2927. What was the decision of the Governor?—The Governor referred it to the Attorney-General, as I had done myself, and he gave it as his opinion that it was all right: this is his letter to me on the subject:—“Dear Oldrey,—Do not levy a fine on Mason in the case of clothing for more than one case; you may sentence him in every individual case; you are all right, but whilst you cause reverence to the quarter-deck, after you have succeeded, conciliate as much as you can. I will see how to give you help. Take care of your health. Yours faithfully. D. O’Reilly.”

2928. That is a letter to you, not an opinion?—I consider it an opinion, as the letter contains a form for a copy of a warrant of distress to act on.

2929. It is not upon a case submitted to him?—I wrote to the Attorney-General; it was, I believe, also submitted to him by the Governor, and this letter is his reply to me.

2930. Did you hear from the Governor upon the subject?—I did; Mr. Mason petitioned his excellency; Mr. Berry presented or forwarded the petition, I believe, in which Mr. Mason stated that I was mixed up with the politics of the parish.

2931. What communication did you receive from the Governor as to the communication you had made to him of the question of law?—I was requested, after the Governor had received this petition, not to proceed in any way until I received further orders.

2932. Have you a copy of the Governor’s letter?—I have the original at home, but not here.

2933. Chairman.] Did you receive those further orders?—His excellency was induced, on the representation of Mr. Berry, and on the petition of Mr. Mason, to allow him a new trial.

2934. Did that new trial take place?—It did; and I have the minutes of the new trial.

2935. Sir George Grey.] Before two other special magistrates?—Yes; the reason that Mr. Mason assigned was, that I was mixed up with the politics of the parish, and that I must naturally be his enemy, being a friend of the custos; but the custos and myself were not on such friendly terms.

2936. Was the new investigation ordered upon any doubt expressed by the Governor as to the construction of the law, or upon representations made by Mr. Mason as to the imputed partiality of the judges before whom he had been tried?—His excellency expressed his approbation of my conduct; but as he had given a promise to have the case re-investigated, his excellency observed, it must take place. I remonstrated, as far as respect to the Governor would allow me; I found it was his excellency’s determination, and he gave me orders to attend the investigation, or I should not have attended. I wished to have resigned my commission as a magistrate, but his excellency requested me to continue in office.

2937. What was the result of the second investigation?—He was found guilty and more criminal. This is the report of the special magistrates to the Governor.

[The Witness delivered in the same, which was read, as follows:]

To his Excellency the most Noble the Marquis of Sligo, Governor, &c. &c. &c.

REPORT.

IN obedience to the commands of his excellency the Governor, contained in Mr. Secretary Nune’s letter of date the 10th December 1834, No. 804, we proceeded to the parish of St. Elizabeth, having previously given Mr. Thomas Mason notice that a court should be held at Northampton Pen on Wednesday the 17th instant, for the purpose of investigating the complaints of the apprentices of the said Thomas Mason; and we beg to report to your excellency, that Mr. Thomas Mason, having objected to our power and authority, and not appearing before us, although duly summoned to do so, we proceeded to take the the annexed examination, and find by the evidence before us, that the negro grounds of the apprentices of Southampton pen, in the possession of Mr. Thomas Mason, are for the most part of them in an uncultivated state, occasioned by the apprentices feeling that it is useless to cultivate the land, in consequence of the dilapidated state of the fences, and subject thereby to continual trespass from cattle. We find that special justices Oldrey and Colebrook issued an order on the 25th September last to the said Thomas Mason, to mend the fences of his apprentices' negro grounds at Southampton pen, and that the time occupied in so doing was to be repaid to the said Thomas Mason, which order, from the evidence before us, has not been obeyed by the said Thomas Mason. We also find, that Mr. Thomas Mason requires the labour of his apprentices at a pen called Content Hall, about seven or eight miles distant from Southampton, whither they repair on the Monday mornings, and are not permitted to return till late on the Friday evenings, by which system they have only the Saturday to work in their grounds and to dispose of their provisions, at a market about 12 miles distant from their homes. We also beg leave to report, from the evidence, that the apprentices on Content Pen, with the exception of three or four, have not been regularly supplied with the usual and customary clothing, according to the 12th section of the Act for the Government of Slaves, and the 16th clause of the Abolition Act; and that since the death of Dr. Owen (which event took place in the early part of 1832), they have only received their clothing twice. We also beg to report that the apprentices on Southampton and Content Pens are not regularly attended by any medical practitioner, as required by the 16th clause of the Abolition Act, and the 8th clause of the Act in Aid of the Abolition Act. That Mason's system of administering medicine himself to his apprentices is subject to great irregularity and neglect, and when that gentleman is absent from his property, they are left in the hands of ignorant and incompetent persons to administer it. That the case of Tabitha Hewitt, as detailed in evidence before us, is one of a most cruel and atrocious nature. The services this female rendered to her master to the last moment of her power; the cruel neglect shown her by that master (Mr. Mason) during her long illness, and his unmanly and improper conduct towards her child after her death, are crimes that require the most serious punishment. We also beg to draw your excellency's attention to the evidence of C. R. Ramson, the coroner, and that of John Mins, who when ordered by a magistrate to investigate into the cause of Tabitha Hewitt's death, instead of doing according to law, repaired to the spot, took an external examination of the body of a female who appears from evidence to have died from neglect, and threatens to have her son, John Nimes, punished for complaining of the want of support and neglect of his master towards his aged mother. We repeat that Mr. Mason, not having appeared to rebut the affidavits of Thomas Colebrook, esq., special justice, and Gustosidi Tipping, esq., respecting his conduct towards Captain William Oldrey, special justice, whilst holding his court at Southampton, on the 20th of September last; his conduct, as specified, and those affidavits, we consider as fully substantiated. As regards Mr. Mason's statements, contained in documents from No. 7 to 11, Mr. Thomas Mason did not appear to substantiate them, and the same were denied by the letter of Captain William Oldrey and Thomas Colebrook, special justices. We beg leave to refer your excellency to those letters subjoined to the evidence taken before us. In addition to the foregoing we beg to repeat, that by the evidence before us, Mr. Thomas Mason has, up to the present day, possessed himself of the hogs, the personal properties of his apprentices, although they were kept by them in a space walled in for them; and some he has sent to the pound, others he has still in his possession, thereby depriving the apprentices the free use of their own personal individual property.—Given under our hands this 24th day of December 1834, at Tormington Castle, in the parish of St. Elizabeth.

(signed) William Ramsay, } Special Magistrates.
James Clinch, }

2938. Sir George Grey.] Do you know what steps were taken upon that report being received by the Governor?—The Governor directed the Attorney-General to proceed by indictment against Mr. Mason.

2939. Was an indictment preferred in pursuance of those directions by the Attorney-General?—An indictment was preferred, but drawn up in so legally technical a manner, that it was thrown out by the grand jury at Montego Bay in March 1835.

2940. The bill was thrown out by the grand jury?—Yes; in the indictment it was stated, that with swords and staves he did kill and slay Tabitha Hewitt; whereas he never did any thing of the kind; but it was from want of nourishment and proper medical care that she came to her death.

2941. You know that the indictment was thrown out, and you believe that it was on formal grounds?—I presume that it was; I can form no other reason for it.

2942. Mr. Buxton.] Then you only know that it was thrown out?—I should imagine that it was only for that; I cannot imagine any other reason for it.

Captain W. Oldrey.

28 June 1836.

2944. You are not aware of any further steps having been taken, owing to your having left the colony?—I am not.

2945. Chairman.] Were steps in the course of being taken when you left the colony?—Reports on the subject were made to his excellency the Governor when I left the colony.

2946. Reports of this indictment having been thrown out?—Yes; immediately upon the indictment having been proclaimed in court, I was threatened with 14 different actions by Mr. Hilton, the solicitor of Mr. Mason, who came up and said, “ Captain Oldrey, I have to inform you that I shall commence 14 actions against you.”

2947. Does the throwing out of this indictment imply that no further steps shall be taken?—The Governor will not allow the case to rest, I think; his just and upright conduct would not suffer it.

2949. It was either for murder or manslaughter, you do not know which?—It was for killing and slaying, which I suppose would include either.

2950. Was the result of this investigation either before yourself and Mr. Justice Colebrook, or the two other magistrates, the imposition of any fine upon Mr. Mason?—The sentence was sent up to the Governor.

2951. Were any fines imposed upon Mr. Mason, or was the proceeding against him by indictment before the criminal court of the colony?—The Governor superseded altogether the first trial. No penalties were ever imposed upon Mr. Mason, and no penalties were enforced when the trial took place before Messrs. Ramsay and Clinch; the report is attached to it. The Governor, upon that report ordered an indictment, and no fine was ever levied upon Mr. Mason in the case; he was only informed by me that he had been found guilty, and the amount of penalties would be intimated to him when I next visited the property. I fully expected the Governor would have directed the sentence of Justice Colebrook and myself to have been carried into effect.

2952. Chairman.] Are you satisfied that the penalties were not levied upon the finding of the second court?—Decidedly I am.

2953. Sir George Grey.] Could he have been fined by a common justice and be indicted before the criminal courts of the colony for the same offence; how does the law stand upon that subject?—I consider that the first trial ought to have been final, but the Governor, as the fountain of mercy, might have granted Mr. Mason a pardon of the full penalties found against him; but as to superseding the first special trial by another, I thought it was contrary to law.

2954. Are you sufficiently acquainted with the law in Jamaica to state whether a person could be fined for an offence by a special justice and indicted for the same offence before the criminal courts in the colony?—Certainly not; it would be a violation of the rights of the subject; but the law ought to be amended upon the point of clothing, as a great part of the bar of Jamaica are decidedly against my decision.

2955. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean the Attorney-General's opinion upon the construction of the law?—The Attorney-General confirmed my opinion. I allude to the barristers generally.

2956. Their opinions are at variance with the Attorney-General's?—I have understood it to be their opinion; Mr. Hilton has publicly advanced it; and I really believe his excellency has not the power at present to enforce it as the law now stands.

2957. Chairman.] You mean upon the point of clothing?—Yes.

2958. Will you have the goodness to go on and state the prosecutions brought against you?—There are three actions which Mr. Mason brought against me, in pursuance of his threat.

2959. What is the nature of those actions?—For my having summoned his apprentices to appear before a court ordered by the Governor.

2960. For trespass?—Yes; construed trespass, for issuing the summons which I was directed to do.

2961. When were those actions brought?—This is a notice; one was tried last April.

2962. When were those actions? when was notice given?—Notice was given before I left the island, in February or April; but those were afterwards given to my solicitor since my departure from Jamaica.

2963. When?

2963. When?—They are dated 4th June 1835; I was out of the country at that time. Captain W. Oldrey.

2964. Will you state when they were tried?—One was tried last April. 28 June 1836.

2965. What was the result of that action?—A verdict against me of 289*l.* currency, which carries costs.

2966. By what court?—By the grand court, composed of three puisne judges, (the only legal judge in the island was sick at the time,) Mr. Mais was one, Mr. Barrett, Speaker of the House of Assembly was another, and Mr. Allwood was the third.

2967. Those were justices of the peace?—No, puisne judges.

2968. Was it a jury trial?—Yes.

2969. Sir George Grey.] Had you any communication with Lord Sligo, with reference to any one of those actions brought against you; did you inform him that an action had been brought against you?—Yes, and he ordered the Attorney-General to defend me in every case.

2970. And did he defend you?—Yes, in conjunction with Mr. Panton, the King's Advocate-General.

2971. Have either of the other actions been tried?—No, my counsel moved for a new trial, which was to be argued this month.

2972. Therefore you have not yet been called upon to pay any damages?—Not yet.

2973. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you the minutes of the legal proceedings which took place?—I have not; I do not know whether they are in the Colonial Office.

2974. Mr. Johnston.] Do you know of whom the jury was composed?—The bench we know are proprietors, the jury, I should imagine, were, as usual, composed principally of planters and persons in the planting interest.

2975. You do not know the particulars?—No, I do not.

2976. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of any delay having taken place between the notice of action and the trial, more than is usual on ordinary occasions?—Mr. Mason might have brought his actions on if he pleased in 1835.

2977. Are you aware of another trial brought against Mr. Bourne, a special justice, in the mean time, and the verdict given against him?—I am aware of it, and I do not think that Mr. Mason would have brought his actions against me, had it not been that the Act in Aid had expired on the 31st of December 1835, which took away the only protection that special magistrates had; I do not think, if that Act had been in operation, that he would have ventured to have brought his action into court.

2978. Mr. Buxton.] The facts of the case are these; you in your capacity of special magistrate, think it right to inquire into the conduct of Mr. Mason, as to the treatment of his negroes, and all that results from this is, that no punishment whatever is inflicted upon Mr. Mason?—I do not know what the result may be of any new trial.

2979. No punishment, as far as you know, has been inflicted upon Mr. Mason, but that you have been repeatedly prosecuted by him, and have been once convicted and subjected to damages by a colonial jury and a colonial bench?—Precisely so; I have been threatened with three, but only one action has as yet been brought against me.

2980. Did you not say that three actions had been brought against you?—I have received notice of three, one of which only has been tried.

2981. Then, as far as you know, Mr. Mason has as yet suffered no punishment; you have had three prosecutions entered against you, one has been tried, you have been convicted of damages by a colonial jury and a colonial bench?—Mr. Mason has not suffered any punishment yet, but I have been cast in damages by a colonial jury.

2982. Sir George Grey.] But the application for a new trial is pending, consequently there is no final verdict yet given?—No final verdict has yet been given.

2983. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe that there was an intention on the part of Mr. Mason to intimidate you in the discharge of your duties of special magistrate, by bringing those actions against you?—I have no doubt of it, and further, I can state, from report, but I do not know whether it be correct or not, that when Mr. Mason's intentions to prefer actions against me was known, other planters in the parish intended to join him, and when they found they could not trip me up in my judicial decision, I was informed they had bestowed contributions or subscriptions, or whatever it might be called, on the press, in the pro-slavery interest, to injure me; this I have heard, but I do not know whether it be true or not, but I have been much abused by the press.

2984. Have you any reason to believe that the planters clubbed towards the prosecuting of you by Mr. Mason?—Mr. Mason is a very rich man; I should not think, myself, that he stood in need of it, but I only mention the report that I have heard.

2985. Did you hear that in a shape that led you to believe it?—I heard that the pro-slavery party had joined together to prosecute me, if they could find me “tripping,” and I firmly believe it.

2986. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that they gave money for the purpose?—I understood so.

2987. Mr. Gladstone.] You state that you have heard it reported that the planters had clubbed?—The pro-slavery party.

2988. Are you prepared to state the names of individuals to whom you would apply that; do you mean to apply that to the general body of the planters, or to a large portion of them, or in what way can you give the Committee an idea of the extent of the term which you use?—To those who opposed, as far as they could, the apprenticeship system.

2989. Do you conceive that the parties who oppose the apprenticeship system constitute a large proportion of the present body in Jamaica?—I am sorry to say that they do, but there are a great number, and I am happy to bear this testimony, whose feelings are as kind and as humane as any honourable member present; but I am sorry to say the majority, if I give it as my opinion, so far as I know, and as far as my experience can judge, who are opposed to the present system.

2990. Do you think that the party opposed to the present system are an increasing or a decreasing party?—I should hope a decreasing one.

2991. Sir George Grey.] What are the grounds of their opposition to the present apprenticeship system?—In the first place they consider themselves robbed by the Abolition Act, and by the emancipation of their negroes, and many of them consider themselves ruined from their apprentices having been emancipated; that is in part the cause of their discontent, and of their opposing the new system.

2992. Mr. Buxton.] Are the persons who are thus dissatisfied, in general, owners of slaves who have received compensation, or are they attorneys and overseers, and persons of that class, who are not sharers in the compensation, and whose employment may be lost?—Principally, I should say, attorneys; only a few proprietors reside in Jamaica; the greater part, the mass of the property, belongs to proprietors in England.

2993. Chairman.] Mr. Mason was a proprietor?—Yes, a very wealthy one.

2994. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that the attorneys fear being robbed of the power which they had before?—Yes.

2995. Mr. Gladstone.] Comparing the resident proprietors, and that party resident on the property, who are not proprietors, do you observe a difference between those two classes?—I believe, if the feelings of the proprietors at home were carried into effect in the island, the apprenticeship system would work much better.

2996. The question is, as to the resident proprietors?—There are very few resident proprietors of any extent in the parish of St. Elizabeth.

2997. Have you observed any very great difference between the feelings of the resident proprietor and of those proprietors who are not resident?—There are a few of the proprietors who are very kind; I could mention the names of some of them, if it were necessary.

2998. Sir George Grey.] But taking the residents as a class, and the proprietors resident in England as another class, do you draw a distinction between the feelings of the resident proprietors and those of the attorneys interested in the property in that country?—There are some of the proprietors in that country who are very well disposed, and there are others, like Mr. Mason, who are as decidedly opposed.

3000. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that they had succeeded to any extent, in re-establishing a severe system of discipline and coercion while you were there?—As far as I was concerned I would not suffer it.

Captain W. Oldrey.

28 June 1836.

3001. You state that magistrates have resigned in consequence of the conduct of planters towards them?—Yes.

3002. Have the gentlemen who have taken the places of those who have resigned, adopted a different course from those who have resigned, and whose places they were called upon to fill?—I have only attended three or four courts, when I have always seen justice administered by the special magistrates; but I have heard that a different feeling is exhibited by some of the new magistrates who have been appointed in the colony; I cannot speak from my own observation on the subject.

3003. What you state now, is it with reference to magistrates who have been appointed since you left Jamaica or while you were there?—Some that were appointed while I was in the island.

3004. Do you observe in the conduct of any of the magistrates who were appointed in the room of others who have resigned in disgust, a different line of conduct from that which you yourself pursued, and which other magistrates pursued while you were in the colony?—As I have before stated, I have attended only four courts, those were composed of special justices Colebrook, Connor, Ramsay, Clinch and Chamberlain, and I have always seen them administer the law in a most impartial and just manner; but I have heard that some of the other magistrates have been extremely severe, and have consequently given very great satisfaction to the planters.

3005. Were those magistrates, of whose severity you have heard, magistrates who were appointed in Jamaica at a recent period, shortly before you left?—Some of them were.

3007. Were they men of property who had been appointed at the commencement of the apprenticeship system, or appointed to supply vacancies of magistrates who had resigned in disgust?—One gentleman took the situation of Mr. Hill, who resigned in disgust.

3008. When was he appointed?—He was removed into the parish of St. James, some time after Mr. Hill had resigned.

3009. Was the magistrate appointed in Mr. Hill's place one of the men of whose severity you spoke just now?—Yes.

3010. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you correct in stating that Mr. Hill resigned in disgust?—Yes.

3011. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware that Mr. Hill now holds the special commission?—He does.

3012. Mr. Buxton.] Of the magistrates whom you have named, and who always did justice, how many are magistrates at this present moment?—Three are dead; Colebrook is dead, Clinch is dead, and Connor is dead, and I believe Dr. Chamberlain has resigned; Mr. Ramsay is the only one now doing duty in the colony, I believe.

3013. Sir George Grey.] Was Dr. Chamberlain ever a salaried special magistrate?—I believe not.

3014. Chairman.] But those gentlemen whose names you have mentioned were the only special magistrates whose conduct you had a personal opportunity of observing?—Only those that I had positive proof of, from having been present at their courts.

3015. Sir George Grey.] Dr. Chamberlain was a physician in practice in Jamaica?—Yes.

3016. And he held the commission for a time to assist the others?—Yes.

3017. Therefore the only acting commissioner that is living is acting now?—Yes.

3018. You left the island for several reasons?—Yes.

3019. Did the Governor request you to stay?—Yes, I left on his excellency's leave.

3020. Are you aware whether you might have gone back, if you pleased, and resumed your duties?—I could.

3021. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe, from all that you have heard, and from all that you know, that there is on the part of some of the pro-slavery planters a determination,

Captain W. Oldrey. mination, as far as it is in their power, to bring back the old system of coercion?—
I should think so.

28 June 1836.

3022. Do you believe, from all that you know, and from all that you have heard, that in any portion of Jamaica that system of severe discipline and coercion was carried into effect upon the negroes at the time of your departure?—I do not know from my own personal observation, but I have heard that some were extremely severe. I have heard that triangles were raised on the estates immediately upon a special magistrate joining a district.

3023. Sir George Grey.] Have you not a particular magistrate in your mind at the present moment upon a particular estate?—I have; I understand on the estates in his district.

3024. Subject to the jurisdiction of that special magistrate?—Yes.

3025. Are you aware whether a report of that case was made to Lord Sligo, and whether that magistrate is now in the commission?—He was when I left the island.

3026. Do you know whether he is in the commission now?—I do not know.

3027. Chairman.] Did it appear to you, while you were in Jamaica, that the conduct of the special magistrates was watched with sufficient vigilance on the part of the supreme authority?—It was most closely scrutinized, and the eye of the Governor was seldom taken off from the conduct of the special magistrates.

3028. Do you think it possible for a special magistrate to have betrayed his duty by siding unfairly with the planter against the apprentice for any length of time, without such conduct attracting the notice and reprobation of the Governor?—If the Governor were made acquainted with any undue severity, much less any act of positive injustice, he would immediately have called that magistrate to an account for it.

3029. Do you think it likely that a magistrate could have acted unfairly in that respect for any length of time without its coming to the knowledge of the Governor?—It might be done; I should think there is a possibility of its being done.

3030. Do you think it probable?—Yes.

3031. Mr. Gladstone.] Are there not rival parties, who entertain a great opposition to each other, spread over Jamaica?—Yes.

3032. Does not the feeling between those parties afford a considerable degree of facility by which all cases of abuse are likely to become known?—Very little, except when the trials are held in public places; because one party will not visit the property of another party; it would be considered almost an intrusion.

3033. Do you mean the courts of the special magistrates?—Yes; the special magistrates are bound to hold courts on every plantation, when there are complaints to be tried, where there are 40 working negroes or upwards.

3034. You perhaps consider then that there are adequate means by which the conduct of the negro may be known to the special magistrate, but not by which the conduct of the special magistrate can be made known to the Governor?—It can be concealed; for instance, I will give a case, suppose I went upon a property, and I had no one with me, my conduct might be partial or it might be otherwise; no one could report my misconduct to the Governor, for it is not likely the planter who calls for punishment would do it, and no other person could do it, I should think. If he were to call upon me to punish a negro, and I punished that negro, it is not probable the planter would make a complaint against me for so doing; I am speaking of the possibility, and this injustice would not, in all probability, come to the Governor's knowledge; but the special magistrates are called upon to make their reports of punishments weekly to the Governor. I will give you its form, it is divided into columns; 1st is the date; 2d, the name of the property; 3d, the distance ridden by the special magistrate during the day; 4th, the complainant; 5th, the defendant; 6th, the crime or charge; and 7th, the decision. If the Governor should receive any complaint against a special magistrate, he would immediately call upon him for his notes; but who is there to complain to the Governor, if the special magistrate were to act so partially as to punish at the will of the planter?

3035. Supposing that the Governor sees in these accounts of the special magistrates, or of one special magistrate, as compared with the general body, a great amount of punishment, do not you suppose that he would be led by that fact to institute an inquiry?—He would, I have no doubt, instantly call upon him to explain the reason of it.

3036. Sir

3036. Sir George Grey.] Have you seen the returns which are now sent of the number of punishments inflicted by the special magistrates, which are forwarded to the Governor and sent home to the Secretary of State?—The number of apprentices and the amount of punishment by the special magistrates were sent to the Governor when I was in the island. Captain W. Oldrey.

3037. Have you seen the late returns?—No.

3038. But do you think that any precaution which could be taken by the Governor of the conduct of a special magistrate is omitted by the Governor?—Not under the present law.

3039. Can the probability which you stated of a magistrate being guilty of undue severity, carried through a considerable period of time and escaping the notice of the Governor, arise, if the returns sent in are correct returns?—Yes, it is probable; and I wish to point out the necessity of an alteration in the law, and an alteration in the administration of justice in the colonies. A magistrate goes upon a property, without having any person with him as a witness, he has no one to assist him in forming his court; he may be insulted by the planter with impunity, and he has no witness except the poor negroes, and they are not well acquainted with the common courtesies of life.

3040. But their evidence is good?—It is.

3041. Do you mean that the insult might be committed by planters upon a special magistrate without the negroes conceiving it to be an insult?—Yes; and the special magistrate ought to have attached at least two police constables, in order to assist at his court, and to be witnesses of his conduct, for his own satisfaction, as well to observe the conduct of the managers, and for the ends of justice.

3043. Take two districts, with the same number of apprentices in each, and through a period of six months, the amount of punishment in one being considerably greater than the other, do you not think that by that fact the Governor's attention would be called to that district in which the punishment was greater?—I should think that the Governor would not overlook a second report; his excellency would call upon the special magistrate to account for it.

3044. Is it probable that during a long period of time a systematic severity may be pursued without his attention being called to it?—Yes, but his attention would be called to any report, as I before stated.

3045. Has not a special magistrate a power of summoning any police to attend him; are they bound to obey the orders of the special magistrate?—He has; but the police was stationed at a great distance from some of the special magistrates; I had at first three regularly attached to me, but they were not equal to the duty.

3046. Mr. Gladstone.] Practically did you find difficulties arise in the execution of your duty from the want of policemen attached?—Most certainly; yet I had three attached to me for some time, frequently I had to send them to issue warrants and summonses, and very often I sent them from one property or to another to tell the managers that I was going to visit their properties, for the purpose of getting the apprentices ready and not to lose time to the property nor my own time, which was then extremely precious.

3047. Did you find want of actual means to carry your sentences into effect?—I had no difficulty in that particular at all, because it was only to give my order and and it was executed, sometimes by the police and sometimes by the apprentices themselves.

28 June 1836.

3048. Mr. Buxton.] Was Lieutenant White a magistrate when you were in the commission?—He was.

3049. Was Mr. Fitzgerald a magistrate when you were in the commission?—I think he must have arrived when I was about quitting the colony.

3050. Sir George Grey.] Is Mr. Fitzgerald alive now?—He is dead.

3051. Is Mr. White a magistrate?—No.

3052. Was he dismissed?—I understood that he was, for severity.

3053. Have you any doubt that he was dismissed by the Governor?—None.

3054. Mr. Buxton.] Did it come to your knowledge, while you were in the colony, that any special magistrate had for a considerable period of time exercised severity against the negroes?—I do not, from my own personal observation. I have answered the question before; I do not, from my own knowledge, but I have heard it so reported.

3055. Have you heard it in that way and from those persons that you do in your conscience believe the fact, that for a considerable time and to a great extent the special magistrate was guilty of cruelty?—I believe those who told me were convinced of its truth and that they believed it; I do not know Mr. White intimately, and to give an opinion upon another magistrate's conduct that I have not seen, I cannot.

3056. Do you believe that cruelty did exist to a considerable extent for a considerable period of time in any one district in Jamaica?—From report only.

3057. Mr. Gladstone.] You had in your mind a particular district and a particular magistrate, are you not also perfectly aware that that magistrate has been dismissed?—I may say that I have more districts than one in my mind, but all this arises from report and I cannot answer for its correctness; I believe that those who reported the cases to me, indeed I am thoroughly persuaded, that they believed it or they would not have communicated it to me, but whether the facts were so or not I do not know.

3058. Sir George Grey.] Have you heard the reports since you have been in England or in Jamaica?—When I was in Jamaica and also since my return.

3059. Mr. Buxton.] If that report was true, that for a considerable period of time cruelties were exercised in any district, with the connivance of the special magistrate, do you, with that fact before you, believe that the Governor can acquire such a knowledge of the conduct of the special magistrate as will enable him immediately to check him, provided that he is unduly severe?—I have already stated that if a special magistrate could be found to be so severe and so unjust, I should think he would be fully capable of concealing it from the Governor.

3060. Were the names of the special magistrates mentioned to you who had been severe?—They were.

3061. With the specific acts of cruelty connived at?—Certainly.

3062. Did you make a report of them to the Governor?—No, they were publicly talked of.

3063. Do you know whether any communication of those facts was made to the Governor?—I am convinced they were.

3064. Do you know whether steps were taken in consequence of communications made to the Governor of those facts?—Yes.

3065. Chairman.] Do you know of any instance in which complaints were made of the conduct of a special magistrate by persons of credit, in which the case was not investigated by the Governor?—No.

3066. Sir George Grey.] Do you conceive it possible that in those cases which are so public and notorious and talked of every day, the special magistrate could pursue that systematic course of conduct and at the same time conceal it?—That which is considered severe by one is considered lenient by another; it might or it might not have been reported to the Governor.

3067. Assuming that the severity was undoubted; that there were acts done with the connivance of the special magistrate of admitted and undue severity, which were matter of common conversation, do you think it possible that that conduct could be concealed, if, as you say, they were capable of being guilty of it?—The cases that I allude to were remedied, because complaints were made to the Governor, and the Governor ordered investigation immediately.

3068. Mr. Gladstone.] And remedies were applied in all the cases?—I believe the Governor administered justice in all cases, and applied the proper remedies.

3069. Do you believe that it was in the power of the Governor to administer effectual remedies in the cases which you have in your mind, and that they were so administered?—Certainly.

3070. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that there was a disposition on the part of some of the pro-slavery attorneys to overawe the special magistrates by intimidation, was there a disposition on the other side to win them over by presents and acts of service?—I do not know that they ever succeeded.

3071. Sir George Grey.] Had you ever any presents offered you?—No.

3072. Are you aware, respecting those five magistrates whose conduct came under your notice, that any presents were offered to them?—I know that all those who punished with the greatest severity were the greatest favourites with the planters, but I do not know that they received presents for so doing; but previous to Mr. Colebrook's departure, a piece of plate was voted to him, I have heard; he was an upright and just magistrate, in my opinion.

3073. Mr. Gladstone.] Did you ever hear of presents being received?—I am not aware of it from my own knowledge; but I have heard of some of the special magistrates who have punished very severely who have had plate voted to them after leaving their districts.

3075. When was that?—In the latter part of 1834 or the beginning of 1835.

3077. Was an account given in the newspaper?—Yes.

3078. Was he one of the two magistrates of whom you spoke who showed undue severity, and who connived at such acts?—No; he was not one of them; the magistrate I allude to was appointed in the country; he did not go from England.

3079. Was he a salaried magistrate?—Yes, I suppose so.

3080. Mr. Johnston.] Did any of the apprentices share in contributing to this piece of plate?—No; I do not know, from my own observation, that he was guilty of undue severity, but I have heard so. I never attended his trials. His name is Dillon; he superseded Doctor Madden at Kingston, I think; the difference in the administration of the law was very sensible, as Doctor Madden did not inflict corporal punishment to the extent that Captain Dillon did. Doctor Madden was not liked; he was very ill treated, and he threw up his commission in disgust. I do not know that Captain Dillon was ever guilty of any undue severity; as an officer I should hope that the report is not correct.

3081. Sir George Grey.] Why was he removed from his district?—I have heard different reasons assigned.

3082. Do you know whether he applied for another district, or was removed by the act of the Governor?—He was removed by the act of the Governor to a great distance, and at a great expense.

3083. Against his will?—Certainly, I should think so.

3084. How long had he been in this district before he was removed?—Only a few months, I believe.

3085. When did Dr. Madden leave Jamaica?—In the early part of December.

3086. And this was in the early part of 1835 that he was there?—Yes, and previous to that period.

3087. Mr. Gladstone.] St. Anne's, into which he was removed, was a disturbed district?—Yes, as it required good discipline.

3088. Do you suppose that his removal was a mark of the Governor's confidence, as the district to which he was removed was a disturbed district, which would require a man of abilities to bring it into order?—I should think that the Governor thought that the sooner Captain Dillon was removed from Kingston, where he had a great number of friends, the better, and that his services would be greater to the public in St. Anne's, and he would be enabled to bring the apprentices in that parish into order in a shorter time than those who had been there before him.

28 June 1836.

3089. Mr. Burton.] Do you know of any other case of a piece of plate being given to any magistrate, either while he held the magistracy or upon his retirement?—I have heard of another.

3090. Who was that?—Lieutenant White.

3091. Do you happen to know that Lieutenant White was provided with a habitation by Mr. Campbell, a West India proprietor?—I do not know it.

3092. Do you happen to know whether he was provided with fodder for his horse?—I do not know it.

3093. Did you happen to hear that he was extremely severe in the punishment of the negroes?—Yes; I have heard so.

3094. Did you hear that he was a most severe magistrate?—I have heard so.

3095. Did you hear that he was very popular among the planters?—I did hear so.

3096. Sir George Grey.] Did you hear that he was dismissed by the Governor for his undue severity?—I heard so.

3097. Mr. Burton.] Was he not dismissed in consequence of a quarrel with a clergyman or with a missionary?—I do not believe it; I heard that the Governor dismissed him for undue severity.

3098. Do you know that he got his piece of plate after he was dismissed or retired?—He received the plate, I have heard, in London, which was voted to him while there.

3099. Assuming that the special magistrate could by any means be overawed or seduced from the fair administration of justice, do you conceive that the machinery of the periodical returns is such as immediately to reveal their misconduct to the Governor?—It is possible that they may be concealed from the Governor in the way I have mentioned; but the Governor would, upon discovering that there was a greater degree of severity in one district than in another, call upon the magistrate to account for it.

3100. Cannot the check intended to be obtained by those periodical returns be easily evaded by inserting a careless and partial account of the case, and the evidence by which it has been supported?—Assuming such a case, I say that it is possible.

3101. Supposing that a negro has just grounds of complaint against a special magistrate, what redress can be obtained in that case?—He has many friends in the country to fly to, and he has other special magistrates; there are a number of upright and most merciful people in the country, who would immediately write to the Governor, and complain of this conduct when made known to them.

3102. With reference to his ignorance and his poverty, do you think that he can get justice if he thinks that he has ground of complaint against the special magistrate?—If he has the intellect to communicate his sufferings either to the special magistrate or to his friends, if they know their friends as well as those who are supposed to be their enemies, I should think that that friend would immediately communicate to the King's house, and that the Governor would instantly order an inquiry into the case.

3103. Did you upon your return to this country give in a memorial to Lord Glenelg, stating your observations during the time that you held the magistracy?—I did.

3104. Have you got a copy of that here?—I have simply the report relating to Mr. Mason's conduct and my opinion as to the result of the system.

[The Witness delivered in the same, vide Appendix.]

3105. Sir George Grey.] What is the nature of the protection which you think necessary?—The nature of the protection which I allude to is, that when a special magistrate acts impartially and administers justice, and vexatious actions are brought against him, and a verdict is given against him, the Government ought to indemnify the special magistrate, and if he is not indemnified he must be ruined.

3106. Have you applied for indemnity from the action against you?—I have.

3107. What is the answer you have received?—Until there is a decision of the trial nothing can be done; it was quite satisfactory.

3108. That is the answer you received; till the damages are payable, the Governor cannot indemnify you?—Until a new trial takes place and the result is known, of course the Government cannot indemnify me.

3109. Have you had any refusal of indemnity in the event of the verdict being ultimately against you?—On the contrary, I have received every encouragement.

3110. Mr.

Captain W. Oldrey.

28 June 1836.

3110. Mr. Buxton.] You stated that the Act in Aid had expired; would that have been of any assistance to you if it had existed?—I think Mr. Mason would not have brought his action against me if the Act had been in force; the fear of treble costs would, I think, have deterred Mr. Mason and also other planters.

3111. Under what law is clothing due to apprentices?—Under the slave law, and by the 16th section of the Abolition Act; the Jamaica Act I allude to.

3112. By whom is the sufficiency of clothing determined; by the special magistrate or by the vestry?—By the vestry; the special magistrate has no voice in it; he is not a vestryman, except where a special magistrate is appointed to the commission of the peace as a local magistrate.

3113. Sir George Grey.] Has it been customary to give to the special magistrates in Jamaica an ordinary commission of the peace, so as to enable them to act in addition to their special duties, in the ordinary duties?—Those who were out in the country first were generally appointed to two different parishes, in order that they might become acquainted with the negro character and with the state of discipline then used upon the different estates; there was an interregnum, a period when they were not appointed; now I believe the greater part are appointed local magistrates.

3114. In the ordinary commission as well as the special commission?—Yes, I was.

3115. Did any case come before you when you were a special magistrate, in which you conceived the clothing to be insufficient, but in which the vestry decided that it was sufficient, and you could not administer the remedy?—The usual clothing which had been given previous to the Abolition Act coming in force, is now, I believe, given to the apprentices, positively I cannot say, as it depends entirely upon the vestries.

3116. Did any special case come before you, of complaint of want of clothing, in which you conceived that the complaint was well founded, but the vestry had decided that it was sufficient?—None.

3117. Chairman.] Besides the amount of food secured to the slave by the old slave law, there were certain allowances of fish and things of that kind, was not that the case?—They were generally given.

3118. Have those allowances been generally continued on the estates of Jamaica, as far as you had an opportunity of observing or not?—Generally withheld.

3119. Without any misconduct on the part of the negroes, were they withheld as a punishment for any particular misbehaviour, or is it the general and usual practice to withhold them?—I have heard the proprietors thought that they could not afford to continue those allowances, that is my construction of the reason for their having been stopped.

3120. Have they universally been withheld?—Not universally.

3121. Mr. Gladstone.] Were they generally withheld by the poorer, and given by the more opulent?—Some of the more opulent have continued them.

3122. Chairman.] Do the negroes purchase those things that were formerly given to them?—I have heard of those things being done, by their giving extra labour.

3123. Do you apprehend that, in point of fact, the negro is less well off in point of food than he was before the Emancipation Act?—No, in point of fact he is not, because he has more time now to cultivate his grounds, the produce of which he takes to market and disposes of, by which means he is able to purchase the things which he received of the master, by the fruits of his own industry.

3124. Did any instances come under your observation, of plantations where the negroes suffered from an insufficient quantity of food?—I have had complaints of the kind, particularly from those properties in the interior, relative to salt, as it is called; it means salt fish, a condiment that is absolutely necessary medicinally, as well for seasoning their vegetable diet. Those who lived far in the interior found great difficulty, as they could not obtain salt provisions for a time, but afterwards, when they found that they were put entirely upon their own resources, they laboured hard upon their grounds, and purchased with the surplus produce of those grounds salt fish and other necessary things, which they required, and which were formerly given to them by their masters.

3125. In the parish of St. Elizabeth, with which you were connected, did any estates come under your own observation where the negroes in your opinion suffered

Captain W. Oldrey. fered from an insufficiency of food?—No, because the grounds were ample in St. Elizabeth.

28 June 1836.

3126. Mr. Gladstone.] In the case to which you have adverted, was it a temporary difficulty, which was removed when the negroes had got into the habit of using the time allowed under the new system?—A temporary difficulty.

3127. Chairman.] Do the negroes appear to you to consider it a hardship that those allowances are stopped?—At first they considered it a very great hardship, and it tended rather to make them displeased with the change, and I am sorry to say that there was not a conciliatory feeling evinced by a great number of the managers at the commencement of the new system, but everything was done that bad policy could possibly conceive to injure the new system. The old women, the aristocracy of the estates, those who had been accustomed to lie down after having had six children, were compelled again to work; the mothers with children, who were formerly indulged with time to nurse their children, they were compelled to work, and deprived of their former indulgences. When the elder females were thus discontented and the younger women also, it was no wonder that discontent prevailed. We all know very well the influence females have on mankind, and the conduct I have alluded to produced general discontent.

3128. During your stay in Jamaica did there appear to you to be any improvement in the feeling on the part of the planters?—There was some improvement.

3129. Was there an improvement of feeling on the part of the negroes?—There was; they are very susceptible of kindness, and very well disposed when well treated.

3130. Do you conceive, on the whole, that negroes, during the latter part of your stay in Jamaica, did conceive that they were living in a state of things essentially more advantageous to them than what had existed while they were slaves?—Certainly.

3131. Do you conceive that their state of physical comfort was greater as it respects food and clothing?—I think it was, from their own industry alone.

3132. Mr. Gladstone.] The means of exercising that industry being supplied to them by the Abolition Act?—By the laws, not by any indulgence of their masters.

3133. Are you induced, from those various circumstances which you have enumerated, to augur favourably for the slave?—If the Abolition and other Acts were to be amended and improved as they should be, I have not the least doubt in the world that the estates in Jamaica will increase in value cent. per cent. before the expiration of apprenticeship.

3134. When you say if the Abolition Act is improved as it ought to be, you refer to such improvements as are suggested in the paper which you have put in?—I could enlarge upon those amendments now. I was asked on my return whether I could suggest anything to the Government, and without delay I sent in some amendments.

3135. Have you, upon the whole, been led to approve of the principle of apprenticeship in the West Indies, substituting an intermediate state between slavery and freedom?—Most certainly, under proper laws.

3136. Have you heard enough of the state of feeling in our West India colonies to judge whether it is, upon the whole, more or less favourable to the apprenticeship than it is in Jamaica?—I have heard that the negro is better off in British Guiana.

3137. Do you think, upon the whole, that there is more difficulty as regards the feeling of the white population in Jamaica than there is in any other colony?—Yes.

3138. Looking at that state of facts, and assuming the fact to be true for the moment, are you led to attribute it to the circumstance that Jamaica has since been the scene of the hottest disputes and agitation upon the subject, and that party spirit runs higher in Jamaica than elsewhere?—Certainly it does, in a great measure.

3139. Do you connect these facts together at all?—Yes, I do.

3140. You have said most unequivocally that the disposition of the executive is to afford protection to the apprenticeship system, and to give the negro the benefit of it; do you feel prepared to give an opinion upon the feeling of the special magistrates, whether, upon the whole, with reference to the general body of special magistrates, so far as you know, the special magistracy partake in that spirit which you have described as animating the executive?—Decidedly I do, with the exceptions that I have mentioned or alluded to.

3141. Then

3141. Then taking together those two facts, that the executive is disposed to give sufficient protection to the negro, and that the generality of the special magistrates coincide in that opinion, is it then your opinion that with the Act in Aid re-enacted, sufficient protection could be given to the negro?—Not unless other Acts are amended also.

Captain W. Oldrey.

3142. With such amendments as you have intimated or are prepared to intimate, do you think that the apprenticeship system may be so administered by a faithful governor and a responsible magistracy, as to give sufficient protection to the negro?—I do, and if his excellency the present Governor, the Marquis of Sligo, were to remain in the colony to the end of the apprenticeship, I do firmly believe that all descriptions of property would rise cent. per cent.; I can prove that land has increased from 30 to 50 per cent. already.

3143. Were all the facts which you have stated relative to Mr. Mason and others brought out in evidence in the proceedings upon the action against you in Jamaica?—No, they would not allow a single word to be mentioned.

3144. They would not allow the details of the facts to be gone into?—No.

3145. Upon a legal ground?—Upon a legal ground, I presume.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

Captain William Oldrey, called in; and further Examined.

Captain W. Oldrey.

3146. Chairman.] ARE there any observations which you wish to address to the Committee with reference to any of the points upon which you were examined the last time you attended?—There are.

1 July 1836.

3147. What are those points?—First, respecting the clothing; Sir George Grey asked me the question, “If clothing were issued in December 1833, when it would be due again?” of course it would be due in December 1834; but if that question had any reference to Mr. Mason’s case, whose clothing was issued in February 1833 and not issued until December 1834, the negro would be legally entitled to his clothing in February 1835, and Mr. Mason would be liable to be punished for having withheld the clothing; that is my opinion. Respecting the opposition that I have met with, the opposition has not been successful with me; some of the pro-slavery party have endeavoured to intimidate me, but have not succeeded. In reply to a question whether I knew of any opposition to any other special magistrates, I said I did not know it from any personal observation, but that the opposition had been general. If I am called upon to explain I can do so; these are the particular points that I wish to explain.

3148. Mr. Gladstone.] You were understood in your last examination to say that the opposition to you, the attempt to intimidate you, had been one of the causes of your leaving the island?—It was.

3149. Do you mean the explanation you have just given to be a qualification of the previous statement?—No, the question that I referred to was the last but three or four, I think, whether I knew of any others being opposed, and I said no; but there were many reasons for my leaving. First, from the opposition I met with; secondly, the heavy duties; thirdly, the great expense I was at beyond the stipend and the loss of health.

3150. From a report of the proceedings which I have seen in the Jamaica newspaper, of the action brought against you, the gravamen of the charge against you appears to have been the summoning of the entire body of Mr. Mason’s apprentices from both his properties at the same time, and leaving him without the means of carrying on the work and looking after the cattle, or performing the most common office; is that your understanding?—No.

3151. Will

Capt. W. Oldrey.

1 July 1836.

3151. Will you state the fact. Did you summon the whole of the apprentices upon the two properties at the same time?—I will, with permission, read my summons. “Knock Patrick, Manchester, Sunday, P.M. December 14th 1834. Sir, I have to request you will attend with the detachment of police under your command, at Northampton pen, on Monday (nine o'clock) of the 17th instant, to assist at a special court to be there held, to investigate into certain charges and complaints which will be then preferred against Mr. Thomas Mason, the present proprietor of those properties. You will also cause all the apprentices belonging to Southampton and Content plantations to appear before said court, at the hour of nine in the morning, in order that they may be examined relative to their master's conduct toward them. A return is to be made to the court of all those who may be reported to be sick or unable to appear to give their evidence, in pursuance of orders from his excellency the Marquis of Sligo.”

3152. When you spoke of all those who may be sick or unable to appear, did you mean to allow under those last terms for such as might be detained about the necessary work of the plantation?—Most certainly.

3153. Are you aware whether the whole body of apprentices resorted to the court in compliance with that summons, or whether some necessarily remained to do the necessary work, or whether your order was misunderstood?—I will also read my letter to Mr. Mason on the subject in point. “December 16th 1834. Sir, I have to inform you that I have been honoured with instructions by his excellency the Governor to adopt such measures for securing the attendance of the witnesses whose evidence will be necessary to enable special justices Ramsay and Clinch to form a fair and impartial decision in your case. In obedience to which, I have given directions to Mr. Sub-inspector Samuels to summons and bring before a court, to be holden to-morrow morning, at nine o'clock, the 17th instant, at Northampton pen, all the apprentices belonging to Southampton and Content Hall pens, in order that they may be examined touching their several complaints against you for having violated the slave law of this island, and also the 4 Will. 4, c. 42. Should any apprentices belonging to the above pens not appear, a return will be necessary, in order that their absence may be satisfactorily accounted for.” If they were employed in the works they would be satisfactorily accounted for; it was stated on oath that all the second gang did remain.

3154. But it was made matter of charge against you, was it not, that the whole body of apprentices had been taken off the estates?—The whole body did not appear in consequence of my summons; those that did, came in consequence of Mr. Mason having told them that he had gained the day over Captain Oldrey; that Captain Oldrey was sent down by the Governor from Spanish Town, to punish them and to send them to dungeons and prisons; that he could not bear to see them punished, and therefore he recommended them to go into the bush, to hide themselves in the woods. The apprentices knowing that they had not acted wrong, and relying upon my justice, said, “If we fly from Captain Oldrey, to whom else can we look for justice?” and in consequence of their reliance upon my justice, they appeared before the court, but the police could not summon any of them. I will, with permission, read the evidence of Mr. Samuels upon that point. After my letter had been identified, Mr. Samuels gave his evidence as follows: “In consequence of the letter, he went with about 20 policemen on the 16th of December, to Content; it was about 11 o'clock; the police were with him, he took nobody else; he went to Content for the purpose of warning the people; he went the next day, warned as many people as he saw there; did not see any of the people at Content, but he found them at Northampton; that was where the court was held; he saw some old people at Content, but he was told they belonged to Manchester, and therefore did not warn them; he showed Mr. Mason his authority when he went to Southampton; he saw first a watchman, a pen-keeper, and a woman carrying water; he told them what he had come about, and told them to warn all the remainder of the people on both the properties. None of the apprentices accompanied witness's party; he obeyed the directions of the letter; he supposed about 100 negroes attended at Northampton in consequence of the warning.”

3155. In point of fact, however, a great number of apprentices did appear at Northampton?—Yes, Mr. Mason, on receiving a copy of my summons, accompanied Mr. Samuels to the negro-houses, and showed him that there were no negroes negroes there, consequently that he could not serve the summons upon them, and said that if he waited there a week he would not see one except on Sunday. Mr. Mason had advised his apprentices to go into the woods to conceal themselves, and he expected that they had followed his advice. Southampton was seven miles from Northampton, and Content two and a half. Mr. Samuels saw Mr. Mason at Southampton, who said, "Well, you will not find anybody here." I wish to show that the summonses were not actually served, although I was prosecuted for it. This is the order of the Governor to me to go to the property, which I wish to put in to show that I acted by his directions:—

"The King's House, 12 December 1834: Sir,—His excellency the Governor having thought fit that a most complete and minute investigation should be gone into as regards the complaints which were made by the apprentices of Mr. Mason, with respect to the insufficiency of their grounds, want of clothing and of medical attendance, and all other complaints which those people may have to make; likewise an inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Mason towards you during the time these complaints were gone into by you, as well as the circumstances urged by Mr. Mason against you;—I am directed by his excellency to apprise you that for such purpose he has ordered Mr. Ramsay and Mr. Clinch to proceed to Northampton, and on Wednesday next to commence such proceedings.

"His excellency therefore expects that you will attend on this occasion, and afford those gentlemen such information as may assist them in the discharge of the duty delegated to them; and that you adopt measures for securing the attendance of the witnesses, whose evidence will be necessary to enable them to form a fair and impartial decision."

3156. Chairman.] When you were last examined, you used the expression, "pro-slavery party," as applied to a class of persons in Jamaica; will you have the goodness to state to the Committee what you understand precisely by that expression?—I used it in contradistinction to that party which is called les amis des noir, friends of the negroes; in the pro-slavery party I include the greater part of the managers or planters in Jamaica, the majority of the House of Assembly, and the press, generally.

3157. When you call them the pro-slavery party, do you mean to say that you conceive that they are desirous of re-establishing slavery in Jamaica, or merely that they are in some respects opposed to the conduct and views of those whom you have called les amis des noir?—Opposed to the present system.

3158. You stated when you were last examined, that that opposition to the present system; and aversion to the new state of things which it has produced, have been gradually diminishing since you have had an opportunity of observing Jamaica?—I stated that it was diminished.

3159. Mr. Gladstone.] Is the Committee to understand that, from the result of your experience, you deliberately ascribe to the bodies which you have named, and to a large portion of the white population of Jamaica, a preference of the old system of slavery to the new system, and a desire, if possible, to return to it; does your opinion go that length, or is it only that you ascribe to them generally jealousy and irritation, and perhaps tenacity and obstinacy?—My opinion is, that the pro-slavery party, as I have designated them, in Jamaica, are decidedly opposed to the present system, and that they use every effort in their power to mar its success; that is my deliberate opinion.

3160. Would it be disagreeable to you to name individuals who you think are actuated by those motives?—I have given a very general scope, the majority of the House of Assembly, the majority of the white population, the majority of the planters and the press.

3161. Has your experience been extensive, or was it chiefly confined to a single parish?—It has been extensive, but it has been chiefly confined to a single parish.

3162. Your direct experience has been chiefly confined to a single parish, in that case you would hardly say that your direct experience was very extensive?—I should say it was, because I was in communication with almost all the owners or many other persons of consideration in the colony.

3163. When you say that you were in communication with almost all the owners, or many persons of consideration in the colony, do you mean official persons, or the great body of proprietors and negroes?—I have been brought into contact with a great many.

3164. But those would be almost exclusively in one parish?—Chiefly; but when I have gone to Montego Bay, and Kingston and Spanish Town, I have ascertained their opinions generally; some members of the Assembly and other gentlemen attending the courts.

3165. Have

Capt. W. Oldrey.

1 July 1836.

3165. Have you been in many parishes of Jamaica besides St. Elizabeth?—I have.

3166. In what parishes?—I have been in St. Andrew's, St. Katharine's, St. Dorothy's, Clarendon, St. Elizabeth, Manchester, a distant part of Westmoreland, St. James's, Trelawney, St. David's, St. Ann's, St. Thomas-in-the-Vale and in the East; all those places I have been in; I considered it my duty to become acquainted with the general opinions and feelings of the people at large.

3167. Mr. Buxton.] Have you reason to believe that this pro-slavery feeling has diminished since you left the colony?—From reports that I have received from very good authority, it has diminished, but still the opposition is very great.

3168. Have you ever known instances of female apprentices being flogged?—Yes, I have in the parish of St. Elizabeth, in the gaol of St. Elizabeth.

3169. Was there a strong and general feeling among the white population of Jamaica hostile to the infliction of corporal punishment upon females?—I should say not; as a proof of it, I was in Jamaica in the command of His Majesty's ship Hyacinth, when Mr. Beaumont proposed that female punishment should be abolished; only four members went to the bar, Mr. Beaumont, Mr. Watkis, Mr. John Salmon, junior, of St. Elizabeth, and some one else; from this I believe the mass of the resident proprietors in 1831 were in favour of corporal punishment.

3170. But the question is as to the feeling now; has there been a change in that feeling, or are they at this moment almost as much as they were formerly inclined to the continuance of corporal punishment upon females?—I should think the deliberate opinion of the House of Assembly, in favour of continuing corporal punishment on females, except four, could not so soon change.

3171. Has the practice of inflicting corporal punishment on females on the plantations absolutely ceased in Jamaica?—Yes, because it is contrary to law now.

3172. You have stated that instances have occurred of corporal punishment having been inflicted on females within the gaols?—Yes, in my own parish it has been done, until I put a stop to it.

3173. Do you conceive that the special magistrates have the power of preventing that taking place?—The special magistrate cannot be always in the gaol; it was contrary to law, yet it was done; but when it was reported to me I instantly put a stop to it, and wrote off to the Governor; and this is a letter to me in reply to my report: "King's-house, 1835.—That part of your letter respecting the use of the cat whilst on the tread-mill, has been referred to the Attorney-General, and it is not expedient that such a large power should be vested in the superintendent."

3174. Do you believe that the steps that were then taken have put an effectual stop to that practice?—I should hope so.

3175. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware of the precise nature of the motion of Mr. Beaumont to which you have adverted in the House of Assembly?—Yes, it was for the abolition of female punishment.

3176. Do you conceive that the vote of the House of Assembly in opposition to that measure was meant to imply that the corporal punishment of the females was lawful and ought to be maintained?—Yes, it was sanctioned by law.

3177. Has there been any declaration on the part of the House of Assembly in favour of the abolition of the corporal punishment of females since the abolition of slavery?—I have heard of none.

3178. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware that Lord Sligo sent the House of Assembly a message stating the fact that corporal punishment existed in the gaols, and that the House of Assembly took no notice of that message?—I have heard so; and I have read it in the reports of his excellency's speech to the House of Assembly.

3179. That was since the apprenticeship was established?—It was when the Assembly was dissolved or prorogued in the year 1835.

3180. Mr. Gladstone.] You have heard then that the House of Assembly took no notice of this message of Lord Sligo, but you have not heard any expression of opinion by the House of Assembly upon that point?—No, I have not.

3181. According to your impression, is the whipping of females legal in Jamaica?—It is illegal.

3182. You say that you have heard of cases which have taken place in the parish of Elizabeth; under what circumstances did they take place?—The females were upon the tread-mill, and I presume that they did not move fast enough on the steps, when the overseer directed the cat to be used, and it was used.

3183. Was it used upon female apprentices exclusively?—Exclusively.

3184. Are you aware whether under the same circumstances, it would have been applied to free females, or whether free females would have been liable to it according to the laws of the workhouse?—I should think not.

3185. Are you aware that they have special laws in the workhouse for the punishment of apprentices which do not apply to the case of free persons?—I do not know of any special law; there is a general law that female apprentices shall not be punished.

3186. The general law to which you advert is the law of abolition, which enacts, that female apprentices shall not be punished upon estates; is not the regulation under which this punishment to which you allude is supposed to have taken place, the law of the workhouse, for the maintenance of workhouse discipline?—I should think not; because no vestry law can be opposed to the law of the island or to the imperial Act.

3187. But the cases of the flogging of females, which you have quoted, are cases in which the punishment purports to have been inflicted, does it not, for an infraction of workhouse discipline?—I presume that it was because they did not move quick enough upon the steps; I can only offer that assumption.

3188. You are not aware of the ground of its infliction?—Only what I have stated.

3189. You have assumed, but you are not positively aware?—I am not positively aware.

3190. How many such cases have you heard?—As a special magistrate for St. Elizabeth, it was reported to me that they had been whipped in my absence.

3191. In how many cases?—I cannot say; but I instantly put a stop to it, and reported it to the Governor; the answer is in his excellency's letter I have now read.

3192. You are not aware how many cases took place, and no statement was made to you upon the subject?—As soon as a case was reported I put a stop to the punishment; I do not know how many had taken place before.

3194. Was it reported to you that it was a general practice to flog females in the workhouse, or was it reported in that particular instance a particular female had been flogged?—I do not know how many times it had been inflicted, but when I returned to the town of Black River to hold a court on the Saturday where the gaol was, it was reported to me that females had been punished with a cat. I promptly inquired into the case, and ordered its immediate cessation. By the first post I made the report that I have mentioned; it was stated that females were punished upon the tread-mill; more than one I found upon the tread-mill at the time.

3195. Mr. Buxton.] Was it reported to you that there was a system of flogging females in the gaol?—It was reported to me that females were flogged upon the tread-mill; and instantly, on receiving a report, I put a stop to it.

3196. Do you believe that this was an isolated instance of an individual being flogged, or do you believe that it was a system which was adopted?—I cannot say that it was a system, but I am convinced that many must have been flogged upon the mill. At the time I allude to there were four upon the mill.

3197. And had those four been flogged?—I ordered the cats out of the hands of the boatswains myself when in the act of flogging them.

3198. Chairman.] Then you found that there were four females who were about to be flogged?—They were on the steps of the mill, and they were flogged with the cat when the mill was going round; the boatswains had the cats in their hands.

3199. Do you mean that the practice was, that the flogging took place, not as a punishment for misconduct, but that while they were on the mill the whip was used as a stimulus?—Yes, decidedly as a stimulus.

3200. You satisfied yourself of that being the case by personal inspection?—Yes, and instantly put a stop to it.

Capt. W. Oldrey.

1 July 1836.

3201. Mr. Gladstone.] You, as special magistrate, went into the workhouse, and gave an order to the boatswains to desist from the use of the cat, and they did so desist; is that correct?—Yes, and I ordered the superintendent not to punish any one upon the mill, neither man nor woman.

3202. Your impression in general was that the punishment had never been authorized by the law of the island?—It never was; it could not be.

3203. The Governor bore you out fully in that impression?—He did.

3204. Supposing it not to have been authorized by the law of the island, it was in the power of the executive, without the interposition of the legislative body, effectually to prevent the recurrence of such a practice, or to provide for its being punished when it had occurred?—Certainly, to provide for its being punished when proved to have occurred.

3205. May not that be sufficient to account for the House of Assembly not taking part in any notice of such proceeding, inasmuch as it would seem to devolve upon the Governor, as his duty to prevent it, if the case were already provided for by law?—I have already stated that the Governor did as the executive put a stop to such practices when made known; the law was distinct upon the point, but the law was infringed upon in more workhouses than one.

3207. Did it never enter into your mind that such a prosecution ought to be instituted, as they had offended against the law, and besides been guilty of a cruel and a very improper act?—It did; but his excellency, I presume, considered that the superintendent had been guilty of inflicting the punishment more through ignorance than any other cause, and from his conciliating feeling did not order any prosecution, to my knowledge, in the case.

3208. Chairman.] Do you know that it was the habit in the gaols in Jamaica to place in the tread-mills males or females that were not apprentices?—I never heard of any free female being put upon the tread-mill.

3209. Are you satisfied that they never were?—I am satisfied none were in St. Elizabeth, and I should think in no other part of the island.

3210. Mr. Gladstone.] Practically, with reference to the sufficiency of the law as it exists at present, are you aware that a prosecution was instituted against a supervisor on account of a case of female flogging, which occurred in the Trelawney house of correction?—I do not know.

3211. Supposing it to be true, for a moment, assuming the fact, for argument's sake, that such a prosecution has been instituted, and that it has been conducted to issue and that the supervisor has been found guilty for the offence under the slave law, are you of opinion that the sufficiency of the law is clearly vindicated, at least so far as regards the infliction of flogging by supervisors of their own authority?—I am in that case.

3212. Mr. Buxton.] But though this opinion would settle the point as to its legality of the punishment inflicted by the supervisor on his own authority, do you mean to say that in case he had the authority of the magistrate, there would be the means of preventing the continuance of that practice of flogging females, and are you so well acquainted with Jamaica law as to say that that will still be illegal?—It certainly would be illegal, even if he had the authority of a magistrate.

3213. Mr. Gladstone.] What did you consider to be your legal authority for going into the workhouse and putting a stop to this practice; did you conceive that the clause of the Abolition Act, which constitutes special magistrates, authorized you to interpose in the case of workhouse discipline between the prisoners in the workhouse and those who were set over them?—Most certainly.

3214. Did you conceive that the letter of the law gave you that authority, or that, though the letter did not give you that authority, you were carrying out its spirit and intent?—I consider that I was carrying out its spirit.

3215. Did you or did you not conceive that you had authority under the letter of the law?—I consider that I had, for the law particularly states that no female shall be punished; it is illegal. I had committed some of the women myself. I was a local magistrate as well as a special magistrate; other special magistrates not in the local commission of the peace did not consider that they had a right. A special magistrate, not a local, stated to me in writing, that he had not the power of entering into the workhouses. In me it was lawful; in the other special magistrate, who was not a local magistrate, it was not lawful.

3216. Chairman.] How did you happen to be a local magistrate as well as a special special magistrate?—I was a local magistrate for two parishes, from the month of April 1834, several months before the Abolition Act came into force.

3217. The Governor may, if he please, appoint any special magistrate a local magistrate?—Yes, he may.

3218. Is that usually done?—It is usually done, and I believe the reason why it is now generally done is, on account of the irregularities which have been committed in the workhouses.

3219. Mr. Buxton.] Do you know of any law or regulation in Jamaica authorizing a special magistrate to adjudge an indemnification to the apprentice for any wrong or injury done to him?—Special magistrates can only fine to the amount of 5*l.*, and that goes to the island treasury, not to the apprentice; the law in that point is extremely defective; I will give a case: a certain planter in St. Elizabeth told his apprentices that he would knock their teeth down their throat, and they might spit them up again before Captain Oldrey, and he would pay his fine of 5 l.; that was Mr. Mason; it came out in evidence in a complaint made to me.

3220. Have you known instances of cutting off female hair?—I have.

3221. Is the custom injurious to the health of the negroes?—Most decidedly it is, in a hot climate like Jamaica; they consider it to be a very cruel thing.

3222. Are you conversant with the operation of the eight-hours' system?—I am.

3223. Will you be good enough to state to the Committee what the operation of the eight hours' system is?—It deprives the apprentices of a half day to go to their grounds to cultivate them, which would enable them to go on Saturday to market; the market may be from 20 to 30 miles from their grounds; the average distance of the markets, I should say would be, taking it from the centre of the parish, 12 miles in the parish of St. Elizabeth.

3224. Will you go on to explain the operation of the eight hours' system?—It gives an opportunity to the proprietor or manager to extract as much work out of the apprentices in the eight hours as in the nine, which is the legal time for field labour, in my opinion; but the Act is so defective, that we cannot compel the masters or managers to work their apprentices on the legal nine hours' system.

3225. Mr. Gladstone.] Will you explain how it gives them the opportunity of getting the nine hours' work done in eight hours?—They are sent out to field labour at daylight; they have no clocks or watches to regulate the time, and they are nominally worked eight hours; but I believe they are worked nine, and they are completely deprived of the half day which the spirit of the Act gives them.

3226. Mr. Buxton.] So that the first reason why the negroes lose their time is, that the hour of the day is somewhat uncertain, and they do not know precisely the moment at which they should terminate their labours; is there not another objection to it, namely, that they cannot in the short interval after they have been working eight hours, go to their provision grounds?—Most certainly.

3227. And consequently the advantage which it was supposed they would derive of having half the day on the Friday, when they might go and work on the provision grounds, is taken away from them?—It is so.

3228. And, practically speaking, did the negroes consider that of all the hardships they had to endure, the greatest and the heaviest was that of the eight hours' system?—They considered it a very great hardship, and a very great loss.

3229. Have the apprentices been driven, under the adoption of the eight hours' system, to surrender the allowances which they were accustomed to enjoy in a state of slavery?—I have understood so, and it has been resorted to for punishment.

3230. Do you mean to say that, in the first instance, the eight hours nominal are nine hours' employment in point of fact; and secondly, that the half of the Friday is not given to the negro, and consequently that he has not the opportunity of working his provision grounds?—He loses half a day in working his provision grounds.

3231. As far as you knew the state of the negroes, where the eight hours' system was in operation, did they lose the half day on the Friday?—They do; but many of the good proprietors do allow the apprentices to work according to the spirit of the law, which is on the nine hours' system.

1 July 1836.

3232. But where the eight hours' system is in operation, they lose the half Friday?—Yes, it prevents their going to their grounds, for it is impossible that they can go eight or nine or ten miles to their grounds after they are blown off their work, which is at sunset; there is no twilight of any extent in that country.

3233. But you are quite clear in the fact that, where the eight hours' system is introduced, the negroes do not get the half Friday?—They do not.

3234. Mr. Gladstone.] Was the eight hours' system, as you have described it, carried into operation on all the estates in the parish of St. Elizabeth, or on a great majority of them?—On the majority; the nine hours' system was followed on a great many plantations; the eight hours' system was enforced, but it is only resorted to by those who are opposed to the law.

3235. During the period to which your experience refers, did any change take place in the proportions of the estates or plantations where the eight hours' system, and the nine hours' system respectively were adopted; and did the number of those on which the nine hours' system was preferred, increase or decrease?—On plantations the adoption of the eight hours' system has increased, and that for the purpose of punishing the negroes.

3236. Of the 18,000 or 20,000 negroes, who were in the parish of St. Elizabeth, were a greater number under the influence of the eight hours' system, when you ceased to be a special magistrate, than there were when you commenced being a special magistrate?—They commenced first of all on the nine hours' system generally, almost throughout the parish; but when they discovered that the law, so vaguely worded, gave them the power of working them on the eight hours' system, it was changed on a great many plantations, not a half, less than a half, a great many.

3237. On a quarter?—I should say about a quarter or a third; I cannot say, but on a great many.

3238. Did any of those who had thus adopted the eight hours' system for the purpose of punishing the negroes, afterwards return to a more conciliating course, and adopt the nine hours' system?—Some did, on my recommendation.

3239. Many of them?—Some of them did.

3240. At the time you went away, what proportions of the plantations were adopting the nine hours' system; were there as many as a quarter?—The plantations generally were working on the nine hours' system; but a great number were working on the eight hours' as a punishment.

3241. Were there as many as a quarter of the whole of the estates working on the eight hours' system when you ceased to be a magistrate?—I should think so.

3242. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think that the law would be improved by recognizing only the nine hours' system?—It would be a great improvement, and it would give great satisfaction to the apprentices generally.

3243. You said on the last occasion that it would be necessary greatly to amend the present law of Jamaica; is it your opinion that the local legislature would ever consent to introduce the necessary amendments?—I do not think they would, and therefore it is absolutely necessary that the Imperial Parliament should legislate for them.

3244. What do you consider to be the treatment of the negroes in the workhouse?—Very cruel, very bad; but more particularly I confine myself to the workhouse of St. Elizabeth; I beg leave further to observe, that unless some amendment takes place in the law as now existing in Jamaica, that I firmly believe, that at the end of the apprenticeship, instead of the lands increasing in value, they will decrease; I consider also that it will be the means of doing so much injury to the colony that it will become a second St. Domingo.

3245. Chairman.] Are you speaking particularly with reference to the treatment that the negroes receive at the workhouses?—I speak of the general system of laws as they stand; the laws ought to be amended, and unless they are amended, I think the result will be as I have stated.

3246. Do you mean that upon the expiration of the apprenticeship system the other laws that will be in force will be, in your opinion, such as to be likely to produce the disastrous effects which you have referred to?—I consider that the present laws, if continued to the expiration of the apprenticeship, will produce such a feeling on the part of the negro population, that it will be almost ruinous to the colony.

3247. How do you reconcile what you have now stated with what you said on a previous occasion, that there was a reciprocal and increasing good feeling between master and apprentice?—There is; but it will not be to the extent necessary; there is a great hope that the Abolition Act will be amended by the Imperial Parliament; and I verily believe that that is the reason why so good a feeling exists on the part of the apprentices; the amendments that I could suggest to the law (I speak practically) would, I think, correct all or most of the abuses, and it would be for the general interests of the proprietors at large, and for the comfort and happiness of the apprentices.

3248. What points do you specially refer to, as, in your opinion, requiring correction in the abolition law; are the alterations which you consider necessary explained in the letter to Lord Glenelg, which you have delivered in to the Committee?—Not to the extent that I deem absolutely necessary.

3249. Why did you not, when you wrote to Lord Glenelg, state to him fully what alterations you thought necessary when you were treating on that subject?—I wrote rather in a hurry, and I omitted several things which I can add, if deemed necessary, and I will submit it, if required, to the Committee.

3250. Will you have the goodness to prepare a paper for the use of the Committee which shall contain the additional suggestions which you would desire to make, besides those which are contained in your letter to Lord Glenelg?—I will.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

3251. Chairman.] WILL you have the goodness to proceed with your observations upon the subject of the Jamaica enactments?—I will refer to those observations which have been made upon the subject of flogging females. It has been supposed that there is an authority existing in the law of Jamaica for flogging females; it has been alleged that the practice of flogging females prevails in Jamaica since the passing of the Abolition Act; this allegation rests on the supposed authority of the following passage of the Governor's speech, made by him on proroguing the Assembly, on the 3rd of February in the present year: "You were reminded that the infliction of corporal punishment had been deputed to the supervisors and managers of such establishments, a class to which the constitution does not confine those magisterial powers, which have been here placed in their hands; all of these subjects have remained unnoticed. The whipping of females, you were informed by me officially, was in practice, and I called upon you to put an end to conduct so repugnant to humanity and so contrary to law; so far from passing an Act to prevent the recurrence of such cruelty, you have in no way expressed your disapprobation of it; you have not even denied the truth of my assertion, and therefore must have credited it, notwithstanding you have taken no step to put an end to the practice." The Committee will be so good as to bear in recollection, that the speech of the Governor was made on the 3rd of February. It is right for me to bring to the knowledge of the Committee the proceedings which had taken place from the time the house was first called until this prorogation. Lord Sligo had called the House of Assembly together at a very unusual and inconvenient period, namely, in the month of August. The session which he then convened consisted of no other acts than the delivery of his speech and his receiving the address of the Assembly in answer to it. On receiving it, he thought proper to dissolve the Assembly. The consequence was, that it was not possible for the Assembly to meet again before the 10th of November, which was three weeks later later than its ordinary period of meeting, the time for getting through the important business, which in a large colony like Jamaica must engage their attention, was too circumscribed to admit of being completed before the Christmas holydays. They were under the necessity, on the 17th of December, of applying to the Governor for an adjournment over the holydays. The presence of the members on their properties at that period of the year is indispensably necessary. That adjournment accordingly took place, and the house again met on the 26th of January. On the 1st of February the Governor sent down that message, which the house considered, and on the 2d of February declared by a resolution to be an invasion of their privileges; and by that resolution the house further declared, that they could not, consistently with their own duty or with a due regard to their rights and privileges, proceed to any other business till reparation was made for that breach of privilege; on the same day the house sent this resolution to the Governor. On the 3rd of February, the day immediately following, the Governor sent for the house, and by the speech which I have just now read prorogued them until the following day. On the following day the house again met, and the Governor having made no reparation for the breach of privilege which he had committed, the house renewed their resolution of the preceding session, and sent a message to the Governor, informing him that they could not proceed to business until they had obtained reparation for that breach of privilege. On the 5th of February the Governor sent a message, reiterating his conviction that he had made no breach of privilege, and refusing to make any reparation. The consequence was, that the house came to the resolution, "That his excellency's message this day, reiterating his conviction that he had committed no breach of the privileges of this house, is not satisfactory, and therefore this house cannot, consistently with its rights and privileges, proceed to any further public business." The Governor then, on the same evening, prorogued the Assembly by proclamation. The Committee, therefore, will perceive, that after the Governor had called their attention on the 3rd of February to this subject of the flogging of females, and the power delegated to the supervisor of the workhouse, which he considered that they had admitted to be well-founded, no opportunity presented itself for the house sitting as a House of Assembly to give any answer to it, because the breach of privilege committed by the Governor and his refusal to make reparation for it, had precluded the house from proceeding to any other business; but they did make a representation, distinctly and unequivocally denying the truth of the statement in the Governor's speech, and the representation was made in a strictly legal and constitutional manner; it was made in strict conformity with and under the authority of the law of the island. The members of the Council and Assembly, by virtue of Acts of the legislature, which have been renewed from time to time for about 120 years, exist as a known recognized legal body, even when the Assembly is dissolved, and a fortiori when it is prorogued. They have the power, under the law which appoints them, of meeting and making their representation to the Government, through their agent, also appointed by law. They are required by the law to give a certain notice of the time of their meeting, in order that all those who are members of either branch of the legislature may attend and decide upon the nature of the representation which shall be made to the Government. Having given that notice, they met, and resolved upon making that representation; and accordingly, by their despatch to me of the 7th February, they addressed to me that representation, and directed me to lay it before His Majesty's Government. That representation is in the papers which were read by an Honourable Member the other day. I hold in my hand the despatch which was addressed to me by the committee of correspondence, which is signed by twenty-six members of the House of Assembly; the signatures are here, and the passage which is in this despatch was transcribed by me in conformity with my instructions, into the statement addressed to Lord Glenelg, and in which statement the House of Assembly, for I use that term to designate the individuals who compose it and who formed the committee of correspondence, distinctly deny the fact of any such practice existing. The passage in their despatch and in this statement is to this effect: "The house replies that they cannot allow their silence on this topic as any evidence of their assent to his excellency's proposition; rather should it be taken as a proof of their courtesy and forbearance, which would not suffer them to deny what the King's representative asserted as a fact, although it was well known to the house that his excellency had been grossly imposed upon by some enemy of the island. The house repudiate in the strongest terms terms they can find, the accusation that the whipping of females is practised in Jamaica. The house must lament that the broad and positive declaration by the noble Marquis, that the practice of flogging women is common in Jamaica, is calculated to raise in Great Britain a repetition of that clamour of which this colony has been so much the victim. The public prints noticed some time ago, with reprobation, the whipping of a female in the Kingston workhouse. This claimed the interference of the executive and the punishment of the offender, but could not require a new law; for his excellency remarks in the passage recited, that the practice was contrary to law. Another case took place in the Trelawney house of correction, for which the supervisor was dismissed by the magistrates, and a prosecution is now pending against him for an assault on the individual. We are ignorant of any other instances of the whipping of females. It is true that such acts are against law, and also subject to severe penalties, that it is beyond the duty or power of the legislature further to interfere. The laws which the legislature have passed, it is the province of the Crown to carry into execution." Now I would refer to the fact which is here mentioned of the prosecution of the supervisor of the Trelawney house of correction on the 15th of March last at the Cornwall Assizes. This supervisor was found guilty, because under the law this supervisor had no authority to flog females.

3252. Did the committee of correspondence mean to affirm in the despatch which you have just read, that the practice of flogging females actually did not take place, or that it was illegal?—I consider them as asserting both facts, that the practice did not prevail and that the practice was contrary to law, and they refer to the only two instances which have come to their knowledge of such a practice having taken place, the one which occurred in the workhouse in Kingston, where the executive immediately interfered and the party was removed; and the other, which took place in the Trelawney house of correction, where the supervisor was removed and a prosecution was pending against him.

3253. Is it not possible that more instances of this practice may have taken place without its coming to the knowledge of the committee of correspondence?—I should say, that as the members of the House of Assembly were resident in different parts of the island, and generally were persons of property and magistrates, if the practice of flogging females prevailed, or if it had been sanctioned either by any regulation in the workhouse or by any authority given by a magistrate, it must have been known to them.

3254. Were you present the other day when Captain Oldrey stated to this Committee in his evidence, that he had himself seen four females on the treadmill in the parish of St. Elizabeth, who were subjected to the lash while they were on the treadmill?—I heard him state so, and I do not at all mean to controvert a statement, of course, which fell within his own observation, but I refer to the statement made by the committee of correspondence, for the purpose of showing that those were the only two cases which had come to their knowledge; and therefore, that the practice could not have prevailed to any extent, and that it was deemed by them to be contrary to law.

3255. Supposing this statement of Captain Oldrey to be correct, does not that prove that such a practice might exist, and yet have escaped the knowledge of the committee of correspondence?—That particular instance might have escaped their knowledge unquestionably; but it does not appear to me possible that such a thing could have been a proceeding practised without other instances having come to their knowledge besides those two, which they aver were the only instances which had come to their knowledge. That it was contrary to law is evident from the conviction which took place in March last, of the supervisor of the workhouse of Trelawney; that conviction proceeded on the ground that it was contrary to law. My own impression most decidedly is, that after the passing of the Abolition Act, it is impossible to maintain that either a magistrate or a supervisor has authority to punish female apprentices by flogging. It seems to me clear, that if there had crept into the regulations of a workhouse any looseness of expression seeming to authorize it, which I really do not know, for I am not aware of any regulation or any law which authorizes it, and I have given myself some trouble to discover it, as it would be at variance with the Abolition Act, it must and would be corrected by that Act.

3256. Would it not be in the power of the Governor, supposing it admitted that the law forbids the flogging of females in the workhouses, to issue a general direction to all the supervisors of the workhouses within the island of Jamaica, calling calling their attention to this state of the law, and strictly forbidding the practice?—No doubt; and it is scarcely possible to conceive that the thing could have taken place without having been reported to the Governor, and we find in the instance which does take place, of the person in the Trelawney workhouse coming to the knowledge of the Governor, that party was prosecuted by the Attorney-General at the assizes, and was convicted.

3257. Do you know whether any step of the kind, to which I have alluded, has been taken by the Governor?—I am not aware of it; but the Governor may put himself of course in communication, by means of his secretary, with every supervisor of a workhouse in the island.

3258. Is there a workhouse in every parish?—Yes.

3259. Are there visiting magistrates, as is the practice in England?—There are visiting magistrates in every parish.

3260. Have the special magistrates free access to every workhouse?—I take it for granted that they have; if there was any difficulty arising from the distinction between the local magistrate and the magistrate having a special commission, the Governor might obviate that at once by granting a special magistrate a local commission. I believe it was at my own suggestion that clause was introduced into the Act, by which the Governor might grant local commissions to every special magistrate.

3261. Then are you of opinion that, without any new Act, it would be in the power of the Governor to take measures which would prevent the slightest chance of the recurrence of this practice?—I have not the slightest doubt of it.

3262. Mr. Johnston.] Have you any evidence of the judgment in the case of the prosecution of the supervisor of the Trelawney workhouse?—I have no evidence of it; but the source from which I derive my information of that trial and that conviction, is one of the newspapers of the colony, which reports the proceedings of the assizes for the county of Cornwall, held in the town of Montego Bay in March last; I have no record of the conviction, but the indictment was tried before the Chief-Justice of the island.

3263. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you any account from any Jamaica newspaper which you can put in?—I have not any Jamaica newspaper with me at present, but I will hand it in when I come on a future day.

3264. Chairman.] Do you remember whether the cases of flogging which you have alluded to were similar to those described by Captain Oldrey the other day, in which the apprentices were placed upon the tread-mill, and the lash used as a stimulus?—I had no knowledge whatever of it until I heard the instances mentioned here by Captain Oldrey the other day; I had not the slightest notion that such a practice prevailed.

3265. Mr. Johnston.] Will you turn your attention to a clause of the Jamaica Gaol Act, of the date of the 4th of July 1834, in page 300, in which it is stated that a justice of the parish to which such prison, &c., may belong, shall have power to inquire upon oath, &c., to order the offender to be punished, &c., or by personal correction; in reference to your opinion, that there is no law regarding Jamaica by which the flogging of females could have been at all justified, may not this phrase which is used, "or by personal correction," give sanction to the practice?—My opinion is, that there is one principle by which every Act must be construed, if its terms be ambiguous, and even though its terms should be express, and that principle is furnished in the express prohibition contained in the Abolition Act, and by its annulling any provision in a colonial Act contravening that prohibition. When I find the British Act of Parliament expressly enacting that any act of the colonial legislature authorizing the infliction of whipping on female apprentices shall be null and void, I apprehend that it would be the duty of a court of justice to take that Abolition Act and the colonial Act, to read the one in reference to the other, and certainly not to give such a construction to the colonial Act as would be at variance with the express prohibition contained in the Abolition Act.

3266. Mr. Gladstone.] With reference to that particular clause of the Jamaica Gaol Act, it being general in its terms, would it not be in direct violation of a known and universal principle in the interpretation of laws, to refer that general enactment to a specific and subsequent enactment upon the same subject?—Clearly so.

3268. Did the whipping of females form exclusively the subject of that message?—The message is this; it refers to the regulations respecting gaols.

His excellency the Governor is compelled to request the attention of the legislature to the Act for making further provision for the building, repairing and regulating of gaols, houses of correction, hospitals and asylums, for the purpose of completely guarding against certain abuses, which if not specifically declared to be illegal, are liable to occur in the administration of that law.

It is plainly impossible that all the minute rules required for the good government of the places of confinement and punishment, varying as they must with different circumstances, could be introduced into a statute of the island. The power of making such rules was unavoidably delegated to the justices assembled at the general or quarter sessions, who must be considered as the unexceptionable depositaries of such trust. But a construction may in some instances be given to a power thus delegated completely at variance with the wise and humane regulations of the law for the abolition of slavery, which should always be taken in connexion with any measure affecting that class of persons for whose benefit it was framed.

His excellency understands that the power of inflicting corporal punishment at their own discretion has been trusted to the supervisors of workhouses; those persons, however respectable they may be, are not in his excellency's opinion of the class in life to justify such confidence. Instances which have recently come before the public show that this is not a loose assertion, and the fact that the magistracy, whom the spirit of the British Constitution entrusts with the power of summary punishment, are chosen out of another class, confirms him in the sentiment. He hopes, therefore, that the supervisors may be deprived of that power, and that it may be reposed in the magistrates and no one else.

A much more serious breach, not only of the spirit but even of the letter of the law, has been committed under the supposed authority of the Act in question. His excellency alludes to the rule permitting the use of the whip upon women by the superintendents of tread-mills. This is a direct infringement on the 21st section of the Abolition Act, which expressly forbids the whipping of the women under any circumstances.

3269. Did the House of Assembly make any answer to that message?—They did not.

3270. Did they give answers to all the other 13 messages?—No.

3271. To how many of them did they give answers?—"That the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th messages do lie upon the table; that the 7th be referred to a committee of the whole house, to inquire and take into further consideration the state of the island."

3272. Then it appears that the two messages which refer to the state of public accounts and the 14th message, were the only messages of the whole number upon which measures were proposed to be immediately taken?—They were.

3273. What was the subject of the 14th message?—"I am commanded by his excellency the Governor to lay before the house an estimate of the expense of keeping clean and in repair the arms belonging to the island in the year 1836."

3274. Therefore, as it was for the year 1836, it in its own nature required to be taken into consideration?—Necessarily so.

3275. What is the date of the order which you have just read to the Committee that such and such messages do lie upon the table?—It was on the 17th of November the message of the Governor was sent, together with the other thirteen, and on the same day this order was made that some should be taken into consideration, and that others should lie upon the table.

3277. Were there any other subjects in which the house was necessarily called upon to occupy itself during the interval between November and the Christmas holydays?—Necessarily so; at the time that Lord Sligo prorogued the house there were no fewer than twelve bills, among others the Act which imposes taxes upon the importation of articles from different parts of the world, and various petitions of individuals; and I hold in my hand this mass of paper, constituting the votes of the Assembly, without the appendix, which would show the proceedings of the house from the 17th of of November.

3278. Were there any subjects of great legislative importance connected with the state of the island, which commanded immediate attention, and somewhat like exclusive attention on the part of the House of Assembly?—There was a police Act, "An Act for the Colonization of the interior part of the Colony, for increasing

5 July 1836.

W. Burge, Esq.

5 July 1836

increasing Emigration, and the Subsistence of the Troops." The case of persons having claims of a small amount to compensation in the colonies, I should say, as far as my experience goes, I have seldom, if ever, seen a session which had a greater proportion of business requiring immediate attention than that session which met on the 17th of November; the house was necessarily obliged to confine itself very strictly to the public business, because they had been deprived of three or four weeks of the ordinary time which had been accustomed to be appropriated to the discharge of the public business of the island.

3279. Is the period before the Christmas vacation, that in which they usually vote the supplies?—The supplies are generally the last measure voted by the house.

3280. After the Christmas vacation or before?—After Christmas, if the session is not finished before Christmas; except from some accidental circumstances the house, by meeting in October, is enabled to get through its business before the Christmas holidays, and thus a great expense and inconvenience to the members are avoided.

3281. Were any proceedings taken, to your knowledge, upon any of those eleven messages that were placed upon the table of the House of Assembly before the Christmas vacation?—I find, on the very next day, upon the 18th, the second message of the Governor, which was a particular communication on the subject of the Act in Aid, was taken up again and read, and then was referred to a committee. The twelfth message from his excellency the Governor was taken up and again read and referred to another committee.

3282. As other messages from the Governor were taken up, and measures instituted upon them, what do you conceive to have been the reason why no notice was taken of this communication relative to the government of gaols, and particularly to female flogging?—The reason is stated by the committee of the House of Assembly, in their communication to me, and which forms part of the papers before Parliament, that it was not necessary, that the practice did not exist, and, as they said, in order to avoid giving to the Governor's statement, what they must have given, a direct contradiction.

3283. The Governor in his message speaks of a rule in workhouses which allows of the infliction of this punishment upon females; are you aware of such a rule?—I am not.

3284. Chairman.] Though the Assembly may have been correct in saying that this practice was illegal, does it appear to you that they were correct in saying that in point of fact it had not taken place in any instances?—They are not pledging themselves that those may be the only two instances; I do not read their paper in that way, but they are denying that such a practice can be considered as prevailing, and they allege that they know of only the two instances they mention.

3285. They mean that it was unusual, not that it had never taken place?—I do understand the statement in the way I have mentioned.

3286. Mr. Gladstone.] Then it appears that the Governor and the House of Assembly were of one mind, as to the sufficiency of the powers which might be employed under the existing law to prevent this practice?—Yes.

3287. Is it your own opinion that a special magistrate, whether a local magistrate or not, has power to visit the houses of correction?—I conceive so, certainly.

3288. Are you aware whether, in point of fact, most of the special magistrates in Jamaica are local magistrates, according to the suggestion that you offered?—I believe they are; I do not know to what extent that clause has been adopted, but I can myself see no objection to every special magistrate in the island having a local commission.

3289. Do you think that the Governor had a right to issue a proclamation, warning the supervisors against the flogging of females?—A perfect right.

3290. Have the House of Assembly such a right?—No, it would have been illegal for them to do that; they must leave that to the executive, thinking that the law was quite abundant to prevent such an act.

3291. Are you of opinion that, though it is illegal for the superintendent of the workhouse, of his own authority, to order females to be flogged, yet that the magistrate has the power to authorize such punishment?—I do not conceive that he has.

3292. Are you decidedly of opinion that he has not that power?—Perfectly so; I feel it impossible to reconcile such a power being placed in the magistrate, with that express enactment in the abolition law, which prohibits the flogging of females, and which annuls any law contravening that prohibition.

3294. Where does it occur to you, that there is anything repugnant or contradictory in the Jamaica Gaol Act, with the provision in the imperial Act?—Because I find this expressed prohibition of flogging female apprentices, and I cannot read this proviso in such a manner as in fact to nullify that prohibition.

3295. Then you do not hold that this proviso, which is embodied in the same clause, has the effect of doing away with the provision which is antecedent to it?—I must read that reddendo singula singulis; I cannot read it as authorizing any justice of the peace to punish any apprenticed female by whipping or beating the person.

3296. Has he no power to inflict punishment upon her as a prisoner, in the house of correction, in the same way as he would inflict a punishment upon any other person there?—I apprehend that under this clause, if there exist a regulation applicable to all persons who are in the workhouse in the character of criminals, that regulation is applicable to all alike, and that it affects apprentices, subject however to the restriction contained in the abolition law in relation to the flogging of female apprentices.

3297. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you not think that the breadth of that prohibition to flog females is restricted by the proviso at the end of the clause, as much as the other clauses are restricted?—I should doubt it.

3298. Will you explain to the Committee the ground of that doubt, or make clear the principle that that enactment is excepted from the operation of that proviso?—I can satisfy the terms of that proviso, without importing into it the whole of the prohibition contained in the previous enacting part of the clause; I am not bound to import into it that part which prohibits the punishment of females by flogging, because there are other species of punishments which are permitted to be inflicted by others than the special justices; but that description of punishment is inflicted in workhouses under regulations that have been made, and which are applicable to all descriptions of criminals.

3299. Do you think that that does satisfy the terms of the proviso?—I think so, when I look to the object of the Act.

3300. Mr. Johnston.] Although under the imperial Act the magistrate has no power to punish by flogging, the question arises whether he has power to commit such females against the abolition law to the workhouse, and then when those females became inmates of the houses of correction, these cases falling within the scope of the regulations in Jamaica Gaol Act, whether giving a fair common sense construction to the clause to which your attention has been called, a justice is empowered to direct the punishment or the personal correction on those females, irrespective of the imperial Act, inasmuch as the provision by which the 17th clause is guarded expressly excepts any previous regulation or police laws, which have been or may be passed by the Legislature at Jamaica?—It is a matter of opinion; I cannot put it otherwise than I have put it already, and that is my impression; my opinion is, that they cannot under that clause flog females.

3301. Mr. Gladstone.] What are the terms of the Jamaica Act, in which it interdicts female flogging?—Verbatim with the imperial Act. The 21st clause is, "That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons entitled to the services of any such apprenticed labourer, or any other person or persons other than such justices of the peace holding special commissions to punish any apprenticed labourer for any offence by the whipping, beating or imprisonment, &c."

W. Burge, Esq.

5 July 1836.

3302. Mr. Johnston.] Is felony punishable by flogging under the Jamaica laws?—No person found guilty of felony is sentenced to the workhouse; they are sentenced to the gaol.

3303. Do any of the courts of Jamaica, under the laws of the island, ever inflict the punishment of flogging for felony?—I have known instances of flogging.

3304. But the Committee is to understand that the courts of Jamaica may sentence to flogging in the case of felony?—No doubt about it.

3305. Without distinction of sex?—Without distinction of sex; I know no law against it.

3306. Then previous to the abolition law coming into operation, did the practice of female flogging prevail in Jamaica?—The practice of flogging females did prevail.

3307. Mr. Gladstone.] Several cases have come under your notice, in which it has been stated that female flogging has taken place in the workhouse; have any of those been cases in which it has been alleged to have taken place under order of a magistrate?—No, I know nothing of instances, except the two which are contained in this despatch of the committee of correspondence, the one Captain Oldrey spoke of.

3308. Did you understand that in any of those which had been made known to you the order of a magistrate was supposed to be given?—I am not aware whether the order of the magistrate was or was not given. As connected with this subject, I ought here to advert to an imputation which was made the other day, that there was a party in Jamaica called a pro-slavery party, whose object was to defeat or to render futile the enactment of the Abolition Act; I beg leave to express my firm conviction that this is an imputation which has no foundation; I do not believe that there exists any such party, and further, I am perfectly convinced that the whole proceeding which led to the late prorogation of the House of Assembly originated not in any unwillingness to renew the Act in Aid, but from a conviction of the necessity of maintaining their rights, which had been invaded by the interference of the Marquis of Sligo. I can give you a strong proof of the correctness of this belief: since the Committee met on Friday, accounts have arrived from Jamaica, from which it appears that the Government here having honestly and fairly directed Lord Sligo to make reparation for the breach of privileges which had been committed by him, and he having obeyed that direction by sending my Lord Glenelg's despatch, addressed to Lord Sligo, the House of Assembly did not allow 24 hours to elapse before they immediately brought in an Act corresponding precisely with that Act which Sir George Grey introduced into the House of Commons, and when the packet sailed on the 27th, although it was only the third day after the house had met, the Bill had been engrossed, and was to have been read a third time that night.

3309. Mr. Johnston.] Your opinion, in reference to what you have stated as to the party termed the pro-slavery party, is formed from the knowledge you have of the island?—It is formed in this way: I resided 20 years in Jamaica; I am on intimate terms with by far the larger number of the members of the House of Assembly; I am in constant unreserved confidential communication with a very large number of them; if there existed a desire on their part to defeat or impair the Abolition Act, I think it is impossible but that in the unreserved correspondence which passes between them and me (I am not speaking of public despatches, but private letters) I must have seen something of that desire, something to have justified me in believing that such a desire existed, if, in point of fact, it did exist, but I have never, so help me God, seen a single expression in any letter addressed to me to justify me in the suspicion that there was any body in the House of Assembly who would wish to defeat or impair the Abolition Act.

3310. Do not you think that the opinion of a gentleman who was in Jamaica since the Emancipation Act came into force in the capacity of a special magistrate is entitled to some weight, in reference to the proceedings under that Act, which he saw with his own eyes?—I say not equal to the opinion of a person who is in unreserved communication with persons there, and whom he knows; Captain Oldrey resided in the parish of St. Elizabeth, which was 30 or 40 miles in extent; his avocations could not take him into other parts of that large island, and he could not be in communication with many persons, so as to know what was passing on other estates; I consider myself to have better means of forming a correct judgment upon the motives and dispositions of the great body of proprietors prietors than Captain Oldrey, who, till he came there, must have been wholly unacquainted with their habits and disposition.

3311. You admit that the special magistrate, to whom allusion has been made, was fairly entitled to form his opinion from what he saw in the parish of St. Elizabeth?—He might form his opinion from what he saw. I am not at all disposed to question the credit of the witness, but I cannot sit here and hear an attack made upon the House of Assembly, and motives imputed to them in their own conduct, for which I believe there is no foundation, without stating, as far as my own opinion and my own knowledge go, an opinion founded upon experience, that there is no foundation for that attack.

3312. Had not Captain Oldrey an opportunity of meeting with his brother special magistrates, and learning from them the condition of the apprentices, and the working of the apprenticeship system?—I do not dispute that he had the power of seeing with his own eyes in his own district, and of learning from others the working of the apprenticeship; but when Captain Oldrey is speaking as to the motives which govern the individuals who compose the House of Assembly, and the large body of white proprietors, then I think myself quite as competent, and more competent, to judge of the motives which are prevailing in their minds than Captain Oldrey; I will make another observation on this subject. Notwithstanding the strong and jealous feeling in the House of Assembly upon the subject of the invasion of their privileges, I know that a powerful motive which induced them, without the slightest hesitation, to pass that Act in Aid was to repel the imputation which had been made against them in this country, of their not acting bonâ fide under the Abolition Act, and of their entertaining a desire to defeat its provisions; I know from long experience the jealousy with which they watch any attack on their privileges. The promptitude with which they applied themselves to the passing of this Act proceeded from their desire to disabuse the public mind, and to show that they had no desire to defeat the Abolition Act.

3313. Chairman.] Do you believe that there is an increased feeling on the part of resident proprietors in Jamaica, that the system of apprenticeship which now prevails, and the system of complete freedom, which is about to obtain in that island, is compatible with their comfort and interests?—I believe those who had doubts about the apprenticeship system, many of them are become much more reconciled to it than they were; there are others who entertain doubts about it, but they consider that the law is passed, and there is no disposition, as far as my information goes, to defeat the law; there has been a contrariety of opinion as to the probable issue, but much less now than there was.

3314. But you think, on the whole, that there is less irritation than there was?—Decidedly, and in truth, what has been supposed to be hostility towards the measure itself has been rather irritation in consequence of measures which were perfectly independent of it, for instance, the feeling on the subject of police and of emigration, two measures to which they attach great importance, and respecting which the Governor took a different view from them; those are measures in which they were thwarted in a manner very unsatisfactory, and they have produced a degree of dissatisfaction which has been mistaken for a feeling of hostility to the measure of apprenticeship.

3315. Mr. Johnston.] Do you hold the official situation of agent for Jamaica?—I do; and if the question is put to me on the supposition that my appointment of agent can influence the evidence I give, the person suggesting that question is very much mistaken, and does me great injustice. It is perfectly well known, that upon the subject of the Act in Aid I strongly and anxiously urged that the Assembly should pass it upon this ground, that if the unjust endeavour to prevail on the people in this country to believe that there is a disposition in the House of Assembly to defeat the provision of the Abolition Act had in any degree succeeded, they should at once be disabused by passing this measure.

3316. Who are your constituents?—The Council and the Assembly of Jamaica.

3317. Mr. Gladstone.] With reference to the appellation, the pro-slavery party, is there not, on the other hand, a party who have been designated as enemies to the peace and prosperity of the island, and who have fomented rebellion among the slaves?—Yes.

3318. Do not you think it probable that those who used terms of excitement might be inclined to think that neither of the appellations which resulted from that that sort of feeling were to be interpreted as literally correct, but that they were indexes rather of the excited state of the minds of those who used them, than indicative of the intentions of those to whom they were applied?—There is a party there considered as representing a powerful body in this country, who before the abolition of slavery were called the anti-slavery party; there is a part of the press under the influence, as I have heard, of that party. The most fortunate event for that island would be the cessation of all interference on their part. Whilst they impute to the community motives and feelings by which they are not actuated, it is not surprising that many of that community should attribute to those from whom that imputation proceeds feelings and motives which they disclaim. In such a state of things there will be irritation on both sides, leading to the expression of views which neither may really entertain, and language is used conveying much more than either party really intends or desires to convey.

5 July 1836.

3319. Mr. Johnston.] Have you any objection to state your own opinion of the apprenticeship?—It is the law of the land.

3320. Mr. Gladstone.] Do not you think it probable that there has been a great exaggeration in the appellatives which have been bestowed on both sides?—No doubt of it.

3321. Mr. Johnston.] Will you give an opinion as to your experience of the apprenticeship system?—The question whether the original establishment of the apprenticeship was advisable is wholly different from the question whether, having been established, it should be terminated before the term of apprenticeship had expired. My answer to the one question does not influence my answer to the other. I had strong doubts at the time the measure of emancipation was passed whether there might have been found some other intermediate state besides that of apprenticeship. One of the circumstances which made me hesitate extremely upon the subject of apprenticeship, was my apprehension that it might afford occasion to keep up on the part of persons in this country those feelings of suspicion and distrust towards those entitled to the services of the apprentices, and I feared that the consequence of those feelings and of the expression of those feelings, would be to excite in the apprentices discontent and dissatisfaction towards their employers, so that at the termination of the apprenticeship, instead of their entrance on their state of absolute freedom with the best possible disposition towards their former masters, a contrary disposition might exist. They might be persuaded to believe that something to which they were entitled had been withheld from them during the apprenticeship. Feelings of the greatest mutual kindness and confidence should be cultivated between the employer and apprentice, for the sake of both, and with a view to the prosperity of the colony. The surveillance, the suspicion, the misrepresentation for which the apprenticeship would furnish occasion, would, I feared, be very adverse to the cultivation of those feelings—I am so perfectly convinced that the successful results of this great measure of emancipation, both as they relate to the real happiness of the negro population and the prosperity of the colonies, depend on the kindness and confidence which exist between the apprentices and their employers. I always feared the possibility that apprenticeship might lead to the counteraction of those feelings, and that therefore, in that point of view, before the emancipation measure was passed, I entertained doubts of its expediency, but I ought in justice to those who framed the measure to state that I did not express those. I could not take upon myself the responsibility of urging my own opinion as an individual, when it was opposed to that entertained by the large body of the persons interested in West India property who were in favour of the specific measure of apprenticeship, but it is perfectly well known that, thinking it possible that there might be many in Jamaica and perhaps in the Assembly, who might entertain an opinion similar to mine on the subject of apprenticeship, that I suggested to Lord Stanley the expediency of giving to Lord Mulgrave, then the Governor of Jamaica, such directions as would enable him to assent to an Act, although it did not adopt the specific measure of the apprenticeship. But although my own opinion before the abolition measure was passed was in favour of some other intermediate state, yet the apprenticeship having been adopted, I consider that nothing would be so mischievous as any measure which should put an end to that apprenticeship before the term prescribed for its expiration.

3322. Chairman.] You mean putting an end to apprenticeship before the time when it can legally expire?—Of course. I wish to add, that my feeling always was that it was absolutely necessary that there should be some intermediate state, and the question in my mind was, whether apprenticeship was the best state.

3323. Mr. Johnston.] Have you any objection to state your own opinion of the working of apprenticeship at present?—Some communications which I receive represent it as working well; others, on the contrary, represent it as working not well; and others represent it as working very badly. There is an infinite variety in the disposition of the apprentice; in other instances the variety of opinion may be the consequence of the mode of management. I can only say that in a great many instances it appears to be going on very well; I have heard no extensive complaint.

3324. Keeping in view the information which you have received, can you form any opinion of your own with reference to the question which was put to you of the working of the apprenticeship?—It would, after all, come to the calculation whether the favourable reports were entitled to greater weight than those of a different character. To determine to which to give the preponderance, I must have a great deal of information and cool observation, which, residing here, I cannot have acquired. I have no hesitation in saying that it has worked much better than I ever expected.

3325. Then the Committee is to understand that you have formed no conclusive opinion upon the subject?—Not having been at Jamaica to see the working myself, I can act only upon the information of others; that information goes a very little way in enabling a person to form an opinion. There are opposite statements, both of which may be well founded with reference to the respective species of local observation of those by whom they were made; and hence arises the difficulty for me, not having been in Jamaica since the abolition of slavery, to form a conclusion; if I had all the representations one way that it worked well, I could state that as the result; but that not being the case, I cannot state my opinion in any other way than that in which I have given it.

3327. Chairman.] Will you proceed with your observations upon the Jamaica enactments?—There seemed to me to be a misapprehension on the part of one of the witnesses respecting the law which was referred to in the volume of printed papers. It is entitled, “An Act to increase the Power of Justices in determining Complaints between Masters and Servants and between Masters and Apprentices, Artificers and others.” I have no printed copy of it. The preamble is to this effect; “Whereas it is expedient to enlarge the powers given to justices, by an Act passed in the fifty-fifth year of his Majesty King George the Third, intituled ‘An Act for the better adjusting and the more easy Recovery of the Wages of Servants, and for the better Regulation of such Servants.’” Now it has been supposed that this law purports to transfer to the local magistrates power over the apprentice, and to divest the special magistrate of that power. I think it is impossible that this can be considered to be the object of the Act, when it is seen that the first clause contains this enactment, “That it shall and may be lawful, not only for any master or mistress, but also for his or her attorney, manager or agent, to make complaint upon oath against any apprentice not within the meaning of the 41st chapter of the fourth year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled ‘An Act for the Abolition of Slavery.’” This clause and the other clauses were passed for the purpose of supplying a defect which existed in the former Act. The former Act did not enable the attorney, manager or agent to make a complaint before any magistrate respecting his apprentice or his servant. The second clause enacts, “That it shall be lawful for the said justices to require, when they shall see fit, security from the master or mistress of an apprentice for his or her good behaviour to the apprentice, or to dissolve the articles of apprenticeship between master or mistress and the apprentice, if under all the circumstances of complaint the said justices shall deem it fit and proper to do so.” It is quite clear that this clause did not refer to the apprentice under the Abolition Act, because the provision on the subject of apprenticeship stands under the express enactment of that law. The third clause enacts, “That all complaints, differences and disputes which shall arise between masters or mistresses and their apprentices aforesaid, touching or concerning any wages or allowances which may be due to such apprentice, shall and may be heard and determined by two justices of the peace of the parish where such apprentice or apprentices shall be employed, which said justices are hereby empowered to examine on oath any such master or mistress, attorney or agent, apprentice or apprentices, or any witness or witnesses touching any such complaint, difference or dispute, and to summon such master or mistress, attorney or agent, to appear before such justices, at a reasonable time to be named, as to the justice shall seem meet in such summons, and to make such order for payment of so much wages to such apprentice or apprentices as according to the terms of his, her or their indentures of apprenticeship shall appear to such justice or justices, under all the circumstances of the case, to be justly due, provided that the sum in question do not exceed the sum of 100*l.*, the amount of such wages, clothing and allowances to be paid within such period." Then it enacts, "If any servant in husbandry or any mechanic, artificer, handicraftsman, labourer, person employed in droggers, body or house servant, or other person shall contract with any person or persons whomsoever to serve him, her or them for any time or times whatsoever, or in any other manner, and shall not enter into and commence his or her service according to his or her contract, or having entered into such service shall absent himself or herself from his or her service before the time of his or her contract (whether such contract shall be in writing or not in writing) shall be completed, or neglect to fulfil the same, or be guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor in the execution thereof or otherwise respecting the same, then and in every such case it shall and may be lawful for any justice of the peace of the parish where such servant in husbandry, mechanic, &c., shall have so contracted or been employed or be bound, and such justice is hereby authorized and empowered, upon complaint thereof made upon oath to him by the person or persons or any of them with whom such servant in husbandry, mechanic, &c. shall have so contracted, or by his, her or their attorney, manager or agent; which oath such justice is hereby empowered to administer, to issue his warrant for the apprehending every such servant in husbandry, &c., and to examine into the nature of the complaint; and if it shall appear to such justice that any servant in husbandry, &c. shall not have fulfilled such contract, or hath been guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanor aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for such justice to commit every such person to the house of correction, there to remain and be held to hard labour for a reasonable time, not exceeding three months, and to abate a proportionable part of his or her wages for and during such period as he or she shall be so confined in the house of correction, or in lieu thereof to punish the offender by abating the whole or any part of his or her wages, or to discharge such servant in husbandry, mechanic, &c. for his or her contract service or employment; and at the same time to award to such servants such proportion of wages for services performed as to them the said justices shall seem meet; which discharge shall be given under the hand and seal of such justice gratis; and if the said justices shall award any proportion of wages to be due to any of the servants aforesaid, they the said justices shall issue their warrant to levy forthwith for the amount on the goods and chattels of the master or mistress of the servant to whom they shall award the said wages to be due: provided always that the sum so awarded shall not exceed 100*l.*" Now upon looking to this Act, it will be seen that it is intended to extend the provisions of the Act passed in the 55th year of his Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An Act for the better adjusting and the more easy Recovery of the Wages of Servants, and for the better Regulation of such Servants." And this Act extended also the powers of the Act of 9 Geo. 2. Under 9 Geo. 2, the amount of wages which could be recovered by the summary process was limited to a certain sum; the amount was extended to 100*l.* by 55 Geo. 3, and it appears further, that under this Act an attorney or agent could not make a complaint before the magistrate on behalf of his constituent. To remedy this defect this Act is passed. The first clause expressly excepts apprentices, the second third and fourth clauses evidently refer to contracts and to relations wholly distinct from those of apprentices under the Abolition Act, and a careful perusal of the Act will instantly show that my further answer to the objection that has been urged would be independent of the language of the Act; that you could not, consistently with the Abolition Act, give effect to those clauses so far as they transfer authority relative to apprentices from the special magistrate to the local magistrate. Here again the Abolition Act would furnish the principle upon which you must construe the colonial Act, and no court could say that this colonial Act could be read as giving an authority to the local magistrate over the apprentice, because there is this Act which says that the authority belongs to the special magistrates alone.

5 July 1836.

3328. Mr. Johnston.] Keeping in view the laws to which you have now directed the attention of the Committee, supposing a contract of wages to be entered into between the apprentice and a stranger, that is, a person not the manager, before what court could the apprentice recover in case of any dispute?—The person who may be entitled to the service of the apprentice, either by having been the former owner of the apprentice when he was a slave, or by hiring his services from that owner, or by contracting with the apprentice himself, sustains that character towards the apprentice which brings him and the apprentice under the cognizance of the special magistrate.

3330. Does it occur to you that there is any particular proviso which would meet the case which has been put to you?—I thought one of the objections made to this law, by the witness pre-examined, was, that it gave the special magistrate authority in cases where the relation between master and apprentice did not refer to, and that it was one of his objections that it did give such authority. It appears to me perfectly clear that the clause which invests the special magistrate with sole and exclusive cognizance, in all matters in relation to the apprentice and the person entitled to his services, extends to all those cases where an apprentice hires himself out either to his former owner or to his neighbour.

3331. Is there any specific enactment in the Jamaica Abolition Act upon that point?—The Jamaica Abolition Act is a transcript in that respect, I believe, of the imperial Act.

3332. Is there any single enactment in the Jamaica Abolition Act which restricts the special magistrate's jurisdiction in cases of wages due to apprentices?—There is nothing that I am aware of to prevent the apprentice, if a debt was due to him, from suing for that debt in a court of law, as any other person would.

3333. Before the special magistrate, limiting the question to the case of any debt due to the negro by the proprietor or manager?—I will read the clause: "Be it enacted, that all complaints made by any apprenticed labourer against the person entitled to his or her services, touching any fraud practised or refusal to furnish any such apprenticed labourer with sufficiency of provision, ground or other means of maintenance and support, in cases where such apprentice hath no provision ground, or of illegally and improperly withholding from such apprentice any portion of the time allowed him or her to cultivate such ground, or of imposing task-work on any apprenticed labourer, contrary to the provisions of this Act, or of breach of any contract on the part of any person engaging the voluntary services of any apprenticed labourer, or of any cruelty, injustice or other wrong or injury done to or inflicted upon any apprenticed labourer by the person entitled to his or her services, shall be heard, adjudged and determined before any one or more special justice or justices; and he or they is or are empowered to punish any offender, in any of these respects last mentioned, with a fine not exceeding 5 l., and for default of goods and chattels whereon to levy such fine, the offender shall be committed to gaol until he or she shall pay or satisfy the same, but such imprisonment shall not exceed five days; provided that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or taken to bar or destroy the right of any apprenticed labourer to proceed in the supreme or assize courts or the courts of quarter sessions or common pleas for any wrong or injury done to or committed against his or her property or person by any person whomsoever." And I refer also to the 20th clause: "That the several justices of the peace having special commissions as aforesaid (and no other magistrate or justice of the peace in this island) shall have, exercise and enjoy a sole and exclusive jurisdiction over, and shall solely and exclusively take cognizance of all offences committed or alleged to have been committed by any such apprenticed labourer, or by his or her employer, in such their relation to each other, or of the breach, violation or neglect of any of the obligations owed by them to each other; or of any question, matter or thing incident to or arising out of the relations subsisting between such apprenticed labourers and the persons respectively entitled to their services, provided that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to abrogate or take away the powers by law vested in the supreme court of record, or to the superior courts of civil and criminal justice in this island."

3334. Is it your opinion, that under this clause of the Act the special magistrate is entitled to adjudge in the case of debt or wages or damages?—Under this clause, as far as there has been a wrong committed by a breach of the contract, the special magistrate has power under this clause of fining the person, but there is nothing in this clause that precludes the apprentice from recovering the amount of the wages which would be due to him.

3335. To whom does this fine go when adjudged?—All the fines imposed by the Act are applied to the use of the island.

3336. Then it does not appear that the apprentice has any summary process under the Jamaica Abolition Act for the recovery of wages or any debt that may be due by his proprietor or manager?—I see no clause in the Jamaica Abolition Act or in the English Abolition Act that enacts that any debt or damages which may be claimed by the apprentice may be recovered in any other manner than debt or damages claimed by any other of His Majesty's subjects.

3337. That is before the ordinary courts of law?—Yes.

3338. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you think that any special magistrate is able to enforce claims for wages which have been entered into under his sanction and guarantee, as is commonly the case with contracts for wages?—The 19th and 20th clauses give to the special magistrate an authority for the purpose of enforcing all those contracts. The 19th clause provides, "And for securing the effectual superintendence of the said apprenticed labourers and the execution of this Act, be it further enacted, that the Governor may, and he is hereby empowered to issue under the public seal of this island special commissions to one or more person or persons, constituting him or them a justice or justices of the peace for the whole of the island, or for any parish, precinct, quarter or other district within the same, for the special purpose of giving effect to this present Act and to any laws which may hereafter be made for giving more complete effect to the same; and every person to or in favour of whom any such commission may be issued shall, by force and virtue thereof and without any other qualification, be entitled and competent to act as a justice of the peace." The 20th clause says, "That the several justices of the peace, having special commissions as aforesaid (and no other magistrate or justice of the peace in this island) shall have, exercise and enjoy a sole and exclusive jurisdiction over, and shall solely and exclusively take cognizance of all offences committed or alleged to have been committed by any such apprenticed labourer or his or their employer, in such their relation to each other or of the breach, violation or neglect of any of the obligations owed by them to each other." Now the wages due by the employer to the apprentice under a contract constitute an obligation arising out of the relation of the master and apprentice, no less than the obligation on the part of the apprentice under the same contract to give his services for wages.

3339. You think that these words would authorize the special magistrate to give a summary remedy to the apprentice in case of his wages being withheld, or any wrong being done by his master?—Yes.

3340. Mr. Johnston.] Will you point out in what manner the apprentice could bring his claim, and in what manner a special magistrate could adjudicate for the amount of that claim?—If I see a clause vesting a magistrate with an exclusive jurisdiction, and the terms in which that jurisdiction is expressed are so framed as to enable him to take cognizance of an obligation contracted by the apprentice to give his services, and by the master or any other person hiring the services to pay for those services, I cannot doubt that that special magistrate has vested in him all that is requisite to enable him to exercise that jurisdiction.

3341. But then it is not an obligation, but the violation or neglect of any of the obligations?—It is a violation of an obligation, if a man having entered into an agreement to pay a sum of money for wages omits to do so, the non-payment of a debt contracted is a violation of the obligation of the party who engaged to pay it.

3342. Is not the scope and tenor of the two clauses to which you have referred, the 19th and 20th and the 49th, that the special magistrate shall proceed by penalty in case of breach of contract or violation of obligation, and that he cannot proceed for wages or debt?—The 49th clause does not narrow the jurisdiction which had been given to the special magistrate by the 19th and 20th clauses.

3343. Under the 19th and 20th clauses could the magistrate issue a judgment, or cause a distress to be levied?—The magistrate would have a right to adjudicate upon the performance or non-performance of the contract which the apprentice had entered into, and to give his judgment upon that.

3344. But his finding that the contract should be observed or not is equivalent to judgment being issued, or a distress caused to be levied upon the party?—That clause does not in express terms give him a power to issue a distress, but the question is whether he would not have it as incident to the jurisdiction which is expressly given to him.

3345. As a lawyer, is it your opinion that he would have that power?—Yes; he would have that power, he is invested with the commission; there is delegated to him an express authority to enforce the obligation between the master and apprentice, and he has the power to the extent to which a magistrate may take cognizance of particular debts, but if the debt exceeded a certain amount the adjudication of the magistrate would furnish a ground upon which the apprentice would bring his action in the supreme court.

3347. Then it is your opinion that the special magistrate has sufficient jurisdiction to apply a full and ample remedy in the case of a claim for wages to the extent of 10*l.* on the part of the apprentice?—Yes, I conceive that he might; I consider that he is invested with a sufficient power by his commission for that purpose.

3348. So that the apprentice would be sure, in the ordinary course of things, to recover his wages, without being obliged to go to any other court?—I think so, clearly.

3349. Are you aware that there is a tribunal in Jamaica for this species of debts, and if so, can a special magistrate conduct an adjudication without an express enactment?—I have already expressed my opinion, that that Act respecting servants' wages did not extend to the case of apprentices, that so seemed to me, looking to the object of the Act, which was to extend the provisions of the local Act previously in existence, by enabling the attorney to enforce his claim for wages which he could not do under the former Act.

3350. Then, in fact, you hold that it is only under the Abolition Act that the apprentice has a remedy?—Yes, only under that, except the remedy he has in common with all His Majesty's subjects, when the sum is beyond a certain amount, to bring his action.

3351. Were not the local legislatures required by the 16th section of the Emancipation Act to pass regulations to enforce the punctual performance of voluntary contracts with apprentices?—The Act speaks for itself; the enactment is a very comprehensive one.

3352. Have the local legislatures followed out the Act?—I think they have completely followed out that Act; and the best proof of it I have is the order of His Majesty's Council, the only constitutional tribunal for giving or withholding assent to acts of an independent legislature in the colony. It would be extremely difficult, I might say it would be impossible, to find any specimen of legislation in any part of the world which could stand the test of criticism, in which the object was, not to find in what respect it was perfect, but in what respect it was imperfect, and in which the parties entered on the criticism with a strong prejudice against the body from whom legislation proceeded and with a strong impression that there was a design to make the legislation imperfect; I believe there is no act of legislation which would stand the test of criticism conducted on those principles and directed by those motives.

3353. Then it is your opinion, that the clause of the imperial Act, wherein it is stated that regulations should be made respecting any voluntary contracts into which any apprenticed labourer may enter with their respective employers or with any other person for hired service for any future period, and for limiting the greatest period of time to which such voluntary contract may extend, and for enforcing the punctual and effectual performance of such voluntary contracts on the part both of such apprenticed labourers and of the person or persons engaging for their employment and hire, have been legislated for by the local legislature?—I consider so.

Richard Mathews, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

R. Mathews, Esq.

3354. Chairman.] HAVE you examined the Acts with reference to the Emancipation Act that have been passed in the West India colonies, with the exception of Jamaica?—I have examined them, in addition to those of Jamaica.

3355. You have heard the evidence which Mr. Jeremie has given upon that subject?—Yes, I have.

3356. Are you prepared to agree with him in the general spirit of those objections which he has made to the Acts?—I am prepared to express my concurrence in the views that he himself has taken of these Acts before the Committee.

3357. Mr. Gladstone.] Are there any points in which you do not concur with him?—It is possible that a minute examination of the evidence given before this Committee by him might present to my mind some shades of difference on some few minor points; but on all points which I consider of any importance I fully concur with him.

3358. Chairman.] Have you yourself carefully examined the Acts in question, so as to be able to give an opinion upon them?—I have.

Joseph Beldam, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

J. Beldam, Esq.

3359. Chairman.] HAVE you examined the Acts of the other West India colonies in the same manner as you have examined those which have been passed by the Legislature of Jamaica?—I have examined the whole of the West India Acts and ordonnances with great attention; I had previously to this examination prepared an analysis of all the West India Acts and ordonnances; I have since had an opportunity of listening to the vivâ voce examination of my friend Mr. Jeremie, and I do not find that any one of those objections which have been taken by him materially differs from the objections which I had already put down upon paper. There are however some other objections of a more technical kind, which I have thought important, and especially so as making up the aggregate of what appeared to me to be the character of these colonial laws. I have thought indeed that those minor objections tended more fully to show the spirit and disposition with which those laws have been concocted, and that their effect at any rate was to drift those laws still further from the plain intention and spirit of the imperial Act. I have introduced those technical objections, however, more particularly because it appeared to me that if, as the result of this Committee, there should be any step recommended of a legislative kind, or of any other kind, to remedy the defects of the colonial laws, that then those objections upon paper would furnish means the most immediate, if not the most satisfactory, of remedying many of those defects by special instructions, which might be sent out to the colonies. With reference to the importance of special instructions, I have already made a suggestion elsewhere, and with a view to those instructions, I have introduced some of these objections, although they are not of sufficient individual importance to present to this Committee. The whole analysis is very concise, and may be employed as an index to the more extended examination of my friend Mr. Jeremie. I now again express my general concurrence in his observations upon the various heads of evidence on which he has been examined, and beg leave to put in the remainder of my analysis, a fair copy of which will be ready in a few days.

[Permission was given to the Witness to put in the remainder of the Analysis when prepared.]

Mr. William Gladstone.
Sir George Grey.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

William Burge, Esq. made the following statement :

I STATED on a former day that the prosecution of the supervisor of the Trelawney workhouse, which was represented in the reply of the Assembly to Lord Sligo's charge respecting the flogging of females to be then pending, had been terminated by the conviction of the supervisor at the late March Cornwall assizes. I was asked whether I had any document on that subject; I said I had only a newspaper, and I undertook to produce it. This is the "St. Jago Gazette" of the 25th of March, which contains the proceedings at the Cornwall assizes; I read its account of this trial:—"This was an indictment against the traverser, late supervisor of the Trelawney workhouse for having flogged a female while on the treadmill of that establishment." "The Chief-Justice charged the jury, who returned a verdict of guilty. After the verdict was returned, the Chief-Justice observed that it was very necessary and proper that such an indictment should be brought, for the purpose of trying the legality of such punishment, but he did not conceive that the traverser would ever be called upon to receive sentence." With respect to the authority of the special magistrate to entertain a complaint on the part of an apprentice for wages due to him, and to enforce payment of them to the apprentice, I have in my hand the Act of the Legislature of Jamaica, passed in 1834, which extended the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace to 5*l*. The jurisdiction which had been conferred by an old Act of the island of Jamaica (33 Car. 2, c. 6) upon the magistrates, enabled them to take cognizance of sums not exceeding 40*s*. It is unquestionably true that all those Acts applied generally to justices of the peace, but I entertain no doubt that the special magistrates might, with respect to the wages of apprentices to the extent of 5*l*., exercise all the powers conferred on the general magistrates as to other subjects of difference. I have never seen the form in which the special commission is granted, but with the skill and experience which the Colonial Office possesses in the person of their present assistant secretary and late legal adviser, I cannot doubt that it has been framed in such terms as to confer those powers. Care would be taken to refer to the powers conferred by the laws of Jamaica on general magistrates, and to grant to the special magistrates the same powers, quoad the particular subjects which are under their exclusive cognizance. For instance, if an Act of the legislature empowers justices of the peace to award a distress for the particular sums of which they may take cognizance, as in those two Acts, 33 Car. 2, c. 6, and this Act passed in 1834, the special commission to the special magistrate would refer to those Acts and the powers derived thereunder by the general magistrates, and would then invest the special magistrates with those powers in relation to all the matters of which the special magistrates were thereby authorized to take exclusive cognizance under the Abolition Acts. The pertinacity with which I was interrogated the other day by an honourable member upon this subject, induced me to look more into the subject as a question of law, to ascertain what the practice had been. The only Jamaica gentleman I have since seen was Mr. Miller; he was of the council at the time of the passing that Act; on my putting the question to him, he concurred with me, and said it was the practice, if the apprentice made a complaint against any person for withholding his wages, the special magistrate would enforce payment to the apprentice, and this was wholly independent of the fine which he imposed. Mr. Miller has quitted Jamaica entirely, entirely, has no property in the island, and never, I believe, had any slave property. He is a gentleman of large fortune, who was a great many years resident in Jamaica, a very extensive attorney; he lives now in Bryanstone-square, whom I should be very anxious to see brought before this Committee as a witness to give evidence on the practical working of this measure.

3360. Mr. Buxton.] Was this gentleman the custos of Trelawney?—Yes.

3361. Did he come over here for the purpose of complaining of the conduct of Lord Sligo?—No, he came home from Jamaica, having no intention to go back.

3362. Was he the gentleman who submitted the case to Mr. Battie?—He was the custos of the parish, and I have no doubt that case was submitted with his knowledge and concurrence.

3363. Chairman.] Will you have the goodness to proceed?—I conceive that a jurisdiction being given by the local Act to general magistrates in all matters of difference not exceeding 5*l.*, with power to enforce that jurisdiction, and a jurisdiction is given to the special magistrate as to some of those matters by the Abolition Acts, it would be perfectly competent, and of course that he should be invested by the terms of his special commission with the like powers as to those matters of difference of which he has thus the special or exclusive cognizance.

3364. Mr. Buxton.] Is Mr. Miller the gentleman Lord Sligo refers to in page 44: "I have the honour to enclose you the memorial sent me by the custos of Trelawney?"—Yes.

3365. It is the same Mr. Miller who presented that document to Lord Sligo?—Yes. It is not the practice in Jamaica, nor is it proper, that the freeholders or inhabitants of the parish should meet, unless convened by the custos of the parish, who represents the lord lieutenant of the county. Mr. Miller having received a requisition from several freeholders, he convened, and, as custos, presided at the meeting, and, as the public organ presiding at it, was the person officially to transmit its resolutions or memorial to the Governor.

3366. He is the same person who presented the memorial that Lord Sligo sent over here, with the contradictions of a great number of special magistrates to it?—He forwarded to Lord Sligo the memorial adopted at the meeting.

3367. Mr. Gladstone.] Is the Committee now to understand it as your opinion, that the apprentice has no remedy by the special magistrate, which may exceed the amount of 5*l.* currency?—That is my opinion; that is the nature of my evidence.

3368. Are you aware at all what the practice in Jamaica is, as to the times of paying wages to the apprentices; at what intervals they are usually paid?—As far as I have heard, and as far as comes within what I may call my own experience, I believe they are paid every week; in the instances I know, they are.

3369. Have you a good deal of information on the point?—I have; I believe that to be the practice, but of course my information of late must be entirely that which is communicated to me by others.

3370. From what you know of the character of the apprentices, do you believe, that in order to keep up a feeling of confidence and satisfaction in their minds, in the system of working for wages, it is necessary to pay them at short intervals?—I conceive so; it would be very unwise to let the apprentice feel any apprehension as to the promptitude and certainty with which he would receive his wages.

3371. Do you not think his feeling that confidence would necessarily depend on his being paid at short intervals?—Yes.

3373. Mr. Buxton.] How long was the Act, to which you have alluded, to endure?—The Act of 1834 was, by its terms, to be in force until the 31st December 1831, on the meeting of the sessions; in the last year a committee was appointed to renew it, and it was one of those Acts before the legislature at the time of the prorogation by Lord Sligo.

3374. It is not an Act at this moment in force?—My impression is that it is at this moment in force.

3375. You have no proof of that?—I have not the votes with me to refer to. If it is not passed, I believe it is one of the Acts which was in progress when the prorogation took place. When the Assembly again met, the house took up the Acts according to the state in which they were at the time of the prorogation.

3376. It may or it may not be revived?—My impression is that it is revived.

3377. Have you any doubt, that as long as the Act endured, the apprentices' wages were recoverable by that Act only?—My impression is, that the apprentices' wages might have been recoverable, not under this Act exclusively, but under that of the Abolition Act; if the special commission gives to the special magistrates, as it may, all those powers to execute the duties committed to him by the Abolition Act, which other magistrates have to execute, the duties delegated to them by any of the laws of the island.

3378. Do you not know that all the special magistrates have all those more extensive powers that the Abolition Act gives?—I have never seen the special commission; I know that many of the special magistrates have general commissions under the authority given to the Governor by the Abolition Act; and there being power to give to the special magistrates all the authorities which belong to the local magistrates, there is of course power to give some of those authorities, that is, such of those authorities as should enable them to execute the decisions which they are authorized under the Abolition Act to pronounce.

3379. Taking the case of a special magistrate, not a local magistrate, do you think the wages of an apprentice were recoverable under this Act and no other Act?—I consider that they were; and there was a part of my evidence on Tuesday which (I suppose in consequence of the rather irregular conversation that passed) was not taken down. I stated that when the proposition was first suggested by the Government of having special magistrates, the West India body felt considerable reluctance to accede to this measure, and had gone so far as to prepare a memorial, representing that it conveyed a reflection on the local magistracy. I felt the extreme importance of removing all excuse for future agitation and interference in the colony, and with that view, of withdrawing from the local magistracy a jurisdiction in respect of the apprentices, which there were persons in this country would represent was not duly or impartially exercised by them. Their distrust, not my own, made me think it would be better to vest it in magistrates specially appointed and sent from hence. I prevailed on the West India body not to interpose any objection to the appointment of special magistrates, but rather to adopt it as a much preferable measure to leaving the execution of the law in the hands of the local magistrates, and subjecting the colony to have the conduct of its magistrates misrepresented. Certainly my feeling has been, that so far from circumscribing the powers of the special magistrate, I would give him, in its fullest extent, the exclusive cognizance, to use the language of the Act, of every matter and thing between the apprentice and any person entitled to his services.

3380. Chairman.] Did you represent your views to the Government?—Most assuredly, while the Act was in progress; and here I may refer to a representation made by one of the witnesses, of his belief that the letter to which he alluded was written by Mr. Barrett. One of the circumstances inducing me to believe that it was not written by Mr. Barrett is, that at the time of the passing of the Abolition Act he was in England, having been sent, together with Mr. Hodgson, by the Assembly on the affairs of the colony. On this question, of course, I consulted with them; and they both concurred with me, and it was with their sanction I went down to St. James's-street, where the West India body met, to entreat them not to interfere; that the best thing would be to leave the whole thing with regard to the apprentices in the hands of the special magistrates. Mr. Lefevre, who was at that time the under secretary, knows my sentiments on this subject. I will now proceed to the comment which has been made on clauses 33, 34 and 35 of the Jamaica Abolition Act. It is to be found in page 25 of the papers laid before the Committee by Mr. Jeremie. The comment is in these words: "By sections 33, 34 and 35, a slave carrying a knife in his pocket (for that may be deemed an offensive weapon), unless with the knowledge and consent of his manager, might be condemned to 39 lashes and imprisonment, with hard labour, for one month; besides which, the offensive weapon is to be forfeited to the employer; this appears to be a most objectionable enactment." In the other paper, laid before the Committee by another witness, it is said (page 12), "The clause is open to the common objection of giving to the master an interest in in the punishment of the apprentice, making the same individual the granter of the license, the executor of justice, and the beneficial receiver of the penalty." Now it is surprising that any man having the slightest knowledge of criminal law, who looked at those sections, 33, 34 and 35, could have hesitated in perceiving that by no possible construction could a knife be called an offensive weapon. There is one universal rule with respect to the use of terms in construing statutes noscitur ex sociis. The term offensive weapon is in company with gunpowder, guns, swords and pistols, or fire-arms of any description whatsoever. I think it is a little hard that the Jamaica Legislature should be complained of for using the term "offensive weapon," when it is a term of continued recurrence in English Acts of Parliament. Take, for instance, the Act for protecting the revenue, the Smuggling Act, the term "offensive weapon" is used in various clauses of this Act. Now if there is no fear that in an English Act of Parliament a knife in the pocket could fall under this description, there is certainly no ground for entertaining this fear because the term has been introduced into an Act of the colony, where a knife, so far from being deemed an "offensive weapon," is an article included in the supplies annually delivered to every apprentice on the estate. But it is supposed its forfeiture could take place to the owner, now I will just read the clause of the Act; "And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for any such master, manager, or lawful employer to seize and retain to his own use any gunpowder, guns, swords, pistols, or fire-arms of any description whatsoever, or any other offensive weapon unlawfully in the possession of any apprenticed negro." I should like to know how by possibility any one looking at this clause, and meaning to construe it with common fairness to the colony, could say that either of those inferences was deducible from this enactment. Can a knife in the apprentice's pocket, which had been given him by his employer, be said to be unlawfully in his possession? and yet these are inferences alleged in these papers to be legitimately deducible, and objections to the enactment in the Jamaica Act. There is another observation made in page 24 of the evidence, in answer to the 222d question. The Abolition Act, in the case of the clandestine employment or harbouring of any apprentice labourer who is absent from the service of his employer without leave, authorizes the special magistrates, in the case of an apprentice, and the local magistrates in the case of other persons, if they shall see just cause, to examine the party complained against, upon his or her oath, touching the matter of such complaint. This authority is represented by the witness in this answer in the following terms; "Here is a confession extracted from the party complained against on his oath." I read that clause as affording this advantage to the party accused, that the special justice had it in his power to effect the extenuation of the accused by his own evidence. I should have thought that it was a subject of approbation instead of a reproach to the law. Then it is said, "I think from the manner in which this Act is framed, it is in the power of the master to inflict upon the apprentice in one case 45 hours of continuous labour in succession, that in the case of the negro being under punishment he may be worked for 60 hours." I will only say I have very different notions of the meaning of the word cruelty or wrong, if such an act would not be both cruel and wrong, and therefore within the cognizance and power of the special magistrate to restrain and punish, and within the cognizance, I suspect, to punishment by the other courts. I submit it is quite impossible that such an act could be committed with impunity. That it would ever be committed is a conjecture of what it is possible might take place; there is not a particle of evidence adduced for the purpose of showing that it ever had taken place.

3381. Mr. Gladstone.] What do you think as to the probability of such case occurring?—I have not a conception that such a case is at all likely to occur.

3382. What do you think would be its bearing on the interests of the master?—I think that it would be injurious to the interest of the master.

3383. Mr. Burton.] Are you not aware that formerly many acts were done by the master which were directly contrary to their own interests, such, for instance, as working the negroes during the time of slavery to such a degree as to diminish the number of the population?—What may have occurred in individual cases I have not the means of speaking with accuracy; I am one of those who do not attribute the mortality which took place among the negro population to hard labour.

3384. Are you not aware that Dr. Madden states in his book instances of negroes being worked thirty-five hours in succession?—I do not recollect that instance in his book, I do not speak to the fact.

3385. Are you not aware that it was qualified by Mr. Jeremie in his evidence that in a case of working to the extent of sixty hours, it would be a case of that kind of cruelty which would come under the operation of the law?—I looked at the expressions in Mr. Jeremie's evidence, and I felt great difficulty in saying that he had actually conceded that it would fall within the term cruelty; there appeared to me a reluctance to admit that it was a case of cruelty; if it be a case of cruelty, and therefore within the cognizance of the special magistrate, and repressed by him, I do not see how it can be brought forward as an objection to the Act.

3386. May there not be many cases amounting to hardship, and known to be hardship, which would not come under the denomination of cruelty?—I feel it quite impossible to answer so indefinite and general a question; my opinion with respect to that which constitutes cruelty is this, that even the undue or the excessive exercise of a power which the party has to the services of the negro is as much an act of cruelty and of illegality as the exercise of a power which was not at all possessed by him.

3387. Are you to be understood that the law gives this power of working for so many hours, but that there is a restraint upon it, namely, that the negro must not be so long worked as to amount to a case of cruelty?—Certainly not. I do not conceive that the law gives any such power as the working a negro for any such time.

3388. You deny that the law gives that power, but still you say that if it gives that power, that is restrained if it is an act of cruelty?—No, that was not my proposition, in answer to the question put to me; I never said that there might be cases of extreme hardship which would not amount in law to cruelty, my answer was, that with respect to that, I could not give a definite answer, that there were different notions as to what was extreme hardship. So comprehensive is my notion of what would constitute cruelty, I would conceive that to be cruelty which consisted in the excessive or improper exercise of a power given.

3389. Taking the distinction between legal right and the cruelty that might result from the exercise of legal right?—I put it as an abstract proposition.

3390. Looking only at the legal right, how do you conceive the master has a power of working his negro under the Act?—I have not said, nor do I consider that the Act conferred a legal right to employ the negro continuously for forty-two hours or forty-five. I put it, as an illustration of my notion of cruelty, that although I should find a power enjoyed by a person, yet the abuse of that power would constitute a case of cruelty punishable by law, just as much as if there was not a shadow of power conferred.

3391. How many hours, according to the legal right, may a master work his apprentice?—I must refer, then, to the language of the Act.

3392. Will you have the goodness to give it?—“And be it further enacted, that no person who by virtue of this Act or of any such Act of Assembly, ordinance or order in council as aforesaid, shall become a prædial apprenticed labourer, whether attached or not attached to the soil, shall continue in such apprenticeship beyond the first day of August 1840, and that during such his or her apprenticeship no such prædial apprenticed labourer, whether attached or not attached to the soil, shall be bound or liable by virtue of such apprenticeship to perform any labour in the service of his or her employer or employers for more than forty-five hours in the whole in any one week;” that is the extent of the law.

3393. That does not say those forty-five hours may not be held continuously?—Then, if they were held continuously, I should say it was cruelty, and that cruelty is an offence clearly cognizable by law. There are some matters connected with the evidence of Dr. Madden upon which I should be desirous of giving evidence, because I am quite satisfied they have been brought before the Committee by that witness under great misapprehension. I will take the allusion which is made to Captain Oldrey's trial, in answer to question 779. “I believe that a new trial has been moved for Captain Oldrey, but that in consequence of the manner in which the charge was opened, limiting the amount of the fine to something under 300*l.* the cause could not be brought into the Court of Error.” Here is a great mistake under which Dr. Madden has fallen, from his unprovoked distrust of the Jamaica bench and a Jamaica jury. The verdict of the jury was given for 280 odd pounds currency; now the amount of the verdict, in order to enable a party to take the cause into the Court of Error in the colonies, must, under the King's 47th instruction, be 300*l.* sterling, and it must be 500*l.* sterling to enable him to bring a cause from the Court of Error in the colony to the King in Council. The supposition that the verdict was for 280*l.* currency, so as to be put within the sum which would admit of its being carried into the Court of Error is a complete mistake. The jury, if this had been their design, might have given their verdict for 400*l.* currency, the sum which enables a party to carry it into a court of error being 300*l.* sterling, which in currency is 420*l.*

8 July 1836.

3394. Sir George Grey.] Is sterling mentioned in the 47th instruction?—Yes.

3395. Have you known any case taken into the Court of Error where the verdict did not exceed 300*l.* currency?—No, no case can be carried into the Court of Error, except in two particular cases, namely, where His Majesty's revenue was concerned or the title to a freehold is involved. Those are the two cases excepted by the King's 47th instruction. Another statement of Dr. Madden is equally erroneous. In answer to question 785, "In the constitution of the courts, do you mean the judges?" and he says, "I think the judges of the court of assize were highly prejudiced against the special magistrates generally." Sir George Grey asked, "Do you apply that to the Chief-Justice as well the other judges?" The answer given in is, "He does not preside in those courts I allude to. I mean the local judges who assist in them." Now the Chief-Justice does preside; he is bound to preside both in the grand court and in the assize court; and unless he is prevented by illness, it is as much his duty to attend the assize court, and in point of practice he does so, for I believe he has not omitted on a single occasion since he has been chief judge to preside at assize courts.

3396. Did he, in point of fact, preside when that case was tried?—That case was tried in the supreme court, where, even according to Dr. Madden, the Chief-Justice presides; but he happened to be ill upon that occasion; but he presided, I believe, in the other case alluded to, Mr. Bourne's case.

3397. Are you aware whether the verdict was according to his summing up in that case of Mr. Bourne?—I have looked very anxiously for the report of that trial, but have not found my newspaper in which I believe it is reported.

3398. You are not aware that the view taken by the jury of that case accorded with his view?—I am not; in answer to question 792, "You say the Chief-Justice is dependent for a part of his salary on the colonial legislature?" Dr. Madden answers, "When he was sent out, the House of Assembly kept back his salary a year and a half, in consequence of his appointment not being satisfactory to the proprietors." Now, I take leave to say this is another statement which is calculated to convey a very unfounded imputation on the Assembly, and would lead any one into error as to the circumstances which prevented the Chief-Justice from obtaining his salary immediately on his appointment; I will state those circumstances: I think in the year 1800 or 1801, an Act was passed, giving a salary to a chief justice, provided a barrister of a certain number of years standing at the English bar, and a certain number of years practice at the Jamaica bar. It is not unreasonable, that if a man is to administer a code of laws of a country, he should at least have had some acquaintance with those laws, and that, as the Legislature of Jamaica paid a salary to the Chief-Justice, it should require that he should have some knowledge of the local law he was to administer; this law was not only the common law of England, but a considerable body of local statutes and of colonial usages. In a subsequent year, another Act was passed that increased the salary of the Chief-Justice, adding a further restriction requiring him to have been of a certain number of years standing at the bar. Upon the death of the late Chief-Justice, instead of appointing a person who had been at the Jamaica bar to be the Chief-Justice, the qualification enjoined by the Jamaica Act which gave the salary, the present Chief-Justice was sent out, who had not been at the Jamaica bar, the consequence was this, that there existed no law under which the Chief-Justice could claim a salary. The Assembly, however, passed a law expressly giving him this salary, and not keeping him out of it, as it is said, because his appointment was not satisfactory, for they gave him the salary from the first moment of his putting his foot in the island of Jamaica; they made the law retrospective. I refer to the next question, which is 793, in which the name of Mr. Barrett occurs, as being supposed to have been the writer of a letter which is set out, dated the 30th of August 1834; I have read that letter, and I can certainly state, knowing pretty well the style of Mr. Barrett, that it does not appear to me to be his style of writing. I do not believe it to be his letter, from the sentiments it contains, because I cannot think that having concurred with me in the view which I took of the expediency of having all that related to the apprentices left to the jurisdiction of the special magistrates and not the local magistrates, he would have used that language; and although I will not give the name of the person whom I have since heard, on inquiry, to be the writer, yet certainly the report represents another individual as having been supposed to be the writer of that letter and not Mr. Barrett. There appears to me also to be a misapprehension in that part of Dr Madden's statement, which relates to persons whom he considers to have been illegally held in slavery. The question 648 is, "Have you found that any apprentices who so applied," that is, who applied to be discharged from apprenticeship, "have been illegally detained in slavery?" He answers, "A great many." "What became of the negroes upon your ascertaining the fact that they were illegally detained in slavery?—Generally speaking, when I could not succeed in procuring their freedom myself, I referred them to the Attorney-General; he used to institute some proceedings, but in a great many instances those persons did not obtain their freedom.—On what grounds do you conceive they were entitled to their freedom?—There were a great number of Indians who had been imported from the Mosquito shore; the descendants of those persons were declared free by law; there were a great number in Kingston that I was well assured were illegally held in slavery." In answer to question 656, "In those cases in which an individual was considered by the magistrate not to be an apprentice, was he from that time released from active labour to his master?" He says, "Many, since I left the island, whose cases had been before me but not decided, I understand have become apprentices, having been claimed over again.—In cases brought before you and adjudicated upon by you, was the immediate practical effect to release the party from actual servitude?—They could not punish them for not labouring except through me, and I would not punish them while I had a doubt." May I beg, in answer to this statement, to observe, in the first place, that the necessary effect of instituting an action of homine replegiendo, is to give the plaintiff his freedom from the time that action is filed until a verdict passes in favour of the defendant; it is therefore impossible that if such an action was instituted, the person instituting it could have been detained in slavery during the pending of the action; I know that from my own experience, for I believe I have been counsel during the twenty years I was in Jamaica for more plaintiffs bringing actions of homine replegiendo than any counsel who was ever there. I made it a rule when I became Attorney-General, as I had the appointment of the Solicitor of the Crown, not only to give them my own services in those actions but to procure them the gratuitous services of the Solicitor of the Crown, and the present Attorney-General can do just as I did. In point of law it was the inevitable and necessary result of the institution of the action of homine replegiendo, that the party bringing it was in a state of freedom until the verdict was given against him. When that verdict was given against him, such is the law upon this subject, settled by decision, that although if a verdict in favour of the plaintiff is conclusive against the person claiming him as his slave, yet a verdict against the plaintiff was not conclusive against him. I have known six, eight and ten actions of homine replegiendo brought by the same person after having brought preceding actions and failed in them.

3399. Chairman.] To whom was the appeal, in case the action was decided in the first instance against the plaintiff?—The plaintiff might bring another action immediately.

3400. In what court?—In the same court, or in any court; I have stated the law on this subject in my evidence before the Commissioners of Legal Inquiry, and I there gave the name of the case. To an action brought by a plaintiff to recover his freedom, the defendant pleaded as plea of former recovery a former verdict in his favour.

3401. Do you mean that the individual might bring a new action without any alteration of circumstances?—Yes, and that he received an adjudication on demurrer in the grand court.

3402. You state that while those actions were pending the plaintiff was practically free?—Yes, and in consequence of the abuse which took place of that right, it was proposed to introduce an Act for the purpose of obliging the party who brought the action of homine replegiendo to find security; but I objected to such an Act being passed; I rather think it reached the council, and they threw it out upon this ground, that it was infinitely better all those cases should receive the fullest investigation, and that the fair and honourable conduct of the counsel would be a sufficient security that the action should not be resorted to for vexatious purposes, or when there was not a reasonable ground for submitting the case to a jury. It was not thought advisable to impose any restraint on the assertion of the right of freedom.

3403. In point of fact, would not any respectable counsel in Jamaica have refused to bring such an action, if he was convinced it was frivolous?—I have brought the action a second time, because the party has told me she could bring forward additional evidence, and I brought the action, feeling that though there was a hardship on the defendant in being obliged to defend himself, it was infinitely better that hardship should be sustained than it should be made a reproach against the colony that its law did not admit of the amplest means for asserting and recovering the freedom of a person illegally held in slavery.

3404. That was a case in which, in your opinion, there were substantial grounds for trying the case a second time?—I took it very much upon the representation of the party, but I mean to say the state of the law of Jamaica at the time alluded to by Mr. Madden, there was nothing to prevent actions of homine replegiendo being brought without any restriction.

3405. Mr. Buxton.] Is there no responsibility for damages incurred by those who bring actions?—None. With respect to those who were alleged to be Indians, and this is put forward by Dr. Madden very much upon rumour alone, when I was in the colony, I had the means of knowing that the number was considerably reduced; and there is one circumstance which is almost conclusive, the descendant of an Indian has a description of hair which almost prevents any doubt as to the person being an Indian. But it is a misapprehension, that the party could be kept in slavery while an action of homine replegiendo was pending; for the court would immediately have issued an attachment against the party who should have laid his hand on the negro with a view of keeping him in slavery during the time that his action was pending.

3406. Chairman.] Will you go on to the next point, if you please.—I have only one or two other observations to make. Very much of the objection which has been urged against the Jamaica Abolition Act seems to originate in an unjust and unfounded distrust of the manner in which the law of Jamaica is administered. The expression of one of the witnesses is, that justice cannot be expected from a Jamaica bench and a Jamaica jury. I shall certainly not think that a tribunal which exists by law requires any vindication from me, even if the persons by whom it is thus attached were competent, from experience, to form an opinion of its character; whether it be their object to endeavour to deprive the people of Jamaica of the trial by jury or not, I do not know; but I shall content myself with expressing my belief, founded on no inconsiderable experience, that charge which has been made against the Jamaica bench and the Jamaica jury is unjust, and is not warranted by any actual experience of the conduct and character of those persons who compose both those tribunals.

3407. Sir George Grey.] But you think, as a general principle, that it is desirable that judges who are to administer the law should have a legal education, and be brought up in the practice of the law?—The constitution of the Jamaica court, which has been found to answer extremely well, has existed a great many years, and by associating with the Chief-Justice a gentleman of the colony of local knowledge and experience, you have the advantage of those who have been witnessing the proceedings of the court, and are conversant with the local usages and laws which must influence their decisions. I am ready to confess that barristers have a predilection in favour of barristers put upon the bench; but it is by no means clear that the qualification of all the judges, being barristers, is so indispensably necessary as is supposed.

3408. Therefore you prefer the present constitution of the supreme court of Jamaica to a constitution which would involve the necessity of having legal judges on the bench in preference to those not having legal knowledge?—I am not disposed to express a disapprobation of a legal bench, if it be so constituted as to secure a due acquaintance with the local laws and usages of the colony.

3409. Do you think that the advantages to be derived from having wholly unprofessional men on the bench with a professional Chief-Justice, are sufficient to counterbalance the disadvantage of having a bench not composed of a professional man, when illness may prevent the attendance of the Chief-Justice?—Certainly not. But considering that the law administered in the Jamaica courts consists of a great deal of local law, there ought to be on the bench some experience of that local local law. It is not a correct designation of all the assistant judges to describe them as wholly unprofessional persons. Many of them have necessarily had the means of acquiring knowledge of that part of the law which they have to administer.

3410. You have adverted to the Report of the Commissioners of Inquiry upon the Administration of the Law in Jamaica; do you concur with them in their observations on the administration of the law in Jamaica?—I expressed my opinions in answer to some questions that they put to me upon the subject. I have not seen any reason to alter them. My opinion on this subject, as given to the Commissioners of Legal Inquiry, is to be found in my answer to the 230th question, and it is as follows: "I think it would be an improvement in the administration of the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the supreme and assize courts, if they were more assimilated to the courts of nisi prius in England; that all causes should be tried before a single judge; and that thus motions for new trials or an arrest of judgment, should not be heard before or decided by the same judges who sat on the trial; but that such motions should be reserved for and disposed of by the supreme court alone, consisting of the full bench. But such an improvement would not be complete unless the judges of the supreme court were men of legal education. Such an arrangement would render necessary the appointment of assistant judges at the assize courts."

3411. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you not think that some legal knowledge was necessary in the case mentioned by Captain Oldrey, where the two judges were not professional men?—I am not prepared to say that either of those judges was incompetent to have decided any question arising on that trial. I consider that Mr. Barrett, though not called to the bar, who was one of the judges, possesses extensive information, and has acquired a good deal of legal knowledge from reading and from long experience. Another of the judges had been many years ago a solicitor, and had long been an assistant judge.

3412. Supposing you were satisfied with the case of those two individuals, do you think that you have always sufficient security that the party who might sit in the absence of the Chief-Justice would possess legal knowledge?—I think that there is a sufficient number of well educated gentlemen in the island of Jamaica to admit of the administration of the law being entrusted to them, provided professional persons be associated with them, so as to exclude all those disadvantages which might arise from there being no professional person on the bench. There is as much evil in having the bench wholly occupied by persons who have no knowledge of the local laws and usages, as to have it wholly occupied by persons who have had no legal education. The law administered in Jamaica consists not merely of the common law of England, but of usages and local Acts, of which a person who might have been educated in this country would, till he had acquired experience there, be wholly ignorant.

3413. Sir George Grey.] Those judges have criminal jurisdiction as well as civil?—They have; I can certainly say, in my experience of the administration of criminal jurisprudence, that I certainly have not met with any instances in which I could find fault with their decisions either on one side or the other. I was twelve years Attorney-General, and although I might find fault with decisions in civil cases, yet I must say in the criminal jurisdiction I was unable to find such cases.

3414. Mr. Gladstone.] You have in civil cases seen defects?—I have; in cases, too, in which the Chief-Justice has concurred with the assistant judges.

3415. Sir George Grey.] What salary is received by the assistant judges?—Two assistant judges of the supreme court receive 1,000*l.* a year each; two assistant judges in each of the assize courts for the counties of Cornwall and Surrey receive 700*l.* each. The total amount of the salaries of all the assistant judges is 4,800*l.* currency.

3416. Is there a regular Chief-Justice?—Yes.

3417. What is his salary?—He receives 4,000*l.* a year currency, and 150*l.* is paid to him from the appropriated revenue, I believe; he also receives some fees. With respect to various other objections which have been urged to these laws, I am quite satisfied to leave them upon the answers which have been given by the witnesses to the questions put by the Committee; the objections are removed by the answers.

3418. Have you now concluded the observations which you were desirous of making upon the Jamaica enactments?—I have concluded the observations I had to make on the Jamaica enactments. I refer to the observations with which I originally prefaced my evidence. I have only to add, if any of the statements which have been made by the witnesses, either with respect to the working of the apprenticeship measures or the general habits or disposition of persons in the colony, or the conduct of the tribunals, should influence the decision of the Committee, I ask for the opportunity of further meeting those statements, by bringing before the Committee the witnesses who may have the means of refuting them. There are some persons now in England who have been in Jamaica since the Abolition Act was passed, and I wish that their evidence may be heard.

8 July 1836.

Captain Oldrey, called in ; and further Examined,

Captain Oldrey.

3419. Chairman.] THE Committee understand you have expressed an opinion which was implied in an answer given by Mr. Burge to the Committee, that you conceived that as a special magistrate you had a power to adjudicate upon claims of wages to the apprentice from his employer ; will you have the goodness to state to the Committee in what sense you meant to make that assertion ?—By the 49th clause, a special magistrate is empowered by Act to adjudicate every case between master and apprentice.

3420. Did you mean, then, to say, that the special magistrates had the power to oblige the master to pay to the apprentice any sum of wages that was due to him, if he thought fit ?—Not to the apprentice, because the last clause but two states that every fine must go to the public of the island ; the 68th clause.

3421. You mean merely to state to the Committee, that you had the power of fining the master for not having paid this money to the apprentice, which fine was to go to the Crown, and not to the apprentice ?—To the island, and not to the apprentice.

3422. Is the Committee distinctly to understand that you do not conceive you have the power of obliging the master to pay to the apprentice the wages due to him ?—Certainly not, the 68th clause prevents it.

3423. In what way do you imagine the apprentice might proceed to recover the amount of wages due to him from his employer ?—The courts are open to him, should he prefer taking his case before any other court.

3424. Mr. Buxton.] That is, supposing he had sufficient knowledge and sufficient money to appeal to the court ?—Decidedly.

3425. Mr. Gladstone.] Were cases of wages withheld frequently brought before you ?—No.

3426. Have you reason to know that they frequently exist ?—I have heard that they frequently have existed, and that faith has been broken by the master, but none came under my own observation.

3427. Chairman.] Did such cases come before you in any single instance —No.

3428. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware at what period apprentices are paid their wages ?—Weekly, they prefer it ; many will not trust beyond the week.

3429. Is it usual to pay them weekly ?—Yes, it is.

3430. When the interval is beyond a week, what would it be in general ?—I cannot exactly answer the question ; they used to be paid weekly for their weekly labour, and many will not trust beyond a week ; some masters have violated their faith with the apprentices, I do not mean to say generally, which has been the cause of their not working so willingly as they otherwise would, and another reason is, the improper treatment they have received ; I can point out one estate, Mr. Taite's, in Westmoreland, line in line with Mr. Scott's, where the apprentices would not give a single hour of their own time to their own master, but hire themselves out to Mr. Scott regularly.

3431. Mr. Buxton.] How many crops of sugar were carried off when you were in the island ?—I should say two.

3432. Was one of those during the time of slavery and one during the time of apprenticeship ?—In the parish of St. Elizabeth the season is later than in other parts of the island ; one took place in the time of slavery and the other under the apprenticeship system.

Mr. Charles Lushington.
Sir George Grey.
Sir Stratford Canning.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

William Burge, Esq., called in ; and further Examined.

3433. Chairman.] ARE you desirous of making any further observations to the Committee on the subject of Jamaica enactments?—On Friday last, when I laid before the Committee the Act passed in 1834, intituled “An Act to facilitate the Recovery of Small Debts,” and which extended the jurisdiction of a single justice from 40s. to 5l., I was asked whether, as that Act was passed only to be in force until the 31st of December 1835, I knew that it had been re-enacted? I stated my impression that it had been re-enacted. I knew that a committee had been appointed at the commencement of the session to bring in that Act; but not then having the votes of the House of Assembly before me, I was not able to state with certainty whether it had been passed. I have, however, since then referred to the votes, and I find that on the 17th of December, that Act which had been brought in at the commencement of the session, passed into a law, by receiving the Governor’s assent, and consequently that Act is now in force.

W. Burge, Esq

12 July 1836.

Mr. William Miller, called in ; and Examined.

3434-5. Chairman.] I BELIEVE that you are well acquainted with the island of Jamaica?—I am.

Mr. W. Miller

3436. Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee how long you have resided there?—Thirty-six years.

3437. Mr. O'Connell.] Up to what time?—Up to the 5th of June 1835.

3438. Chairman.] Were you a proprietor of slaves?—No, I had a few domestics.

3439. But you were not a planter?—I am a planter by profession. I was agent for a number of proprietors, and managed their properties there.

3440. Were you a member of the legal profession?—No.

3441. Mr. O'Connell.] Or any profession besides?—No other.

3442. Chairman.] Were you a member of the House of Assembly?—No.

3443. Mr. O'Connell.] Were you a member of the Legislative Council?—Yes.

3444. When were you appointed?—In 1834, I think.

3445. Mr. Gladstone.] By whom?—Lord Mulgrave.

3446. Your interest then in slaves was confined to a few domestics?—To a few domestics.

3447. How many properties, with what number of apprentices, had you under your care, as agent for proprietors?—Rather more than 10,000.

3448. How many estates?—Forty-eight properties, from the 1st of August, the commencement of the apprenticeship.

3449. Have you property in any other colony but Jamaica?—No.

3450. Have you any intention to return to the colony?—No intention whatever.

3451. Were you custos of any parish?—Of the parish of Trelawney.

3452. You were appointed by Lord Mulgrave; did you continue in the Legislative Council up to the time of leaving the island?—Yes, until the time when I left the island.

3453. You remained there a considerable time in the Legislative Council under Lord Sligo’s government?—Yes, my appointment was in England. I was recommended by Lord Mulgrave.

3454. Were

Mr. W. Miller.

12 July 1836.

3454. Were you in the habit of confidential communication with Lords Mulgrave and Sligo?—Yes.

3455. You had not merely official intercourse, but confidential communication?—Yes.

3456. Have you reason to believe you enjoyed their confidence and good opinion?—I have reason to think so.

3457. Up to the time when you left the island?—Up to the time when I left the island.

[A letter was handed to the Witness.]

3458. Have the goodness to refer to a letter which appears in page 45 of the second part of the Parliamentary Printed Papers, No. 1.; is that a letter of Lord Sligo's?—It is.

3459. Are you the person referred to in that letter of Lord Sligo's?—I believe I am.

3460. What course did you take relative to the question of abolition, when it was under discussion in the Legislature of Jamaica?—The course I took was favourable to bringing it about.

3461. You were anxious to see the principle of apprenticeship carried fully into effect?—Certainly.

3462. You thought that that afforded the best prospect of a favourable issue to the state of slavery?—I did.

3463. Chairman] Were you a magistrate in Jamaica?—Being one of the Legislative Council made me a magistrate in every parish in the island.

3464. But were you accustomed to act as a magistrate in Jamaica?—Yes.

3465. Mr. O'Connell.] You had been a magistrate of a particular parish before?—Of several parishes.

3466. How long is it since you got into the commission of the peace; about how long?—My memory does not serve me, but it was a good many years ago.

3467. Ten or twelve?—Yes; I think nearer twenty years.

3468. Chairman.] Do you conceive, upon the whole, that the system of apprenticeship is working well?—I understand that it is now working better than it did when I left the island; I could perceive, before I left the island, an improvement in the working of the system.

3469. What were the principal difficulties in the working of the system, as they appeared to you, while you were in the island?—In all great changes there are a great many difficulties; the thing was new to everybody connected with it.

3470. Did those difficulties arise from the nature of the subject itself, or from the aversion either of the negro population or of the planters to this new state of things?—I do not think there was any aversion on the part of the planters, and the negroes did not understand it well at first; it was a new thing; I believe they expected to have received wages from the commencement.

3471. Do you believe that both classes are becoming gradually more reconciled to this new state of things?—I think so.

3472. Mr. O'Connell.] Is it your opinion, though they were disappointed in that expectation of wages, that the system would have worked better?—Would you wish me to explain my opinion of what was likely to make the system work better?

3473. I wish you first to answer my question, which was—Is it your opinion that the payment of wages would have made the system work better?—Instead of the present system?

3474. Yes?—I think it would; I think the negroes would have liked it better.

3475. Chairman.] Do you mean by that to say, you think that a system which left the negro free to receive wages for his labour would have been preferable to an apprenticeship system, that it would have worked better than an apprenticeship system?—I do not mean to say that it would have worked better, but I think they would have liked it better.

3476. Mr. O'Connell.] The opinion you gave me was, that the system would have worked better on wages; that was the opinion you gave me, at least I so understood it?—Yes, I stated that the negroes would have liked it better.

3477. Of course you know in that is implied, that the former proprietors should not give any allowances for extra wages, and in that view of it, is it your opinion, as a practical man, that the system would have worked better, the negro providing for himself but getting wages for his labour?—I had no experience of that; I think the negroes would have been better pleased with wages, but I am not certain that the negro would have given sufficient labour.

3478. Chairman.] I do not quite understand whether you mean a system of wages connected in some measure with the system of apprenticeship, or a system of wages such as farm servants in this country might be working for, and no system of apprenticeship at all?—I merely meant to say, that I thought the negro would have been better pleased if he had been offered wages.

3479. You mean to say, that as far as the negro is concerned, he would prefer a system of free labour to a system of apprenticeship?—Yes.

3480. Do you think that the negro considers the system of apprenticeship as substantially more favourable to him than the old system of slavery?—I should think so.

3481. But do you think he looks forward with pleasure and hope to the substitution of a system of entire freedom to that of the present system of apprenticeship?—I have no doubt of it.

3482. Mr. William Gladstone.] Is it your opinion it was judicious to interpose a system of apprenticeship between a state of slavery and a state of entire freedom?—I think so.

3483. But when you say that you think the system would work better upon wages than as it is at present, do you mean the Committee to understand that wages are paid in very few cases at present?—I did not mean to say it would work better; I said the negro would be better pleased with wages.

3484. Mr. O'Connell.] Is it your opinion that the negro could expect wages without giving adequate labour for the wages?—He ought not to expect it.

3485. That is quite clear; but from your knowledge of the country, is it candidly your opinion that if he had been offered wages on the terms of giving fair value in work for it, and that there was no obligation in any body to provide for him in any way, that he would or would not have worked for those wages and earned them?—No, I think it is very doubtful.

3486. You are not able to form a decisive opinion, either this way or that?—No, because food is easily obtained there; they have not the same inducement to work there as in many other countries.

3487. There is not the same pressure, but there is the same anxiety for more comfort; the negroes like to be well dressed, do they not?—Yes, they are fond of dress.

3488. They are fond of every thing in the nature of luxury that they can get, are they not?—They are.

3489. Have you known the experiment tried of offering negroes wages by giving adequate labour?—Yes.

3490. Have you known that experiment tried, not in extra hours, but for the entire time of a day or a week?—I have known it for half a day, and I have known it indeed for a day.

3491. Then, so far as you have known it, was it successful?—I only knew it practised on two estates, and there it was successful.

3492. Have you any objection to mention the names of these estates?—At Hyde Hall and Etingdon.

3493. Mr. Gladstone.] Was that before or since the abolition?—Since the apprenticeship.

3494. Mr. O'Connell.] About what number of slaves were there upon each of those estates?—I should think about 550.

3495. Upon each?—Upon both.

3496. And was that experiment made upon the entire gang of each estate or partially?—On all the workers.

3497. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean that upon the two estates you have mentioned the negroes were paid for all the labour they performed, or merely paid for the labour beyond those hours which they were bound to work by the apprenticeship law?—The proprietor of the estates was in the island at the time. I had the management of them previous to his arrival, and he made an arrangement with the people.

3498. At the time of the emancipation?—After.

3499. What

Mr. W. Miller.

12 July 1836.

3499. What was the basis of that arrangement; was it to give them remuneration for all the labour they should perform?—No, for one day in the week; I think they agreed, to the best of my recollection, to work in the old way, from daylight until dark, for four days, and he paid them wages on the fifth day.

3500. And the sixth day they had to themselves?—Yes; they had the sixth day to themselves. He was anxious to employ any that were disposed to work, even on the sixth day, and would have paid them.

3501. But they preferred working on their own provision grounds on the sixth day?—Yes, most of them.

3502. Now, when they worked on their own provision grounds on the sixth day, were they contented to give the fifth day to their master for wages?—Yes, they entered into an agreement with him.

3503. Then how did they contrive to take their provisions to market; did they take them to market on a Sunday?—Negroes do not go to market every market day; only now and then, when there is an overplus of provision, they go to market.

3504. How often, upon the average, would negroes go to market?—It depended altogether upon the season, whether it was a favourable season for producing provision or not.

3505. Taking the case where they would require oftenest to go to market, how often would they go; would they require to go once in a fortnight, once in three weeks, once in a month, or how frequently?—Perhaps once in three weeks.

3506. But sometimes more rarely than that?—Yes; but the heads of families seldom go to market; they send their children, and sometimes some negroes employ others to carry their provisions to market.

3507. Mr. O'Connell.] And pay them?—Yes.

3508. Mr. Gladstone.] And do they find it more profitable to pay others to take their provisions to market in some cases than they do to go themselves?—It enables them to stay at home and attend to their little property, and cultivate their provision ground, and do as they think proper.

3509. In the case of these two estates the negroes generally preferred wages on the fifth day to having the benefit they would derive from having two days' work for themselves, and thereby having a greater facility of going to market themselves?—It appeared so from their entering into the arrangement with the master.

3510. How distant were the markets in the case of these two estates?—There was a market within four miles of the estate.

3511. Is that nearer than the markets generally are; is that less than the average distance of markets?—Perhaps it is.

3512. You think it is, on the whole?—Yes, I think it is, on the whole.

3513. Was there one estate within four miles, or each of the two estates?—Yes; the distance is nearly the same.

3514. Was there anything peculiar in the circumstances of these two estates which led to the formation of such an agreement; do you ascribe it to anything in the disposition of the people or the disposition of the master; for I think you said these were the only two estates which you knew as to which a similar agreement was made?—Yes.

3515. To what do you ascribe the fact that such agreements have been made upon these two estates and upon no other?—Upon my word I cannot account for it; I cannot give any particular reason.

3516. But you say that those are the only estates on which such agreements have been made that you know of?—I merely speak as to my own knowledge.

3517. Do you mean that you are not aware of any other estates upon which wages are paid at all to the negroes?—Wages were paid on every estate I was concerned for.

3518. Mr. O'Connell.] For extra hours?—Yes.

3519. And labour given accordingly?—Yes, and their half day that they were entitled to.

3520. How long did the experiment continue on these two estates, to your knowledge?—Until I left the island.

3521. And it was still going on?—It was going on, and I believe is going on now. The proprietor is in London, and can give the Committee any information upon the subject.

3522. Who is the proprietor?—Mr. Shirley.

3523. Mr. Gladstone.] But what was the peculiarity of these two estates; did it consist merely in this—that they gave a whole day, the fifth day of the week, for wages, whereas on other estates they gave only half a day, and extra hours on the four other days?—They worked out their time agreeably to law during the four first days of the week.

3524. Then the whole difference consisted in this, that they gave the whole of their stipulated labour during the four first days, whereas in other cases it was spread over a space of five days in different portions?—Yes.

3525. Mr. O'Connell.] They worked more hours in four days, in order to have the fifth day to sell for wages?—Yes, that was the arrangement.

3526. And that arrangement was acted upon by them?—Yes, it was acted upon.

3527. And by their owners, who paid them faithfully the wages, I presume?—Quite so, the money was sent to the overseers of the estates every week for that purpose.

3528. Chairman.] Do you conceive the fact you have mentioned, of this system being confined to these two estates, is to be attributed to the proprietors of other estates not having made the same offer to the negroes, or that if the offer had been made, the negroes would not generally have been disposed to accept it?—I think it is very doubtful that they would have accepted it.

3529. Mr. O'Connell.] But there was no peculiar circumstance on these estates other than the owner seems to have made the offer; was there anything particular on these estates, and had they any advantage that other estates had not?—They had no advantages that other estates had not; in fact, perhaps it would be proper for me to mention, that all the extra allowances were stopped. Mr. Shirley stopped all extra allowances, and gave them, I think, to the best of my recollection, 2s. 6d. a day for Fridays; therefore they had not the same allowance that other estates had.

3530. But they could, if they pleased, have refused that plan?—Certainly.

3531. And thrown themselves on the allowances?—Certainly.

3532. And they preferred working more hours on four days, and working the entire of Friday for wages; that was a preference made by negroes?—That was the arrangement they entered into with their master.

3533. Mr. Gladstone.] By extra allowances you mean those that were not compulsory?—Those not provided for by law.

3534. Mr. O'Connell.] And what are those; just specify those that you reckon as extras of which they were deprived, the negroes of these estates?—The dry provisions; what we call dry provisions, flour, rice and fish, and their allowance of rum and sugar.

3535. They get none of these?—None of these.

3536. Then those allowances you conceive are not compellable by law to be given?—I am not aware that there is any law to compel it.

3537. Chairman.] Do you imagine the negroes on those two estates considered themselves, on the whole, better off than negroes on other estates or the contrary?—That I had no opportunity of arriving at a proper conclusion upon.

3538. Mr. O'Connell.] If they chose they could fall back on the law?—Certainly.

3539. Chairman.] Had the negroes on other estates you managed these allowances, or had they not?—On the estates I managed myself, I never stopped any allowances.

3540. On these two?—It was not me that stopped it on these two estates.

3541. Mr. O'Connell.] I understood you it was a free bargain?—I understood it so; I was not present when the bargain was made, but I understood from Mr. Shirley and from the people that it was.

3542. Chairman.] But do you suppose, if the negroes on these two estates had had the same allowance given to them by the proprietor which you gave to the negroes on the other estates that were under your management, that in that case the negroes upon these two estates would have been willing to work for the wages in the way you described?—I suppose they must have considered the extra wages equal to the allowance.

3543. Mr. O'Connell.] They liked the half-crown a-day very much?—I did not stop the allowance upon any estate I was concerned for, and I paid the people also for all their extra time, for the half day.

3544. Chairman.] But still, would the negroes that were receiving this allowance ance have submitted to that system of working that was in practice on these two particular estates to which you have adverted?—Would the negroes generally, do you mean?

Mr. W. Miller.

12. July 1836.

3545. Would the negroes that were in receipt of the extra allowance, as was the case in the other estates under your management, would they have been willing to accede to the terms proposed to the negroes on these two estates, who worked for wages when they were deprived of their allowances?—If the proprietor had not been in the country I do not think they would have accepted of the terms that they did; not from me, they would not, in my opinion, but that is merely my opinion.

3546. Mr. C. Lushington.] Are you of opinion that the negroes generally can distinguish accurately between their past state of slavery and their present system of apprenticeship?—I should think so.

3547. Do you think they prefer the latter?—I should think so.

3548. Mr. O'Connell.] Upon that proposition I suppose you entertain no doubt?—No doubt whatever.

3550. Do they understand and appreciate the privileges they have derived under the apprenticeship system?—Very well indeed.

3551. If they are aggrieved or oppressed, are they acquainted with the proper course of obtaining redress?—They are.

3552. And according to your knowledge they are not deterred by apprehensions of the resentment of their masters from applying to the proper sources for redress, if they consider themselves injured?—As far as relates to my own concerns, quite the contrary. I invariably encouraged the negroes, if they had any complaints to make against any person that had the management of them, to come forward readily and make it to me, and I would give them redress.

3533. Mr. Gladstone.] I want to understand very distinctly the difference between these two estates and the other estates within your knowledge. I understand that on the other estates under your management wages were regularly and habitually paid to the negroes?—Yes; I preferred the nine hour system; indeed the nine hour system was pretty general at the commencement of the apprenticeships throughout the country, and I continued it during crop, and therefore in crop time it was quite necessary to employ the negroes during the half of Friday; their time expired at half-past 10 o'clock in the forenoon, and I paid them wages for the remainder of the day.

3554. Then upon all the estates under your management you paid the negroes one half day's wages?—Yes, I happen to have in my pocket the exact copies of several agreements I entered into with the negroes; perhaps the Committee will allow me to produce them.

[The same were produced.]

3555. Can you state what was the average amount of wages you paid, or would you read them from the papers which you have just produced; the amounts, not the whole agreement?—

3556. Mr. O'Connell.] State how much per hour, by the hour?—If you will permit me, as it is very short, I will read it; “A plan for taking off Seven Rivers sugar crop, 1835. The apprentices to be hired for a limited portion of their own time; videlicet, part of the spell gang for seven hours each day; the boiler-men, syphon-men, stokers and dry trash carriers for nine hours.” For the seven hours, able people were paid at the rate of 1s. 3d.; children were paid at the rate of 7½d. For the nine hours, the boiler-men were paid at the rate of 1s. 8d.; the syphon-men 1s. 3d.; the stokers, that is, the people that make the fire, 1s. 8d.; the dry trash carriers, which is young people and children, at the rate of 1s. 3d.; on the Friday it was necessary on that estate to hire 54 labourers to work the half of Friday. The people in the distilleries received 10d. each, the head men 10d., the cane cutters 10d., the cart men 10d., the loaders 10d., boys and girls 7½d.

3557. Mr. O'Connell.] Are these currency or sterling?—They are currency; hat was at the rate of 12l. 16s. 3d. a week.

3558. Mr. Gladstone.] Twelve pounds sixteen shillings and threepence weekly for the whole estate; how many people were there upon the estate?—I think at Seven Rivers there were about 320, to the best of my recollection.

3559. Well, then, what sum would you pay in the year, for, I presume, the amount amount you now mention did not continue for the whole year, but merely lasted during crop?—This was the agreement the people entered with me during crop.

3560. What sum on that estate would you pay during the whole year for wages?—If you suppose the crop was taken off in 18 weeks, it would be at the rate of about 13*l.* a week. The whole of the people assembled at the overseer's house, Seven Rivers, on Saturday the 10th of January 1835, and agreed to the above terms, in witness whereof the constables have affixed their marks, and the special magistrate his name.

3561. Then that would be at the rate of 234*l.* a year for that estate, multiplying 18 by 13?—Yes.

3562. Then did you pay no wages at all out of crop time?—I left the country in June, before the crop was finished.

3563. But from August to December, before the crop began?—No, I did not, to the best of my recollection, pay any wages before that.

3564. Well, then, in point of fact, you paid the allowance on all these properties?—Yes.

3565. Well, then, the difference between those properties under your management and the two properties to which you before alluded, appears to be that on those two properties the negroes had wages for one entire day, and none for four days, whereas on those under your management, they had wages for half a day?—And all the extra hours that they worked during crop.

3566. But was it not found necessary on those two estates to employ them for more than ten hours during each of the five days, during crop time?—I am not speaking of crop time on Mr. Shirley's two estates.

3567. Are you aware, then, what arrangement he made for crop time?—I do not know exactly the arrangement he made, but he paid wages for the extra time.

3568. Do you think, on the whole, the condition of the negroes on those two estates, in respect of their wages, was more advantageous than on the estates under your care?—I do not think them so advantageous, but that is only my opinion.

3569. Mr. O'Connell.] To the negro or to the master?—To the negro.

3570. Sir George Grey.] Did you think they got as much value for the work they did?—I think it would be hardly equal to all the allowances.

3571. Plus the wages which were paid on the other estates?—The extra wages on Mr. Shirley's estate.

3572. But you think on the two estates the value they received for their work was hardly equal to what was received by the people on the other estates, which consisted of the extra allowances, and the wages you mentioned?—Knowing the negro character well, as I do, I think very few negroes in my concern would have come into it.

3573. Would they have come into the arrangement made on those two estates?—No, I do not think so.

3574. Mr. O'Connell.] By characters you mean the shrewdness of their characters?—Yes.

3575. Mr. Gladstone.] For how many hours was the mill put about on the properties under your care during crop?—The hours allowed by law, and for all extra hours the negroes were paid.

3576. But for how many hours was the mill actually in operation?—It depended altogether on what crop there was to take off, and the situation of the estate; there was hardly the same plan practised on any two estates; it depends altogether on the situation of the properties.

3577. For how many hours generally then was the work continued about the mill?—For 16 or 18 hours.

3578. Was it in any case greater; did it ever continue for the whole twenty-four hours?—Not to my knowledge.

3579. On any of the properties?—Not any of the properties I attended to.

3580. What was the greatest period which any negro, on the properties under your care, worked continuously, whether for hire or by compulsion?—I think 18 hours, to the best of my recollection.

3581. In any case did any negro work for 18 hours continuously by compulsion?—Do you mean during the apprenticeship?

3582. In any case during the apprenticeship, did any negro work 18 hours; did he give 18 hours of the 42 weekly hours he was bound to give continuously tinuously by compulsion?—He gives it of his own free will and accord; he might either give it or not give it as he thought proper; if he gave his labour, he got wages for it.

Mr. W. Miller.

12 July 1836.

3583. Did he ever give 18 hours without getting wages for a part of the 18 hours?—Certainly not to my knowledge.

3584. Must you have known it if it had been the case?—I should think so.

3585. Were you in the constant habit of receiving accounts and inspecting the properties?—I received a diary every week of the actual transactions during the week.

3586. Did you pay them frequent personal visits?—Yes, I did as often as I could.

3587. You described the practice of paying wages as universal on the estates under your own care, do you believe it was general throughout, according to the best of your knowledge?

3588. From the acquaintance you have of the habits of the persons in the island?—With the gentlemen that I was acquainted I believe it was general.

3589. Was there any falling off in the crops on the estates under your care?—Yes.

3590. Considerable?—Considerable.

3591. To what proportion upon the whole; I do not ask you as to any particular estate, but to what proportion, on the whole, was the crop of 1835 less than the crop of 1834?—I should think about one-tenth.

3592. Taking the entire island of Jamaica?—I am speaking of my concern.

3593. I believe, if you take the whole island of Jamaica, the decrease of the crop of 1835, as compared with the crop of 1834, is considerably greater, is it not, than one-tenth?—

3594. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you know whether it is or not?—I am not aware, because the crops were not finished when I left.

3595. Chairman.] Were the seasons equally favourable those two years?—The seasons were favourable both years.

3596. Do you think any part of that difference can be accounted for by any difference of seasons?—It was my opinion that it was caused by the want of labour.

3597. Sir G. Grey.] Was the one-tenth diminution of the crop of 1835 more than a larger diminution which has frequently taken place between one year and another under slavery?—The crop of 1835, according to the favourable seasons we had, and if every thing had been going on in the usual way, ought to have been a very large one, for during all the time I was in Jamaica, I do not recollect a more seasonable year.

3598. Mr. Gladstone.] Then you ascribe the difference to want of labour; but did you find practically any very great difficulty in inducing apprentices to enter into agreements to work for wages, or to perform those agreements when they had entered into them?—At the commencement of apprenticeship, in my own concerns, they objected to enter into an agreement; I could not induce them to do so.

3599. The thing was new to them?—Yes; in fact they said they did not understand the thing.

3600. Sir George Grey.] Owing to a misapprehension?—I believe it was so.

3601. Did that indisposition to enter into an agreement gradually disappear?—Yes, it did.

3602. Then, did the want of labour, of which you complain, become less and less felt, or did it continue to be felt as severely in the latter part of the crop of 1835, as it was during the earlier part?—No, I think the system improved during the latter part; the people understood the thing better.

3603. Mr. O'Connell.] Did you ever know in that period a negro refuse his labour for adequate wages?—Yes, I have known whole gangs on many estates that would not take wages at all at first.

3604. But when once the system of wages began to work, did you ever know them refuse adequate wages?—The crops on my concern were taken off all with wages from the commencement; they understood the thing better.

3605. Chairman.] Do you apprehend that at present there is any ground for fearing there would not be an adequate supply of labour, in case of an abundant crop, if proper wages were offered?—I think that is very doubtful; I do not think that they would give sufficient labour to take off a very large crop.

3606. Mr.

3606. Mr. O'Connell.] The habit of labouring for wages is increased?—No doubt of it; the letters I receive by every packet confirm that.

3607. Sir George Grey.] Was there an indisposition, that you are aware of, on the part of any managers of estates in the infancy of this system to offer wages?—Not to my knowledge, although I have heard it said so, but I do not know it of my own knowledge, none of my neighbours had an indisposition to offer wages.

3608. But you have heard it stated?—I have heard it stated.

3609. Have you heard it stated, that that indisposition also has decreased since the system has been longer in operation, and that wages are more general latterly than they were?—I think the system is better understood now than it was at first, and that the thing is working better on both sides.

3610. Mr. Gladstone.] From the improvement that took place in the estates under your own management, should you have felt confident you would take off a larger crop in 1836, supposing you had an equally favourable season, than you took off in 1835?—Yes.

3611. Do you think you would be able to take off a full crop, supposing you had a good season?—Not a full crop in the proper time.

3612. Is it not usual to plant canes for the next year during the time you take off the canes for the current year?—The extent of the crop would depend altogether on when the plant was put in.

3613. At what period of the year is the plant put in?—They commence planting in the month of October, that is what is called the fall plant; they plant in the months of November and December.

3614. Is there no planting of canes during the months of crop?—Frequently; there are some districts of the country, where a spring plant answers better than a fall plant, and then it is necessary to put in the plant during the crop.

3615. Now, upon the estates under your care, did you plant in the spring or in the fall?—On some of them in the fall, and others in the spring, and others we do not plant at all, we go on what is called the returning system.

3616. On those estates planted in the spring, you found a great difficulty in carrying on the planting of canes at the same time with the crops?—We could not carry on the crop at all.

3617. You are obliged to desist from the crop during the time of planting?—Yes.

3618. During the system of slavery, did you plant at once, and take off the crop?—Yes.

3619. Do you mean to say you could not get sufficient labour to do both at once?—Yes.

3620. Were you ever induced to offer what perhaps you would consider high wages for the sake of inducing the people to do both at once; did you ever attempt to stimulate them to labour by offering high wages?—Yes, the people would not dig cane-holes for wages. I understand they are now digging cane-holes for wages, and I understand they take jobs on several of the properties that were under my management. They undertake perhaps a piece of five, six or ten acres for so much per acre.

3621. Was the system of task-work in practice on any estate under your management?—Yes, it was.

3622. Was it in practice during slavery, or was it introduced with the apprenticeship?—It was in practice during slavery.

3623. Extensively?—Yes, on a few estates in my concern.

3624. With reference to the amount of wages, upon what principle did you proceed in estimating the amount of the wages you could afford to give to the negroes, as the system was new to you?—If I had taken that into consideration, the wages would have been so small. If I had only allowed the amount that the proprietor could afford, I would not have got the people to work.

3625. Sir George Grey.] The amount that you conceived the proprietor could afford?—That I conceived the proprietor could afford would not have been sufficient to have induced the negroes to work, I therefore gave them the wages that jobbing negroes were in the habit of receiving.

3626. You offered them the wages of jobbers?—Yes, what they have been accustomed to, and what they know to be the wages.

3627. Do you think then that the sums you offered were more than the ordinary proceeds of the estate would properly afford?—I think so.

3628. Are you quite confident of that fact?—I made a calculation, and I know what what a planter could afford to give for 100, 200 or 300 hogsheads on the estates that I had the charge of.

Mr. W. Miller.

3629. Now, according to your calculation on any one of those estates, or upon all of them, instead of the 1*s.* 3*d.* for the seven hours to the spell-gang which you just read to us, from the agreement you made, how much or about how much would the negro have got?—That is what the proprietor could have afforded, 1*s.* per day to able people.

3630. Mr. Gladstone.] And that would have been 20 per cent. less?—Yes.

3631. Sir George Grey.] Was the rate of wages uniform on all the estates you had the charge of?—There were hardly two of them the same.

3632. You read us one; what proportion does the rate of wages in that agreement you read bear to the average rate?—On some estates under my management, we made sugar at the extra wages, at the rate of 15*s.* per hogshead, others 18*s.*; some 20*s.*, some 30*s.* and I think the highest was 34*s.* 6*d.*

3633. You are stating now what the expense of extra wages was?—Yes.

3634. Mr. Gladstone.] How do you account for so very great a difference as that between 15*s.* and 34*s.* 6*d.*?—The difficulty of making agreements with the people. The planter could not do without the labour.

3635. Do you ascribe it solely to the greater or less disposition of the negroes to work, and to the inequality in the nature of the work performed?—Yes.

3636. Mr. O'Connell.] The greater disposition of the negro to get high wages?—Yes.

3637. Sir George Grey.] In point of fact, was the amount of wages given in each case regulated by the willingness of the negroes, with whom you made agreements, to perform the work for the amount of wages contracted for?—In a great measure.

3638. Was that the general standard?—My standard was never to offer less than what was generally given as the price of jobbing labour.

3639. Mr. Gladstone.] Now, with reference to the high wages you have described, when you said that the planters could not afford to pay them, did you say it with reference to the present price of West India produce, or that obtained some few years ago?—No, when I made my calculation, sugar was not selling so high as it is now.

3640. And when you said the planter could not afford them?—I made my calculation on 20*l.* sterling a hogshead, and 10*l.* sterling a puncheon of rum.

3641. Sir G. Grey.] What has the produce of that crop sold for, upon an average; what has been the average price per hogshead?—About 20*l.*

3642. Mr. Gladstone.] How many pounds weight per hogshead?—Eighteen hundred weight.

3643. Sir G. Grey.] You made your calculation on what?—On 20*l.* sterling per hogshead, and 10*l.* per puncheon.

3644. And what was the actual average selling price?—It would depend altogether on the weight of the hogshead what it would fetch per hogshead.

3645. But the hogshead you calculated at 20*l.*?—Yes, in the calculation that I made, I took the average shipping weight of my whole concern, and put it at the rate of 20*l.* per hogshead.

3646. Was the average selling price of that crop higher than the calculation you made?—Very considerably higher, I should think.

3647. Mr. Gladstone.] When you made that calculation as to what the planter could afford, did you credit the estates with the interest of the compensation money, or did you leave the compensation money altogether out of the question?—I left it altogether out of the question. My principal reason for making the calculation, was to know how estates could be conducted by and by, at the expiration of the apprenticeship.

3648. Mr. O'Connell.] You gave me an account of the extra allowances not compellable; what, in your judgment, are the allowances compellable to be given by law, what would they consist of?—They are enumerated in the Consolidated Slave Law, and to the best of my recollection I think it is clothing and provision ground.

3649. And nothing more?—I beg to refer you to the Consolidated Slave Law. Nothing more, to the best of my recollection.

3650. Upon Mr. Shirley's two estates was there nothing more given than clothing and provision ground?—I understood from Mr. Shirley that that was the arrangement he had entered into with his people.

3651. Do you mean to say that the same quantity of clothing, according to your experience, was given after the apprenticeship that was given before?—Certainly. I allude to my own concern when I speak positively. The same quantity of everything was given; I never altered.

3652. Sir George Grey.] In your own concern you gave not only the allowance compellable by law, but all the extra allowance too?—Yes, all that they had ever been accustomed to receive.

3653. You made no difference in any of the allowances, whether compellable by law or not?—No.

3654. Mr. Gladstone.] Did you exact extra work from the negroes in return for such extra allowance?—Never one hour.

3655. Is that extra allowance never calculated on the amount of wages paid for extra time?—No.

3656. Do you believe the majority of the estates was worked upon the same principle as those which you had the care of, or, on the contrary, that on the majority of the estates the negroes were compelled to give extra labour, in order that they might not be deprived of their allowance?—I understood from my neighbours they were conducting their estates in the same way as I used to do.

3657. Mr. O'Connell.] Did they receive that extra allowance while they were slaves?—Yes.

3658. Constantly, it was your habit?—There was no particular allowance, because I lived long enough in Jamaica to remember the time when the negroes on many properties got little or no fish.

3659. But after they got fish?—After they got fish; I remember when I went to Jamaica first, some of the planters imported fish sometimes at the rate of a barrel for four or three negroes.

3660. At that period were there not other indulgences, for example, their victuals were cooked for them during slavery, was it not?—That is not the case now.

3661. Was it not the case during slavery?—Certainly.

3662. And they were allowed nurses to attend to their children during slavery?—Certainly.

3663. Now during slavery, the spring planting, which seems to have been the severest work, was not that generally done by the job, even during slavery?—That depended altogether on the strength of the property. An able-handed property could afford to turn out a gang and put in the spring plant without stopping the mill; a weak-handed estate would prefer employing a jobber, because they could not put in the plant without stopping the mill.

3664. Mr. Gladstone.] Were many of the estates you managed full-handed estates?—Yes, several of them.

3665. But even on them you say you could not get labourers enough to carry on the planting?—Certainly.

3666. Sir George Grey.] Did you, in fact carry on the planting by any means on these estates without stopping the mill?—No, we stopped the mill to put in the plant.

3667. Which you would not have done during slavery?—No.

3668. On the same estates?—On the same estates.

3669. With the same number of hands employed?—With the same number employed.

3670. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you know any instance of spring planting without hiring jobbers?—Oh yes; some estates never hire jobbers; when there is plenty of strength on the property it is not necessary to do it.

3671. Are these constables negroes that put their marks to that agreement?—They were negroes.

3672. Do you mean free negroes?—Apprenticeship negroes.

3673. Some of the free negroes have acquired wealth, have they not?—You mean the apprentices.

3674. No, I mean men who are free, free even during slavery?—A great many of the coloured people have.

3675. But I distinguished, and I wish you to distinguish. I know that brown people have (the coloured people), but have any of the actual negro blood, without mixture of European, acquired property?—They may have acquired a competency. I do not know any negro that possesses any property of consequence.

3676. During slavery, what was the highest rate you have known given for jobbing to an owner of jobbing slaves?—To do what?

3677. In spring planting?—That depended upon the nature of the soil; perhaps no two properties gave the same amount; if the soil were light, it would cost less than if it were heavy, but I have known as high as 10*l.* an acre to be given for a very heavy soil.

3678. Now what was the lowest by the acre, that you remember in the more favourable soil?—I have known cane-holes dug for 4*l.* an acre.

3679. Mr. Gladstone.] How many days' labour would there be in digging cane-holes in an acre, on the lightest soil, of how many hands?—At a light soil, I should think that 24 negroes would dig an acre a day with ease, and in very heavy soil, it is considered a fair day's work for a man to dig 60 cane holes a day, on very heavy soil.

3681. Mr. Gladstone.] Then according to the rate of 4*l.* per acre on light soils the wages of each man would be between 3*s.* and 3*s.* 6*d.*?—Yes.

3682. Sir George Grey.] That is supposing the negroes themselves to get the wages; but supposing that was paid to a jobber, who received a profit out of the labour of the gang?—I am speaking of a jobber; the negroes had not come into that way of working when I left the island.

3683. Mr. Gladstone.] I think you said the nine hour system of labour was in practice on all the estates under your management?—Yes, to the best of my recollection.

3684. You said also, that it was generally in practice throughout the island at the commencement of the apprenticeships, but that afterwards it was changed in certain parishes?—It was changed, and I believe the principal cause was, that the Marquis of Sligo strongly recommended the eight hour system, and I am not sure if he did not issue a proclamation recommending it.

3685. Could you refer the Committee to any document in which it was recommended by the Marquis of Sligo, inasmuch as if it were recommended by him, there must have been some formal and official document?—I think I observed in one of his despatches, wherein he stated he had sanctioned it.

3686. And do you refer the adoption of the eight hours' system on those estates where it was adopted for the most part, to that recommendation of the Marquis of Sligo?—I think it is more likely to answer the proprietor of the estate, and I think it would be equally beneficial to the negro.

3687. But did you adopt it on the estates under your own management?—No, not at the time, because the crops were not finished when I came away; it is very likely I might have adopted it if I had remained.

3688. Now it has been stated, that the eight hour system is injurious to the negro, because it leaves to him so small a fraction of the five days of the week, on each of which he has to give eight hours to his master, that he cannot employ it advantageously to himself in his own provision ground, whereas if he had the nine hour system, he has the entire moiety of Friday available to his own benefit, and on the Saturday he is enabled to go to market; is that your view of the case, or how would you make out the proposition that the eight hour system need not be more oppressive to the negro?—The eight hour system enables the negro to give his master an hour or an hour and a half a day every day for extra wages, whereas the nine hour system enabled them to leave off at half-past ten o'clock on the Friday, and the negroes were not then disposed to give their masters the half of the Friday; that is to say, they were not so willing as they would have been under the eight hour system.

3689. Then how did they dispose of that half day; on their own provision grounds?—Perhaps some of them might.

3690. They either disposed of it on their own provision ground, or else in no fixed employment at all?—I thought I had discovered that when they had the half of Friday, they were very fond of visiting; they often travel a great distance, and form connexions; this gave them the half of Friday, all Saturday and all Sunday, and on the Monday a great many were disposed to come to the hospital instead of going to work.

3691. Chairman.] Which of the two systems do the negroes prefer, the eight or the nine hours' system?—The nine hours' system I believe, and I think so because it gives them the two days and a half together.

3692. Mr. Gladstone.] Is it your opinion that the negro would employ the two extra hours on the fifth day more beneficially to himself by giving them to his master than he could employ the half day of the Friday by working on his own provision grounds?—I think so, if he received fair wages for it.

3693. Are you decidedly of that opinion?—I am, and I think it would have been more beneficial to their health; but that I give as my own opinion.

3694. Did you ever hear it stated that the adoption of the eight hour system was owing to a desire to thwart the apprentices, and to curtail the comforts of the negroes?—I never understood that.

3695. But have you never heard it stated or suggested that that was the case, and that in fact it arose out of the excitement and agitation prevailing in the island?—I have seen it in the newspapers, but I do not know it of my own knowledge.

3696. Do you believe such statement entirely devoid of foundation yourself?—I think so.

3697. Sir George Grey.] Which system, the eight or nine hour, do you think most popular among the negroes?—I should think the nine hour system.

3698. Mr. O'Connell.] For less wages?—Not for less wages; the negroes understand that uncommonly well.

3699. Mr. Gladstone.] What proportion of the estates, within your knowledge, were worked upon the eight hours' system, and what proportion the nine hours' system, when you left the island?—That I have no idea of.

3700. Cannot you give the Committee a general idea of the proportion, which was the more common of the two, the eight or the nine hours?—I should think at the time I left the island, which was during crop in the parish of Trelawney, the nine hours' system was. I do not know what was the system that was followed up on the pens and coffee plantations.

3701. Mr. O'Connell.] In the plantations of which you had the management, were the provision grounds generally near the sugar plantations, or remote from them?—Almost every plantation I was concerned for had what they call dinner-time ground, that is, ground that, during the two hours' dinner-time, the negro can go to and return back to his work in the afternoon.

3702. Was it generally far from his hut, his habitation, his house?—No.

3703. Was it near or far from the sugar plantations in general?—The negroes' houses generally are built as near the centre of all plantations as possible, and at no great distance from the works.

3704. Mr. Gladstone.] How much land, on an average, would each negro have to attend to during his dinner-time?—They are not confined to any particular quantity of land; it is what a man is capable of cultivating.

3705. Then are these dinner-time grounds close by his hut?—They are on the estate, perhaps within a mile, some within half a mile, some joining the huts.

3706. Mr. O'Connell.] I wish to call your attention to some evidence given on oath during the prevalence of slavery. I wish to know how much of these allowances now the apprentices in general have, a house, clothes, the privilege of keeping stock and feeding it on his master's property?—Yes, all these on the properties that were under my charge.

3707. And during crop, using the cane tops for his pigs, are all those continued?—To all in my employ.

3708. Had his family access to the boiling-houses and the use of hot liquor during crop?—There was no alteration whatever with regard to those that were in my employ.

3709. A medical man still?—Yes.

3710. And hospital provision ground, costing 15*l.* an acre, have they this?—They have all the allowances they used to have.

3711. Garden ground with fruit trees, meat and port wine, when they are sick, have they these still?—Yes, they have.

3712. And all other necessaries ordered by the doctor, salt fish at Christmas and harvest home?—Yes.

3713. Herrings once a week?—Yes.

3714. Oatmeal for the children?—Oatmeal or rice, or something else.

o.58.

3716. And

Mr. W. Miller.

12 July 1836.

3716. And all these allowances are continued to the negroes?—Yes. They were continued up to the day I left the country. The properties I was concerned for have fallen into the hands of other managers now, and therefore I cannot speak to what is done now.

3717. And these you consider the customary allowances on the estates you have had to do with?—Yes; those were the allowances that I gave.

3718. Sir George Grey.] Were you examined as a witness before a committee of the House of Assembly in Jamaica in November 1834, relative to the new system?—Yes.

3719. Have you had an opportunity lately of perusing the evidence you gave before that committee?—Yes, I think I have.

3720. Has your opinion as to the probable working of the new system been at all modified since you gave that evidence?—Yes, it has, since I gave that evidence.

3721. You were asked before that committee whether you considered it possible to carry on the manufacture of sugar under existing circumstances, and you stated “Certainly not.” Do you now say you consider it impossible to carry on the manufacture of sugar under the apprentices?—No; the apprentices at that time refused to give their labour.

3722. By existing circumstances, I do not mean the system of apprenticeship, but the system of apprenticeship connected with a general refusal to work for wages which you believed then to exist, with the feeling in your parish of the growing disposition on the part of negroes to work for wages, and with the fact that on the properties under your management, they did work sugar for wages, do you think it possible to carry on the manufacture of sugar with a profit to the proprietor?—During apprenticeship they may on a small scale, but not to the same extent as was formerly done.

3723. But with a profit to the proprietor so as to keep the estate in cultivation?—If produce keeps up at the present prices they may, but not if produce were to fall to the price it was 10 or 15 years ago.

3724. Do you, in point of fact, believe that the manufacture of sugar has been carried on profitably by the proprietors of estates in Jamaica since the apprenticeship system has been in force?—I know it to be the case in my own concern.

3725. Mr. O’Connell.] But your impression was so strong at that time that I think I have read in your evidence that you said you would not ask the negroes to work for wages?—Yes; I said so in my evidence; such was their disposition not to work on many properties, that I had not even proposed to them to work for wages. I thought the better way was to allow the thing to go on for a little time, so that we might have an opportunity of giving the things more consideration.

3726. Sir George Grey.] But you felt at that time the strong apprehension to which you have adverted in a previous part of your evidence to-day?—Yes.

3727. Mr. O’Connell.] Now is it your opinion that sugar plantations have increased or decreased in value since the 1st of August 1834; are they, in your judgment, more valuable or less?—I am not aware that they are saleable at all. I am not aware of any estates that have been sold.

3728. Can you form no estimate, in your own judgment, whether they are now more valuable to be worked than they were in 1834?—Estates that I have valued for 70,000*l.* and 80,000*l.*, if they were offered to me now, I would not give 5,000*l.* for them; but others might, people who were disposed to speculate; that is merely my feeling.

3729. Sir George Grey.] How long ago is that valuation of which you have spoken?—A good many years ago.

3730. Long before the termination of slavery?—Yes.

3731. During the latter years of slavery?—Before apprenticeships were dreamed of.

3732. Chairman.] Were estates in Jamaica saleable during the few years that immediately preceded emancipation?—I do not think so; there may have been some estates sold.

3733. Mr. O’Connell.] But it was not a general article of sale?—No.

3734. Mr. Gladstone.] Were they as unsaleable then as now?—I think some time before the apprenticeships, quite so.

3735. What do you ascribe that to?—It was very doubtful, with the most experienced people, that the system would work.

3736. But

3737. When was the rebellion?—In 1831.

3738. During the years from 1825 to 1830, was property as unsaleable in Jamaica as it has been since the apprenticeship?—There is no doubt that the rebellion caused a great damp.

3739. Mr. O'Connell.] But previously to the rebellion, were not estates very hard to be sold in Jamaica?—They were.

3740. For ten years before?—Yes.

3741. Do you know Dean's Valley, in Westmoreland county?—I had the management of Dean's Valley, and sold it.

3742. Lately?—Not very long ago.

3743. Are you aware it has been lately sold to a Mr. Thomas M'Neil, or Dean's Valley Dry Works, in Westmoreland; do you know that?—Yes, I know the situation of it.

3744. Have you heard it has been lately sold for a large price?—No, I have not. I heard that Dean's Valley Water-works were sold, but not the dry works. It may have been sold too for any thing I know; but since I have come to England, I have heard that Dean's Valley Water-works has been sold to a Mr. James.

3745. Sir G. Grey.] Do not you think there is a greater degree of security felt both for person and property in Jamaica now, than between the rebellion in 1831 and the beginning of the apprenticeships in 1834?—People are not so much alarmed now, I really believe, as they were at that time.

3746. They look on the present system as one of greater stability?—They look on the present system, that it will work without any disturbance in the country. That is my own opinion.

3747. Is there a greater disposition for the investment of capital in Jamaica now than there was previously to emancipation, taking the few last years of emancipation?—I am not aware of that.

3748. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you heard of any case of the investment of capital in Jamaica since the apprenticeship began?—The only case that I know of is an estate in the parish of Trelawney, which I valued about two months ago in London, that one brother sold to the other.

3749. And do you consider that a mere commercial transaction, or was it connected with any private circumstances which rendered it peculiar?—No, the father died; and I understood he desired, by his will, that his property should be sold, and the money divided among his family, and it was necessary to sell this property.

3750. Sir George Grey.] But I suppose there is reasonable time allowed for the sale of it, as there is in most of such cases; it is not necessary to sell it now, if the sale will be disadvantageous at the present moment?—They were very anxious to close the concern, and it was considered necessary to sell it.

3751. Mr. Gladstone.] At what rate did you value the property; how many years' purchase?

3752. Mr. O'Connell.] Give us the particulars of your calculation?—About 6,000*l.* was given for the property; and I think I once valued it, but that was a long time ago; I need not mention the sum I valued it at a long time ago.

3753. Yes, you may mention it?—I think I valued it at 60,000*l.* currency.

3754. Sir George Grey.] How long ago is that?—Upwards of 20 years.

3755. Was it bought at that 60,000*l.*?—I think it was.

3756. Mr. O'Connell.] Are you certain?—I am not exactly certain as to the exact sum; but I know my valuation was sent home, and the person about purchasing it purchased the property.

3757. Sir George Grey.] Was there any debt upon it at that time when you valued it at 60,000*l.*?—I suppose there was a debt upon it.

3758. When you valued it at 60,000*l.*?—Yes; but as a stranger called in to put a value on the property, I had nothing to do with that.

3759. Mr. O'Connell.] How long ago is it since 6,000*l.* was given for it?—About two months ago.

3760. Mr. Gladstone.] How many hogsheads of sugar did it produce last year?

Mr. W. Miller.

12 July 1836.

year?—I think it produced last year about 120 hogsheads, but I cannot speak positively.

3761. Is it likely to produce as many in the present and future years of the apprenticeships?—If the system continues to work well, it ought to produce as much; and if the seasons are favourable, it is a sea-side estate, and it depends altogether on the seasons.

3762. And with those facts in view, and also with your anticipations, whatever they may be, as to the probability of prices keeping up, you thought 6,000*l.* a proper value to put upon it?—Yes; 6,000*l.* was the value I placed on the freehold and buildings, the stock and the present crop I valued at 2,800*l.*, making a total of 8,800*l.*; there was another gentleman called in, who valued with me, and we were both of the same opinion.

3763. Sir George Grey.] Do you conceive, say 8,800*l.*, would have been the full value of that estate in the year 1832, as much as could have been got for it in the market?—I do not know what could have been got for it in the market in the year 1832.

3764. But do you conceive the depreciation you have spoken of of West India property took place previously to the year 1833, when the Emancipation Bill passed, or do you mean to imply it was in consequence of that Bill passing?—Slavery had not been abolished then.

3765. I understand you to say there has been a great depreciation in the value of Jamaica estates since a period of 20 years ago, when they were worth a great deal, did that depreciation take place previously to the year 1833, or subsequently?—I think the depreciation commenced the moment the mother country (England) began to interfere with the colonies.

3766. Do you mean to refer back to the period of the slave trade debates?—No.

3767. Then, what interference with the colonies do you mean on the part of the mother country, when will you date the commencement of that interference?—I should date the principal commencement of it when the apprenticeship was proposed or taken into consideration.

3768. In 1833; give me the year in which you conceived that interference took place?—If 1833 is the year, that is the time.

3769. Previously to 1833, would that estate, of which you have just spoken, have been valued at 60,000*l.*, with any chance of getting the money?—Certainly not, estates have not been of the same value.

3770. Then previously to 1833, at which period you date the interference of the mother country with the colonies, had not a very great depreciation taken place in West India property, so as to produce almost ruin to many persons engaged in the West India trade?—There is no doubt that that was the case, the price of produce was so low that the estates produced very little, and of course that effected the price; on referring to my memorandums, I find the depreciation of West India property commenced in 1823.

3771. I want to know whether since the year 1833, when that Bill passed, the depreciation of West India property has gone on in the same progressive ratio in which it was increasing previously to that period?—I cannot say, because I do not know any estate that has been sold but the one I mentioned.

3772. Have there been many estates offered for sale during that period?—Yes, I believe so.

3773. Without the possibility of finding purchasers?—That I am not aware of; I am not aware that any estate I was concerned for has been in the market.

3774. Are you aware that any estate has been let on lease since the Emancipation Bill passed?—I have heard so.

3775. At what you would consider a fair rental?—Yes.

3776. For what period have these leases been granted?—I do not know.

3777. But have they been from year to year, or for a term of years?—Upon my word I do not know upon what terms, I merely heard that one or two estates have been leased since I left the country.

3778. Had you any personal knowledge of those estates which you heard had been leased since you left the country?—One of them I had.

3779. Do you think they might have easily found tenants for those estates previously to 1833?—Yes, I think they might as readily have found tenants for them then as now, if they had been offered.

3780. Then

3780. Then you do not think any increased facilities have occurred by the alteration of the system in letting estates in Jamaica?—I suppose the reason that gentleman let his estate was, he was fearful he would not get the sum he had been accustomed to get, and therefore he was anxious to lease it; but I merely give that as my opinion.

3781. But can you give no opinion as to the comparative facility of obtaining tenants of estates now and for years previously to 1833?—Estates were not offered let in those days, to my knowledge, but if they had been offered I do not doubt they would have found tenants for them, if the terms were such as a man could afford to pay.

3782. But upon as good terms as they would obtain tenants for them now?—I should think so.

3783. Mr. Gladstone.] You said you anticipated the cultivation of sugar would be carried on on a small scale during the apprenticeship?—On a smaller scale than it has hitherto been.

3784. Mr. O'Connell.] When you speak of 1833, you allude to Mr. Stanley, now Lord Stanley's Bill, the bringing in of that Bill?—Yes.

3785. Now that estate that you valued at 8,800*l.*, were there any particular disadvantages belonging to that estate; did you value it from your general knowledge of the depreciation of Jamaica property generally, or does it labour under any particular disadvantages?—No, it does not labour under any particular disadvantages; they have got very good provision ground and very good works.

3786. Sir George Grey.] You did not value it merely as a family arrangement, but you fixed a price which you thought would have been a fair price if it had been put up to auction between strangers?—The compensation money had been disposed of, therefore had the person who purchased the property received the compensation our valuation would have been perhaps different, at all events it would be as to the amount of the compensation.

3787. Then the compensation money had been disposed of on that estate?—Yes.

3788. When you valued it at 60,000*l.*, did that valuation include all the slaves upon it?—Yes.

3789. Chairman.] Do you happen to know what was the amount of compensation money upon this estate?—No.

3790. Mr. Gladstone.] How many people were there on the estate?—I should think about 240. I have since ascertained there are upwards of 240 apprentices.

3791. The compensation then would be about 4,800*l.*?—Yes.

3792. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you recollect how many negroes there were upon it when you valued it at 60,000*l.*?—I really do not; it is a number of years ago.

3793. In the 6,000*l.*, did you make allowance for the value of the apprentices; were the apprentices to go over to the purchaser?—Yes.

3794. Mr. Gladstone.] At how many years' purchase did you calculate it in your valuation?—I did not go into any calculation; it was one brother disposing of the estate to another brother; and it was left to two gentlemen to say what ought to be given for the property.

3795. Mr. O'Connell.] Then you did not value it as between strangers at all; it was a family arrangement?—We considered that 6,000*l.* stock, and the present crop, the latter now on its way to England, 2,800*l.*—8,800*l.* sterling—was a fair price for the freehold works, and the labour of the apprentices.

3796. Mr. Gladstone.] But in fixing the price, I suppose you looked to the probable returns of the estate?—Yes.

3797. And you inferred what the probable returns would be, in some measure, from the past returns?—I think I did take that into consideration, and I took also into consideration the contingencies.

3798. Did you in fact fix the price of 6,000*l.* on the supposition that that value, if not quite, would be realized during the period of the apprenticeships?—Yes, during the time of the apprenticeships; that was the feeling both of the other gentleman and myself.

3799. Mr. O'Connell.] Then you did not value the reversion after the apprenticeships as worth any thing?—We did not give that much consideration.

12 July 1836.

3800. Sir George Grey.] And you did not take into consideration any debt that there might be upon it at the time?—I am not aware of any.

3801. You valued it irrespective of any possible charge upon it?—Yes; it is subject to dry weather.

3802. Mr. O'Connell.] Can you form any estimate as to what would have been the value of it if slavery had not been abolished?—No, I cannot.

3803. Can you form any estimate of what you would have valued it as between strangers?—I think the same money. I mentioned that the transaction was between two brothers; the one brother named one person and the other the other.

3804. Sir George Grey.] The two brothers were joint legatees of the father's property or devisees, is not that the case?—Yes, I believe so.

3805. And in the division of the property one brother agreed to take this estate at 6,000*l.*?—I believe there were other children.

3806. But was the estate actually sold to a stranger for that money, or taken by a member of the family at the value of 6,000*l.*, he being debited with the 6,000*l.* on account of the father's estate, and his brothers and sisters being entitled to an equal share?—I understood the brother that purchased the estate said he would not like the estate to go out of the family, and that if he could get it at a fair valuation he would take it.

3807. Then, in fact, he took it as 6,000*l.* of the father's property; present crop and stock 2,800*l.*; making 8,800*l.*; he being entitled to share equally with his brothers and sisters?—I do not know the nature of the father's will, and therefore I cannot say.

3808. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you remember the name of the estate?—Yes.

3809. What is it?—Hermoney Hall.

3810. In what parish?—The parish of Trelawney.

3811. Did you sign the petition to Lord Sligo from Trelawney in May 1835?—There was a memorial sent to Lord Sligo.

3812. You signed that?—Of course I would sign it as chairman.

3813. Mr. Gladstone.] Did you consider yourself as pledging your own individual opinions in signing it?—Not at all; I was requested, as the custos or the chief magistrate of the parish, to call a meeting, and I attended that meeting and gave my opinion.

3814. Officially?—Yes; but I wrote Lord Sligo the moment that the requisition was served on me, to let him know the nature of the meeting.

3815. In point of fact, did you concur in all the opinions expressed in the document which you signed as custos?—I do not recollect now exactly what opinions were expressed in the document.

3816. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you recollect whether you dissented generally or agreed generally with the statements?—I think I agreed generally; because on the occasion I stated what I had observed in a tour I had made of a great part of the island, the last visit I paid to my concerns, and I was rather particular, as I was coming to England, in taking notes of the state of cultivation of different parishes.

3817. Have you not changed your opinion a good deal since?—I have had occasion to do so since I have come home; I have understood the system is working better.

3818. Sir George Grey.] At the period at which that meeting was held the apprehensions to which you have adverted had not been dispelled to the extent they have since?—No; it had not at that time worked so well.

3819. You think the subsequent experience of the working of apprenticeships has tended, both on the part of the managers of the properties and of the apprentices, to produce a better understanding, and consequently to ensure a better system of working?—I certainly think so.

3820. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you know any person of the negro unmixed race that has received a finished education, that is, what you would call well educated?—No, I am not aware of any negro being well educated.

3821. Chairman.] I believe it is the custom in Jamaica to commit apprentices to workhouses as a means of punishment?—The special magistrates do so.

3822. Have you had any opportunity of observing the manner in which those negroes are treated when they are in the workhouses?—Yes, I have.

3823. You are probably aware that it has been alleged that female negro apprentices have been subjected to flogging in the workhouses?—I have heard so since since I returned to England; I was not aware of it myself; I know of no instance of it when I was in Jamaica.

3824. Were you in the habit of frequently inspecting the workhouses and observing personally the system which was pursued in them?—Yes.

3825. More than one workhouse?—Only one, the workhouse of the parish of Trelawney.

3826. Are you able positively to state that the practice I have adverted to could not have taken place, or did not take place in the workhouse in the parish of Trelawney?—I do not know any instance of it.

3827. Do you conceive that if such a practice did take place it would be decidedly illegal?—No doubt of it.

3828. Mr. O'Connell.] Was there any complaint made of such practice at all prevailing in the parish of Trelawney in the workhouse?—I understand, after I left the parish, that there was.

3829. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean it would have been illegal to punish a female apprentice by flogging her while in the workhouse, or illegal to punish any female?—It would have been illegal to punish her by flogging in any way, whether a prisoner or not.

3830. Would the female apprentice, distinguishing between a female apprentice and a free woman, be subject in the workhouse to all the regulations that all other persons in that workhouse were subject to?—They were accommodated (I mean apprentices) I believe, in the same ward, and they received the same kind of food, of course, and they were punished agreeably to the sentence of the special magistrate, whatever it was.

3831. But would the commitment of a female apprentice to the workhouse for a given time to hard labour subject her to the regulations which affected all the female prisoners?—Yes.

3832. Were the regulations in writing?—Yes.

3833. Did those regulations sanction the punishment of any female in that workhouse by flogging, either as a distinct punishment or as a means of compelling them to labour on the tread mill?—Certainly not.

3834. Did you visit the workhouse of Trelawney officially as a magistrate?—Yes.

3835. Is there any record kept of the punishments which might be inspected?—Yes; which was regularly presented to the quarter sessions.

3836. And did you ever know an instance, during the period you were one of the visiting magistrates, which occurred?—No instance came under my knowledge.

3837. Of a female being punished?—No.

3838. Were the regulations which affected the discipline of that workhouse changed after the Emancipation Act came into operation, or did they remain the same as they had been during slavery?—I think it was one of the first acts of Lord Sligo to insist on the regulations being inserted in the workhouse books of each parish or house of correction.

3839. To what effect; how did that regulation of Lord Sligo, inserted in the workhouse books, differ from the regulations which had previously been in force in order to maintain the discipline of the workhouses?—Before the commencement of the apprenticeships.

3840. I understood you to say, Lord Sligo, from the commencement of the apprenticeships, insisted upon that regulation?—Apprenticeships had commenced before Lord Sligo came.

3841. It was one of the first acts of his government?—Yes, he recommended it strongly.

3842. And was that recommendation attended to?—Yes, it was, as far as related to the parish of Trelawney.

3843. Now previously to that regulation which Lord Sligo recommended, and which was adopted on his recommendation, was it legal, in the workhouse of Trelawney, to punish females by flogging, or to compel them to labour on the tread-mill by flogging?—Certainly not, never since the commencement of apprenticeships.

3844. Then so far as this point of the punishment of females by flogging in workhouses goes, it had not been legal before the apprenticeship system began any more than it was afterwards?—Females were subject to be punished during the the time they were slaves, but not from the commencement of the apprenticeships.

3845. Was it the custom to commit female slaves to the workhouse of Trelawney as a punishment?—Yes.

3846. When so committed as slaves, were they subject to the same regulations as to discipline, with other female offenders in the workhouse, who were free women?—No, free women could not be put in the penal gang; free women were merely sent there for confinement.

3847. Free women were not sentenced to hard labour?—No.

3848. At the present time, are free women liable to be sentenced to hard labour, as well as apprentices, in the workhouse of Trelawney?—No, I never saw a free woman punished.

3849. On the tread-mill?—No.

3850. Mr. O'Connell.] What was the name of the supervisor of the Trelawney workhouse?—When I left the island, his name was Slowly.

3851. Have you heard that that man was convicted of flogging a female?—I have heard so, in fact I saw it in the newspaper.

3852. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean by convicted, that he was legally convicted by a court of law?—Yes, I think I saw his trial in one of the newspapers.

3853. That would decide the illegality of the act?—Yes.

3854. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you consider the act was illegal under the abolition law?—I should think so.

3855. I mean, have you any other ground for supposing the act to be illegal, independent of this conviction; have you any other ground for supposing the act to be illegal than the existence of the abolition law?—That is the only thing that guides me.

3856. I believe the man who was convicted, was convicted for inflicting punishment by the lash, of his own authority; do you think he would have been convicted if he had done it under an order from a magistrate, or do you think a magistrate, giving such an order, would have acted in conformity with law?—I think if the local magistrate had given such an order, he would have been equally guilty with the man.

3857. Mr. O'Connell.] Are you apprized of the Gaol Act, which passed in July 1834?—I believe a Gaol Act did pass then.

3858. You were in the council at the time; by that Act, the magistrate was authorized to flog a female in close confinement for any time not exceeding one month, or by personal correction, as in the case of prisoners convicted of felony, and sentenced to hard labour?—

3859. Sir Stratford Canning.] Does your answer apply to the use of the lash as a stimulant to keep up the labour of the tread-mill, as well as for absolute punishment?—Yes.

3860. Chairman.] What is it, in your opinion, that renders it illegal for the supervisor of a workhouse to compel a female apprentice committed to hard labour, to work on the tread-mill, by having recourse to personal correction?—If there is any clause in the Gaol Act, I am not aware of it; I must have forgotten it; I was not aware that there was any clause of the sort.

3861. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you heard of any case since the apprenticeships have been in existence, in which continuous labour for a long period has been exacted from the negroes?—Not without his own consent.

3862. Do you believe that any such case has existed?—I am not aware of it.

3863. Are you aware that, under the law as it stands, there is no literal prohibition against working a negro for 45 hours in one week continuously, or have you ever heard that such is the construction put upon the law?—No, I have never heard so; and never heard it was attempted.

3864. But you are aware that the law does not allow it to be done?—Certainly.

3865. The distribution of the 45 hours among the several days of the week, but merely enacts that the negro shall give to his master 45 hours of his time?—Forty-five during crop, and forty and a half out of crop.

3866. You are not aware that any specific distribution, as regards the days, is laid down?—No, I am not sure whether there is any clause in the law to that effect.

3867. Have you ever heard of any case in which more than nine hours a day was was exacted from the negro; that is to say, in which he gave more than nine hours a day otherwise than of his own free-will?—I am not aware of any case of the kind.

3868. Do you think it likely, if such a case as working the negro continuously for 24 hours against his will, or for a greater period, that if such a case had existed, it would have been heard of, and there would have been a great uproar in the island about it?—I think the negroes understand the law sufficiently, that if that had been the case, they would have complained to a magistrate, who would have taken notice of it.

3869. Do you think a case of 45 hours continuous forced employment would have attracted a great deal of attention?—I think so, and I think it would have met with the opprobrium of most people.

3870. Do you think the party would have been punished for the cruelty under the abolition law by a special magistrate?—If the law were sufficient to do so, I think it is very probable that would have been the case.

3871. You are aware the law enables the special magistrate to punish cases of cruelty, should you, in your mind, consider such an exaction of labour from the negro amounted to an act of cruelty?—I certainly should think it would.

3872. But you have no reason, directly or indirectly, to believe that any such case has occurred?—I have no knowledge of any such case; I was only ten months in the country after the Act.

3873. But is your knowledge of the island of Jamaica and the habits of the community residing there, and the practice pursued in the cultivation of estates, such as to induce you to believe that the occurrence of such a case is extremely improbable?—I think it could not have passed without being noticed.

3874. Do you think it would cause very great discontent among the negroes, and prove a serious impediment to their entering into any contracts to do labour for wages over and above their stipulated time?—I think it would have that effect when it took place.

3875. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that system could be adopted on an estate beneficial to the proprietor?—Certainly not.

3876. Mr. Gladstone.] What would you say was the average distance of the markets from the provision grounds, where the negroes raise their commodities? It is very difficult to answer that question, because there is a difference in every parish.

3877. What is the greatest distance you have ever known?—The parish of Trelawney I speak of.

3878. What is the greatest distance you have ever known in any parish?—I should think 10 or 12 miles; perhaps more in other parishes.

3879. Now cannot you give an idea of the common distance; does the distance commonly amount to as much as that?—I can speak to the parish of Trelawney; I think there are six market places in the parish, and, on an average, I suppose the market is not more than five or six miles.

3880. And was the parish of Trelawney better provided in that respect than the generality of parishes, do you think?—There are more villages in it, that perhaps is the reason.

3881. Are you aware of any case in which wages agreed to be given to the negro have been withheld from him, and in which complaints have been made to the special magistrate on that score?—Yes, I think I have heard of one or two instances of the people in Falmouth, that is the principal town in Trelawney, complaining to the special magistrate.

3882. Are you aware whether the special magistrate has in such cases awarded the wages to be paid to the negroes?—Yes, I know that he has, because he consulted me on the occasion; and I know he has made the negro pay the wages when the negro happened to owe wages to the master, and made the master pay also the other way.

3883. How could the negro owe wages to the master?—It is not an uncommon thing for a master to hire a negro out, and he produces so much, which they call wages, so much wages a week he is to pay so much.

3884. Who was the magistrate of Falmouth at the time?—I think it was Mr. Davis.

3885. Then it is within your knowledge, is it, from his having consulted you on the subject, that he has awarded to the negro wages withheld from him and due for the performance of labour?—I think it was Mr. Davis.

Mr. W. Miller.

12 July 1836.

3886. At all events you are certain of the fact?—Yes, I know that the negro complained to Mr. Davis; I think it was his mistress owed him so much for wages, and he desired the mistress to pay the money.

3887. He entertained the complaint?—He heard his story, and I believe her's, and he ordered the money to be paid; and I believe it was paid.

3888. Mr. O'Connell.] Do you know any jurisdiction he had to enforce the payment?—I think there is a clause in the law that provides for it.

3889. Mr. Gladstone.] Did he inflict any fine as well as ordering the wages to be paid?—I am not aware that he did.

3890. Mr. O'Connell.] Did you ever know, during slavery, negroes compelled to work 24 hours continuously?—During slavery they came in to work for 24 hours; they were not relieved from their spell until the expiration of the 24 hours, that was the mode in which it was done; but they had double spells, and while one spell is at work the other is at rest; but still they were at hand, if they had been required, and the planter very seldom interfered with their arrangement in that way, as long as the work went on, and the quantity of produce was made; he allowed them to make that arrangement among themselves; they were better pleased with that arrangement than when it was made by the overseer or by the attorney.

3891. Sir George Grey.] Had not the master at that time the right to the whole time of the slave during the week?—He had a right to the whole of his labour of course.

3892. And he has only a right to a limited portion of that period now?—Only a right to a limited portion.

3893. Therefore, does the same motive exist now for employing the negro for a long time continuously, which did exist before, when he had the right to his whole time?—No.

3894. As he has only a right to a limited portion, is he not likely to get more work done by a fair and reasonable distribution of his time, than by an unreasonable one; supposing the master to require 45 hours' labour to be performed consecutively, is he likely to get as much work done by working a negro 45 hours, as he would by a fair distribution of that period over the week?—Certainly not.

3895. Because he had no claim on his time during the remaining portion of the week?—No.

3896. Mr. Gladstone.] Did your confidential communication with Lord Sligo continue up to the period of your leaving the island?—Yes; I think I wrote him two or three days before I embarked.

3897. And you stood in the same relation towards him as you had previously done?—I do not know anything to the contrary.

3898. Let me put into your hand a letter, which is in page 99 of the first part of the papers relating to Jamaica, and ask you whether it was written by you—[handing it to the witness] perhaps you will read it, and just state the circumstances?—This is only part of the letter; I have got a copy of the original, if you will permit me to put it in.

3899. Chairman.] The original is much longer?—Yes, it is longer than that.

“26th July, 1834. Sir,—The change in the condition of our labouring population, which is now so near, will render great care and circumspection in your conduct necessary; you should constantly bear in mind that they will then be free, and entitled to the protection of the same laws as you are, as well as to the enactments made here relating to them. The exercise of a great degree of prudence and moderation will be necessary on your part; they cannot be expected to be acquainted with the laws, and should they transgress them, it will be your duty to point out their faults to them, coolly and dispassionately, and not to appeal too hastily to the special magistrates, nor until you have ascertained that the error proceeds from wilfulness, and not from mistake. The change is great and unprecedented, and some misapprehension may be expected to arise on their part. It will be highly creditable to you, if you can bring the new system into successful operation without an appeal to the special magistrates; an appeal from them to the magistrates against you, in which you were found guilty at such a critical period, would give me great concern, and you would incur my most serious displeasure. I wish to effect the change as easily and with as little alteration as possible; you will therefore continue the usual usual allowances and indulgences until cloth is served, when these matters might be better regulated. Adhere strictly to the abolition law, as to the hours of labour; make a signal, either by shell or bell, in sufficient time before the hour appointed for the commencement of labour, to enable the apprentices to be at work by that time, in order that no part of the nine hours' labour may be lost. The hour to begin work is sunrise, and you can regulate your watch by referring to an almanack, or several of the newspapers; the nine hours' labour must terminate at sunset; arrange with the negroes the hours of meals and rest. On Fridays they are to cease work after four and a half hours' labour. It is probable some difficulty may arise in obtaining watchmen; there is no law to oblige them to act as such during the night, or on Sundays. If an arrangement cannot be made with them to be entirely responsible that no injury is done to the cane field (or wherever they may undertake to watch) at all hours, an agreement by way of hire must be made with them, not to exceed 1s. 3d. for a night's or for a day's work. In providing for stock, the days they work must be returned to them according to the present system. Foddering the pens may be dispensed with on Sundays, out of crop. During the 1st of August, and two subsequent days, the close may be kept in a close pasture, or otherwise regulated, as has been usual during the Christmas holidays. I am your obedient servant."

3900. You state in that letter to the overseers that you wish the allowances to be continued until a certain period?—No alteration has been made in the allowances.

3901. But new arrangements might be made?—If it were considered necessary.

3902. In point of fact, however, you continued the allowances up to the time when you left the colony, and made no alteration, is that the case?—Yes.

3903. Sir George Grey.] And did that period of the supply of annual clothing occur before you left the colony?—Yes.

3904. Mr. O'Connell.] The object in summoning them before the hour of labour came was that they might have come from their habitations to the place before the commencement of the nine hours?—It was supposed that the planter was entitled to nine hours' work.

3905. Exclusive of the negro's journey from his sleeping place to the place of labour?—Yes.

3906. Do you know whether any females are obliged to work in chains in the workhouse?—I believe so, they are called penal gangs.

3907. And that since they became apprentices as well as before?—It was the case before.

3908. And since?—And since.

3909. Chairman.] What is the object, do you suppose, of putting chains on females in the workhouse, is it to prevent escape, or as a means of punishment, or what is the object?—To prevent escape; they are frequently employed on the roads; there is only one or two people to look after them; it is to prevent escape, I believe.

3910. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that they actually wear chains in the workhouse, or being sentenced, they wear chains when working on the roads?—They are sentenced to be put in chains.

3911. Do you mean that they wear chains in the workhouse, where there is no opportunity of escaping, or do you mean that they only wear them when they go out to work?—They wear chains in the workhouse; they are not taken off.

3912. Sir Stratford Canning.] Do they wear them by night as well as by day?—I believe they do.

3913. Sir George Grey.] Is there any motive for their wearing chains for the purpose of security when they are within the walls of the workhouse?—No, I should think that was not necessary.

3914. What is the weight of the chains, do they vary?—No, they do not vary; they are light chains.

3915. What species of chains are they?—Small link chains.

3916. Fixed to where?—Fixed to a collar round the neck.

3917. There is a collar round the neck and a chain from the collar to where?—It hangs down.

3918. To where—where is it fastened to—what part of the body is the other end fastened to?—They put it round their body.

Mr. W. Miller.

12 July 1836.

3919. Is it fixed to either their hands or their feet?—Oh no, it is not fixed to either their hands or their feet, it is fixed round the neck, and when they go out there are two and two put together.

3920. Mr. Gladstone.] Does it confine the motion of the body at all?—No.

3921. Sir Stratford Canning.] Then how is it supposed to prevent their escape?—It is when they are out at work, they are linked two and two.

3922. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you had occasion to see the effects of instruction on the negro properties with which you have been acquainted?—On several properties they have the benefit of instruction.

3923. Sir George Grey.] Are the persons who compose these penal gangs sentenced to them originally by the magistrate who commits them, or are they liable to be placed with the penal gang by order of the supervisor of the workhouse for misconduct in the workhouse?—The supervisor has nothing to do with it, further than that of taking care of them; they are sentenced by the special magistrate, and he is accountable for the custody of them.

3924. In the case of apprentices?—Yes, in the case of apprentices.

3926. Then no female can be sentenced to that penal gang except by order of a special magistrate?—Certainly not.

3927. Can a male be sentenced to the penal gang except by order of a special magistrate?—No negro can be punished in any way except by order of the special magistrate.

3928. But I suppose there are persons not male apprentices in these workhouses?—There are people who are taken up on suspicion and cannot account for themselves travelling about the country, but no free people are put in.

3929. Are there no free persons in Jamaica liable to commitment to the house of correction?—Not without a legal trial.

3930. Not by the sentence of a magistrate?—No.

3931. Then there is no power of summary commitment to the house of correction by order of a magistrate?—A magistrate may commit a person brought before him on any charge for safe custody; but he cannot pass sentence on him.

3932. Supposing there were any courts of criminal jurisdiction in Jamaica that could pass sentence of imprisonment with hard labour on a free person in Jamaica, would he then, under that sentence, go to the same house of correction to which the apprentice would go by order of a special magistrate?—If the sentence of the judge was that he was to go there, he would go there.

3933. In point of fact, is imprisonment with hard labour a punishment imposed by law in Jamaica on free persons?—I believe it is the same, as far as relates to that, as it is as to free people here.

3934. In point of fact, I want to know whether in the workhouses in Jamaica, take the workhouse of Trelawney, with which you are acquainted, there were persons there who were not apprentices suffering the punishment of hard labour?—Not to my knowledge; no.

3935. Mr. O'Connell.] Did you ever know a free person suffer the punishment of hard labour in that way?—I think I have heard of free people being condemned to hard labour.

3936. Did you ever know any instance of your own knowledge?—There is no instance that I recollect at present that I can give you.

3937. Females are sometimes chained in pairs?—Always when they go out.

3938. Sir George Grey.] During the time you were a visiting magistrate of the workhouse at Trelawney, previously to the Emancipation Act coming into force, were the inmates of that workhouse all slaves?—All of them slaves.

3939. Subsequent to that period have they been all of them apprentices?—Yes.

3940. What I mean is, during the time you were a visiting magistrate of the workhouse of Trelawney, were there any persons under sentence in that workhouse who were not slaves; any free persons?—No; the free people are kept in gaol.

3941. Is the gaol a distinct place from the workhouse?—Yes; it is the adjoining building.

3942. In that gaol were they liable to hard labour, or merely there for safe custody?—I do not recollect ever seeing a free person there that was sentenced to hard labour.

3943. Does the gaol still subsist as distinct from the workhouse?—Yes.

3944. Are the apprentices sent to the workhouse and the free persons sent to gaol?—Yes.

3945. Then what I want to know is this; whether supposing a special magistrate to sentence an apprentice to hard labour, and the court of criminal jurisdiction in Jamaica sentence a free person to hard labour, they would go to a different place of confinement or the same?—No; one would go to the gaol and the other to the workhouse.

3946. Chairman.] Upon the estates which were under your management, were there many instances of complaints on the part of the negroes against the overseers?—There were sometimes.

3947. On the other hand, had the overseers frequent occasion to complain of the negroes to the special magistrate?—Not very often; although I have known complaints; but I believe as little of that in my employ as any; there was not a great deal of it; there were instances of it.

3948. You are not able to state to the Committee the number of complaints that were made?—No.

3949. You have no account of it?—No, I have no account of it.

3950. Sir Stratford Canning.] In the penal gang are the sexes kept separate?—Yes, they are kept in separate wards.

3951. But when they are at work?—If they are working on the road they are worked all together.

3952. Did you ever know men and women chained together?—No.

3953. They are kept separate?—Kept separate.

3954. Are the prisons open to the inspection of the special magistrates?—Yes.

3955. At any time they please?—Whenever they please to go, and, in fact, every magistrate is obliged to visit the gaol a certain number of days in the year.

3956. But besides that they can go at any time they please?—Yes.

3957. And the doors of the gaol are open to them, and the workhouses too?—Yes, with instructions to keep nothing from them.

3958. Sir George Grey.] The penal gang is a distinct gang from the ordinary prisoners of the workhouse?—The penal gang stop in the workhouse.

3960. But suppose he does not sentence him to the penal gang, but simply to imprisonment with hard labour, does he of necessity go into the penal gang?—Certainly not; if he orders him to the penal gang he is put in chains.

3961. There must be a distinct sentence to the penal gang before an apprentice can be subject to these chains?—It is an understood thing, that if a special magistrate sentence a negro to the penal gang he is put in chains.

3962. But if the sentence is imprisonment to hard labour, can he then be put into the penal gang, if that is the whole sentence?—Not to put a chain upon him, but he may be secured with the penal gang.

3963. Then the penal gang is a distinct punishment from imprisonment, with hard labour?—It is so; it lays with the special magistrate altogether whether he will place him with the penal gang, or whether he will put him to hard labour or solitary confinement.

3964. Can you tell at all what proportion of the prisoners in the workhouse, when you visited it, were in the penal gang, as compared with those that were not wearing chains?—There was a large proportion in the penal gang.

3965. What proportion?—I should think upwards of two-thirds.

3966. About what was the number of prisoners in the workhouse altogether at that time?—They varied so much that perhaps they were hardly two days the same; some days there were half a dozen people sent in twenty-four hours, but I should say, taking an average, perhaps about thirty.

3967. And what was the population of apprentices which is comprised within the district for which that workhouse was established?—About 25,000.

Augustus Hardin Beaumont, Esq., called in; and Examined.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

3968. Chairman.] YOU have been a member of the House of Assembly at Jamaica?—I was so.

3969. How many years did you fill that situation?—Four.

3970. How long have you resided in Jamaica?—Thirty years.

3971. Are you a proprietor of land in Jamaica?—I am.

3972. Were you a proprietor of slaves whilst slavery lasted?—No, I was not; my property consisted of houses in Kingston, and land in different parts of the island.

3973. Have you been a planter?—I was bred a planter.

3974. Were you a proprietor of slaves while you were a planter?—I was not, excepting a few domestics, whom I manumised. It is usual in the West Indies to put the young men of a family to learn to be planters; I learnt the trade, or profession, or whatever else the business is called.

3975. In short, you acted as manager, but you were not yourself a proprietor of a plantation nor of slaves?—I was not what in Jamaica is called a manager; but I lived the greater part of my boyhood with my uncle, who was a proprietor; I resided among the negroes, and knew everything about them as respected their characters, opinions and civilization. I have also lived weeks and months together among my relations and friends, who were proprietors of sugar estates; for instance Oxford estate, which belonged to my cousin.

3976. When did you leave Jamaica?—In May 1835.

3977. Had you been resident on a plantation in the country at any period immediately before the time when you left Jamaica?—I was.

3978. For any length of time together?—For two or three weeks at a time.

3979. Were you then conducting the management of any estate?—I was not.

3980. Were you a member of the Assembly up to the time you left Jamaica?—No I was not; I lost my seat in the House in consequence of having proposed, with the knowledge, and almost at the request of the Governor, the Earl of Belmore, the abolition of female flogging, compulsory manumission, and moving for a committee to consider the best means of meeting the wishes of the British nation by emancipating the slaves on reasonable terms.

3981. When was that?—In 1833.

3982. Mr. Gladstone.] What district did you represent?—The parish of Westmoreland.

3983. Chairman.] Is that a rural district?—Very much so; it is a parish in which there are a very great number of sugar estates.

3984. Mr. Gladstone.] Is there any town in that parish?—There is, Savannah-la-mar.

3985. Chairman.

19 July 1836.

3985. Chairman.] Are you quite satisfied that you lost your election in consequence of having proposed the abolition of female flogging?—Beyond all possibility of doubt.

3986. There were no other complaints made against you by your constituents?—Not the slightest; on the contrary, I was on very good terms with them.

3987. Mr. Gladstone.] Did you find that that measure had the effect of turning against you those voters in the town as well as those interested in sugar cultivation?—Not by any means in the same degree.

3988. It was therefore by the change of feeling of the rural voters towards you that you lost your election?—Very much so.

3989. Chairman.] At the time you left Jamaica what appeared to you to be the state of things with regard to the working of the apprenticeship system; did it appear to you to be working in a manner from which good results might be expected?—It did not; it appeared to me that good could not result either to the proprietor or to the negro from the continuation of that system, and I will state shortly my reasons for coming to this conclusion. The special magistrates must be from one of two classes; they must either be sent from this country or be chosen in the colony. If they are sent from this country, they are perfectly ignorant of the local customs, and even unacquainted with the patois which the negroes speak. In most of the rural districts the negroes do not speak a language that you can understand, and in fact it would be as totally unintelligible to you as the dialect of some parts of Lancashire.

3990. Would the negroes understand pure English?—In some places easily; in others with much difficulty. There is an expression of meaning conveyed in creole parlance generally different from what would be intended by the same words in this country; in fact, the patois in the island of Jamaica is very distinct from the language here. The special magistrate imported from Britain is then incompetent to perform his duty, because he cannot understand the suitors in his court; then if the special magistrates are chosen in the colony, the case is about as bad, if not worse; very few men would accept the stipend who are fit to hold the office; the consequence is, that at the present moment I perceive in the list of special magistrates a considerable number of men to whom such enormous powers as are vested in the special magistrates under the statute of emancipation ought not to be entrusted for one minute.

3991. Did it ever occur to you that any remedy could be found to obviate the inconvenience you have described?—I think so. The entire emancipation of the slaves would have effected this object; such a measure was not at all adverse to the feelings of the proprietors themselves in the year 1833 or 1834, because the majority of the House of Assembly (I was not then a member of it, but I was in the constant habit of intercourse with the members and conversing with them), the majority of them were decidedly in favour of complete emancipation, in preference to apprenticeship; but Lord Mulgrave, the then Governor, directed Mr. Panton, I think it was, who was then holding the office of Advocate-General, to inform the members of the House, that if the Act of the British Parliament was not adopted, almost word for word, they would endanger the compensation: the consequence was, that when a division took place in the house, a considerable number of members who at that time had become a minority, from the Governor's interference, and who were for the entire emancipation of the slaves, but not wishing, however, to give any factious opposition to the Government measure, seceded from the house, and the Bill which passed in the island of Jamaica, adopting the British statute, was enacted only by a portion of the house, the rest having quitted it for the evening. I know that the general impression among the planters was, that an entire emancipation would be better. There has been a change in feeling, certainly, since; that is, since they found that the apprenticeship might be turned into slavery.

3992. Then, are you of opinion that it was thought by a majority of the House of Assembly that it would have been better not to have interposed a system of apprenticeship between the state of slavery and a state of freedom?—That was the feeling decidedly at that time all over the island by all classes.

3993. Do you conceive the system of apprenticeship, upon the whole, to have worked as well as could have been expected?—Decidedly it has worked badly, very badly, because the special magistrates are entirely dependent upon the overseers or managers. Society and its relations in Jamaica are very differently constituted.

A. H. Beaumont,

constituted from what they are in this country. A special magistrate there is dependent upon the overseer in the vicinity of the property in which he resides for all the comforts, and in many instances for the absolute necessities of life. If, for instance, a special magistrate is sent for to any estate several miles from the town where the special magistrate resides, on his arrival at the estate where he is to adjudicate between the parties, manager and slave, he is indebted to the overseer, one of these parties, for the refreshment he receives; for there are very few inns in that part of the world; he is indebted to him for corn for his horse (for every man uses his own horse, there being no stage-coaches), and for every comfort he receives; and it is in the power of the overseer to make him excessively uncomfortable. But the fact is, that they do make the special magistrate very comfortable, and to all intents and purposes the special magistrate soon becomes in his feelings and opinions a planter. I have heard overseers say they like the new system well, because under the old system they had the responsibility of flogging; but that it is much better now, "for instead of a black driver," as one of them said, "we have got a white one, and he answers the purpose quite as well." And I do not believe that the quantity of human suffering has decreased, and that I declare most solemnly, by the adoption of the apprenticeship.

3994. Do you mean to state that you do not consider the condition of the negro better under the system of apprenticeship than it was under the system of slavery?—I believe in the estates in the immediate vicinity of large towns, and more directly under the control of Government, their condition is considerably meliorated, but, taking it as a whole, with reference to estates remote from the seat of Government, which are far the greater number, I believe that the condition of the slave is not at all meliorated. I believe the quantity of human suffering to be the same, if not more. For instance, under the clause of the British Act adopted by the Act of the Legislature certain arrangements may be made by proprietors and their agents, with the assent of the majority of the negroes, for hiring their surplus time. The special magistrate is supposed to act as the protector of the negro under this Act, but when a special magistrate becomes perfectly identified, as in most instances is the case, with the planter, and when, as you must observe is frequently the case, they are in the habit of making him presents of pieces of plate, the arrangement must be a very one-sided one, because the negro himself is very ignorant of what his rights are; the special magistrate alone can explain them to him, and if that special magistrate is identified with the planter, then the interests of the negro must be sacrificed, and I believe that to have been the case in almost all the arrangements that I have heard have been made. For instance, when I hear them talk about a penny an hour, it appears to me that that is a very inadequate remuneration to the negro for his time, during the crop, particularly, when it is extremely valuable. I know that during the crop the proprietors of jobbing gangs were in the habit of getting from 6*s.* 8*d.* currency, in some instances, to 10*s.* currency per day, for the labour of their slaves who were sent upon sugar plantations during the period of crop, particularly when they were digging cane-holes, by what is called the job.

3995. Do you conceive the evils that you have attributed to the system of special magistrates to belong necessarily to any scheme of apprenticeship, or that a scheme of apprenticeship could have been devised which would have worked better with regard to the special magistrates?—I do not think that any scheme of apprenticeship could have been devised which would not have been subject to the same objections. Had a system of entire freedom been adopted, the negroes would have instantly come under the protection of the common law of England, which is the common law of Jamaica, and of the Acts of the Jamaica Assembly. Some difficulty has been started, I believe, about a provision for the poor, but that difficulty would not exist in Jamaica, because there is an Act in the island imposing a poor-rate, by which all persons who are free and unable to work are supported; it was an Act passed by the early colonists in the reign of Charles the Second.

3996. Are you therefore of opinion, that as long as the system of apprenticeship is maintained, no remedy to the evils which you attribute to it could be provided by the British Legislature?—I do not think there can; you will observe that the Emancipation Act gives almost despotic power to the special magistrate over the slave. There is only one thing that can check the tyranny of a special magistrate conjoined with that of an overseer, and that would be public opinion; but public opinion in the island of Jamaica is peculiarly adverse to the slave, because no man can defend the the interests of the slaves there without subjecting himself to entire ruin. Indeed he cannot live in the colony if he does. A. H. Beaumont, Esq.

3997. Do you mean to give it as your deliberate opinion to the Committee, that the great majority of the gentlemen who have been appointed special magistrates in Jamaica have betrayed the trust reposed in them, in order to conciliate those little acts of kindness and favour which you represent to have been shown to them by the overseers?—I do; and I believe this, that it is impossible for any man, however pure and virtuous he may be, leaving this country to go to Jamaica and perform the duties of special magistrates there for twelve months, without suffering one of the two things, either becoming to all intents and purposes in his feelings a planter or else quarrelling with the planters.

3998. Sir G. Grey.] Your practical experience extended to about nine months of the apprenticeship?—I left in May 1835.

3999. Were you personally acquainted with many of the special magistrates who administered the apprentice law during the first few months of the apprenticeship?—I was.

4000. And the statement you have made, as to the great majority of those special magistrates having betrayed their trust, applies to those magistrates who were then in Jamaica, and with respect to whom you had means of personal observation?—It applies not only to them, but it applies to those subsequent; I form my opinion partly from observation and partly from the correspondence I have had with disinterested parties upon the subject before and since I left Jamaica.

4001. Does that apply equally to those of whom you had personal observation, and to those with respect to whom you received letters since?—Of course, my own knowledge of what I had seen and heard myself would be better evidence, but I believe that since I left the island the conduct of the special magistrates has been worse than it was before.

4002. Have you attentively read the report by the special magistrates to Lord Sligo, transmitted by Lord Sligo to the Government at home, and presented to Parliament in the course of last Session?—I have looked over it.

4003. Do you conceive that the spirit manifested in those reports corresponds with the description you have given of the character of the great mass of the special magistrates?—I know enough of the mode of making up returns in the island of Jamaica to place very little reliance upon any such returns.

4004. Do you believe that those reports of the special magistrates are purposely falsified, to produce a wrong impression of the character and spirit which actuated the writers?—I cannot state the reason which may actuate them, but I have said that I know enough of the mode in which returns are made up in the island of Jamaica to place very little reliance upon any Jamaica returns.

4005. Do you believe that the sentiments expressed, as well as the facts stated in those reports, give a false representation of the spirit which actuated the magistrates, or of the facts which came under their observation?—They may or they may not; but I should place very little belief in them.

4006. Will you state the names of the several special magistrates whom you know to have received pieces of plate from planters during the period you were in Jamaica?—A Lieutenant White, in St. George's, was one; there was another gentleman for the parish of Manchester, I do not recollect his name, and two or three others.

4007. At what period was that?—I do not recollect; I recollect seeing an advertisement in the paper, I think there were three of them; and I saw very recently an advertisement of the same description.

4008. Do you know whether Lieutenant White's piece of plate was presented while he was a special magistrate, or after he had been dismissed for misconduct?—I recollect hearing a proposition to present him with it before he was dismissed, but I believe he did not actually receive it till after.

4009. Do you know whether he was dismissed in the intermediate time?—I believe he was.

4010. Are you able to state the names of any other special magistrates that received pieces of plate?—I think there are five that have received pieces of plate; I am not positive as to the number; there are several, however.

4011. Will you state the particulars on which you found your belief, that five received pieces of plate, so as to enable the Committee further to investigate that statement?—I cannot say whether Mr. M'Cleod received a piece of plate from the parish parish of Westmoreland ; I know it was in contemplation to give him one at the time he was removed from Westmoreland to St. Dorothy's ; several received plate or votes of thanks. I do not now recollect their names, but the fact was notorious enough.

A. H. Beaumont,

4012. In what month was that ?—I believe it was some time between August and May ; but I do not mean to say any thing disrespectful of Mr. M'Cleod, as I believe him to have been a good magistrate.

4013. Can you state at what period between August and May that present of plate was in contemplation ?—I think it was in the later period, when he was transferred from Westmoreland to St. Dorothy's.

4014. Now, with regard to the other three, can you state any particulars which will enable the Committee to obtain further information respecting them ?—All I recollect is seeing the statement in a newspaper, that pieces of plate were to be presented, naming at different times several special magistrates ; I think there is one for the parish of Manchester ; I know there are several to whom it was proposed that these presents should be made.

4015. At what period was it proposed with respect to the magistrate of Manchester ?—I think at the same period, but it may have been subsequent to my leaving the island : my recollection being formed from what I saw in the newspaper, I cannot fix the date nor the particular persons who were to receive the plate ; the practice of giving plate to favourite special magistrates is not uncommon.

4016. You have been in the habit of getting the Jamaica papers since you left the island ?—I have.

4017. Can you favour the Committee with those papers which contain the advertisements of those pieces of plate being presented ?—I cannot, because when I have read a Jamaica newspaper, I throw it away.

4018. Can you, upon investigation, furnish the Committee with the dates of the papers which contain the advertisements of the three other ?—I did not positively state that there were five ; I only know that it was not an uncommon occurrence ; but when one considers the important duties of special magistrates, it struck me as a curious circumstance, that they should be receiving pieces of plate from one party of the suitors in their courts.

4019. You have stated that you believe it to be a common occurrence ?—I believe, in every instance in which a special magistrate has given satisfaction to the planters, something of the kind has been done, either a piece of plate or a vote of thanks.

4020. Upon what is that belief founded ; is it founded upon documentary evidence of any kind ?—No, it is founded upon the evidence by which I would know of any fact that took place in London.

4021. Is it founded on advertisements in the papers ?—Principally upon that.

4022. Can you furnish the Committee with copies of those advertisements ?—I have not got them, and to find them would give me more trouble than I should like to take ; but if the Committee would direct the clerk to search the Jamaica papers they would probably find it.

4023. Cannot you point out within a month, or a week, the date of the paper ?—I cannot.

4024. Do you think you could at any time, between the present day and the day to which this Committee will adjourn, direct the attention of the Committee to the paper in which those advertisements are to be found ?—I shall not go over the newspapers to ascertain it, but if the Committee will direct the clerk to do it, I think they will find one of them some time between January in this year and the present time ; they are at the Jamaica Coffee-house.

4025. Mr. Burton.] Are the Committee to understand you to say positively that you know of your own knowledge, or from information on which you can rely, that these pieces of plates or votes of thanks have been presented, or is it merely that you have an impression upon your mind that in a number of instances these compliments have been paid ?—I know positively of two instances, and I believe of three others.

4026. But you do not speak positively to the other three ?—Not to state names and dates.

4027. Chairman.] But you have stated that you will not undertake to produce any any proof to the Committee of those instances?—I have got other avocations to attend to; I cannot go through 700 or 800 newspapers. The fact is so, and will hardly be denied in the colony.

4028. Sir George Grey.] Were you correctly understood to state, that the amount of suffering was not at all diminished under the apprenticeship system, compared with what it was under slavery?—I have stated, that upon the estates in the immediate vicinity of the Government there is a considerable change, but in the greater portion of the remote estates there is very little change for the better.

4029. Do you mean that corporal punishment is inflicted to the same extent as it was under the system of slavery?—I believe it is, if not more.

4030. Have you compared any returns of the number of lashes inflicted monthly during the apprenticeship, with a return of the number of lashes inflicted monthly during slavery?—Looking at the character of the greater number of special magistrates, I do not place the slightest reliance upon any return made, and I am ready to name the magistrates and give my reasons.

4031. Upon what is your belief founded, that the number of lashes inflicted now is equal to that inflicted during slavery?—I have always understood so from the negroes themselves.

4032. Then you are now speaking only up to May 1835?—Yes.

4034. Had you frequent opportunities of communicating with the negroes upon those estates?—Generally about the island, because I was in the habit of travelling about the island.

4035. Upon those estates can you give the names of the special magistrates who administered the law upon them?—I do not mean to say that the negroes upon those estates particularly complained of their managers; on the contrary, the negroes upon Petersfield and Witney expressed themselves very favourably of their managers, but they were speaking of the working of the system generally throughout the country, they thought that it was any thing but freedom.

4037. Sir George Grey.] With respect to flogging, you have stated that you believe the amount of flogging to be equal during the apprenticeship to what it was under slavery; upon what is that belief founded?—The mode in which I arrive at that impression must be a very vague one, because it was difficult at any time to ascertain the number of lashes given during the time of slavery, but when I have been riding through the country I have spoken to the negroes on the way-side, and I found that the impression upon their mind, and I believe they were speaking the truth, was, that the special magistrate flogged more, in many instances, than had been done before.

4038. Can you name any estate upon which the negroes stated distinctly that that was the case with respect to a special magistrate, under whose jurisdiction they were placed?—I was told it by the negroes of a great many estates in St. George's, who came down to make complaints of the circumstance; they applied to me, and I immediately sent them to the Attorney-General, and he sent them to the Governor.

4039. Can you state the name of a magistrate or of any magistrates who administered the law in this severe way?—Lieutenant White.

4040. Upon what estate?—Upon all the estates of the parish of St. George's.

4041. Are you aware that Lieutenant White was dismissed from the magistracy?—I believe he was, but to the best of my recollection it was not for cruelty. The negroes upon the Hope estate, belonging to the Duke of Buckingham, told me that their condition was anything but improved.

4042. In what respect?—They said that there was a greater degree of coercion; that the special magistrates were, as they expressed themselves, very spiteful.

4043. Did they say that they had not so much time at their own disposal?—
They

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

They stated that the time was kept surreptitiously, that the clocks were made to answer the purposes of the planters, and when they were supposed to be working eight hours they were sometimes working twelve.

4044. What was the name of the magistrate upon this estate?—He was the special magistrate for the parish of St. Andrew's, but I do not remember his name.

4045. Did you make any representation to the Governor of that fraud by means of the clocks?—I had made so many representations to the Governors upon different occasions, and there was so little attention paid to them, particularly when the planters were hanging men contrary to law, that I thought it useless to make any such application.

4046. Then you heard that special allegation that the clocks were altered so as to deceive the negroes four hours out of the twelve, and yet you made no representation of it to the Governor?—In the case of the St. George's negroes, who made this complaint, I did; I sent them to the proper officer, His Majesty's Attorney-General, whose duty it was to protect them, and I gave the negroes an hour-glass, which they afterwards told me the overseer had taken away and broken. Overseer in Jamaica means chief manager, in other colonies the word means what is called in Jamaica a book-keeper.

4047. Did you write a letter to the Attorney-General stating that fact?—I wrote a letter to the Attorney-General, stating that the negroes had causes of complaint, and he would have arrived at the knowledge of it, as I did, by asking the negroes. They had a great number of other complaints to make.

4048. How far was that estate from the place at which the Attorney-General resided?—About 32 miles by the direct road, but coming as they did to Kingston first, it was about 45 miles.

4049. Who carried the complaint to the Attorney-General?—I sent the negroes themselves.

4050. How many of them went?—About 30.

4051. Did that written communication specify this particular complaint about being defrauded of their time?—I cannot say; I probably left it to the negroes to state particulars.

4052. What time of the year was this?—In April, during the crop of 1835.

4053. Do you believe those complaints as to the time to be well founded?—I do.

4054. Have you ever heard those complaints made in any other estate since the apprenticeship?—I know it was always the practice in the island of Jamaica to crib the negroes' time, and I am satisfied that the Act of Parliament has not changed man's nature; and as I know that they did crib their time before, I believe they continue to do it now.

4055. Then you believe that upon the Hope estate the negroes were deceived to the extent of four hours out of twelve in the working hours?—I will not say the particular amount they were deceived, nor do I instance the Hope in particular, except in stating what the negroes there said, but I believe that the practice is very common.

4056. The question was upon what you found your belief that the practice is common, and you said you founded it upon the allegation on the part of the negroes of the Hope estate; do you believe that allegation made to you by the negroes upon that estate to be correct or not?—Substantially I believe it is; they may have exaggerated the amount of the deception practised upon them, but I do believe that the time is in many instances stolen from them, and I will state why it must be so. You cannot carry on any plantation according to the present system unless the negroes occasionally work 36 hours, at least, continuously, and I will state why. Suppose the spell, as it is called, is changed, which is generally about six or seven in the morning, the negroes on it continue to work either in the manufacture of sugar, or in the field till eight in the evening of the next day, making continuous labour of about 36 hours. If the estate is what is called heavy handed with negroes, the spell, as it is called, will divide themselves into two and alternately rest. If it is an estate that is weak handed they must work the whole of the time; for instance, there must be a great number of green trash carriers, as they are called, that is, women whose business it is to carry the green trash after the cane is ground, to take the trash from the mill and put it upon the trash heap; there are a certain number of young girls whose duty it is to be the dry trash carriers, that is, to carry the dry cane trash which forms fuel. Another number must be stokers or fire makers, another number must be attendants upon the mill, and if it is a mule mill, then a number of boys are required to drive the mules; a certain number are required to be attending upon the coppers.

coppers. If the estate is heavy handed, so that they can have double sets upon each spell, then the work is comparatively very easy, because whilst one-half of the spell are asleep the others are working; but if from any circumstance the estate is weak handed, or there is a great deal of sickness upon it, as the work must be done and continues night and day, the spell on duty is kept continuously at work 36 hours. Now, I know enough of negroes to know that they would not sell their time for this continuous labour except for a considerable sum of money. I have known, in times of slavery, when the sum of a dollar has been paid for the purpose of getting a negro to keep the spell of another; for instance, according to the system of concubinage in which most planters live, when one of the white planters kept a black girl, he would pay half a dollar, or sometimes a dollar, to get a negro to keep part of her spell during half the night, and therefore when I see an arrangement by which they are to get 1*d.* or 1½*d.* an hour, I am satisfied that the law is evaded, and that by some collusion the negro is still made to work in many instances 36 hours continuously, under pretext of these inadequate arrangements, which I look upon as fraudulent.

4057. You heard the evidence of Mr. Miller with regard to estates under his charge?—I did.

4058. Did you hear the evidence as to the mode in which the crop was taken off those estates?—I did.

4059. Did you hear it stated that the extra time beyond the time allowed for by law was all paid for by agreement between the managers and the negroes?—I did.

4060. Are the Committee to understand you to mean, that fair wages are in no cases given to the apprentices for their extra time, but that, under the pretence of wages, a compulsory process is enforced, by which they are defrauded of the time which the law intended that they should enjoy?—Not physically compulsory, but moral compulsion; you are perhaps not aware that the negroes have never had arrangements for hiring themselves for wages on sugar plantations to any great extent previously to the apprenticeship; they are, in a very considerable degree, strangers to those arrangements; they have, in general, little confidence in the managers of proprietors; having been long slaves, they cannot divest themselves of the feeling that they now are compelled, in a certain degree, to do what they are asked or ordered to do by the overseer; or they are persuaded by the leading men upon the estate, who, in general, are made great pets of and receive great advantages, to adopt any arrangement suggested by the overseer. These head men, under the manager's direction, in fact, compel the great body of the negroes, not by actual force but by moral force, to adopt almost any suggestion he may make.

4061. Do you mean to state, that, during the early period of the apprenticeship, the negroes were not practically conversant with the rights which the law gave them?—They were not, and for this reason amongst others, they were under the impression, up to the 1st of August 1834, that they were to be free. Finding that they were not free, they instantly had an immense disgust to the system; they thought that freedom had been given to them by the people of this country,—by the King, as they said, and that they had been cheated out of it by the white people, and the consequence was, that in some cases they would make no arrangement for wages in return for labour; and, in other instances, they were ready to enter into almost any proposition made them, because they placed no confidence in the system, and considered themselves still as slaves; they did not believe it to be a lawful one; they considered it concocted by the planters.

4062. Do you mean, that that ignorance of the rights which the law gave them extended to the leading men among the negroes?—Not to that degree amongst them as amongst the more ignorant, yet the feeling was very general; when you consider that there are very few of the negroes that can read or write, comparatively speaking, it will not be wondered at that—

4063. Do you mean to state, that advantage was taken of that ignorance on the part of the negroes by the managers, so as to defraud them of part of the time which, according to the strict letter of the law, they were entitled to?—I should think so, for this reason; the work of any negro belonging to what is called a jobbing gang was, at the very lowest, worth, at eight hours a day, 2*s.* 6*d.*, and if they were persuaded to give their labour for a 1*d.* or 1½*d.* an hour, it was a fraud upon the negro, for it was not half the worth of that portion of labour, or it was not more than half what would have been given to one of the jobbing gangs.

4064. Do you mean further to state, that the special magistrates lent themselves as parties to this fraud on the part of the proprietors and managers to avail themselves of the ignorance of the negroes to abuse the power vested in their hands?—

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836

Looking at the fact of the lowness of the rate, I should say that the special magistrates evidently did, because if a special magistrate sanctions an agreement to give 1*d.* an hour for that which he believed was worth 3*d.* or 4*d.* an hour, he was sanctioning a fraud. He might be, and probably was, especially if he came from this country, wholly ignorant of the value of a negro's labour. I have known in the island of Jamaica as much as 6*s.* 8*d.* a day, that is, for ten hours' labour, during the time of coffee-picking.

4065. Then your opinion is, that, during the nine months with which you were conversant with the system of apprenticeship, there was, generally speaking, a combination among the proprietors, managers and special magistrates, as against the apprenticed population and to their disadvantage?—I do not believe there was any express combination; I do not believe they ever entered into any agreement upon the subject, but that, as the special magistrate became more familiarized with the planters, and found them very hospitable and agreeable persons, that his sympathies with them became stronger day by day, and his antipathies against the slaves greater. He received great favour and hospitality from the planters; he only knew the negroes as labourers and servants.

4066. Do you form that belief upon a knowledge of facts, or upon your general knowledge of human nature?—Upon both; but I will state a fact, as an example, with respect to the special magistrate for the estate called Oliphants, or St. Jago. The overseer upon that estate I believe to be a very benevolent person, but the magistrate was dependent upon him for every comfort and for every necessary of life. The overseer could almost starve him, whenever he pleased, and he certainly must have led a very miserable life if it had not been for the accommodation that that overseer could and did give him. The magistrate did not understand the patois spoken by the negroes, particularly in that part of the country, Manchester and Clarendon, where they speak exceedingly bad, and he was necessarily obliged to be dependent entirely upon the information he got from the overseer. I believe that that magistrate, with the best possible motive, would have sanctioned any agreement that the overseer told him was a right one. I do not mean to say the overseer did mislead him.

4067. Do you instance the magistrate you refer to as a proof of the fact that the special magistrates become daily more attached to the planters, and more hostile to the negroes?—I do; I have scarcely known a special magistrate to whom that did not apply; I could instance the special magistrate of a part of St. Andrew's. I know that his attachment to the planters was very considerable; he was upon the most friendly hospitable terms with them, and I heard him, upon one occasion, say that he had been very much mistaken in his idea of what was the state of the slaves.

4068. What did he say?—The substance of it was this, that he thought the slaves were as well off as they ought to be.

4069. Was he speaking of them under slavery, or under apprenticeship?—Under apprenticeship; and the whole leaning of his conversation was distinctly with the planter, and against the slaves.

4070. But he expressed an opinion that the negro under apprenticeship was as well off as he ought to be?—He did; the conversation was not directed to me, but he said that he had been induced to imagine that the condition of the slaves was extremely uncomfortable, and that they were very cruelly treated; that he had changed his mind upon the subject, and I think his expression was, "that they were a damned deal better off than they deserved to be." I recollect making some observations to him, and he got rather angry upon it, and I found that, as he had made up his opinion on the one side and I had made up my mind upon the other, it was of no use to enter into any further angry discussion with him.

4071. How did the special magistrate of St. Jago show his increased hostility to the negroes?—When the negroes came to make their complaints to him, his manner and style of addressing them was certainly not that which a magistrate in this country would generally make use of.

4072. Do you mean to say that his manner towards the negroes differed during the latter part of the period with which you were conversant with his practice from what it was during the earlier part?—I do not know what his manner had been during the first period; but I should judge that it must have altered, because his manner I thought extremely harsh, different from what it would have been to white persons; he appeared always to have anticipated that they were wrong; and when I heard him making his judgments, which he did very summarily, without taking any note or record of them, I thought he was unnecessarily severe and unkind, to say the least.

4073. Chairman.] Did you ever see his manner with the negroes when they first made their complaints?—I did.

4074. Did his manner upon those occasions appear to you to be such as to discourage the slave in making his complaint?—Decidedly so; I heard them say so themselves.

4076. Upon which do you rest your belief, that the magistrates, in the course of your observation of them, became more hostile to the negroes than they were when they first entered upon the discharge of their duties?—Unless I had a list of the special magistrates before me I could not enumerate the names of those who appeared to increase in hostility to the negroes; but I judge not so much from previous acquaintance with them as from a consideration of what every magistrate's conduct ought to be to a person that goes to make a complaint; and when I have seen the special magistrates sitting, it appeared to me that they did not treat the blacks in that way.

4077. But your opinion appears to be founded upon what you conceive ought to be their conduct generally, rather than upon a comparison of what it was at one period with what it was at another?—I was introduced to several of them upon their first arrival in the country, and their manner of expressing themselves with respect to the negroes was very different from what it was some months afterwards.

4078. Are you aware whether punishments increased as the magistrates remained longer in the colony?—I believe the fact to have been that there was greater hardships imposed on the negroes. I believe the punishments immediately after the month of August up to the latter end of 1834 were very excessive.

4079. Were they greater or less during that period than in the last six months?—Several of the negroes, particularly those belonging to the parishes of Port Royal and St. Mary, have repeatedly shown me their backs, which had been very cruelly lacerated.

4080. Have you any means of forming an opinion as to the increase or decrease of punishment, taking the last six months of the apprenticeship and the first six months of the apprenticeship?—It is impossible to ascertain the relative proportions of punishment, because it is not done publicly. The only mode by which you could ascertain it would be by making use of the returns, which I have already stated I do not believe to be true.

4081. On what is it that you found your belief, not only that the returns are not true, but that the direct reverse of those returns is true; and that there has been an increase instead of a decrease?—Because I have seen a considerable number of negroes who had been flogged. I was very much in the habit of conversing with the negroes, and a great number have shown me their backs who had been severely punished. I saw a large number of negroes, some of them very respectable people, that had been very severely flogged; and I believe that flogging had not diminished during the apprenticeship, as compared with the last years of slavery.

4082. You are speaking of the first period of the apprenticeship, during which there was an increase; but the returns show a great subsequent decrease. Have you any fact to justify the opinion that that decrease has not taken place?—I believe in some places it decreased very much. For instance, in the parish of St. Thomas in the East, under Mr. Lyon, there was an immense decrease of punishment; but I know he was rather unpopular with the principal people on that account.

4083. Have you any information at all as to the amount of punishment during the last six months preceding this day?—None at all, except some letters from friends upon the subject.

4084. Have you any information as to any period subsequent to May 1835, when you left Jamaica, as to the amount of punishment?—No, I have not; but up to May 1835 they had not decreased, as compared with the same period of slavery.

4085. Lord Sandon.] Your impression upon that point is gathered from the fact of persons you saw with the appearance of having been flogged upon them?—It was.

o.58.

4086. And

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

4086. And you think you saw more persons with those marks of punishment in the latter part of the time than in the first part?—There were more punishments from August to October than subsequently, but from October to May 1835 I do not think there was so much flogging.

4087. Have not you stated that there was an increase of punishment progressively during the apprenticeship?—No, I stated that there had been an increase of punishment during the apprenticeship, compared with slavery.

4088. Sir George Grey.] Are the Committee to understand from what you have stated, that you consider that the magistrates, the longer they have remained, have become more hostile to the negroes and more severe in their conduct towards them?—I stated that I believed they were more hostile to them.

4089. Upon what does that opinion rest?—Because whenever I have seen the magistrates adjudicating, it appeared to me that they decided against the slave when I thought that the slave was right, and that they endeavoured by all possible means to prevent complaints from being made to them.

4090. Can you compare the conduct of the special magistrates at one period of the apprenticeship with their conduct at another period of the apprenticeship, and can you, upon that comparison, state any facts which justify the belief that they became more and more hostile the longer they remained in the colony?—From August to October in the year 1834, there were many complaints made by the negroes to the special magistrates. Subsequently to that period, the number of complaints very much diminished, as the confidence of the negroes in the magistrates diminished, and I believe that the adjudication of the special magistrates has been more seldom called in, excepting cases where the overseer or manager applied for his interposition. The negroes would submit to a greater number of privations, they would do a greater quantity of labour and be more obedient to the special magistrates than they would be, before they saw it was of no use to appeal to them. When I saw special magistrates receiving favours from managers, I believed the negroes when they said they had no confidence in them. The consequence would be, that as they were more submissive after October 1834, than they were before, there would not be so much occasion to flog them.

4091. Then you state this as the fact upon which your opinion is founded, that complaints diminished?—Yes, I believe this. I pay no regard to returns.

4092. And upon that fact you found the opinion that they became more hostile to the negroes?—Yes; I know that the planters express themselves much better satisfied with the working of the system, and are generally good friends to the special magistrates.

4093. Mr. Buxton.] Were there any means of ascertaining the number of punishments inflicted whilst slavery prevailed?—There were not.

4094. Had you any means of ascertaining the number of punishments inflicted during the first six months of apprenticeship?—No further than what I have mentioned, that I have known repeated complaints by the negroes, that they were flogged. Immediately after the first of August, the negroes being impressed with the idea that they were free, complained when they were flogged; I suppose that I have seen at different times, from August 1834 to about October, above 500 who had been flogged and severely flogged; and there must have been a great number flogged that I never saw.

4095. You have stated that there is no official return of the number of punishments during slavery; is there any official return of the number of punishments during the first six months of the apprenticeship?—I do not know, I think there is not, at least I have access to none.

4096. So that it is impossible for you by official documents to prove that the number of punishments has either diminished or increased?—Quite impossible.

4097. Do you think that it proves that a more merciful system is adopted now than there was at the earlier stages of the apprenticeship, that there has been an actual diminution of the number of punishments; or might not the fact of the multiplicity of punishments in the first instance have led the negroes to suppose that they had not that degree of protection which they supposed they had in the first instance, and consequently they might not have dared to make those complaints?—I have no doubt that that is the case; but, as I said before, I do not believe the returns, whatever they may be; I believe that many men now holding the office of special magistrate, would have very little care what sort of returns they made, and would make them to please the planters or the Government, as they thought best suited their interest.

19 July 1836.

4098. Is there any effectual check upon the fidelity of the returns of punishments?—I am not aware what regulations the Government may have adopted, but I cannot imagine that there is any check; for instance, if a young man of very debauched manners and habits, as is not unfrequently the case, is made a special magistrate, no faith can be put in his returns. I think a person of that character, who would not be entrusted by a merchant to keep a common account, ought not to be entrusted to keep returns of punishments, and to exercise dictatorial power.

4099. Chairman.] Are you prepared to express an opinion to the Committee that there have been frequent cases of men without character and of bad conduct appointed to the office of special magistrate?—Most decidedly so.

4100. Sir George Grey.] By the Secretary of State or by the Governor?—By the Governor.

4101. What proportion of the magistrates have been appointed by the Governor and what proportion by the Secretary of State?—The official returns will state that.

4102. Are you able to state?—If I saw the return I could state it at once; the proportion varied at different times; as special magistrates died or left the country, others were appointed by the Governor.

4103. Does your observation apply to those appointed by the Governor or to those appointed by the Secretary of State?—With regard to the character of those appointed by the Secretary of State, I have no means of judging, except by their proceedings after they arrived at the colony. With respect to those appointed by the Governor I knew many of them personally.

4104. Mr. Gladstone.] Do not you know that the proportion appointed by the Governor, as compared with the whole number, is extremely small?—No, on the contrary, I should say that the one fact of a special magistrate being appointed by the Secretary of State, and the other fact of his taking upon himself the active discharge of the duties, are very different things, because it very frequently happened that a special magistrate, from illness or some other cause, did not perform the duty, which fell upon some special magistrate appointed by the Governor along with his other duties.

4105. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to state that the greater part of the acting special magistrates, during the nine months you were in Jamaica, after the apprenticeship began, were appointed by the Governor?—To ascertain this you had better refer to your official returns.

4106. Chairman.] But without adverting to the returns, are you prepared to express any opinion as to the proportion?—I believe that two-thirds of the administration of the law as to the slaves, in truth and fact, went through the hands of special magistrates appointed by the Governor; for instance, in the whole of St. Thomas in the East, the whole of St. Ann's, the whole of Manchineal, the greater part of St. James's, and at one time a great part of Westmoreland, when Bryan Edwards was special magistrate there.

4107. Who are the magistrates of St. Thomas in the East?—Mr. Lyon was the only one for a long time.

4108. He was a magistrate with respect to whom a great diminution of punishment had taken place?—Yes, he is an able, intelligent and admirable magistrate.

4109. Who is the magistrate of Manchineal?—At the time I left the island, Mr. Kennet Dawson, a very unfit person.

4110. Who was the magistrate of St. Ann's?—Mr. Sooley, a very unfit person.

4111. Are you aware whether Mr. Hill and Mr. Norcutt were appointed by the Secretary of State?—By the Secretary of State. Mr. Richard S. Cooper was colonially appointed for St. James, and Mr. Bryan Edwards for the parish of Westmoreland; and that division of the island, reckoning from St. Thomas in the East, is about two-thirds of the sugar properties in the island. The circuit I have stated goes above half round the island; and I believe that portion of the island I have described comprises two-thirds, or at least considerably more than half of the sugar estates in the island.

4112. Do you mean to say that considerably more than half of the sugar estates in the island were under the charge of five special magistrates appointed by the Governor?—Practically, I believe they were.

4113. How many special magistrates were there in Jamaica at the time you left?—I do not exactly remember the number.

4114. About

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

4114. About how many?—I do not believe that at that time there were more than 22 actually engaged.

4115. Are you aware of the present number?—I am not.

4116. Mr. Gladstone.] Should you be much surprised if you were told that there were 50 when you left the island?—I know there were a considerable number; but I am speaking of those special magistrates that did administer practically the duties of the office. I know that Mr. Lyon alone performed the duty for St. Thomas in the East, and that Mr. Kennet Dawson performed the duty for the Manchineal district; I know that for a great portion of the parish of St. Ann the duty was performed by Mr. Sooley; and that Mr. Norcutt and Mr. Hill had been the special magistrates of St. James's; but they were not acting; and that the large district of St. James's was under Mr. Cooper; and of Westmoreland under a planter, Mr. Bryan Edwards, who had immediately previous to his appointment been an overseer.

4117. Sir George Grey.] Are you able to state, with any accuracy, the number of magistrates who held the special commission at that time?—I am not; but I have not mentioned the whole of the island in the circuit I referred to.

4118. You stated that five magistrates had practically the charge and superintendence of at least half the sugar estates in the island; are you able to state what number of special magistrates held the special commission in May 1835?—I cannot say, I think I recollect 20; there might have been twice as many, but I speak of those persons actively engaged in that portion of the island in which there was most trouble found in arranging the apprenticeship system; my attention was not particularly drawn to other parishes; I did not attend to them when the cultivation was principally coffee or grass.

4119. You have no accurate information as to the number of special magistrates at that time?—No further than from the official returns as to the number, and my own knowledge as to those who were actively engaged.

4120. Mr. Burton.] Have several of the stipendiary magistrates an interest in apprenticed labour?—They have.

4121. Will you state their names?—Mr. Ralph Cocking has.

4122. Was he a magistrate appointed in the colony?—He was.

4123. Had he made himself remarkable by having joined the Church Colonial Union?—He did belong to the Church Colonial Union; but I know he is a man of very good and amiable character; he had been an overseer; he is interested in apprentice labour property.

4124. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean that he is the holder of apprentice labour?—I mean in the right of his wife.

4125. Sir George Grey.] What is the nature of the interest that Mr. Cocking had?—I know he was interested in slaves, and to the best of my recollection it was in the right of his wife.

4126. Do you mean that his wife was the owner of an estate on which apprentices worked?—He was the owner of slaves.

4127. At the period of his appointment was she entitled to the benefit of the labour of apprentices?—I cannot say if she individually was; but I know that his wife's family were; and have heard and believe that he was so in right of his wife.

1428. What do you mean by his wife's family?—Her sisters.

4129. What members of her family were entitled to her benefit of apprenticed labour?—I cannot say, but it was a matter of notoriety that Mr. Cocking was interested in slave property; but the particular tenure by which he held it I do not know.

4130. Chairman] Do you mean that he had himself a pecuniary interest, or that his connexions had a pecuniary interest in apprenticed labour?—I believe that he has himself a pecuniary interest in the right of his wife.

4131. Sir George Grey.] You believe that either Mr. or Mrs. Cocking have a direct pecuniary interest in apprenticed labour?—I have no doubt of the fact.

4132. On what estate did the apprentices labour in which either Mr. or Mrs. Cocking have an interest?—I believe somewhere between St. Mary's and St. Thomas in the Vale. Mr. Cocking had been an overseer upon Lewisburgh or in that neighbourhood.

1433. How long ago?—To the best of my recollection he was an overseer when he was appointed, but certainly a very short time anterior.

4134. Upon what estate?—I think it was Lewisburgh; but it was an estate in that vicinity.

19 July 1836.

4135. To whom did the estate belong?—I do not remember; it is not the custom in the island of Jamaica, in speaking of an estate, to refer to the proprietor; you describe it by its name; few persons, in speaking of the estate, think about the absentee proprietor.

4136. Was Mr. Cocking the owner of the estate on which you believe him or his wife to have pecuniary interest in the labour of the apprentices?—No.

4137. Upon what estate did the apprentices labour, in whose labour Mr. Cocking had a peculiar interest?—They were mostly domestic servants I believe; I think there was a portion that worked in what is called a jobbing gang. They were not sufficient to form a jobbing gang, but they worked with others I believe.

4138. Did you ever investigate these facts yourself?—No; but I have no doubt of the fact that Mr. Cocking was interested in slave property. It was matter of notoriety. I know that the negroes, when I was travelling through that part of the country, said that it was a very hard case; in the first place, they said, the Governor himself is a slave-owner, and here is our special magistrate a slave-owner, and he has got all the feelings of a slave-owner, and what hope have we of justice; and I recollect my attention being particularly drawn to the circumstance from that conversation.

4139. Is it upon that conversation that you found your belief, or upon any other fact?—No; upon the perfect notoriety of the fact that Mr. Cocking was interested in slave labour.

4140. But you are not able to state whether it was Mr. Cocking or Mrs. Cocking, or some other member of her family?—I cannot say; but I have no doubt that Mr. Cocking was interested in slave property at the time he was appointed a special magistrate; whether he disposed of it subsequently I do not know.

4141. Do you know whether he continued to retain his interest after he was a magistrate?—I understand that he did.

4142. Did he continue to act as an overseer after he was a magistrate?—He could not, of course.

4143. You have stated that you believe him to have been a humane man?—Yes.

4144. He is not one of those men that you would include in the charge of becoming increasingly hostile to the negroes?—No; because I should say the appointment of Mr. Cocking is a very judicious one, if colonial slave-owners were to be appointed at all.

4145. Have you read Mr. Cocking's reports?—I have cast my eye over them.

4146. Have you cast your eye over them sufficiently to become acquainted with the substance of them?—No.

4147. Sir James Graham.] If Mr. Cocking is so humane a man, whence arose the complaint of the negroes as to his having the feelings of a slave-owner?—I do not undertake to say that in every complaint a negro made against a special magistrate he was necessarily right, but I believe that the most humane man could not properly execute the duties of special magistrate. I believe Mr. Cocking to have been a very humane man, but I have no doubt that in many instances he decided very wrong, and for this reason, that every planter has two distinct characters; he has got one character as between the persons who are freemen like himself, and he has a very different character altogether with regard to slaves; and a very amiable man in his relations with his equals may be of opinion that it is necessary to use very harsh measures with slaves, and that is the general impression of all planters throughout the country; all of them think that the negroes are an inferior race of beings.

4148. Has any instance of undue harshness on the part of Mr. Cocking, in his conduct towards the apprentices, fallen within your own knowledge?—No; only the negroes that I met with in that part said that they were flogged more than they had been flogged during the time of slavery, but whether that was so or not I cannot say. I saw some of the negroes that had evidently been flogged; negroes wear, in general, a short loose Osnaburg frock over a pair of trowsers, and it just comes as low as the waist, and if they have been flogged, and they have not changed their apparel, you can see the bloody marks upon the back of the frock; and if the negroes are referring to the circumstance of being flogged, they will lift up the shirt and show you the back and the marks upon it, as they have shown me.

4149. Did the negroes complain to you of the remarkable severity of this gentleman's decisions?—They drew no comparison with other special magistrates, but they said that there was more "flog! flog!" to use their own term, since the King had given them "free," than there had been before.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

4150. Did they go on to make the observation that the Governor was a slave-owner, and that that particular magistrate was a slave-owner?—I do not know that the same observations were made by the same negroes or concurrently, but I know that in that part of the country they made the observation. One would complain of the flogging, and another would say that they could expect very little justice, because the Governor was a slave-owner and Mr. Cocking was one too.

4151. All those observations were made by negroes within the jurisdiction of Mr. Cocking?—To the best of my recollection within his jurisdiction; I cannot say where his jurisdiction began and where it ended, but it is in that part of the country between Spanish Town and Anotta Bay.

4152. Sir George Grey.] Do you believe that Mr. Cocking, a humane man, flogged more as a special magistrate than he had done as a manager?—I should think from August to October that he did.

4153. What motive could he have had for exercising greater severity as a special magistrate than he had exercised as a manager?—The negroes and the managers did not understand one another upon the apprenticeship system coming into operation. In many instances the allowances, which the negroes had been accustomed to, were withheld; the negroes were not aware why this was done. Again, the negroes were extremely anxious that the forty-five hours which they were required to be worked, should be as much as possible spread over four days of the week, so as to give them the greatest possible proportion of Friday to themselves; and for some reason I do not know, except it was to render their situation irksome, that plan was not adopted; the planters preferred making them work eight hours a-day. I believe the ultimate object was this, to compel the negroes to sell their time for the smallest sum that can be got for it. I will state how that is done. In examining Mr. Miller the Committee were not aware that there is a very great difference between the negroes' provision-ground and the negroes' garden. Mr. Miller stated that the negro might go from the field and work his garden; that is true; but the garden which the negro works in an hour or two, when he has left his labour, is, upon the sugar estate; it is a mere kitchen garden; but the productive grounds of the negro, which are attached to every estate, are at a considerable distance, sometimes 15, 16 and even 20 miles; in one instance I know that they are at the distance of 27 miles; for instance, in the case of Meylesfield estate, in the parish of Westmoreland; if the negro were made to work nine hours a day he would take the half day on Friday to walk to his ground, which say is 15 or 20 miles distant, to be able to commence the labour of it at an early hour on the next morning; if, on the other hand, he works eight hours a day, then on the Friday he would not have the time to go up to his grounds, and it would take half of his Saturday to do it, so that there would be so much time lost to him. The managers were well aware of that fact, and by compelling the negro to work eight hours a day instead of nine, they would compel the negro to sell the extra hours for less than he otherwise would do. For instance, the negro would sell the extra hour upon the Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday for a much less proportionate sum than he would sell five hours upon the Friday. The extra or ninth hour in the first four working days of the week was of little value, but could he have exchanged that ninth hour of each of those four days for four hours on Friday he would have been a great gainer. A negro's remote provision-ground is a mine of wealth to him; his garden in the estate itself is of little value.

4154. Are the Committee to understand you to state that Mr. Cocking, whom you have represented as a very humane man, flogged the negroes more as a special magistrate than he had done as a manager, from the motive you have stated?—I do not attribute that motive to Mr. Cocking, I attribute it to the managers, and I believe it is justly attributable to them.

4155. Then what motive had Mr. Cocking, in your opinion, for flogging the negroes more as a special magistrate than he had done as a manager?—I said that at the first commencement of the apprenticeship there were considerable disputes between the managers and the slaves. The general impression amongst the planters was, that there should be a system of coercion, that the slaves should be taught they were not free, and I believe that acting upon that principle there was a greater portion of punishment, not under him alone, but under all the others, than had taken place before, with one or two exceptions.

4156. Can you state those one or two exceptions?—In the case of Major Norcutt and Mr. Hill.

19 July 1836.

4157. Any others?—I dare say there are, but I do not recollect the names of all the special magistrates.

4158. Chairman.] That cause of an increased degree of punishment was obviously of a temporary nature and would cease when the negro became aware of his real condition under the apprenticeship?—It would cease when the negro gave way and gave up what were his rights and ceased to demand them.

4159. You have stated that the negro was ignorant of the nature of the apprenticeship, and imagined himself completely free, and therefore he was not willing to comply even with the legal demands of his master upon his time?—In several instances, certainly.

4160. Mr. Buxton.] Will you state the names of all the magistrates who you conceive had an interest in slavery?—The first in the list is Richard Chamberlain, jun., Richard Cocking, Richard S. Cooper, I think Richard B. Facey, Walter Finlayson, Alexander Gordon Fife, Cheney Hamilton, James Harris, I believe Charles Hawkins, William Hewitt, Samuel Price, William Ramsey, W. H. Sooley, John Woolfris.

4161. Sir George Grey.] How many of those magistrates held the commission while you were in Jamaica?—Eight of them.

4162. Do you know how many of them hold the commission now?—I do not.

4163. Will you state the interest of Mr. Chamberlain in apprenticed labour?—His mother is a proprietor of apprenticed labourers, which will ultimately be his, and his father is in the same situation; his father and his mother in their own separate rights are owners of apprenticed labourers.

4164. Have they landed property in Jamaica?—Yes.

4165. Upon which apprentices labour?—No, they are principally domestic slaves, except that his father has what is called a pen.

4166. What had Mr. Chamberlain been before he was a special magistrate?—He had been a clerk to William Titley, a merchant in Kingston.

4167. He was appointed by Lord Sligo?—I believe he was.

4168. Do you know whether he holds the commission now?—I have no means of ascertaining.

4169. Or what the extent of his interest was in apprenticed labour?—Whenever he was living in his mother's house he had a control over all the servants.

4170. Do you mean that he had any control beyond what any son might exercise in his mother's house?—None.

4171. Do you mean to state that the extent of Mr. Chamberlain's interest was, that his mother, in whose house he sometimes resided, had domestic servants who were held in apprenticeship?—And slaves that used to be hired out for wages, as I believe.

4172. Do you know how many she had?—No.

4173. Do you know whether she had more than enough for the ordinary purposes of the family?—To the best of my knowledge she had; there were some that were hired out, I believe.

4174. What is Mr. Cooper's interest?—He is a proprietor of a small plantation or pen. I think it is in right of his wife, but his wife is dead, and I believe he holds it as tenant by courtesy.

4175. Mr. Gladstone.] Are the terms "plantation" and "pen" indifferently applied to the same property?—No, "pen" signifies a plantation for raising stock or grazing.

4176. Is there any planting upon a pen?—Very frequently Indian corn.

4177. Is there any planting of the export produce of the island?—Sometimes pimento is raised upon the pen.

4178. What number of apprentices are upon his estate?—I do not know.

4179. Where is the estate?—I believe somewhere between St. Andrew's, St. Mary's and St. Thomas in the Vale, on what is called the "Above Rocks."

4180. What is the name of it?—I do not recollect.

4181. Mr. Facey, what is his interest?—I think his interest is in right of his mother or aunt.

4182. Do you mean that his mother is the owner, or that he is the owner?—His mother, I believe.

4183. Of what is she the owner?—I do not know; I only know that the family have got slaves amongst them. I believe she has got a number of slaves in Jamaica. Many free persons live upon the wages or hire of slaves in Jamaica.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

4184. Is his mother a coloured person?—Yes; I think it is his mother who owns the slaves.

4185. Chairman.] Is not it the case that almost every family in Jamaica in easy circumstances has some apprenticed labourers as servants?—With scarcely an exception.

4186. Sir George Grey.] Has Mr. Finlayson the same interest?—I believe he takes an interest under his brother's will in slave property. I know there are slaves in the property which belongs to his brother's estate. I believe there are about 30 apprentices that are held under the will of his brother; I believe he is interested in that will; I believe he is an executor of it. I answer your questions as to these gentlemen being interested in slave property to the best of my knowledge, which in some cases of this sort is very limited.

4187-8. What is the interest of Mr. Alexander Gordon Fife in apprenticed labourers?—His aunts and sisters are very considerable holders of apprenticed labourers.

4189. Has he any himself?—I believe not.

4190. Mr. Cheney Hamilton, what is his interest?—He is in possession of some slaves, and I think he has got a small pen, but I am not quite sure.

4191. What is the nature of his interest, to the best of your knowledge?—To the best of my knowledge he is a proprietor of domestic slaves, and I think he has, in right of his wife, an interest in some agricultural apprentices; I know that they have the control of slave property. Until the Emancipation Act passed, the distinction between domestic slaves and field labourers did not exist, because a domestic slave frequently laboured in the field.

4192. What is Mr. Harris's interest?—The whole family have got slaves.

4193. Was he one of the magistrates who held the commission when you were in Jamaica?—I am not sure.

4194. What is the nature of Mr. Harris's personal interest?—I do not know particularly.

4195. Do you know whether he has any beyond that of the members of his family having an interest?—I know there were a considerable number of slaves belonging to the Harrises, if it is the Mr. Harris that I mean.

4196. But you do not know whether, if he be a member of that family, he has himself any personal interest in apprenticed labourers?—If he is a member of that family, I should think he had, because I understand that they all have.

4197. Do you know whether he is a junior branch or an elder branch of the family, or what his pursuits have been?—I have stated that he might have been appointed subsequently to my leaving the island.

4198. Upon what do you found your belief that he is personally interested in apprenticed labour?—I knew a Mr. James Harris, who, to the best of my recollection, was clerk of the peace of the parish of St. Mary's.

4199. Was that Mr. James Harris a member of the family of which you have been speaking?—I always understood that he was.

4200. Had that Mr. Harris a personal interest in apprenticed labourers?—I always understood that he had.

4201. In apprenticed labour of what kind?—As I mentioned before, the distinction did not exist before the apprenticeship, and I do not know how the slaves are now classed as apprentices.

4202. Do you know whether this Mr. Harris is the individual you refer to, except from the similarity of the name?—No, I have no other reasons whatever.

4203. What is Mr. Hawkins's interest?—The gentleman I mean is a lieutenant in the navy; he has some interest, I have understood, in some slaves which he holds by right of his wife, but of this I am not sure.

4204. His wife possessed some domestic apprentices?—I have seen some domestic apprentices in his house, and I understood they were his wife's property.

4205. Mr. Hewitt?—He is interested in the Cumberland estate; I think it is in the parish of St. Ann's, or Clarendon; he takes an interest under the will of Mr. William Hewitt his father.

4206. Do you mean that he is a part owner in any estate?—I do not know the particular interest he has, but I know that he is interested with his brothers in a considerable slave property belonging to the family.

4207. Do you mean that he is a legatee under his father's will?—I do not know; I only know that there is an estate called Cumberland held among the family.

19 July 1836.

4208. But you do not know whether he has any interest in that estate beyond that of taking an interest under his father's will?—I understood that when the mortgages of the estate were paid off it would belong to him.

4209. What was to become of the other brothers interested with him?—I understood that he was the eldest son.

4210. Did not you say that under the will he and his brothers were equally interested?—I said, I think, at all events I meant to say, the family generally, his sisters and brothers-in-law. I do not know whether he has any brothers.

4211. How long has the father been dead?—The father died from two to three years ago.

4212. What is Mr. Price's interest?—I believe he has a small interest in slaves.

4212*. Do you mean to say he has an interest now in apprentices?—He has, indirectly.

4213. Domestic apprentices or field apprentices?—I believe they are now domestic apprentices, but that they did formerly work in the field.

4214. Mr. Ramsay, what is his interest?—In the same sort of way; he is a creole of a West Indian family; there are a considerable number of slaves amongst the family; amongst his brothers and sisters; there are some plantations in which they have an interest; I have understood and I believe he has an interest in slaves, his own property or his wife's.

4215. You mean that he has connexions in the island who have an interest in apprenticed labourers?—Yes, I think he is interested in Tremolesworth estate, in the parish of St. Mary's; I believe there was a suit pending in the Court of Chancery about the estate, and I understood from Mr. William Ramsay, his father, that he was a party to it. I believe he has domestic slaves, and the whole of his connexions have domestic slaves in that parish in which he is a magistrate.

4216. Mr. Sooley, what is his interest?—No further than I see in the list of compensation claims, that he is interested in right of his wife.

4217. Was he a special magistrate when you were in Jamaica?—He was.

4218. What is the amount of the compensation claim put in by his wife?—Very small, two or three negroes, I think.

4219. Domestic negroes?—I suppose they were.

4220. Mr. Woolfris, what is his interest?—I believe he has only a few domestic servants; I am not sure.

4221. Did you take apprentices yourself during the period you staid there, after the expiration of slavery?—At the time of the abolition I had only one apprentice in my possession; I purchased her for the purpose of getting her her freedom; I was never in the general habit of using apprentices; I did not choose to come within the control of the special magistrates, and I generally employed freemen.

4222. Mr. Gladstone.] Had you previously, during the existence of slavery, been in the possession of slaves?—None but those which I manumised; I bought and freed four.

4223. And all those you manumised?—I did.

4224. Mr. Buxton.] Do you consider that there being fourteen of the magistrates who were more or less connected with apprentice property is consistent with the pledge made to us on the 14th of May 1833, by Mr. Stanley, which runs in these words: "It might be necessary to distribute through the chartered colonies what already existed in the Crown colonies, namely, stipendiary magistrates appointed by the Crown, unconnected with local interests, uninfluenced by the local assemblies, free from local passions and prejudices." Do you consider that that pledge has been fulfilled, when we have fourteen magistrates in Jamaica who are more or less connected with apprenticed property?—With the exception of two names, I do not believe there was a single man whose mind was not entirely warped by the reverse of the principle stated in that observation of Mr. Stanley's.

4225. Do you consider that the pledge given us, which is called by Mr. Stanley, in another place, the keystone of the whole, namely, that the magistrates appointed should be totally unconnected with colonial property and with local prejudices, has been verified?—Decidedly not.

4226. Mr. Gladstone.] You said that you considered that there were two of those fourteen who were not under the influence of prejudice unfavourable to the negro; do you conceive that that pledge has been violated in respect of those two as well as in respect of the other twelve, or do you think that the appointment of those two was allowable?—It is a happy accident.

4227. Do

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

4227. Do you think that the appointment of those two was allowable in point of principle?—No; because it is only a happy accident that they turned out well.

4228. Does it appear to you, upon a general review of the whole of the cases, that there is any one among those fourteen magistrates who holds in his own person an interest in the labour of prædial apprentices, except Mr. Hewitt?—I cannot exactly say; because, as I mentioned before, as the distinction prædial and non-prædial was only created by the Emancipation Act, I do not know how they would enter them in the compensation claim; they would enter them accordingly as they could get most for them.

4229. The question is not as to the prospective, but as to the retrospective; whether you consider that any of them have a direct interest in apprentices employed in agricultural labour, with the exception of Mr. Hewitt?—I think it is very probable that Mr. Cooper has; and I think it is certain that Mr. Cooper does hold an interest in prædial apprentices; but he was one of the two exceptions I was going to make.

4230. Have Mr. Cooper and Mr. Hewitt, to your own knowledge, any interest in their own persons in apprentices raising agricultural produce?—For the reasons I have before given, I believe they have.

4231. Would you say that you knew it by way of common notoriety?—Yes.

4233. Mr. Buxton.] If many of those persons do not hold a direct interest in prædial apprentices, can they yet be said to be totally unconnected with local interest, uninfluenced by the local assemblies, and free from local passions and prejudices?—Certainly not; on the contrary, I believe that many of those persons who have not a direct interest were much more influenced by local prejudices than many proprietors would have been that had a direct interest.

4233. Sir James Graham.] What is your reason for that opinion?—Most of the persons that hold an indirect interest have been bred up in the colony, and have all the prejudices of it in them; they look upon the blacks as an inferior order of beings; they were, generally speaking, educated to despise slaves as degraded beings. Most persons who have this indirect interest have been accustomed to look upon the blacks as mere creatures of their pleasure, to work as they pleased, and the women to be the objects of their lust. But a great number of the proprietors, on the other hand, having a direct interest, have been educated in this country, and have a different kind of feeling, and when they come to the island of Jamaica they generally have the opinion that the blacks are of the same species as themselves.

4234. Chairman.] Do you conceive that it would have been possible for the Governor to have found in the island of Jamaica a sufficient number of persons to be selected for special magistrates who were wholly unconnected with property in apprenticed labourers?—Wholly impossible.

4235. Sir James Graham.] Then the alternative was, either to select such persons as have been selected in the island, or to send the whole body from this country?—No; they might have made a much more judicious selection than was made.

4236. That relates to the character of the person, and not to the circumstances of the person?—I mean as to character.

4237. Then the observation is confined to individual character, and not to circumstances?—Yes, for this reason, that it was matter of extreme surprise in the colony when some of those appointments were made, because it was the opinion of every reasoning person that heard of them, that many of the appointments so made were outrageously absurd. There was one special magistrate, a discharged wharfinger, discharged under unpleasant circumstances, and another was a young man, a merchant's clerk, discharged also under unpleasant circumstances; another was a person who had been a merchant's clerk, and bore an extremely bad moral reputation.

4238. Laying aside for a moment the moral character of the individuals chosen, if the Government had resolved not to select any persons for those appointments who were not free from local influences, they must have sent them from this country?—Certainly.

4239. Sir George Grey.] Could you name those three gentlemen, if it were required?—At this instant I can.

4240. Sir James Graham.] Except in the passage-money, is there any pecuniary saving to the British Government in selecting the special magistrates from men educated and resident in Jamaica, rather than sending the special magistrates from England

England to the colony?—Except in the difference of the passage-money, I have understood and I believe not.

4241. The feelings of the individuals, with respect to the apprentices, you think would be very different in the one case from what they would be in the other?—If the man sent from this country was a man of sufficient strength of mind not to be contaminated by the planter-like feeling which most men would adopt, he would continue to administer justice, but if he imbibed the sympathies of the planters, of course there would be very little difference between him and the colony-made magistrate.

4242. You have drawn a distinction, in a former part of your evidence, between the feeling of the proprietors even of slave property, not constantly resident, and the feeling of the managers of that property who are constantly resident?—If you send out from this country individuals well educated and high-minded, they would try to administer justice fairly; but that, in general, is not the class of men sent out as special magistrates from this country. I find them in general to be half-pay officers in the army or navy, men accustomed to see flogging, and who are, for the first time in their life (except when they have been sitting in courts martial) called upon to administer this dictatorial law, which invests them with something like absolute power.

4243. You are disposed to quarrel almost as much with the selections made here as with those in Jamaica?—No; I look upon the system as evil either way, but some of the selections have been exceedingly happy. I believe the selection of Mr. Hill and Major Norcutt and Mr. M'Cleod were very good.

4244. Your observation of a lucky accident applies to the selection here almost as much as to the selection there?—It necessarily must do so.

4245. Sir George Grey.] You have mentioned three magistrates as exceptions, Mr. Hill and Major Norcutt and Mr. M'Cleod; are you aware that Mr. Hill and Major Norcutt have long been resident in Jamaica, and were selected by the Governor from among the Jamaica population?—Mr. Hill had not been long resident in Jamaica.

4246. Had he been resident in Jamaica before the apprenticeship came into operation?—I understood that Mr. Hill had a special commission from the Secretary of State here; but Mr. Hill was very well known to have imbibed no portion of colonial feeling.

4247. Was he a man of colour?—He was.

4248. Was Major Norcutt resident in Jamaica before he was appointed a magistrate?—I do not remember.

4249. Sir James Graham.] You have stated your objection to the selections made upon the spot, and to the selections made here; where, in your opinion, could individuals be found that would discharge those duties satisfactorily?—I do not think they could be found, and therefore, as I said at first, it amounts to this, that the apprenticeship never could work advantageously to the slave.

4250. Then your objection is to the system adopted, and not to the mode in which it is worked?—If you can get a set of angels for the purpose of administering the law, they might possibly do it; but in Jamaica there is every temptation for men to violate duty. If you send out a young man, he goes to a country where he finds that the blacks have been looked upon as an inferior race, where concubinage exists to an unlimited extent, where the black men are despised and the black women looked on as the natural prey of the coarsest lust, and it is extremely likely that he will fall into the habits of those with whom he is constantly associating. The special magistrates have in many, indeed in most instances, no other associates but the managers of plantations, over whom they are called to adjudicate.

4251. For the reasons you have just assigned, with the utmost care and the best intentions of the Government, dealing with human beings, they could not, you think, have placed persons in authority who would have done better than those that were chosen?—I do not think that, with the narrowness of the income of the magistrates, the Government could very well have got persons of a different character to have gone out and taken the office.

4252. Sir George Grey.] What is the income?—I believe it amounts to from 400*l.* to 500*l.* sterling.

4253. Does a half-pay officer retain his pay with it?—I think he does. Now 450*l.* sterling, the stipend, I believe, in Jamaica, will not put a special magistrate upon the footing of an overseer or manager, because, although a manager's stipend is

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

is not more than 200*l.* currency, that is, about 120*l.* sterling a year, yet living upon the proprietor's property, with a variety of advantages, he in point of fact lives at the rate of 1000*l.* a year. He keeps several horses, he probably keeps a cabriolet, has an excellent table, and, in all respects, his style of living is infinitely superior to that of the magistrate, whom he can patronize or not, and receive into or exclude from society, according to the manner in which he upholds the rights of the planters, to use the language of those gentlemen.

4254. Is all that at the expense of the proprietor?—The carriage he buys himself, but the horses are kept at the expense of the estate.

4255. As a general rule, are the horses the property of the overseer or manager, or of the absent proprietor?—As a general rule, the horses are the property of the overseer or manager himself.

4256. Are you not aware of the fact, that vacancies frequently occur among the stipendiary magistrates?—I believe so.

4257. Are you aware that it is necessary, upon a vacancy occurring, to fill up the appointment upon the spot, provisionally at least?—Certainly, or there would be no jurisdiction at all, as the local magistrates have no power.

4258. Does not that render it necessary for the Governor, in many instances, to make a selection from the materials he has got?—Certainly; but still I think he might make much better selections.

4259. Is it necessary that some appointments should be made among gentlemen resident upon the spot?—Certainly.

4260. Are you aware that several gentlemen have been sent out at the suggestion of Lord Sligo, as expectants, in order that he may have materials for making a selection for those occasional vacancies, without being driven to the necessity of appointing gentlemen who have been long resident in the colony?—I have heard so.

4262. Are not all your objections concentrated in your dislike of the system of apprenticeship?—No; it is true that I never thought the system would work; I have had 30 years' experience of the negroes; they have been my playfellows in my childhood; and I have known them familiarly till I left Jamaica; I never thought that the system would work well, but I was a very attentive observer of it, and I went through the island to see how it was working, and it appeared to me, that in many instances the special magistrates had identified themselves, to a great degree, with the planters.

4263. With your experience, since the passing of the Act, do you think that it would have been a better and a safer thing at once to have emancipated than to have adopted the apprenticeship system?—I should not have felt the slightest apprehension, nor was there any apprehension in the colony, for, as I mentioned before, the bulk of the Legislature was very desirous to emancipate, and it was only from the representation made by the authority of Lord Mulgrave, by one of the officers of Government, who had a seat in the House of Assembly, that the British Government was unfavourable to entire emancipation, that the apprenticeship was adopted.

4264. Mr. Buxton.] What was the date of that newspaper containing a list of the magistrates?—May the 11th, of the present year. Every day, in consequence of the existence of the apprenticeship, up to the time that I left the island, instead of the feeling of ascerbity between the negroes and the managers decreasing, it was very much upon the increase, and I believe, at the expiration of the apprenticeship, there will be more violent animosity between the managers and apprentices than there had been before the 1st of August 1834.

4265. Do you think that, even though that should be true with regard to the state of feeling, yet that a habit of working for wages will have been acquired by the intermediate state, or do you think that the unwillingness to work for wages would have been as great if no apprenticeship bill had been passed, as it will be when the period of apprenticeship ceases?—I know no instance in which an attempt attempt has been made to induce negroes accustomed to labour to work for wages in a state of slavery or freedom in which it has failed. I hold a letter in my hand from a gentleman in Jamaica, who thinks very differently upon the subject of slavery from what I do; it is dated the 11th of March in the present year; he says, "One hundred apprentices were made free on Scarlett's property, St. Ann's, last week, the owner having omitted to register them in 1832; they have agreed to work four days each week for their grounds and allowances; this is the first instance." That is as my correspondent believes.

4266. That is without any greater remuneration than heretofore, as slaves, they had received?—Yes, that is to say, they took the cottage in which they had resided, the garden attached to it, and 10 or 12 acres of provision-ground as the wages of four days' labour.

4267. Is the period of weekly labour diminished materially in this case?—It is probable that they have agreed to work nine or ten hours during the four days, but my correspondent does not state that particular.

4268. That would be a diminution of about one-sixth of the apprenticed labour?—I have had a great deal of intercourse with negroes, and I find, in general, that they are very ready to work for the proprietor for the original allowances and grounds, provided they gave them the extra day, the Friday; all they required was the Friday and Saturday to cultivate their own grounds, along of course with the Sunday.

4270. Sir George Grey.] By whom were they told so?—In all the proclamations; the proclamation published by Lord Mulgrave contains the words that they would be free, and in his lordship's personal addresses to them throughout the country the same thing is stated. They considered that they had been swindled out of their freedom by the white inhabitants, and I think that, acting upon that feeling, and having no confidence in the local Assembly, nor any of the representatives of the proprietors there, that upon an entire emancipation taking place, a much greater number will leave the properties and go into the lands of the interior, and become squatters, than would have done so had the apprenticeship system never existed, but still I do not think any great number will do this, for this reason, the negroes have a peculiar attachment to the place where they have been brought up, and where the graves of their ancestors are, and I am satisfied that if they were free to-morrow, the great bulk of the negroes would remain on the property, and continue to work for reasonable wages, as in the case of Scarlett's Mountain.

4271. You have spoken of the feelings of the apprenticed population; are you conversant with the feelings of the resident proprietors?—Yes, but there are very few resident proprietors.

4272. Or of the agents and managers?—In a great degree, in many instances there is a feeling of exasperation on their part.

4273. Have not the proprietors and managers a deep interest that, when the period of apprenticeship expires, the negro population should work for wages?—The proprietors would have, but I do not see that the managers have; the managers in general have but a slight interest in the question; the manager is no further interested in the question than he is in the salary he receives.

4275. Have they not as deep an interest as any by-stander in this question, that when the period of apprenticeship expires, working for wages should be general?—The situation of an overseer is one that is very transitory; there are some few that remain many years upon an estate, but not generally. If freedom were established many plantations would be cultivated entirely under the direction of black managers, at a very cheap rate, and this the white managers very well understand.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

4276. Supposing they had a deep interest in the success of free labour at the expiration of the apprenticeship, do they partake in your view, that it would be expedient, in the hope of obtaining this end, to shorten the apprenticeship?—I believe the opinion of a great portion of the proprietors and managers is, at this moment, decidedly in favour of the apprenticeship.

4277. And of continuing it to the term fixed by the Act?—Yes.

4278. They differ from you in opinion, as to the probable effect of a growing indisposition to work for wages?—Possibly they have changed their opinions since 1834; but the fact is, they depend very much upon carrying on the system of apprenticeship long after it has ceased to exist by the existing law, and they contemplate doing this covertly by means of local regulations; for instance, there was a Vagrant Act passed in the year 1834, along with a number of other Acts. The real object of those Acts was very different from what appears upon the face of them; the object, as appears upon the face of them, would be to repress vagabondage, but that was not the intention; the real object was to give coercive power to the local magistracy over the apprentice; for instance, the British Act of Parliament declares, that any colonial Act which contains any clauses affecting the provisions of the British statute shall be void, but any subsequent statutes which do not refer merely to slaves by name, but comprised all classes of the people, but would practically only affect the apprentices, would be in force against them, so that under this Bill, to a very great degree, the negroes are put in the same situation by that vagrant law, in which the poor were placed in England under the English statute which passed in the reign of Edward the Sixth, for making slaves of the poor.

4279. Sir George Grey.] Is that Vagrant Act in force?—It was in force when I was in the island of Jamaica.

4280. Has it been disallowed or not?—I do not know.

4281. Do you believe that that Vagrant Act is now in force; or have you ever heard that it has been disallowed?—Until this instant I thought it was in force.

4282. Mr. Buxton.] You do not happen to know the period at which it was disallowed?—I do not; to the best of my belief it was in force up to the time of my leaving the island; but when the colonial Assembly have made a law and it has received the Governor's assent, it continues in force until it is expressly disallowed, and practically it would exist long afterwards.

4283. Chairman.] Did that Vagrant Act receive the Governor's assent?—Yes.

4284. Mr. Buxton.] Do you happen to know that that Vagrant Act was disallowed the day after the appointment of this Committee?—I do not.

4285. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of the forms attendant upon the disallowance of an Act?—Yes.

4286. Are you aware that it must be by an Order in Council?—I am aware that it takes some time for the adjustment of preliminaries before the disallowance can take place; the Police Act is as bad as the vagrant law.

4287. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe that the object of passing these police regulations and this vagrant law was for the purpose of continuing a modified system of slavery after the expiration of the apprenticeship?—It was decidedly for that object; many of the members of the House of Assembly declared it was for the purpose of continuing as much of slavery as they could.

4288. Sir George Grey.] Has not the disallowance of that Act put an entire check upon the effectual attainment of the object subsequently to the apprenticeship?—Certainly; the disallowance of that Act would be very advantageous, as far as that Act was concerned, but there are several others.

4289. Mr. Gladstone.] Was that Act enacted as a permanent law, or with a clause enacting that it should terminate with the period of apprenticeship?—I am not aware, but if once that Act remained two years upon the statute-book of the island it would have been revived and made permanent.

4290. Could it have been revived without the sanction of the British Government?—It would have been revived by annual Bills, possibly, and it would have continued as a matter of course till it was disallowed.

4291. Does not that disallowance occur generally within the lapse of a few months?—No, there is no reason why it should; there have been some extraordinary Acts passed in the island of Jamaica which were never disallowed. For instance, there is the Constructive Treason Act, passed in the year 1823 for a limited period, but it has been continued in the way in which I speak of, very silently but very effectually; it is passed triennially or annually. It is an Act under which persons may be hanged for treason for words spoken. This Act, the Acts continuing it from year to year, and various other similar Acts, such as the Rebellion Act, are in force as laws, though never specifically allowed. In the words of the Colonial Office, they have been left to their own operation.

4292. You are not aware whether this Vagrant Act did or did not contain a clause causing it to terminate with the apprenticeship?—I never referred to that fact. I knew the object with which it was framed, and it was intended to be made perpetual by direct or indirect means.

4293. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated your conviction that the object of the colonial Assembly in passing that Act was to introduce a modified system of slavery; do you think that if that system had been introduced the negroes would have ever obtained the true enjoyment of liberty?—Never.

4294. Do you think that the point which of all others deserves most carefully to be watched is the prevention of any Act which shall at all interfere with the liberty of the negro at the expiration of the apprenticeship?—If the apprenticeship expired, the negro would then have the same right of voting and all the same immunities that freemen now have, and I think in that case they would very well protect themselves. I think there would then be the control of a salutary public opinion, which at present does not exist.

4295. Do you think there will be a hard struggle on the part of the planters to introduce some system which should interfere with the liberty of the negro at the expiration of the apprenticeship?—The planters will not leave an act in which they will not try to do it, and they will succeed in almost every instance.

4296. Sir George Grey.] Do you think it important to check permanent legislation now by the colonial Assembly, at a period when the negroes as a body do not possess the elective franchise, and are not practically represented in the House of Assembly?—Decidedly.

4297. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you think that the constitution of the colonial Assembly, under the existing law of Jamaica, would secure the rights of the negroes after the expiration of the apprenticeship?—I think it would.

4298. Do you think that justice will be satisfactorily administered by the local magistracy after the termination of the apprenticeship?—I think it would.

4299. And by the courts as at present constituted?—In all questions excepting those in which slavery is directly interested, the juries are extremely good, and justice is very fairly administered by the common law courts, as between free persons; and I believe that when the apprenticeship is abolished, or, at the very most, a year or two afterwards, as the elective franchise will be exercised by a very large number of persons (for the slave would instantly become proprietor of land, and the qualification is extremely low, in fact, it amounts in towns to something very like universal suffrage), they would have ample opportunity of protecting themselves; and besides, a great number of the head men upon plantations are very talented persons, though many are not able to read and write; and I think that when the apprenticeship is abolished they will take sufficient care of themselves; and there would be the control of a great public opinion, which, instead of being directed, as now, entirely to the defence of slavery, would be directed to the maintenance of civil rights. I have no fear of the negroes protecting themselves if they are made free, if the colonial Legislature is not allowed to interfere by any laws which may apparently affect only free persons, but which are meant to affect the slaves particularly. This experiment of the colonial Assemblies, the Colonial Office, with the greatest anxiety to do justice, cannot always discover nor obviate; for instance, the clause the Jamaica Assembly introduced into the Police Act; there was no man that had not resided in the island of Jamaica that could know the real object of it. It was one by which, upon a list of runaways being sent in to a police station, it was to act as a general warrant to apprehend all persons named in that list; and the consequence was, that proprietors, especially those in the local commission of the peace, ordered the policemen to arrest apprentices, take them away from the control of the stipendiary magistrates, and send them away to the property.

4299*. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that the courts of law, as at present constituted, and the local magistracy, will afford a sufficient protection to the negroes when the apprenticeship has expired, supposing these obnoxious laws are not in force?—I think so. I have no doubt of it.

4300. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think it possible that persons that are brought up with those prejudices against the negro can administer equal and impartial justice between white men and black men?—I think they would, for this reason, when Lord Mulgrave was Governor of the island he was in the habit of having at his table coloured persons, the consequence of which was, that that hatred which existed between the castes in a great degree was destroyed. Blacks and whites and coloured men sit upon the juries together, and upon public occasions they meet together; and I think that upon the abolition of slavery entirely an entirely new system would exist; many managers themselves would be blacks or brown persons, because they would be got much cheaper; and, practically, now many estates are managed by black or brown persons who are slaves.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

Esq.

4301. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that that feeling which exists on the part of the whites, of the great inferiority of the black population has diminished, and that it will be more considerably diminished when the apprenticeship expires?—Decidedly, for this reason, in the large towns, where the elective franchise is in a great degree in the hands of the blacks and the coloured persons, there is a much better state of feeling now existing than did before; the parties are necessary to each other, and being independent of physical control, have learned to respect each other, instead of the one despising and the other hating.

4302. Mr. Gladstone.] Supposing the apprenticeship to continue, do you think it would be desirable, for the benefit of the negroes, that the functions of the colonial Legislature should be altogether abrogated, so far as regards questions between master and apprentice?—I do; I do not think they ever frame an Act with relation to the apprentice in which they mean to act honestly.

4303. You do not think the security which is afforded by the power of the executive and of the Government at home is sufficient?—No, for the reason I have given; a clause may appear to persons that are not acquainted with local circumstances to be highly expedient, which may be extremely tyrannical.

4304. Ought not the executive Government in the colony to be aware of those local circumstances, having its own agents distributed through the country?—In many instances the object of those agents and functionaries is not to put the Governor in possession of those facts; and besides, the Governor is not generally a permanent resident, and so cannot form a correct judgment himself, and if he depends upon others he is sure to go wrong.

4305. Do you think, as a general rule, that the stipendiary magistrates through the country are disposed to conceal the real state of things from the Governor, or that they have generally friendly communication with the Governor, and that any instance of a contrary course is an exception?—I know that were any person, whether a stipendiary magistrate or not, to represent to the Governor the real state of things, he would be extremely unpopular. Most men will not like to undergo the invidiousness which necessarily attends doing anything which is considered destructive of what are called the rights of property in Jamaica.

4307. Is that the general opinion of the body of free persons in Jamaica?—Yes, particularly of proprietors and of the bulk of the militia, the black and coloured free persons. The principal objection would be from managers.

4308. Sir George Grey.] Then do you object to that part of the Emancipation Act passed by the Imperial Legislature, which left to the colonial Legislature the enactment of supplemental laws to carry out the principle laid down by the Imperial Legislature?—Certainly.

3309. Your objection is upon this ground, that the Government here has not the means of fully understanding the Acts passed by the colonial Legislature?—Yes.

4310. The clause in the imperial Act which devolves upon the colonial Legislature, to make supplemental laws to carry into effect the provisions of the statute, appears to you objectionable, and according to your view, the supplemental enactments ought to have been made here?—I should think they ought to have been, and there would have been no unwillingness in the colony that they should have been. When the compensation was mentioned in the colony, the value of the slaves had diminished almost to nothing. I have seen slaves for whom they would now require 100 dollars for their apprenticeship, sold at a public sale for 25 or 30 dollars; and this kind of property had so deteriorated, that when the compensation was given, this country might have made almost any terms they pleased.

4311. Is your objection now to the system adopted by the British Legislature in 1833, and not to the mode in which that system has been worked out since?—It is is to the Act as it stood in 1833, leaving that power in the colonial Assemblies ; it appears to me, that there has since been great care in looking over the laws passed by the colonial Assemblies.

4312. You think that the evil which you have pointed out is an evil almost necessarily flowing from leaving it to the colonial Legislature to enact those laws?—Decidedly so.

4313. Mr. Burton.] Were you a member of the House of Assembly?—I was.

4314. Did you propose the compulsory manumission bill and the abolition of female flogging?—I did, with the knowledge of the then Governor, Lord Belmore ; it was in November or December 1831, and subsequently in 1832.

4315. Did the circumstance of your proposing those two Acts expose you to considerable odium in the colony?—Extremely so ; I was the most popular man in the country, and I became very much the reverse, and was nearly ruined in consequence, and ultimately obliged to quit the island of Jamaica.

4316. Were you well aware when you left the colony what was the disposition and feeling of the members of the House of Assembly?—Yes ; and I think I never knew it more hostile towards the black population than it was at that period. Their unceasing object was to manage to frame the laws with that adroitness, that they might re-enact as much as possible of the ancient system of slavery under a new name, and that they made very little secret about.

4317. Do you conceive that we ought, upon this side of the water, to view with great jealousy and distrust any enactments that proceed from the colonial Assemblies?—Certainly.

4318. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware whether the colonial Assembly view with considerable jealousy enactments proceeding from this side of the water?—Excessively so ; in fact, in the colonies, they disregard the statutes of the Imperial Parliament. I will mention a particular instance of it. Even the special magistrates are frequently not aware of the very existence of the British statute professing to abolish slavery. There was a valuation of a negress in Kingston, in April 1835 : they were valuing this negress under a colonial Act, by which they put a valuation of 120 dollars upon the freedom of that negress, who, if she had been sold would not have brought 20 dollars ; and they came to the valuation in rather a curious way. They referred to the colonial Act to justify them. The woman had requested me to attend for her ; and I suggested to the special magistrates, Dr. Chamberlain and Captain Connor, sitting as appraisers, with a local magistrate, called in as one of the appraisers under the Act, that they ought to refer to the British statute and not to the colonial Act ; and the special magistrates told me that that was the first time they were aware of the existence of the British statute.

4319. What clause of the British statute did you refer to?—A compulsory manumission is prescribed by the British statute, which requires a fair appraisement to be made ; but under the colonial Act they made a most unfair appraisement. They took the rate of value of the apprentice's wages for one week, and multiplied that by the number of weeks of the apprenticeship term unexpired, deducting one-third for contingencies, which included only clothing and the minimum price of medical aid, but making no allowance for sickness or for interest of money, or the risk of loss of life, or any of the deductions that would be made in a sale between parties.

4320. Was the second Act in Aid in force at that time?—I think it was.

4321. Did not that Act prescribe that there should be a deduction of one-third for contingencies?—Yes ; but the construction they gave it was this ; that by contingency you were to consider what the clothing of the slave would cost and medical attendance only. They took the utmost value of the negress's wages for a week ; they deducted from that the expense of clothing, and, I think, the medical bill, and then multiplied that by the number of weeks of the apprenticeship term ; but they made no allowance whatever for sickness, loss of life, for the interest of money from the whole amount being paid down. So that the practical effect was, that a negress whom any owner would willingly have sold for 30 dollars, was valued at about 120 dollars.

4322. Did you point out the particular clause of the imperial Act to which you conceived the Act of the colonial Legislature under which they acted was repugnant?—I did.

4323. Will you read the clause?—In the 8th clause it says, " That it shall be lawful for any such apprenticed labourer to purchase his or her discharge from such apprenticeship,

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

19 July 1836.

apprenticeship, even without the consent or in opposition, if necessary, to the will of the person or persons entitled to his or her services, upon payment to such person or persons of the appraised value of such services." It appeared to me that it was the spirit of the Act, especially being one in favour of liberty, that you should not require a larger sum for the freedom than would be required had she been sold to a third person; and that the words "appraised value" ought to be construed to mean honest, fairly appraised value.

4324. Does not that clause devolve upon the colonial Legislature the manner and form and conditions under which the appraisement shall be made?—Yes, but then this clause is controlled by another clause, which says, that nothing contrary to the British statute in a colonial Act shall be in force, but, ipso facto, void. Now, as the spirit of the British statute was that an honest appraised value should be put upon the slave, the colonial Act requiring a different appraisement was contrary to it, and therefore null and void.

4325. Did you point out to the magistrates that the transaction in which they had been concerned was against the law, for that the specific clauses of the colonial Act under which they acted were void, because repugnant to the imperial Act?—I referred them to the British statute, and the special magistrates said they were not aware of the existence of that clause of the British statute, nor were they aware that the statute existed at all; they said that they were acting under the colonial Act. When I again drew their attention to the British statute they said they should apply to the Attorney-General upon the subject, and they said they thought it an extremely hard case upon the woman, but that they considered themselves bound by the colonial Act; that the Colonial Office were better judges than themselves whether it ought to have passed, but as it was the law they would act upon it. The colonial Act says that the value shall be taken down, and from the value shall be deducted only one-fourth or one-third for contingencies.

4326. That Act to which you refer is the second Act in Aid which has since been disallowed?—I think so, but I have understood the practice is still in force, that they follow the form prescribed by the Act, which has been disallowed.

4327. Sir James Graham.] Does that formula of appraisement which you have described under the colonial law remain?—I have understood it to be still used.

4328. You understand that they still deduct one-third for contingencies, though those contingencies do not include what you think they ought to do?—I do; in other words, they make an apprentice pay from twice to three times as much for his freedom as they would sell it to another person for.

4329. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean that the labour of a field negress would be worth only 30 dollars?—This was not a field negress, but a very infirm person.

4330. Did the three magistrates concur in opinion?—No, Dr. Chamberlain did not; he said he thought the view I took of the question was right; Captain Connor said, as long as the colonial Act existed he must obey it; it appeared to him very clear in its words, though he regretted the necessity he was under of coming to that decision, and he agreed with the local magistrate.

4331. Sir James Graham.] Since this Act is now disallowed, how does it remain possible that this construction can be put?—There was a proverb in the island of Jamaica, that even the Acts of the island did not go beyond Stoney-hill, that is about seven or eight miles from Kingston, and in many instances having got into a habit of paying very little attention to the circumstance of an Act being disallowed, they still continue to act upon it.

4332. Mr. Buxton.] Here is a statement of a prædial apprentice, named George Davison, valued in March 1836 at 230*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*; do you conceive it possible that that valuation could have been fairly made?—No, I do not.

4333. Here is another, named Rosanna, for whom the sum of 92*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* was paid, do you consider that could have been fair?—Decidedly not.

4334. Here is another, named Robert Grandison, an apprentice, for 100*l.*, do you think that could have been a fair valuation?—It is not impossible it might be, if he was a man that had made himself eminently useful, which he might have done as a coppersmith, or as a first-rate cooper, carpenter or mason.

4335. Mr. Gladstone.] You do not think that any tradesman upon an estate could be worth 230*l.* currency?—No, for this reason, that they can get, for 25*l.* to 26*l.* per annum, a very good free tradesman with the allowances upon the estate.

4336. Were you cognizant of many cases of manumission?—Yes.

4337. Was it usual for two special magistrates and one local magistrate to constitute a court of appraisement?—They always did.

4338-9. Mr. Buxton.] Do not you think that it would be right that the negroes should appoint one person, and the proprietor or his agent appoint a second, and the Legislature appoint a third?—No; in that case I do not think it would be fairly done, because the negro necessarily must appoint a free person, and most persons in Jamaica are more or less interested in slave labour, and they have a leaning to make the valuation as high as they can.

4340. Sir George Grey.] Have you seen the mode prescribed in the Crown colonies?—I have not.

4341. Mr. Buxton.] If it would be unfair even if the negro should appoint one of the persons to act as appraiser, a fortiori is not it unfair under the present system?—Extremely unfair.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

Augustus Hardin Beaumont, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

4341-2. Chairman.] DO you wish to say anything in explanation of your last day's evidence?—With reference to a question which I was asked upon the last day, with regard to the number of special magistrates who have received pieces of plate, I wish to state some information I have obtained upon the subject. Amongst the special magistrates who have received presents of plate, are, besides Dr. White, Captain Dillon, who succeeded Dr. Madden, and Mr. Fitzgerald, son of the Knight of Kerry. This gentleman died before he received it, but the subscription to purchase it took place in his life time, and the plate, I believe, was subsequently presented to his widow. A similar present was recently made to a special magistrate in one of the midland districts, as I saw in the Jamaica newspapers. I think I am within the facts when I say, that six special magistrates have received such testimonials. It was intended to have given a similar present to Captain Connor; I cannot say if he got it. It is customary to make presents of plate and give votes of thanks to all special magistrates who please the planters. One of the subscribers to the piece of plate to Captain Dillon is now within the access of the Committee; his name is Mr. Delgado, and he resides at 13, Thrisbury Pavement. His opinions on these subjects are very different from mine, and I only mention his name to furnish the best evidence to the Committee.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

22 July 1836.

4343. Sir George Grey.] Are you able to refer the Committee to the documentary evidence from which your information has been derived, with regard to the magistrates to whom those presents of plate have been made?—With regard to the present of plate made to Mr. Dillon, one of the subscribers, as I have mentioned, is at present in London:

4344. With regard to the others, can you refer the Committee to the newspapers from which you have derived your information?—No; but one of the committee, who is a subscriber to the piece of plate to Mr. Fitzgerald, is also in London, and this evidence appears to me the best that could be obtained as to the fact.

4345. You have said that votes of thanks were frequently given to special magistrates who pleased the planters?—I only know the fact from the circumstance of seeing the votes of thanks as published, and repeatedly published in the Jamaica newspapers.

4346. Were you in the habit of reading the Jamaica papers while you were resident in Jamaica?—Constantly; I stated this before.

4347. Have you been in the habit of reading them since?—Generally; I get them almost every month.

4348. Papers of various political opinions?—Yes.

4349. Have you frequently seen in those papers articles complaining very much of the conduct of the stipendiary magistrates, and speaking of them as persons hostile to the interests of the planters?—In the pro-slavery papers certainly;

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.
22 July 1836.

tainly; I have read paragraphs praising some of the special magistrates, and deprecating the conduct of others. There is another explanation I wish to make. In my preceding statement I said, that in taking off the crop it was sometimes absolutely necessary for the negroes to work thirty-six hours continuously. I have prepared a statement of the manner in which the crop is taken off, and the disposal of the negroes, for the purpose of showing how the thirty-six hours must be exacted if the same quantity of sugar is still manufactured by manual labour, and without additional or improved machinery.

4350. Does that refer to any particular estate, or is it a general statement founded upon your general knowledge of the mode of taking the crop?—It refers to an estate upon which I was nearly two years; but it would apply equally to all other estates making a similar quantity of sugar. I have made the statement with respect to an estate of five hundred negroes, making from four hundred to five hundred hogsheads of sugar, and from two hundred to three hundred puncheons of rum.

4351. Will you read that statement?

[The Witness read the same, as follows:]

STATEMENT to show that in many cases continuous Labour for 36 to 38 hours is required in the Manufacture of Sugar on Jamaica Plantations. This Statement is calculated with reference to an Estate with 500 Negroes, making from 400 to 500 hogsheads of Sugar and from 200 to 300 puncheons of Rum.

The number of domestics has been gradually decreasing, and on some estates the establishment is not above one-half of what is here stated; in others I believe it to exceed the number here stated. Domestic servants, until the statute for emancipation was passed, occasionally worked in "the field," especially if they were not of a high caste in reference to complexion. The number of domestics is generally in proportion to the number of females of fair complexion on an estate, and who are rarely put to field labour in consequence of their approach to the aristocracy of complexion.

STATUS IN CROP.

The effectives are divided into two spells, who work alternate nights. The same boiler-men, stokers and mill feeders, and indeed all the best sugar manufacturers, are generally kept on permanent duty during the day, and are relieved alternate nights. The occasional or alternate night manufacturers on relieving the permanent manufacturers continue the work of the latter until relieved in the morning, and then the occasional manufacturer proceeds to field labour during the whole of the day ensuing the night in which he has been engaged in the manufacture.

If the number of hands permits, each spell divides itself into two, so as to rest alternately; the one part working and the others at rest, sleeping on the trash, which in such a climate is no hardship. But if there is a deficiency of hands, from sickness and absence, or a pressure of work from bad yielding of liquor from the canes, that subdivision of spells is impossible, as the whole spell is answerable soliduirement for the work, i. e. a syphon of liquor an hour, and from eight to nine skips of sugar for each set of coppers each night. Under the circumstances last mentioned the negroes do work 38 hours continuously, and I have known the suffering so intense, that young girls (dry trash carriers), who were otherwise anxious to preserve their chastity, have prostituted themselves to obtain a substitute for a few hours, when they have thrown themselves on the trash, overcome with sleep. The long continuance of work before-mentioned occurs more frequently on weak handed sugar estates, particularly those which have not more than 200 negroes.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

22 July 1836.

4352. Mr. Gladstone.] How much do you deduct for meals?—In keeping spell there was no time allowed for taking meals, they eat as they find opportunity; in the field work there was a deduction of half an hour for breakfast, and one hour and a half for dinner.

4353. Sir George Grey.] Does that statement relate to an estate with which you are personally conversant yourself, so as to enable you to speak with accuracy as to its correctness?—It does.

4354. You resided two years upon that estate; what years were those?—Eighteen hundred and nineteen to 1820, about that time.

4355. Does that statement refer to what took place during slavery, or are you able to state that that is the way in which the negroes have been worked since the apprenticeship commenced upon that estate?—I cannot say as to that particular estate what change has taken place; but I should consider that there has been very little alteration; for from the quantity of labour which I know is necessary to take off a heavy crop, I am satisfied that, unless that practice were persisted in, they could not effect that object. A certain number of skips of sugar must be made, and to do it with less labour is impossible, as there is in general no improvement in machinery or otherwise.

4356. Is your information with respect to the manner in which that estate is worked now a mere matter of inference from what you have now stated, or are you able to inform the Committee that you yourself have seen the mode in which the crop is taken off that estate since the apprenticeship?—I have not seen the mode in which the crop is taken off on that estate since the apprenticeship, but if the crop has not fallen off very greatly, there can be no great diminution in the labour. The British statute coming into effect August 1834 could make no difference in the quantity of labour necessary for a particular purpose.

4357. How many hours in the week were the effective negroes worked upon the estate in the period of 1819 and 1820?—It was reckoned by no means a severe estate, and they worked at that time out of crop from about four in the morning till eight at night, with the intermission of half an hour for their breakfast, and an hour and a half for their dinner; the law said two hours, but I never knew it the practice to give more than one hour and a half.

4358. How many days a week did they work?—In crop time they worked six days and a part of the Sunday; for though there was an express law that the mill should not be put about after a certain hour upon the Saturday night, yet long subsequent to that law and up to the passing of the Emancipation Act, the fact was, that the sugar manufacture was carried on during a considerable part of the Sunday, I believe all over the island, certainly in many parts of it; I see no reason why the same practice should not exist now.

4359. Did they work six days in the week and part of the seventh at the period to which you refer, in crop time?—They did.

4360. Did they receive wages at any time there for any work which they performed?—They did not receive wages, but for extra time that they worked upon Sundays an account was kept, and it was returned to them out of crop.

4361. What proportion did the extra time bear to the whole period that they worked?—The only extra time taken into calculation would be when they were required to work during the whole of Sunday, which was occasionally necessary for cleaning coppers, repairing the mill, &c.

4362. What extra time would be allowed in a case in which the negroes worked six days in the week, and only part of the Sunday?—They would receive after the crop a certain number of continuous Saturdays; it was understood that the negro was only entitled to every other Saturday; it was the custom that they should have 26 Saturdays, and if the planters took the continuous Saturdays during the crop, they gave them an equal number of continuous Saturdays after the crop.

4363. Then for the five days in the week and part of the Sunday no extra time was considered to be included in that calculation?—No; if they worked in crop only a part of the Sunday, no return was made for it by wages or time.

4364. Do you mean to say that, under the apprenticeship upon that estate, the negroes have worked there for five days in the week and part of the sixth without receiving any remuneration at all?—I should think, taking the statement, that they have been working for what are called wages, but which are such such minimum as not to merit the term; and looking at the alleged fact, on the other hand, that there has not been any considerable falling off of the crop, that they must have been working a much greater number of hours than is supposed. The Committee will observe, that if any stranger went upon an estate, he would find extreme difficulty in ascertaining the details, because it would be thought very impertinent on his part to attempt to inquire into them; and the only mode in which one can approximate to the truth, is to take the fact of the crop not having fallen off; and, considering the time it requires to manufacture it, calculate what change is likely to have taken place, or could possibly have occurred.

4365. Are you able to state, from your own personal observation or from any certain knowledge, that the negroes, since the apprenticeship, have been worked upon that estate without wages for the same number of hours that they were worked before without wages?—I do not mean to make that estate any particular exception, because I believe it is as humanely managed as any other, I only state the quantity of time necessary to take off the crop; and I believe that pretty nearly the same practice must exist upon all the estates in the island at the present moment.

4366. You think that is only an illustration of the general system, and that the same practice is going on at present upon other estates upon the island which have about the same number of hands?—I should think there can be but very little difference; if a certain quantity of time or labour is necessary to manufacture a given quantity of sugar, and that given quantity still continues to be manufactured, then the same quantity of labour or time must be exacted in some way or other.

4367. Do you know more about this estate than about other estates since the apprenticeship has come into operation?—No, there are some other estates which I know much better; for instance, I know Witney estate in Clarendon. I know that the negroes themselves in general are impressed with the propriety of the crop being taken off, and that they do not hesitate to make very considerable sacrifices, that it should be taken off before the rain-season commences.

4368. Do they give their labour under any compulsory process beyond the forty-five hours a week, or do they make bargains with their employers for wages for the extra time?—I think that in the arrangements that have been made by the negroes for the hire of their extra time, they have been persuaded to dispose of a much greater portion of it than is consistent with their own well-being; and that they have disposed of it at an infinitely less sum than that labour is worth; and considering, as I stated before, the character of the special magistrates who act as the judges to determine whether the bargain is a fair one or not, I am fully impressed with the conviction that in many instances the bargains that have been made are fraudulent.

4369. Chairman.] Are those contracts that have been made between the negro and the planter for any long space of time?—They are generally made, I believe, for twelve months, however the mode in which they may be made is pointed out in one of the clauses of the British Abolition Act; the majority of the slaves bind the minority, and the special magistrates may ratify an agreement made between the proprietor or manager, and the majority of the slaves; and that agreement then, whatever it may be, becomes binding upon both parties.

4370. Does not it appear to you that, although at first the negroes may have been deceived as to the real value of their labour, they will soon become informed of what is the real value, and will not fail to insist upon obtaining it?—It does not appear to me that they have any means of obtaining that information. In the first place, from whom could they possibly get it? The negroes living about the towns can get it, but those living in the country where there is very little facility of communication amongst the inhabitants, except by persons travelling upon foot, who, being negroes, do not know the fact, and by gentlemen travelling about the country in their carriages, who very seldom do communicate any thing to the slaves. The negroes have very few means of information.

4371. Are they not generally acute and intelligent in money matters?—Very much so.

4372. Sir George Grey.] Are you to be understood to state, that the negroes give their extra time for inadequate wages, in your opinion, owing to the negroes not being well informed as to the real value of their own labour?—I think so; and

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

and because the proprietor of an estate has in effect a monopoly of the labour of the negroes on it.

4373. Mr. Gladstone.] You say that the negroes have little means of communication; are they not in the habit of seeing the negroes on task gangs, and have not they the means of ascertaining from them the wages received for their labour; and are not they in the constant habit of resorting to the towns for the purpose of marketing; and does not this afford them the means of knowing the value of their labour?—I should think not; the special magistrate has made a certain agreement for them with the manager, by which they are to get a certain minimum for their wages; negroes on other estates have been persuaded to make similar arrangements; and though they are very acute in making a bargain in matters which they understand, yet in these new arrangements of disposing of two or three hours of their labour in a day, it does not appear to me that they have at present sufficient information to make the bargain.

4374. The question is, whether there are not means of communication among the negroes, and through the community generally, sufficient to enable the negroes to know pretty well what the value of labour in the market would be at any particular time?—No, for this reason, that there is no competition of labour; the question is put as if labour was a commodity in the market, and the negroes might communicate with one another to know the value of that commodity; but this is not the case; the negro must either sell his time to the manager or proprietor of the estate, or not to any one else; there is a monopoly on the part of the proprietor, for if the negroes cannot work for him, they can work for no one else in the extra time; and the manager, by fixing the manner in which the time or labour given the proprietor by the Act shall be spread over the week, can compel the negro to sell the extra time for any sum the proprietor pleases; were the negro even able to offer the extra labour or extra time of any day to any one but the proprietor of the estate where he lives, the whole of that extra time would be spent in going from the estate where he is domiciled to that on which he is to work. The proprietor has in fact a monopoly of the extra time, and that is one reason why the managers prefer to work out the time they can enforce by making the working day eight instead of nine hours.

4375. Supposing that allegation to be correct, does not that allegation go to show that there is not a free circulation of labour, and not that the defect lies in point of adequate knowledge on the part of the negro?—No, for if the negro were aware of the extreme value of his labour, he might insist, and in some instances I have no doubt very acute ones do insist upon a higher rate of wages; but I heard one gentleman say that the rate of wages was a penny or penny half-penny an hour; and that amount is in fact so small as to be a fraud.

4377. Sir George Grey.] Are not you aware that the practice has subsisted since the apprenticeship came into operation, and that the apprentices upon one estate, if they have not been able to make an arrangement with their owner, have in fact engaged their services for hire to the owners of other estates?—I heard of it in one or two instances, just before I left the country, and I heard the persons extremely ill spoken of for doing it. This could be done only where estates were uncommonly contiguous, and could not be a general rule.

4378. Mr. Buxton.] When slavery existed, was a distinction made between allowances and indulgences?—There was no other distinction between allowances and indulgences than this, that when the negroes were digging cane holes there was a certain quantity of sugar and rum allowed them, to make what they called beverage; that might be withheld, if the negroes did not work to the satisfaction of the manager; but the other allowances were quite matters of course, they were not indulgences.

4379. Do you know whether the negroes, in the bargains they have made with their masters, have assigned their extra time in consideration of the allowances to which they were accustomed when slavery existed?—In many instances they have.

4380. Sir George Grey.] On what estate?—I will mention one in particular, Knockaloe plantation, in Hanover. The overseer, Mr. Young, who had been in the employment of Mr. Miller, told me that it was the practice generally among the overseers to withhold the allowances from the negroes, that he thought it an extremely bad plan, that he had called them up, and observed, that he wished every thing to go on as it had done before; that they should receive the same allowances as they had done before; that the children under six years of age should not be compelled to quit the estate, nor be deprived of the allowances that had been usually given them, upon condition that the negroes would work during the five days, that is exclusive of Saturday and Sunday, in the same way as they had been in the practice of doing before, and he said that that arrangement had worked extremely well, and that he had no kind of difficulty whatever with them; he found them very reasonable. I understood afterwards it became very general amongst the negroes to sacrifice a considerable portion of their surplus time for those allowances.

4381. Do you believe that to any considerable extent the negroes have been either deprived of the customary allowances which they had during the state of slavery, or received them in exchange for their extra time?—I believe in the case of almost all estates, that there has been an understanding either expressed or implied, that if the allowances were given a certain portion of extra time was to be given in return by the negroes to the proprietors. I know that the planters, in a body, upon one occasion, took the opinion of a gentleman who had been Attorney-General, Mr. Batty, upon the subject, and also took the opinion of Mr. Watkis. Mr. Watkis's opinion was, that the negroes were entitled to all the allowances precisely as they had been anterior to the passing of the British statute.

4382. Mr. Gladstone.] Whether legal or customary?—I do not know the difference.

4383. Does not the whole question turn upon that difference?—No, because slavery never existed in the island of Jamaica by any law. There is not a single statute, either of Parliament or of the Jamaica Legislature which ever made slaves of his Majesty's black or coloured subjects born in the colony; it is only by customs which grew up in the colony. The allowances are a part of the custom, and the planters have no right to accept that part which is against the slave, and reject that portion of it which is in his favour.

4384. Did not the allowances exist by law?—A great portion of the allowances did not exist by law.

4385. Was Mr. Watkis's opinion that those allowances which had been given by custom only were as much the due of the apprentice as those which were given by specific enactment?—There was a law passed called the Consolidated Slave Act, which imposed certain penalties for not giving certain allowances; but it did not repeal or destroy that custom which co-existed with slavery of giving those allowances, it only enforced some of them by a penalty; slavery existed as a custom only. There is, I repeat, no law sanctioning slavery of British born subjects; it is only a custom which admitted the system, and along with this custom were those allowances. The Consolidated Slave Act imposes penalties for not giving certain allowances; but it does not say that other previous allowances given shall be withheld.

4386. Was it Mr. Watkis's opinion that the apprentice was entitled to all the allowances, of whatever kind, which he had received as a slave?—It was; that he was entitled to the possession of his cottage, to the ground attached to it, and to the provision grounds, and to be in every respect in the same situation with regard to his advantages as he was with regard to disadvantages. The British Legislature had made the statute creating the apprenticeship with reference to him in his existing condition, and that none of those advantages could be taken from him.

4387. Chairman.] Do you draw the distinction between his cottage and his garden, and what are properly called allowances?—Yes, but they were all equally his property.

4388. What do you mean by allowances?—His clothing, and some other necessities; there is a certain quantity of oatmeal, or something in lieu of it, given to women who have children, who have also a certain quantity of sugar; a certain number of herrings are given likewise every week to them, and they are entitled to medical attendance.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

4389. Did the negroes always draw the distinction between what you have now described as more properly called allowances and the tenure by which he held his cottage and his garden?—No, the negro considered he had a right of property in them all.

4390. But the allowances were sometimes suspended or withheld for misconduct?—I have known them withheld or suspended. Upon an estate, generally, if a theft had taken place, and it could not be found out who had perpetrated it, the manager frequently suspended the allowances of the estate till it was discovered.

4391. Do not you infer from that that the negro drew a distinction between those allowances and his house and garden?—No, I do not think so; the negroes generally thought it an act of oppression that they were compelled to suffer for the faults of others; but I do think, in a state of slavery they could not have carried on the estate without that power being vested in the managers, and it was not very often exercised.

4392. Do you believe that the negroes considered themselves agrieved generally by the allowances having been withheld in many cases since the passing of the Emancipation Act, unless they agreed to give some portion of their time for them?—I have heard them in general express themselves thoroughly angry about it.

4393. Have not you stated to the Committee that on those estates where a reasonable arrangement was made in that respect it seemed to give satisfaction to the negroes?—I will not say a reasonable arrangement; I know that the negroes, in order to preserve their allowances, in very many instances have given up a certain portion of their time; for instance, in the case I mentioned yesterday of Scarlet's Mountain, where 100 negroes, who had been made free for not being properly registered, gave up four days in the week in consideration of the allowances; but then it was in consideration of being allowed their cottage and the use of the provision grounds; it was an advantageous arrangement for the proprietor.

4394. Mr. Gladstone.] Those were men absolutely free, and they could have no claim any longer for any allowances connected with the state of apprenticeship or to their lands?—What right they might have to the land they had been occupying, is a question too nice for me to answer.

4395. You have adverted to the case of a particular estate; do you know whether or not the crop upon that estate has been materially diminished since the apprenticeship?—I understand that the crops have not materially diminished; I may be misinformed.

4396. Would you think it incumbent upon you to infer that if the same crop was taken off it was necessarily taken off at the same expense of labour to the apprentices, or do you not rather think it probable that if the apprentices have been working for wages in taking off the crop, they have done a much greater portion of work in less time than they did in the time of slavery?—No, in the time of crop, that is, generally speaking, impossible, because there is no mode whatever, unless by introduction of machinery, by which you can increase the facility of taking off the crop; in a certain portion of time a certain quantity of sugar will be manufactured, and you cannot, by all the industry possible, make the water evaporate out of the cane juice in a less time than it did before the creation of the apprenticeship.

4397. Are there not many other kinds of labour connected with taking off the crop with which the willingness of the labourer and his own interest in the employ would accelerate the work?—It would accelerate it, but not to the degree that it would the work out of crop.

4398. You said that upon this estate the negroes worked from four in the morning till eight at night, with two hours of interval for meals; was that statement meant to extend to crop time?—No, it was out of crop.

4399. And notwithstanding that you said it was not a severe estate, but one humanely managed?—Because the next estates used to turn out in the morning at two and three.

4400. Is it your impression that, during the period of slavery, the negroes generally worked for fourteen hours in the day out of crop time?—The system slightly slightly modified itself after the resolutions of Parliament in May 1823, and, I believe, a short time previous to the passing of the Emancipation Act the negroes did not turn out before about five o'clock in the morning, and returned home shortly after seven.

4401. With the same intervals for meals?—Yes.

4402. But you think that, in the years 1819 and 1820, they worked for the period that you have described?—I am quite positive about that, because I saw it done.

4403. You have said that you consider the negro incompetent to form contracts advantageously for himself, and the special magistrates generally unfavourably disposed towards him; is there any remedy then, that you can suggest, and do you think, in case of absolute freedom, the negro would be competent to form contracts favourable to himself?—Yes; because then you are left to competition. The labourers' market would be open, the negro would carry his labour to the person that would pay him the best for it, and the proprietor would look for the best labourer; and then the rates of wages would regulate themselves, as is done here. This is a question that has been discussed ever since the time of Edward the Third. In this country Parliament has attempted, repeatedly, to regulate the matter between the landlord and labourer; after passing statute after statute, either uselessly or michievously, they found that the best plan was to leave these matters alone to adjust themselves.

4404. Do you think, as a question of political economy, that after a state of the labour market entirely different, it is desirable to launch at once into absolute freedom of the labour market?—There are great advantages that the master of an estate would necessarily have over any competitor, supposing the negroes were free; the general opinion seems to be, that the proprietor would have a right to expel the negro when absolutely free, from his cottage and his garden, and the negro would not wish to leave them; they have a peculiar attachment to the place where their ancestors' graves are, and where they have been themselves brought up, and they would give their labour to the master for a less sum than they would to any other person. If, on the other hand, the master were extremely unreasonable, they would have an opportunity of quitting him, and making an arrangement with some other person, and therefore it would be the mutual interest of the two parties to conciliate each other; and this they would do in every case, as was done at Scarlet's Mountain.

4405. But, as in a time of slavery, there can be no such thing as contracts for labour between the master and the slave, is it your opinion that it would have been wise to go at once into a state in which the negro should have the unlimited disposal of his own labour; and do you think the negro would have been competent to dispose of his own labour in the most advantageous way?—I think for a few months, advantages might be taken of the negro, but as he would be a free agent, able to dispose of his time as he pleased, he would come to a very reasonable and fair arrangement with his master. I think they are acute enough to protect themselves, provided they are put upon terms of equality with the manager or the proprietor. The negroes in British settled colonies are differently circumstanced from those in the conquered colonies. In the settled colonies, negroes have been accustomed to English elections; to the working of a system of qualified popular representation. When the negro became free, he would at once enter into the system; he would become a part of the public; his voice would be a portion of popular opinion. Practising, along with the rest of the community, the principle of self-government, he would respect himself, value his own rights, and know how to make the most of them, thereby contributing the most to the general welfare. In the conquered colonies, where democratic representation has no vestige, the condition of the freed negro would not be equally advantageous, and he might require protection; and I dare say, in that case he would.

4406. In point of fact, can you apprise the Committee, of your own knowledge, that in any case since the apprenticeship began, more than ten hours has been exacted from the negro during the day, and if so, how much more?—That is a question which it is wholly impossible for any man directly to answer, unless you have the manager of an estate before you, and he chooses to answer it. No planting attorney can answer it, because there is no set of men who really do know less about the active managing of an estate than planting attorneys do,

A. H. Beaumont,

although these gentlemen are put forward as persons who must have an immense deal of knowledge upon the subject. The putting forward an extensive planting attorney as the best witness as to the opinions and character of negroes is a delusion on the Committee, and I will state my reasons for this assertion. Persons who are called par excellence planters and planting attorneys, in general have been young men sent from Scotland, and are occasionally the sons of Jamaica proprietors, born in the island. The last being brought up very much amongst the negroes, know their habits, their romances (for negroes who cannot even read, have, notwithstanding, a traditional literature, and some of their fables and tales are contrived with great ability), their superstitions and opinions; but an imported planter knows nothing but how the greatest quantity of sugar is to be obtained out of the greatest quantity of labour. He emigrates to the colony when about 19 or 20; he follows the negroes in the field or in the boiling-house two years, when he is sent to the still-house or distillery, and then he is made a manager. As he keeps perfectly aloof from the negroes, so he generally knows nothing about their real character and opinions but what he has obtained from his black or brown mistress, which every young planter (or book-keeper as he is called, though he has no occasion even to look at a book of any kind) keeps and changes either at caprice, or as he changes the estate on which he is learning to become a planter. When the book-keeper becomes a manager of an estate, called in Jamaica an overseer, he in general performs his duties through the negro headmen, who know the routine of the business a great deal better than he does. When he becomes an agent for proprietors, or what is called in Jamaica a great attorney, he may have from 30 to 50, 60 or even in one or two cases, 100 plantations under his control. He pays to each an annual visit of a day, when the negroes are to receive their clothing, rides round the canes, says a few words to the head-driver, commends or finds fault with the manager, dines and possibly sleeps at the estate, then proceeds to another plantation for the same purposes. Such a man does not know, and cannot know anything of the real feelings and opinions of the labouring population, therefore they are often mistaken in their judgment on the subject, and one of the greatest mistakes they have made is in the apprehension that negroes will not work for wages. An extensive planting attorney knows as little of the characters and opinions of the negroes on the 30 to 100 plantations nominally under his care, but really under that of the black headmen, as does the Skinner's Company in London of the character of the Irish peasantry upon their estates in Ireland. I have known many estates practically managed by black men; thus Mitcham, in Westmoreland, was very well managed by a black man in the name of the overseer, who was constantly drunk and never went into the field, but left every thing to the black head-driver. Gentlemen, like Mr. William Miller, who represented the proprietors of half a hundred estates, only managed them nominally. He usually lived in the town of Falmouth, and left the management to the overseer, who, in fact, managed by means of the headmen. I have known estates managed for weeks together entirely by the blacks, and very well managed. The idea that an extensive planting attorney in Jamaica necessarily understands the characters and opinions of negroes, is therefore quite a delusion on the Committee, who will find that every honourable man amongst them will be obliged to admit that his opinions respecting black men are constantly proving erroneous. There is no mystery about the management of a sugar estate. Any proprietor of common sense who had never been in Jamaica, would, on going there, manage with the aid of the negroes as well and better than do these planter-educated managers. My cousin, Dr. White, who had been bred a physician, took charge of his father's estate, Oxford, and considerably increased the crop, though he was not bred a planter. Dr. Samuells, of Westmoreland, does the same thing in Westmoreland; Mr. J. M. Whyte, who had been an officer of the Guards, was a very able agent for proprietors. Dr. Robertson, a planting agent, and a very good one too, for a considerable number of plantations, was never educated as a planter, but as a medical man. The estates of which I practically know the management are Garredu, in Trelawney; Meytersfield, Petersfield and Bath, Westmoreland; Dean's Valley, Bellisle, Frome and Tantobelle, Dyworks; Bog, St. Elizabeth; Whitney, Clarendon; Oxford and St. Jago, Manchester; Bushypart, St. Dorothy; Hope, St. Andrew's; Knockpatrick pen, Manchester; Swansea, St. John; Lacona, St. Elizabeth; Twickenham Park, Cross, Caymunas Ellis and Caymunas Dawkins, St. Catherine, and a great many others.

4407. Do you think that a correct delineation is applied to the class generally? —I do think that the character I have given of planting attornies to be quite correct. I do not intend my observations to apply in respect of managers or planting attornies to the estates I have particularized; on the contrary, on most of the estates to which the list refers, the management was very humane, and the managers on good terms with the negroes.

4408. Do you know any other class of men who are more competent witnesses? —The best possible witnesses would be the black head-men upon the different estates, who really do the business.

4410. What would you say of the opportunities of an attorney of acquiring information and knowledge among the blacks, supposing him to be an intelligent and energetic, and a right-minded person, as compared with your own?—As it is not, by any means, thought respectable to associate with negroes, or to know anything about their manners and habits, few planters know much about them. I know only one exception to the general rule, and that is, in the case of Bryan Edwards, the historian of Jamaica. I believe he is the only one who has ever taken the trouble of inquiring what were their opinions; there is also possibly another exception in Mr. Long, another historian of the island, but he looked upon negroes as a species of monkies.

4411. What would you think of the opportunities which a manager might enjoy, if he pleased, as compared with those which you yourself enjoyed?—Not so great; because my relations were all proprietors of slaves, and I was in the habit of living amongst them from my childhood, and as is the case with children of most proprietors, a sort of attachment grows up between them and the slaves, and we certainly understand more of their habits and dispositions, and they are likely to be a good deal more confiding in us than they would in utter strangers, for whom they have frequently a deep detestation; for, in general, the negroes very much dislike the white men put over them.

4412. Did not you state that a portion of those managers are sons of proprietors?—A small number are, and if you had here the manager of an estate, who had been brought up in his early life in the colony, I should pay a great deal more regard to his opinion than I would to that of the usual run of the profession. It is the rule with all planting attornies never to interfere with the details of an estate, and they know, in fact, nothing of them; it is left entirely to the overseer as long as the crop is made, and the negroes are not discontented; the planting attorney never interferes; it is a rule not to interfere.

4413. Do you mean to state that you have had more opportunities of becoming accurately acquainted with the rate of wages received by the negroes since the apprenticeship began; the number of hours that they are worked upon the estates, and the mode in which the special magistrates conducted their duties, and with the printed regulations, under which those magistrates act, than an extensive attorney, with the charge of various estates in Jamaica, and personally superintending them?—I think I have, considerably, as to the actual facts.

4414. Will you state the precise rate of wages upon any estates that you remember in Jamaica, which were received during the ten months that you remained in Jamaica after the apprenticeship came into operation, and the means you had of obtaining the information?—I will state what Mr. Lyon told me, the special magistrate for Saint Thomas in the East, and who was sent there at the time it was in a very disturbed state.

4415. At what time?—In January, I think; but it was about the time the Belvidere trash houses were burnt. He told me that he had found no difficulty in making arrangements with the negroes, but that in general the managers and proprietors were unreasonable; and that, as the apprenticeship had only commenced, as a matter of accommodation he had arranged the wages for the first time, but he thought they were much less than the slave was entitled to; but that as the slaves had been persuaded to be satisfied with them by the head-men,

A. H. Beaumont,

he could not make any alteration; and I think he told me the arrangement upon most of the properties in that district was, that they were to receive, in some cases 1 d., and in other cases 1½ d. an hour for extra time. I have no doubt that in many cases the negroes were defrauded as to the quantity of time; and certainly the planting attorney was not likely to know more than myself; the difference between the supposed and real amount of wages, as fixed by the extra time, agreed to be given in exchange for a certain quantity of money, and that quantity of time, in point of fact taken. I used the word "time" to denote "labour for a time certain."

5416. Do you conceive that the attorney who had the charge of those estates was ignorant of the rate of wages paid?—He would, of course, know the rate at which the wages were understood to be paid, because he would have the paying of the money, but the real rate he might not know.

4417. How do you establish that opinion, that you have had better means of information as to the rate of wages paid in Jamaica, since the apprenticeship began, than the attorneys of the estates, who actually paid the wages?—I understood the question to be put with reference to the rate of wages, not in particular instances, but generally throughout the island; in particular instances, of course, the attorney who paid them could give, generally, the best evidence as to the amount paid, but not as to the actual rate of wages.

4419. What evidence can you give upon any estate as to the number of hours contracted for by negroes for a particular rate of wages, and as to the adherence to that number of hours?—I understood from the negroes in the parish of St. George, and I have great reason to believe that it occurred in St. Mary's, that a considerable number of hours beyond that which had been agreed for was required from the negroes. The negroes themselves told me so, and I believe they stated the truth. I look at the quantity of time required to make the crop, and therefore I believe no statements which tend to prove that the negroes do not work (including the time taken under the law, and that paid for by nominal wages) a longer period than that which is asserted, and which period would not be sufficient for the purpose, supposing the crop not to have fallen off.

4420. Do you mean that to apply to the time that they had bargained to give their masters, or that other hours were added by fraud on the part of the employers to the ten hours a day, that they were compelled to work?—I meant to state, that in most instances, the negroes have not made a bargain which is fair, as respects them.

4421. And this fraud was by adding to the time which they are compelled by law to work?—Yes, but I believe in many instances they were deceived with respect to the time. I gave some of the negroes in St. George's an hour-glass, that they might ascertain the fact for themselves, and they told me afterwards that the overseer had come into the field and broken it, and said they had no right to have one. This occurred three times.

4422. Then, as to the facts of the rate of wages paid, and the number of hours work, do you conceive that an extensive planting attorney is a competent witness before this Committee upon the subject, and that the Committee may extract from him, supposing he speaks the truth, correct information as to those points?—He could only say that an agreement had been made, by which a certain number of hours were to be given for a certain amount of money, but whether more or less hours have been taken, in point of fact, he could not say; he could not say that a particular agreement had been made. Now, the best evidence of that particular agreement would be, the return of the special magistrate itself, but it would be no evidence of the time the negro really worked.

4423. You adhere to the opinion you expressed before, that the Committee are not to put the slightest confidence in the returns of the special magistrates?—I did not state that the returns are altogether false; I said that, in all matters which the special magistrate had any interest in concealing, he would (speaking generally) do so; but I can conceive no interest that they would have in falsifying with respect to agreements for wages; they are, I believe, made in writing.

ing. I said that I did not believe the returns as to the amount of punishment, nor do I, speaking generally.

4424. You think that, irrespective of punishments, the Committee may place confidence in the returns of the magistrates?—I would not say generally, because I do not know what the returns are; but I should say, with respect to the rate of wages agreed upon and the quantity of time, that they would be correct, as far as they knew.

4425. Mr. Gladstone.] You think that where the special magistrates have no interest in stating what is false, they will state what is true?—I think they will.

4426. You complained that the time of the negroes had been fraudulently measured, but to your knowledge or belief, in any case, are the negroes avowedly worked more than ten hours a day in compulsory labour?—Not avowedly, but I do believe that the fact is so; because when I know that the law is, in many instances, set at defiance, in matters where there is not so much temptation to do so, I infer that they are capable of doing it in a matter where it is very much their interest to do so. For instance, I know that there was a woman brought up in habeas corpus, belonging to Lord Seaford's property, Montpelier, with a collar round her neck and a sort of spikes in it. Now, when I know that the manager did that in defiance of the law, when I see women working repeatedly in chains, and I know that that is contrary to law, I of course believe, that in working them upon the estate where there is so much temptation to extract the greatest quantity of labour, the planters will not regard the law. The overseer's reputation depends upon getting the greatest possible quantity of labour produced. There are amongst the managers many exceptions to this rule, men who would not commit the least injustice or cruelty against a negro or any one else. My observation is, however, generally true as to the disregard of faith in Jamaica in transactions between planters and slaves or apprentices.

4427. Sir George Grey.] Are you cognizant of that case you have mentioned of the woman brought up with a collar?—There was a case in which that happened I know.

4428. Are you aware that notice was taken of it, and that the individual who acted as a special magistrate upon that occasion is no longer a special magistrate, and that that circumstance is an exception from the practice which has been disapproved by the highest authority in the island?—I know that if my friend Mr. Watkis had not brought it forward, which he did with very great injury to himself, that that human being would have remained in the same state, with the collar round her neck. If I were to return back to the island of Jamaica, and I heard of such a case, I should think the wisest course that I could take would be to say nothing about it, for it would be only ruining myself, and doing no great practical good after all. I know that advocating the negro's rights greatly injured Mr. Watkis, to the extent of a great part of his practice as a barrister in the island.

4429. Are you aware that information of that case was sent to Lord Sligo?—Of course it would be, when the habeas corpus was moved for and the decision made; but the special magistrate did not afford legal protection; it was enforced by an individual not connected with the Government in any way.

4430. Are you aware that when that case was represented to the proper authority, a check was put upon such a practice in future?—They could not well refrain from doing something. A case of great atrocity, when forced before the Government, will be punished, but I am not aware that the manager in this case was prosecuted.

4431. Do you refer to that instance as a single instance of the punishment you have described, or do you give it as a specimen of a punishment common in Jamaica?—The proceedings upon plantations are very secret, and those cases may repeatedly occur, and I believe do often occur, without being known.

4432. Have you heard of one single person, besides that one woman, who was so punished?—I have heard, as a mere vague rumour, that the practice is common.

4433. Mr. Gladstone.] Since the apprenticeship?—So I have heard; it did occur and was accidentally discovered; it may occur in other instances and not be discovered.

4434. Sir George Grey.] Did you inquire upon what estates that practice had existed?—No, it was of no use to do so; I could not prosecute the inquiry; I heard it as a general remark.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

22 July 1836.

4435. Did you make any further inquiry?—No.

4436. Mr. Gladstone.] Did you ever hear its existence from any special magistrate?—Dr. Palmer told me that he believed that flogging and the flogging of women was common enough.

4437. The question referred to wearing collars?—I mean my statement to apply to general ill-treatment of the negroes, wearing collars and general ill-treatment. I was speaking to Dr. Palmer about the difference between slavery and apprenticeship, and he, referring to the original state of slavery, when a magistrate might put a collar on a slave, said that he believed the same atrocities were practised since the apprenticeship that were practised before, but he did not particularize the collar, for I did not particularly draw his attention to that question. Negroes are, I believe, often cruelly confined in cells, under pretext of keeping them in safe custody in plantations, to await the special magistrate's adjudication.

4438. Chairman.] Do you mean to say that you have yourself frequently seen women working in chains?—In all cases in the workhouse gangs they do work in chains.

4439. Mr. Gladstone.] You have not heard of any other case in which a collar has been put upon an apprentice, nor has any special magistrate told you that he was cognizant of such a case?—I heard that all the practices of slavery existed, but I am not aware of any particular case.

4440. Would you seriously adduce the fact, that a particular overseer put a collar upon the neck of a woman illegally, as a proof that the overseers in general were in the habit of avowedly working the negroes beyond ten hours a day in Jamaica?—Yes, and for this reason, that when I consider that Montpelier estate is in one of the most civilized parts of the island, that it belongs to Lord Seaford, and is under the immediate control of Mr. Miller, and within 13 miles of the town of Montego Bay, which is the county town of Cornwall; when I see that a negro was treated in that manner upon that estate, I think it is very likely that other violations of law have occurred in remoter districts.

4441. The question is, whether the fact you have mentioned is evidence that more than ten hours' labour are extorted from the negroes in a day?—I think that if they will ill-treat the negroes where there is no temptation to do it, the temptation of profit will certainly induce them to do so. The law requires that the negro should have two hours' during the time of slavery for dinner; but instead of that they only gave them an hour and a half. Now, if they did that before the year 1834, I think it is very likely they are pursuing a similar practice since.

4442. Are you aware that it was the general opinion in Jamaica that it would be illegal to extract from the apprentices 45 hours of continuous labour?—It was known that it would be illegal, but that was no reason why they would not do it.

4443. Was it the uniform opinion in Jamaica that it would be illegal to extract more than ten hours of compulsory labour?—Every body knew the number of hours that they were entitled to by the law during the week, and a proclamation stated the fact; but the quantity of that time to be demanded each day was left in great measure to the manager's caprice, though the proclamation did attempt to regulate it, but the proclamation was not law.

4444. Were ten hours the number fixed in the proclamation as the utmost limit?—If I remember right, the first proclamation was an extraordinary one, because it was not very intelligible; but, if I remember correctly, Lord Sligo recommended them to work eight hours a-day.

4445. Was it considered in Jamaica, generally, that it would be illegal to work a negro compulsorily avowedly more than ten hours in a day, distinguishing such a case from the case in which he was professedly worked only ten hours, but really defrauded of a greater portion of time?—It was well known that it was contrary to the spirit of the law; but that was no reason why they would not do it, especially as it was not contrary to the letter of the law.

4446. Do you know any facts in support of your opinion that, from the general lawlessness of the community of Jamaica, the negroes are avowedly worked more than ten hours a day at compulsory labour?—When I know that a short time before the apprenticeship, the magistrates of Hanover took a man and hanged him, distinctly contrary to the Governor's pardon, and his express order that it should not be done, when I know that those magistrates to this day remain in the commission of the peace, notwithstanding the matter was brought before two Governors, I can conceive them capable of anything.

4447. Were they stipendiary magistrates?—No.

4448. Do you know any facts affirmatively bearing out your opinion that negroes are avowedly worked more than ten hours a day?—Nothing but what the negroes have told me, nor is there any other mode of ascertaining the fact, because no person except a special magistrate would be permitted by the overseer to come upon the estate, if they supposed he came as a spy, as they would call any other inquirer. There is no express clause in the law to prohibit a negro from being worked more than ten hours a day, so long as the quantity of hours given the planter by law per week is not exceeded.

4449. Negroes have sometimes told you that the managers have ordered them to work more than ten hours a day?—All over the island, where I have travelled, the negroes told me the same thing, that they were worked in the same way as they had been worked in time of slavery, and the more remote the estate was from the seat of Government, the more frequently were those observations made by the negroes.

4450. You have described the negroes as being worked 38 hours continuously during slavery; has any negro ever related to you any similar circumstance since the apprenticeship began, or what is the strongest case that has ever been told you since the apprenticeship began?—The negroes at Twickenham Park and St. Catherine's, and several estates in St. Thomas in the Vale and St. Mary, told me that the system had in no way changed, that the spell keeping was precisely what it was before; they did not particularize those estates, they spoke generally.

4451. Did they mean that they were working day and night without remuneration?—No; I suppose it is probable that they had this so called remuneration, a penny an hour.

4452. Was not that an essential difference between that period and the period of slavery?—It was, so far as the value of the pence went.

4453. Was there any statement ever given to you sufficiently definite to lay it before this Committee in illustration of your opinion, that more than ten hours of compulsory labour are professedly ordered by the managers to be given?—No; the statements I make must necessarily be extremely vague, for they are only those which I obtained from the negroes, there being no other mode of information accessible to me or any one else.

4454. Then it is your opinion that if more than ten hours of labour are taken, it is in manifest defiance of the law?—Whatever they had beyond the law is manifestly against the law; but the law fixes the time per week, and not per day.

4455. Sir George Grey.] You have stated that you have been resident upon a sugar estate since the apprenticeship began; had you not then the means of learning whether the negroes were worked compulsorily more than ten hours a day?—No; it would be impossible to do it; for though I spent some time upon estates where I saw the manufacture of sugar going on, yet I could not say whether the negroes had been there working continuously for thirty-six hours, because I was not continuously myself looking at them.

4456. You never closely investigated the question yourself?—It would have been considered extremely indelicate for me to interfere in it when I was partaking of a gentleman's hospitality; planters do not like to be meddled with in reference to such matters as those on which your questions are propounded.

4457. Mr. Gladstone.] Did the negroes ever complain to you that whereas the law enacted that they should only be worked ten hours a day, they were worked twelve or fifteen?—The negroes have frequently stated that they were cheated out of their time; that they worked "in the same fashion" (to use their own language) as they said they had done before the so called abolition of slavery. It is impossible for any person whatever to give any other information except you have the managers themselves.

4458. Is it your opinion that any manager would venture to go to a gang of negroes and say, "I shall require you to work upon such a day twelve or fifteen hours without wages?"—I think he would, in many instances.

4459. Do you think that in such a case the negroes would refrain from complaining to the special magistrate?—Unless they had great confidence in the special magistrate, they would not, for this reason, that a special magistrate has the power, if he thinks they make an improper complaint, of ordering them to be flogged, and if he exercised that power once or twice, they would prefer submitting to complaining, with the chance of being flogged.

4460. Do you think generally the negroes would have little confidence in the special magistrates?—I believe extremely little.

4461. If you found that on the other hand the House of Assembly made complaints against the body of the special magistrates as being too favourable to the negro, would that at all tend to alter your opinion of them for the better?—I dare say, in some few instances, the special magistrates may have leaned the other way.

4462. If you find that the complaint of the House of Assembly has been, with regard to the general leaning of the special magistrates, that it has been in favour of the negro, will not that tend to improve your opinion of the special magistrates?—No; from what I know of the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica, the proceedings of any of their committees will not determine my mind in one way or another. A committee being got up for a particular purpose, and the evidence being made to bear upon a particular point, they might easily prove anything they pleased.

4463. If the House of Assembly expressed an opinion upon the subject the other way, would not that give an inclination to your mind the other way?—It would have no effect upon my mind either way; I should look to facts, and form my own judgment upon them.

4464. Are you acquainted with Dr. Madden or Captain Oldrey?—I know Captain Oldrey very well.

4465. Do you know Dr. Madden by character?—Yes, I know him by reputation very well, and personally, slightly.

4466. Were those gentlemen in whose kind disposition towards the negro you would have considerable confidence?—I believe Captain Oldrey and Dr. Madden had every desire to do justice, honestly and impartially. I am sure they had; and the same observation applies to some other special magistrates.

4467. Then, they being themselves special magistrates, and being also in communication very much with other special magistrates, if their deliberate opinion of the special magistrates as a body is, that they are equitably disposed towards the negro, would not that produce any effect on the strong sentiments you have expressed against the special magistrates?—It would not; because I think I know the special magistrates a great deal better than either Dr. Madden or Captain Oldrey, because I have known many of them many years, and they could have only known them at the most a few weeks.

4468. You say that you have heard overseers say that they like the new system very well; do you think that is the general feeling amongst the overseers?—I think that the attachment of the managers and the slave-holders throughout the island towards the apprenticeship system has gone on increasing as it continues; the more it continues, the more it resembles slavery.

4469. Do you believe them to be generally well inclined to the apprenticeship system at this moment and desirous to maintain it?—Yes, there is no doubt that property has risen in value at least 25 per cent. since August 1834, and the greater portion of the proprietors in consequence are very willing that the present state of things should exist; it is quasi-slavery.

4470. Do you think there is any considerable party of persons who seriously contemplate and desire to thwart the apprenticeship, and to prevent its working well among the overseers and managers?—I know that there was at the commencement of the apprenticeship; but I believe that feeling has to a very great extent subsided, because they find that the apprenticeship may be made by a change of name to be slavery. Some managers who were determined that the apprenticeship should work, had no difficulty from the commencement, and never had occasion to apply to a special magistrate. Thus Mr. M'Neil, of Westmoreland, Mr. Wheatle, of Knockpatrick, both on friendly terms with Lord Mulgrave, Mr. Carson, of Whitney, and many others, made no complaints of the system; but then these men had not aversion to absolute freedom, and considered that negroes could be induced to work like other human beings. In other cases managers at first conspired against the system until they found how closely it could be made to approximate to slavery.

4471. You believe that there is no such feeling existing among a large body of persons at present?—I think those who consider the subject the most attentively would like to see freedom established at once, in order that there might be certainty and security of property, that they might employ their capital without the fear of any future change; but I believe that the greater portion of managers and persons who have that indirect interest in the continuation of the apprenticeship prefer it, and many of the proprietors also prefer it; the apprenticeship continues the aristocracy of colour; by the deficiency law managers have in fact a monopoly of the business of sugar planters.

4472. Do you think there are many persons who seriously contemplate thwarting the apprenticeship, with a view to procure a return to slavery?—They have not the remotest idea of establishing slavery under the name of slavery, but they have every desire, by means of enacting tyrannical laws, to perpetuate slavery under a different name, and I sincerely believe that they will succeed in this project.

4473. Were you originally, before the apprenticeship came into operation, strongly in favour of absolute freedom?—I was, and every thing that has since occurred has confirmed that opinion.

4474. You said that the colonists in the Assembly were generally favourable to absolute freedom in preference to the apprenticeship; did you mean to say that with the same compensation which was given in the apprenticeship scheme they would rather have had absolute freedom than the apprenticeship, or did you merely mean that they would rather have had entire compensation and absolute freedom with it?—The most intelligent among them, and at one time the majority, would have preferred taking the compensation as it stood (giving the slaves entire freedom) to the apprenticeship.

4475. Chairman.] Would not they, according to the apprenticeship system, have been able to free the apprentices entirely, if they chose it, subsequently?—No, there was an immense difference between the operation of a general system of emancipation and a partial system of emancipation; for though it might be beneficial to emancipate the slaves of the whole island, it would not answer the purpose for two or three proprietors to have done it; but I can name some of the principal proprietors, resident in the island, who were of opinion that entire emancipation was by far the most advisable, and I know, as a fact, that one of the officers of the Government, who was a member of the House of Assembly, stated that he was authorized to mention to Mr. Watkis, a friend of mine, and other members of the Assembly, that the Governor of the island, Lord Mulgrave, was decidedly opposed to entire emancipation, for the reasons I mentioned the other day, and that they would forfeit the compensation if they insisted on perfect freedom. There was a proposition in the House of Assembly to emancipate the slaves entirely, and but for Lord Mulgrave it would have been adopted.

4476. Sir George Grey.] Brought forward by whom?—Mr. Watkis.

4477. As a substantive motion?—As a substantive motion.

4478. Was there a division upon it?—Not as I believe; there would have been no division probably, for the general impression was, that freedom was the most advisable course to be taken; but Lord Mulgrave caused it to be intimated that the Government here would prefer the apprenticeship to the entire emancipation, and that unless the colonies adopted Mr. Stanley's apprenticeship scheme, the compensation would be forfeited; they were willing to adopt the British Act, only substituting entire emancipation for the apprenticeship.

4479. Mr. Gladstone.] How many seceded from the Assembly upon that occasion?—I do not recollect the numbers; when the Governor's feelings came to be known, many persons who had previously been favourable to the entire emancipation joined the apprenticeship party, and I think the number that seceded on the passing of the Bill recognizing the apprenticeship scheme was 17.

4480. Sir George Grey.] Lord Mulgrave, in his despatch of the 19th of December 1833, in the Parliamentary Papers, page 30, states, "I the less regret the course I then took, because I have been convinced, by subsequent observation, that under no circumstances would the abolition of apprenticeship have been carried by the majority of the House of Assembly, and the fruitless agitation of that question would, of course, have only disappointed the negroes with the result. Some few of the advocates of immediate emancipation in the House of Assembly were, I believe, sincerely convinced that that plan would answer best, but others were induced to adopt that cry, with a view either to get further compensation pensation, or to avoid the support of the sick and aged ; and their tone was considerably altered when I told them that I imagined the first would not be obtained, and the last would, in some shape, be enforced ;” are the Committee to understand that you take a different view of the motive which influenced the majority of the Assembly, with reference to the question, from that stated in this despatch ?—Lord Mulgrave is decidedly wrong, for the first assumed motive was absurd, and the second could not have influenced the members of the Jamaica Assembly practically acquainted with the laws of the island. There was no man in the Assembly that did not know that they would be obliged to provide for the sick and aged, because there is a poor-law existing in the island,—a colonial Act of Charles the Second,—and the instant the negroes are emancipated they will then come under the operation of that law, as the free blacks and white persons now do.

4481. Are the free blacks and white persons entitled to demand the same degree of support and of medical attendance which the apprentices now receive from their employers ?—Not in kind, but at least the same in degree ; there is a poor-rate levied, and the free poor are much better attended to than in this country. If the poor choose to reside in the workhouse they might ; they would be very well clothed ; they would have a medical man constantly attending upon them, and they would be much better off than the poor are in this country.

4482. You are of opinion that, instead of Lord Mulgrave being right in his expression that the abolition of apprenticeship would not have been carried by the majority of the House of Assembly, it would have been carried even without a division ?—I think the party was increasing so strongly every day as to justify this opinion ; for though not a member of the house at the time, I had, by courtesy, a seat in it, and I was in the habit of conversing with the members, and I know there was a majority who were desirous of entire emancipation. Subsequently many of those persons have become unfavourable to it ; thus, the Honourable Mr. M’Neil, the chief magistrate of Westmoreland, and an extensive planting attorney and proprietor there, told me in 1834, that he was not averse to absolute freedom. He has since written me, that the apprenticeship with him was working very well. The negroes would be glad to get rid of the apprenticeship, but few proprietors now would, amongst other reasons, because they do not like a constant change of the tenure by which they are holding their property. Had the Governor supported the abolitionists, then the scheme would have been carried.

4483. Mr. Gladstone.] You said, in speaking of Mr. Lyon, the special magistrate, that there was a considerable diminution of punishment in his district, and that he became unpopular in consequence ?—Mr. Lyon was first of all disliked in the parish, because he was not thought sufficiently severe. Subsequently to that, both parties, I believe, were very much attached to him ; so much so, that I know the Governor requested him not accept an office which he had obtained for him by Lord Mulgrave in the customs, but to remain in that part of the island which had previously been disturbed ; and this proceeding gave general satisfaction, and I believe deservedly so.

4484. Mr. Buxton.] Do you know what is the practice with regard to chaining females in workhouses ?—I do ; all females who are sent to the workhouse are chained in pairs ; a collar is put round the neck of each, and from that collar there is suspended a heavy chain, which presses on the breast, and must be very torturing.

4485. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to say that that is the case, whether they are sentenced to penal gangs or not ?—All apprentices, male or female, that are sent to the workhouse are worked in chains, men and boys, girls and women, youth and age, all alike.

4486. Whether they are sentenced to penal gangs or not ?—I know of no such distinction as penal gangs existing in practice.

4487. What workhouse have you been in the habit of visiting since the apprenticeship ?—I have seen St. Andrew’s, Port Royal, Kingston, St. Thomas in the East and St. Thomas in the Vale.

4488. Have you repeatedly visited those houses since the apprenticeship ?—I have visited the interior of St. Catharine’s, St. Andrew’s and Kingston.

4489. Are you able to state that in those workhouses there was no distinction between negroes sentenced to penal gangs and others, but that every negro in those those workhouses was chained?—I do not know the existence of such a thing as a penal gang, though it is talked about. The persons sent to the workhouse are all worked in chains, and if the word penal gang has any meaning, it implies every one confined in the workhouse.

4490. You have stated that every negro in those workhouses when you visited them was in chains?—I believe every one was, I have no doubt about it.

4491. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware of a distinction between switching and flogging under the apprenticeship system, by order of the special magistrates?—I know the distinction existing in the parlance of the colony.

4492. What is the difference?—The flogging is done with the cat, and the switching is done by what are called ebony switches; a sort of broom rod is made of about half-a-dozen to a couple of dozen of very thin springy lathy rods, and they are switched with it; but the switching is done upon the nates and the flogging upon the back.

4493. Chairman.] Is it a severe punishment?—It is not so severe as the cat; it is not so injurious to health.

4494. Does it extend to the females?—I believe it does.

4495. Sir George Grey.] Upon what is your belief founded?—I know there were some females switched or flogged in the Kingston workhouse.

4496. When?—In the year 1835.

4497. Is the switching, of which you have been speaking, inflicted in the workhouse or out of the workhouse, by order of the special magistrates?—I do not know any particular orders of the special magistrates for it, but I have heard some of the negroes say that some of them have been switched and some of them have been flogged; if it was done in Kingston, a fortiori it would have been done elsewhere.

4498. Did you ever hear a man say that he had been switched by a special magistrate?—Not a man, but boys have told me so.

4499. Chairman.] Have you ever seen a cat or a switch used in the workhouse?—Not since the apprenticeship, but I have no doubt both are used; I never saw a cat in a regiment, but I believe soldiers are flogged.

4500. Sir George Grey.] Have you ever seen the punishment inflicted out of the workhouse?—No; I know it has been done; I have seen it after the operation is performed.

4501. Mr. Buxton.] Are there many unregistered negroes in Jamaica?—A very great number not registered according to law.

4502. How many do you think there are?—I should think one-eighth of the apprentices were not strictly legally registered.

4503. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to say that there are a great many negroes unregistered or a great many negro apprentices unregistered?—I mean a great many negro apprentices unregistered or else illegally registered; the Registry Act required that they should be registered every three years; the first register commenced in 1817, many were registered then, and were not regularly registered afterwards.

4504. Are not you aware that a question has arisen and been submitted by Lord Sligo to Government as to the condition of those apprentices, who having been duly registered on the former register, were omitted upon the subsequent one?—I know that that question had been laid before the law officers in the colony.

4505. Are you aware what the decision upon that point has been?—I should think there can be no doubt what it would be.

4506. Are you aware that the negroes who were held in apprenticeship, not having been duly registered, have all been liberated by the Governor?—I should think they are not so.

4507. Have you the means of knowing that they are not so?—There are several estates which I am satisfied are not correctly registered, and I have never understood that the negroes are free upon them.

4508. Do you mean that they were registered on former registries and omitted in subsequent ones?—I do.

4509. Do you think you could point out any negroes who, having been omitted in the last registry, are now held in apprenticeship?—I think it is probable I could.

4510. Assuming that an order has been sent long since by the Government to Lord Sligo, founded upon a legal opinion that those negroes are not legally held held in apprenticeship, how do you account for their still remaining in that state?—From the utter defiance which is very frequently set to every thing in the shape of law where slavery or its relics are concerned, I have known, since the statute professing to emancipate the slaves, negroes held in apprenticeship, when there was not a vestige of title by which that was done; I have known a local magistrate, upon a special magistrate declaring that he saw no cause for interfering, as late as December 1834, order the police to seize an apprentice and carry her to the estate, and that was a matter of perfect notoriety; he himself never attempted to set up any legal title to her, and that gentleman was one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the island of Jamaica.

4511. Sir George Grey.] Who was the judge of the Supreme Court?—The agent of the person claiming to be owner of the apprentice.

4512. Do you mean to say that a special magistrate in that case enforced the compulsory labour from an individual with respect to whom there was no evidence of her being an apprentice?—The special magistrate, having hesitated to adjudicate that this person was liable to labour as an apprentice, Mr. Bernard, a judge of the Supreme Court, and chief magistrate of the district, instantly took the law into his own hands, as agent of the person claiming to have a title in the black girl; the circumstances were these: a considerable number of negroes belonging to the Caywanas estate in St. Catherine's, applied to Mr. Watkis, the barrister, and stated that they had been a great length of time held in slavery without any title whatever; an attorney made some searches in the Record Office, and found that there was no title in the proprietor of the Caywanas nor in any one else; that if there was any title, it either rested in the personal representatives of a deceased or in the King by escheat. Administration was taken out of the personality of this person, who might have the claim, and the personal representatives executed a manumission, so that there was no claim whatever, except possibly one might have been raised by the Crown. Mr. Bernard, however, claimed the services of those persons, who were seven or eight in number.

4513. On what ground?—As the agent of the proprietor of the Caymunas, upon whose estate these slaves had resided, and who it appeared had forcibly kept them in slavery previous to the apprenticeship.

4514. And the owner of the estate, whose agent acted in that manner, is a judge of the Supreme Court?—No; the agent of the owner is the judge of the Supreme Court; the owner is an absentee from the island.

4515. Who is the owner?—I think it was the Rev. Sir William Cooper. In consequence of a claim being set up to this person, Mr. Watkis requested me, he being in very bad health, to take out letters of guardianship of the estate of one of the parties who was an infant; they got hold of one of this party, a girl of about 16 years of age, and Mr. Ramsey, a special magistrate, sent her to the workhouse for refusing to work upon this estate. I was not aware of the circumstance till the expiration of the term for which she was sent to the workhouse of St. Catherine's; I went there, and I saw Mr. Bernard, the agent of the proprietor, and I observed to him that it was of no use to harass those persons; that if he was entitled to their labour, the best way would be to have it settled before a special magistrate; he said he had not the least objection, and we, the Honourable Mr. Bernard, the negress and myself, then went before the special magistrate of St. Catherine's, Mr. Clinch, who said that under the circumstances he could not interfere; it did not appear to him that Mr. Bernard had a claim that he, as a special magistrate, could enforce, and he advised him to appeal to the Superior Court, which he might have done of course, by an action against Mr. Watkis or myself, for detaining his apprentices from him; Mr. Bernard objected to that; he said he would insist upon Mr. Clinch executing his duty or that he would do it himself; Mr. Clinch would not do it, and Mr. Bernard then ordered the police, who were in attendance upon the special magistrate, to take possession of this girl, and to carry her to Caymunas estate, which was six miles distant; I, as the guardian of the girl, interposed, and in conclusion she was not sent.

4516. Was Mr. Ramsey the special magistrate?—He was, in the first instance.

4517. At the time he sent this girl to the workhouse, he sent her there in his capacity of special magistrate?—He did.

4518. Was

22 July 1836.

4518. Was a doubt with respect to her condition of apprenticeship raised before him?—She said that she was free.

4519. Did he investigate her title to freedom before he issued the warrant to convey her to the workhouse?—No; he proceeded upon the principle that possession was the right, and he would only look at the fact that Mr. Bernard claimed possession; there can be no doubt about those circumstances. In consequence of Mr. Bernard's conduct, an application was made to the Court of Chancery by me for an attachment against him, and the proceedings went on for some considerable length, till great expense had been incurred; he then agreed to pay his costs, and I paid mine, and I subsequently left the country; I understand that the parties were afterward seized, taken up before a special magistrate, and the men sentenced to be flogged, and the women sent to the workhouse; and they are now living in apprenticeship upon Caymunas estate, being held by no lawful title in this quasi slavery.

4520. You did not bring this case before the supreme tribunal?—They indicted me for my interference in the matter, and I applied to the Court of Chancery for an attachment against Mr. Bernard, but it was so extremely expensive, that Mr. Bernard agreed to pay his costs, which amounted to three or four hundred pounds, and I agreed to pay mine, to get rid of the suit, as I was coming to this country; he then agreed that the matter should be tried by an action of trespass, the jury finding a verdict for the plaintiff, with liberty to enter a special verdict; however, it was so expensive, it never was tried. Upon the trial of the indictment against me, the Chief-Justice, speaking of the conduct of Mr. Bernard, reprobated it, and said, it was very extraordinary that any gentleman filling the functions of a judge in the Supreme Court should act in that manner.

4521. Then this action, which was to have decided the question, was not tried?—It was not, in fact; the expense was a prohibition.

4522. For the reasons which you stated you did not pursue that action?—I left the country.

4523. Was there no guardian to the negro in the country afterwards?—No; the fact was, it cost me a large sum of money, and I quitted the country, and no person else took it up; no one liked to face the costs.

4524. Then Mr. Bernard did not flinch from bringing this matter before a jury, and abiding the issue?—With the state of feeling existing at that time in the country, if it had not been for the understanding with Mr. Bernard that he would suffer the judgment against him, with nominal damages, I would not have brought it before the jury, because I had no doubt they would have found a verdict against me. The matter was conducted by Mr. Watkis. The fact is, that he had no claim to the services of this girl, or of her family, and this he admitted in his answer to the rule obtained against him for an attachment in the Court of Chancery.

4525. In fact, you did not press the action, and the status of those individuals has never been brought to any ultimate decision?—The Governor knows the whole facts; they were brought before him as Chancellor. It was no portion of my duty to involve myself in expense about it.

4526. But the result, as to those individuals is, that they have returned to a state of apprenticeship, the whole of them?—I have understood so, and have no doubt of the fact.

4527. Sir George Grey.] Do you mention this circumstance as an instance of the fact of apprentices, not registered, being held in apprenticeship, or is it not a case in which there was a dispute as to the title, and a suit pending in Chancery, during which Mr. Bernard attempted, very improperly, to establish his title by force?—No; the Registry Act requires that all slaves, duly held in slavery, shall be registered; and, therefore, if they were not duly held in slavery they could not be properly registered. I may observe, there was no suit pending in chancery in the case I refer to, until after Mr. Bernard had taken the law out of the special magistrate's hands into his own.

4528. Did this proceeding take place before the last triennial registry?—No, subsequently.

4529. When they were registered had they been manumitted by the representations of the late owner?—No, they had not, nor was that necessary.

4530. Had not they been duly registered in the last triennial registry preceding the Emancipation Bill?—I cannot say as to that.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

22 July 1836.

4531. The want of due registration did not then arise as a question in the case you refer to?—Not as to them; I was asked by the Committee whether, if the slaves were not duly registered, and were ordered to be discharged, it would necessarily follow that they would be discharged, and I adduced the facts I have stated, to show that even in a stronger case than that of undue registration, even where there was no title they were kept as apprentices a fortiori, when only erroneously registered.

4532. Sir James Graham.] If they are not duly registered they cannot be duly held?—No, they cannot be, but they are held, in fact.

4533. Is there not a process of law by which their claim to be free may be asserted?—I do not know of any; I know that the Chief-Justice has refused to have the question tried by habeas corpus, and I have understood that the proceeding recommended to be adopted by the law officers, is by homine replegiendo, but I never knew a writ of that kind sued out in a case of apprenticeship. The Attorney-General in Jamaica insisted that the question might be tried by habeas corpus, but the judges of the court thought differently.

4534. Are there not guardians of the apprentices?—No, not at all; the only instance I know of an apprentice having a guardian was, where I took out letters of guardianship in the case I referred to.

4535. Do you contend, that under the existing law, though the statute declares that without due registration no person shall be held in a state of apprenticeship, there is no means on the part of a person so held unduly in apprenticeship, of vindicating his right to freedom?—I know of no means whatever; and I know practically an immense number of negroes were held in the colony who were not duly registered, and who were in all things treated as apprentices, flogging not excepted. I know two estates belonging to one gentleman, where there are 300 in that condition.

4536. Sir George Grey.] Do not you also know, that after you left the colony in May 1835, that question was raised, or having been raised previously, has since been decided, and in consequence of that decision every apprentice in Jamaica, known not to be duly registered has been set at liberty?—I know the question was raised in August 1834, when the British statute came into force; I was the first person who raised it.

4537. Do you know anything of the decision of it, and the measures taken in consequence of that decision?—I do not; but I have stated before, that I believe that if the decision has been favourable, it has not been carried into practice.

4538. Do you believe, from any means of knowledge you possess, that any individual apprentices, not duly registered, are still held in apprenticeship, notwithstanding the Governor's proclamation?—Yes.

4539. Can you state any instances that have come to your knowledge?—I believe on Mr. Batty's estate.

4540. Sir James Graham.] Is there no public officer whose duty it is to watch the register, and to compare it with the returns of slaves?—There is not.

4541. What was the registrar?—The registrar was the island secretary.

4542. Sir George Grey.] Was he a public officer?—It was a public office.

4543. Was not his duty, before he registered a slave, to compare the return presented to him with the previous registry, and to examine the slave himself, so as to see that he corresponded with the original registry, if any doubt existed upon the fact?—Certainly it was not; that never was done in any single instance.

4544. Were his duties prescribed by law?—The registration was done in this way: the clerk of the vestry of every parish had a blank in triplicate, which was filled up; one blank so filled up was kept by the clerk of the vestry, another was sent to the office of the island secretary, and a third was transmitted to England; and if you had apprentices, I might have registered them as my own; there was no control whatever; every person registered just as he liked; there was no officer to inspect it.

4545. Sir James Graham.] Previous to the registration there was no inspection of the status of the individual registered?—There was not. All that was needed to enable the person to claim the compensation was a proof merely of the registration, by means of a certificate made by the island secretary, stating that there there had been a registry of so many slaves, which was to this effect, "I certify that A. B. registered such a number of slaves, in such a parish, at such a time;" and that was the certificate upon which the compensation was claimed.

4546. Supposing that there were, in a certain parish, 700 apprentices registered, while in point of fact, there were 800 apprentices working, was there any means of checking the number?—There was not.

4547. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to say that they were registered en masse, 700 slaves, on such an estate, or did not the name and the age appear on the registry?—In the first registration in 1817 the names of all the parties and their supposed ages, and complexion and country were particularized. In the next registration, the return would be males, by the last return so many, females, by the last return, so many, increase so many, decrease so many, stating whether it was an increase by birth, or increase by purchase.

4548. If they had increased by birth, or by purchase, were the names of those slaves, who had been born or purchased, inserted in the registration?—In most cases they were; scarcely an exception.

4549. Sir James Graham.] Supposing there had been a fraudulent importation of 100 slaves upon any estate, and that fact was suppressed in the return, was there any means, on the part of Government, to check such surreptitious increase?—It would have been known immediately, because it was the interest of the planters themselves to prevent it, as it would have given an exclusive advantage to a few; and I am satisfied that, during the time I was in Jamaica no such circumstance took place, from the abolition of the African slave trade to 1835.

4550. Was there any means of checking it on the part of the Government?—The registration did not give the slightest facility in the prevention of it. In a few cases, where domestics were illegally imported, the law officers proceeded on parol evidence.

4551. Sir George Grey.] How did the question arise with regard to those individual apprentices, who you say were proved not to have been registered having been omitted in the subsequent registries?—I believe that the first instance of it that took place was in the case of a negro claimed as an apprentice by Mr. M'Dowal. I raised the question of absolute freedom, for want of legal registration, before Dr. Madden.

4552. What proof was there of the identity of the individuals, if the register was so vague as you state it to have been?—I never knew an instance of a slave denying his identity; I never knew any dispute about it.

4553. How can you prove that that individual slave was omitted in the 700?—You must take parol evidence to ascertain it; for instance, there is scarcely an estate in which there is not some slight omission as to the registry; if there were 500 registered and 501 upon the estate, it would be a question of parol evidence which was the one not duly registered, at least it would be the only evidence you could get.

4554. Do you mean to say, that supposing the alleged registered slave was named John Brown, there would be no means of saying whether at any prior time the same slave had been registered by that name?—There would not; the negro was probably registered by the name of Cupid or Mercury or Nero, and he would get christened, taking some elegant christian name and a surname equally beautiful, but utterly different. Suppose 700 negroes were registered upon an estate in 1817, and one of them was named Nero, and that he thought proper to take, as many of them did take, the name of James Graham, there would be no means, except by parol evidence, of ascertaining that there was an identity between Nero and James Graham, because it would not appear on the register.

4555. Has there never been, up to the time of the change from slavery to apprenticeship, nor since the apprenticeship began, any public officer whose duty it was to compare the register with the actual number upon the plantation?—There never was; my reason for mentioning the name of James Graham, is this; I recollect an immense number of negroes upon the Three Mile River estate, who, I understood, took that name from the original proprietor.

4556. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to say, that assuming the fact to be that orders were sent from the Government here to Lord Sligo to liberate all that had not been duly registered, and if those orders have been carried into effect, parties liberated may have been duly registered, and some of the parties

A. H. Beaumont,

remaining in apprenticeship may be those who were not duly registered?—It might happen, but it is not likely, because the identity would be admitted by the negroes themselves; but if a dispute arose, it would be almost impossible to determine the fact. In the original registry of 1817, the mother is, in many cases, registered as younger than her daughter; it is all confusion.

4557. Sir James Graham.] Do you think it would be of importance, during the short period that remains of the apprenticeship, that there should be some public officer whose duty it is to check the register by the actual number of apprentices working throughout the island?—I think it would be the means of emancipating a considerable number of persons.

4558. Who are entitled to their freedom, but have no means of proving?—Yes; and if it were the duty of the Governor also to ascertain by what tenure the proprietors held them in slavery, that is, whether there was any colonial title or not, a considerable number more would be emancipated.

4559. Mr. Gladstone.] Can you state any cases in which, as you said, the services of negroes have been sold by the holder of their apprenticeship for 100 dollars, which parties, during slavery, would only have brought 25 or 30 in the market immediately before the Emancipation Act?—Here is a copy of a letter which I sent to the Governor's Secretary with respect to one case, which I will beg leave to deliver in.

[The same was delivered in and read as follows:]

Kingston, Jamaica, 8th April 1835.

Sir,

I AM very unwilling to occupy the attention of his excellency the Governor, and I therefore never appeal to him excepting in cases which admit of no other medium of relief. On the 7th instant, a negro woman apprentice, desiring to purchase her freedom from Miss Bish, of this city, was brought up to be valued before Mr. Nethersole (a magistrate of common law), and special justices Connor and Chamberlaine, magistrates under the Act for Abolishing Slavery in the British Possessions. It appeared, by the evidence of Mr. Colthirst, who was brought forward as a witness by the mistress of the apprenticed labourer, that her annual hire would be 17*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per annum, and out of which he said the mistress would have to deduct 4*l.* for clothing, and 1*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* for medical attendance, leaving the net value of 12*l.* per annum as the utmost she could receive. The magistrate fixed the sum to be paid for freedom in this manner, 17*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* yearly; gross value deducted, one-third for costs and charges 5*l.* 15*s.* 7*d.*,—11*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.*, and this amount multiplied by three and a quarter years' residence of apprenticeship under the law is 37*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* The father-in-law of the apprenticed labourer was compelled to pay the latter sums for the woman's freedom. My evidence that similar services could be procured for one-fourth less than the amount stated by the other witnesses was not regarded on behalf of the apprenticed labourer; I then suggested that an allowance should be made for the probable loss of life, &c., but this was equally disregarded.

Augustus Beaumont.

To W. G. Nunes, Esq.
Secretary to his excellency the Governor of Jamaica,
&c. &c. &c.

Sir,

The King's-house, 21 April 1835.

I FIND I have omitted acknowledging the receipt of your letter, complaining, in the first instance, of the valuation of a non-prædial apprentice of Miss Bish, of Kingston, for 38*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* currency, which you considered more than her worth; and in the next place, raising a doubt as to the validity of the proceedings under the Acts by which the special magistrates were guided.

The operation of the Act of 4th July and the Act of 22nd December 1834, in Aid, explaining, amending and repealing parts of the Abolition Act, never having before been questioned; and as the decision appears to have been in strict conformity with the regulations established for arriving at the value of the unexpired term of the said apprenticeship, the interference of his excellency is not considered necessary; and if the parties imagine they have any grounds for dissatisfaction, it is open to them to adopt such ulterior measures as they may think fit.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, W. G. Nunes, Secy.

A. H. Beaumont, Esq.

No ulterior means were practicable.

4560. Sir George Grey.] Have you any knowledge of the value at which the labour of any apprentices has been transferred from one party to another since the the Emancipation Act took effect, and are you able to compare the selling price of apprentices between party and party with the selling price of a slave previously to the apprenticeship?—Taking the sale at which the apprentices of an estate had been sold en masse, would be the only criterion. Apprentices were scarcely ever sold singly after August 1834; it was a species of property few cared to purchase; I have been repeatedly offered apprentices for 30 to 40 dollars in Kingston, from 10*l.* to 14*l.* currency, and in the sale of an insolvent's estate they brought about that sum.

4561. Chairman.] You stated that you consider the value of landed property in Jamaica to have risen 25 per cent. since the emancipation?—I know that the houses in Kingston and in the towns generally have risen in that proportion.

4562. Do you mean putting the compensation money out of the question?—That would not affect the value of the land; I know an instance in which I was personally interested where property in houses has risen 25 per cent.

4563. Do you think plantations have risen in the same proportion?—Perhaps not quite so much, but they have risen very considerably. I know of some purchases, recently, in which much larger sums were given for sugar plantations than would have been given a year or two anterior to the passing of the Emancipation Act; for instance, a property was sold the other day, Dean's Valley Dryworks estate, in Westmoreland; it was sold by Mr. Barron to the chief magistrate of Westmoreland, the Honourable Thomas M'Neil, and he paid 5,000*l.* sterling for it, I believe; no person, a year before the Emancipation Act passed, would have seriously thought of giving 3,000*l.* for it, exclusive of the compensation.

4564. Sir James Graham.] May not that improved value be ascribed to public opinion being in favour of the present system as compared with the system of slavery which existed before?—Yes; it arises from this, that previous to the emancipation, all reasoning men were aware that whether the British nation interfered or not, slavery must come to an end; that it was impossible to perpetuate it, and when the nation did interfere, every person felt that there was more permanent security for property under the new law; but I think property would have risen still more had there been entire emancipation.

4565. Sir George Grey.] Was there not a great depreciation in the value of slaves before the Act passed?—It was in many instances nearly valueless. I know that very large sums have been made by gentlemen who purchased slaves immediately anterior to the apprenticeship, with the idea that there might be compensation, and they have realized out of the compensation a much larger sum than they gave for the slaves.

4566. Do you think they bought them at a fair value?—I think at the time they gave the market value of the estate.

4567. Was the value of slaves lower a few years before the Emancipation Act than it had been some years before?—The value of slaves had decreased from 1823 to 1833.

4568. What was the difference between 1823 and 1833?—A slave that was worth from 80*l.* to 100*l.* in May 1823, would have been sold immediately after the insurrection in Jamaica up to August 1834, for 20*l.* and 25*l.*, and even so low as 10*l.*, 12*l.* and 14*l.*

4569. Sir James Graham.] Then whatever may be your own opinion as to the comparative merits of immediate emancipation and of gradual emancipation under apprenticeship, public opinion, as marked by the value of property, is decidedly in favour of that which is now in progress?—Decidedly in favour of it as compared with slavery; but in Antigua, where they have adopted entire emancipation, I have understood that the value of property has increased in a greater ratio.

4570. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware whether in Antigua the previous depreciation was equal to what it was in Jamaica?—I should think the depreciation was much greater in Jamaica than anywhere else.

4571. Mr. Gladstone.] What was your own occupation while resident in Jamaica?—I originally had been a proprietor of the largest newspaper in the West Indies, from which I derived an income of 8,000*l.* a year, and the whole of which I lost, directly or indirectly, in consequence of advocating compulsory manumission, the abolition of female flogging and ultimate emancipation.

4572. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to say that in that newspaper you advocated those measures?—No; I was not the editor of it; my state of health had

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

22 July 1836.

had been for several years extremely bad, previously to my bringing forward those motions, and at this time I ceased to be connected with the press.

4573. Did a newspaper advocating those opinions bring an income of 8,000*l.* a year?—O no; they were very contrary opinions; the fact is, that I myself was brought up with all the feelings of a slave-owner, and it was not till a late period that I quitted them; I had then to choose between future station in life on the one hand, and principle on the other; I lost the first and kept the last.

4574. Chairman.] Had you in the House of Assembly uniformly supported the opinions which you have now expressed to the Committee?—No, I told you I was brought up with different opinions; in December 1831 I considered that it was necessary to get rid of slavery, and I thought, as preliminary steps, they ought to abolish the flogging of women, to enable the slaves to buy their own freedom, and to appoint a committee of the House of Assembly to see if there was not some neutral ground on which we could meet the British nation and provide for emancipation, for there was no reasoning man that was not satisfied that in all respects it would be much better that the question should be settled; in order to go very carefully about it, I wrote a letter to the members of the House of Assembly, and which I caused to be printed for private circulation; I sent two copies of it to the Governor, Lord Belmore; Lord Belmore told me that he most highly approved of the opinions contained in it, and he intended to send one copy to Lord Grey, and he asked me for one to send to the Colonial Office; he promised me his support in carrying the measures through, but which support I never got, although I think that if I had had that support I should have succeeded. As a proof that my measures on the subject of slavery were apparently approved by the Governor of Jamaica, the Earl of Belmore, I beg leave to quote the following letter from him to me:—"My dear Sir,—I do not imagine the Parliamentary paper I send you will be palatable to all tastes in the House of Assembly, but Lord Goderich's despatch, R. 59. No. IV. is certainly drawn up with ability, and I think you will read it with some interest. I have desired Nunes to send it you early in the morning, as you may then have more time to peruse it. Yours very faithfully, Belmore." Several members of the House of Assembly came to my house and conversed with me on the subject; they said they highly approved of the propositions, and would support them; the day the propositions were to be made by myself and by my friend, Mr. Watkis, several members, and amongst others, Mr. Walker, the member for St. Ann's, told me that though they were still of opinion that the measures were extremely advantageous, they were so afraid of what they called public opinion that they must vote against them, and upon a division which took place upon the question of compulsory manumission, my friend, Mr. Watkis, and I alone divided for it; and for the abolition of female flogging myself and Mr. Watkis and Mr. Salmon alone voted for it; Mr. Salmon afterwards left us, and upon another occasion he voted against us. A petition was then sent from the parish which I represented, signed, amongst others, by a very respectable gentleman of the name of Williams, praying the House not to receive any motion that was made which would interfere at all with the state of slavery. The Governor showed me this, and also an application which had been made to another person to succeed me in the House of Assembly, as my constituents meant to call upon me to resign my seat. I told the Governor that as I had promised them that whenever they were dissatisfied I would resign, it was my intention to do so, which I did. This gentleman, Mr. Williams, who had first signed the petition against any changes in slavery, opposed me at the election; I was, notwithstanding, returned. Immediately after this a vacancy took place in the parish in the office of chief magistrate, and the gentleman then chosen by the Governor to fill the office was this gentleman who had procured the petition against any changes in slavery; as a matter of course he held the office of chief of the militia in that place; the consequence was, that partly owing to my want of popularity, from having brought forward these measures, and partly owing to the whole influence being thrown by the Government into the hands of those persons who were peculiarly unfavourable to any change in slavery, upon a subsequent dissolution of the Assembly, I lost my seat. I refer to these circumstances, apparently trivial, in anticipation of the abuse which I am sure to receive from the colonial party, who, whenever they are unable to reply to facts, proceed to blacken the reputations of those who have stated them. So unpopular did I become in Jamaica in consequence of advocating the cause of the slave, that Mr. Hamilton Brown, member in Assembly for St. Ann, in that place assured me my life would be in danger if I travelled in that part of the country.

4575. Mr. Buxton.] Had you any command at the time of the rebellion?—I had; I raised and commanded a corps of horse, called the Cornwall Rangers, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel commandant. During the whole time we were on duty we never spilled one drop of human blood, nor sent one man for trial, but we persuaded several thousands to return to work, showing them the uselessness of resistance against the army.

4576. Did you receive any public thanks for the mode in which you conducted yourself upon that occasion?—I did; first for raising amongst the insurgent slaves a corps of pioneers for the use of the King's troops, and then for other services when I raised another corps, but of freemen. With the permission of the Committee I will produce some of the documents.

[The Witness delivered in the same, which are as follows:]

My dear Sir,

PERMIT me, on my part, in addition to the official list, herewith to thank you for the notes of distance, &c. &c., at the end of your report, which, in the dearth of topographical details, are of the first value; pray continue them as long as you are moving in that dark country.

Yours truly,

G. Hillier, D. A. G.,

Lieutenant-Colonel, with colonial rank of Major-General.

Lieutenant-Colonel Beaumont.

Dear Beaumont,

Head Quarters, Montego Bay, February 12, 1832.

LORD BELMORE agrees to your corps being disembodied, the service of the country no longer requiring them. He is much pleased with the zeal you and your officers and men have manifested, and so am I. You have been of the most essential use. You deserve my thanks for the ready despatch exhibited in meeting my wishes and organizing the corps amidst opposition and difficulties that required an energetic mind to meet. I beg you will ride into the Bay this evening, if not inconvenient, as Lord Belmore desired me to say he should be glad to see you, and I also wish to speak to you.

Believe me, dear Beaumont, yours truly,

Willoughby Cotton.

Lieutenant-Colonel Beaumont.

Sir,

Head Quarters, Montego Bay, February 12, 1832.

THE state of the country no longer requiring the Cornwall Rangers to remain embodied, I have moved his excellency the Captain General to permit that they may return to their homes.

To this his lordship has acceded, and I request you will accordingly give the necessary orders to this effect.

It gratifies me to communicate to you the Captain General's approbation of the conduct of your corps since it has been formed. I have at the same time to request you will yourself accept, and make known to your officers and men my acknowledgments of the active and harrassing service they have gone through, and for the ready willingness with which they have met the duties they were called upon to perform.

To yourself personally, my thanks are also due for the instant readiness with which you met my wishes, in raising this corps, under circumstances that required much energy.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your very obedient servant,

Lieutenant-Colonel Beaumont, &c. &c. &c.

Willoughby Cotton, M. G. C.

(No. 1.)

G. O.

Head Quarters, Montego Bay, February 13, 1832.

THE state of the country allowing the Cornwall Rangers to return to their homes, Lieutenant-Colonel Beaumont will be pleased to give the necessary orders to this effect, and he will take measures for restoring to their proper owners such horses as may have been taken by his men for the public service, leaving such as are not immediately owned, at some spot (of which he will give notice), in order to their being claimed.

(No. 2.)

THE Major-General commanding has already expressed to Lieutenant-Colonel Beaumont his acknowledgments for the services rendered by himself and the corps under his orders, and has requested him to convey the same to his officers and men; and he has pleasure in thus publishing to the army at large his sense of the usefulness and of the activity exhibited by the Cornwall Rangers.

By command,

G. Hillier, D. A. G.

A. H. Beaumont,

22 July 1836

The House of Assembly of Jamaica, enraged that I had performed my public duty without bloodshed, accused me of having caused the insurrection, and instituted a species of impeachment against me, which is to be found in the minutes of their proceedings, 1831-1832, page 335. Sir Willoughby Cotton was examined by them on oath in respect to me, as follows:—Q. What was the conduct of Mr. Beaumont during the rebellion?—A. As far as came under my knowledge highly praiseworthy. I recommended to the Governor the appointment of Mr. Beaumont to be lieutenant-colonel of a corps; I thought it expedient to be raised, and his conduct whilst in command of that corps was highly useful, enterprising and active.

Dear Beaumont,

Devonport, October 5, 1835.

I RECEIVED yours this morning, and I have much pleasure in writing you the letter you wish, stating that in the rebellion in Jamaica, I authorized your raising a corps of cavalry, and that you had the command of it with the local rank of lieutenant-colonel-commandant, and that I had every reason to be satisfied with your zeal and exertions whilst in the command.

Yours, always truly, Willoughby Cotton, M. G.

I am actuated by no miserable egotism in placing these documents before the Committee, but aware of the vituperation which my evidence is sure to call down upon me, I wish that the Committee may judge of the estimation my evidence is entitled to, by considering the estimation in which the witness was held by those whose good opinion is at all events not less valuable than that of Jamaica planting attornies.

I beg leave to make an observation with reference to a remark implied in a question in my former examination; I am not exactly in the situation of a by-stander, because all my relations are proprietors of property in the island of Jamaica, and most of them of property in apprentices; myself and my wife have property in the island; and I am as deeply interested in its real welfare as anybody can be, certainly more than most planting attornies, because I have no property any where else, though it is not slave property; and what is of more consequence, the excellence of many of my nearest relations and friends is contingent upon the well-being of the colony. I will beg leave to hand in the following letter as a part of my evidence from a gentleman who has the management of Witney plantation in Clarendon; it appears to me to give some important information with respect to the management of the apprentices and the feelings of planting attornies. The extract from the letter is as follows:—

Witney, 11 November 1835.

I WROTE the planting attorney, that the apprentices were behaving and working as well as I could possibly wish; that I expected to double last year's crop, and that there had not been a complaint since the new system commenced. The reply was, "I observe that when any thing regarding the apprentices is brought forward, your manner and style of writing me is extremely dictatorial and quite different from the way I am addressed by the other gentlemen on the estates under my charge, and I have only to observe that the sooner and the more satisfactory it will be to me that you resign your situation." Now I will inform you what annoys this gentleman. I asked him to allow the apprentices to be educated by an independent minister, residing at the foot of the hill; he said he would sooner let the children alone; however, I agreed with Mr. Slatyer (the independent minister), that he should educate the whole of the people on the estate, without consulting with Mr. —, the planting attorney, and I am happy to state that most of them can read a little, and some have commenced writing. This is the real cause of offence.

The writer of the present letter, Mr. Samuel Carson, is in circumstances to place him beyond the vengeance of the planting attorney, or I should not refer to his letter, and I adduce it to prove the hostility of planting attornies against the moral well-being of the negroes; for, not satisfied with a double crop, in this as in other circumstances, they desired to prohibit their black fellow men from receiving any species of information or increase of intelligence.

The following letter received from one of the negroes illegally held by the Honourable Mr. Bernard, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature (or King's Bench) in Jamaica, shows the manner in which that gentleman continued the illegal proceedings mentioned in the preceding part of my evidence:

Honoured Sir,

Kingston, November 26, 1835.

I AM compelled, in consequence of the disgraceful manner in which we have been treated by Mr. Bernard, to address the following information to your consideration, which I hope will bear a small portion of your attention. About three months after your departure, all of us was taken up, by the instruction of Mr. Bernard, by the police of Kingston, where we

we was residing, handcuffed and carried to Spanish Town, then brought before the special magistrate of that town, a Mr. Moseby, who convicted us to the house of correction for ten days; myself and Robert Johnson was ten days breaking stones within the house of correction; Allan Rockitt was a month on the highway, breaking stones; George Rockitt was flogged, received 25 lashes, and sent to Dawking's Common; Susan Rockitt absented herself, or she might have had her share; Mr. John Williams, the executor, was compelled to interpose in our behalf, in sending a petition to the Governor; his excellency committed the case to the consideration of the Attorney-General, who has not decided on the matter as yet; our eyes are looking for the speedy and beneficial protection which we are aware you are able to render us. Food given to us while confined, one quart of corn and a piece of shad a day for each man, which was very disagreeable; I was compelled to go to Mr. Watkis, but finding him very sick I could not say any thing respecting the matter; I add no more, honoured sir, but remain, with every good wish towards your well-being,

Robert Baswell.

A. H. Beaumont,
Esq.

22 July 1836.

P. S. Robert Johnson is still on Dawking's Common, detained by Mr. Bernard.
To Augustus H. Beaumont, Esq.

John Oldham, Esq., called in; and Examined.

4577. Chairman.] YOU have long resided in Jamaica?—Twenty-two years.

4578. Are you a proprietor of land there?—I am.

4579. To which estate apprenticed negroes are attached?—Yes.

4580. In what parish have you principally resided?—In St. Mary's, and I have estates at St. George's, Portland, and St. Thomas's in the Vale.

4581. Have you been extensively employed as an attorney in managing estates in Jamaica?—Yes; I had about 4,000 apprentices under my charge.

4582. When did you leave Jamaica?—On the 29th of May last.

4583. Have you had those estates under your management from the period of the passing of the Emancipation Act up to the moment when you left Jamaica?—I have.

4584. Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee what your general opinion is of the manner in which the apprenticeship system is working?—I consider the apprenticeship system is working remarkably well. Immediately after the Act came into operation, the negroes gave a great deal of trouble, and, I believe, at the time the special magistrates were severe; but they, the special magistrates, were unacquainted with the negro character, and the negroes were under the impression that there was no law to compel them to work, that they had unlimited freedom, that they had no business to turn out any one day in the week, and they set the magistrates at defiance.

4585. Do you think, under those circumstances, the special magistrates were too severe?—They were obliged to be so at that time. The returns will show the punishments, which were all reported to the Governor; I believe those returns were given in on oath.

4586. Are you of opinion that the negroes have now come to a more correct understanding of the nature of their situation, and that a better feeling exists between them and their employers?—Yes, I feel confident of it, and it is improving every day.

4587. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that, in the first instance, you think there was severity greater than you approved of?—Yes, I think the local magistrates would not have been so severe, and the negroes thought so.

4588. You think the special magistrates were, in the first instance, more severe than the local magistrates would have been, but that that necessity no longer exists?—Yes.

4589. Are you aware that there has been an increase in the number of punishments in the last year as compared with the first year?—I should think not; I think it is quite impossible; all the reports which I have heard from the special magistrates, when travelling about the islands, state that they have few or no complaints, either from the master or from the apprentice.

4590. Your impression is that there has been a considerable diminution?—Very considerable.

4591. But supposing it should appear by the official returns that there has been an actual increase, and that that increase amounts to 10,000, then your view as to the present condition of the negro will be altered?—No; the first three months after the Act came into operation was the time when the greatest number of punishments took place, and since that there have been very few in comparison, so far as my knowledge goes.

4592. Have you had access to the returns of the number of punishments between
0.58. August

John Oldham, Esq.

- John Oldham, Esq.* August 1834 and August 1835?—No, I have not, but I understood so, not only from the special magistrates but from Lord Sligo himself and my own observation.
22 July 1836.
4593. Mr. Gladstone.] When did you understand it from Lord Sligo?—I think I was with Lord Sligo in May.
4594. Mr. Buxton.] When you say there has been a diminution of punishment, do you mean a diminution of all punishment or only corporal punishment?—A diminution of corporal punishment.
4595. Are you able to say whether there has been an increase of punishment or a diminution altogether?—Altogether I should say, because the negroes are better disposed and understand the law better, and there is a better feeling between the managers and the apprentices.
4596. Then your opinion of the improvement that has taken place rests partly upon the fact that there has been a decrease of the total number of punishments corporal and otherwise?—Yes.
4597. Sir George Grey.] Irrespective of the number of punishments, has there been an increase or a decrease in the severity?—A decrease; the magistrates seldom or never have occasion now to make use of the cat, they generally use switches.
4598. You are speaking of estates under your own immediate management?—And in my own immediate neighbourhood, the results of my own observation.
4599. Sir James Graham.] Is the use of the switches a light punishment?—It is a punishment that is generally made use of in schools, a kind of rod.
4600. How is the rod composed, of ebony?—There is only one part of the island where ebony can be procured; it is any kind of bushes that are growing near the house; I have been 22 years in the island of Jamaica, and I never saw an ebony bush or tree; we have not any of it on the north side of the island.
4601. Sir George Grey.] How many special magistrates are there upon the estates which have been under your control?—There are two in each of the parishes; there are four now in St. Mary's; the other parishes are St. George's, Portland and St. Thomas's in the Vale, and two magistrates in each.
4602. Then the conduct of about eight magistrates has come under your observation?—Yes.
4603. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that switches are used; are females flogged with the switch?—Never.
4604. Has no instance of it come to your knowledge?—I heard of one, and that was the only case; I think the name was Slowly.
4605. Was that upon a plantation or in a workhouse?—In the workhouse; it never has occurred to my knowledge on a plantation, and only one case in a workhouse.
4606. Sir George Grey.] And a prosecution took place of Slowly in consequence of that?—Yes.
4607. What was the result of that prosecution?—I did not hear the result.
4608. Had it been brought to an issue before you left the island?—I do not think it was.
4609. Is it considered that that act was illegal?—Certainly.
4610. Has any instance come to your knowledge of chaining women and working them in chains in public streets?—Never, unless by order of a special magistrate; no other person can order it.
4611. Has such an instance occurred under the direction of a special magistrate?—They must have occurred; I have seen them working in the streets in Kingston.
4612. Was this during the time of apprenticeship?—I am only speaking with reference to apprenticeship.
4613. You have seen females working in chains there in the public streets?—Yes.
4614. Sir George Grey.] Those females had been sentenced to the penal gang?—Yes, for punishment.
4615. Mr. Buxton.] Does the special magistrate specifically order that they shall be worked in chains in the street, or does he sentence them to the penal gang; and then does the other magistrate direct the punishment?—The other magistrate cannot order any punishment, but they are sentenced to the penal gang by the special magistrate, and chained two together.
4616. Sir George Grey.] Have you had any opportunity of inspecting the interior of any workhouse yourself?—Yes, I have been in St. Mary's workhouse, and in St. George's.

John Oldham, Esq.

22 July 1836.

4617. Have any persons been confined in those workhouses except apprenticed labourers?—Yes; we have only one place of confinement in each parish.

4618. Do you mean to confine that observation to the parish with which you are personally conversant, or to extend it to the whole island?—I do not know any parish in the island, except Trelawney, where they have two.

4619. In the workhouses which you yourself have had an opportunity of inspecting, are free people confined in common with apprenticed labourers?—The same; I know an instance of a gentleman of respectability being sent there for setting a court of inquiry at defiance, under the militia law.

4620. Mr. Buxton.] Do you know any instance during apprenticeship, in which a white person has been sent there?—I cannot call to my recollection, except seamen.

4621. Do you know any instance in which a white person, of any description, has been sent there?—I do not know of any, with the exception before mentioned.

4622. Sir George Grey.] Do you know any instance in which free persons of colour have been sent?—Yes.

4623. Do you know any instance in which a white person has been committed at all since the apprenticeship?—There are very few cases that have occurred in the island, with the exception of seamen.

4624. In the cases that came under your own observation, were they all chained?—I saw some in irons, but not in chains.

4625. Are any negroes sentenced to confinement, and not to penal gangs, put in chains?—Decidedly not; they would not dare to do so.

4626. What is the description of chain?—It is a very light chain, and a very light collar.

4627. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that you have not seen any white person during the time of the apprenticeship in those houses; did you ever see any in the penal gang?—No, I never have; white people very seldom commit themselves in that way; if they do, it is generally seamen, and the local magistrates get them sent on board of ship.

4628. Do you mean to say that there is not a very low class, low in morals and low in property, of white persons in the island?—No, very few, except in towns.

4629. Mr. Gladstone.] Are free brown persons sentenced to penal gangs to work in chains?—I have never heard of any.

4630. Mr. Buxton.] Have you any idea of the proportion of crime between the white and coloured population in Jamaica?—There are so few of the white population that I can form no idea.

4631. Are you aware of the fact, that the number of white offenders is considerably greater in proportion to the population than the number of coloured persons who are guilty of crime?—I should think it very likely; a white man in that country, if he loses his character, becomes a vagrant, and can do nothing; he has no means of gaining his livelihood, but a man of colour can.

4632. If the proportion of crime is greater of white than of coloured persons, how happens it that you have not seen, in those places of confinement, any whites; is it that the place is one in which it would be against public feeling to place a white man?—I cannot say; for such offences as manslaughter or theft the white people are sent to the county gaol

4633. Supposing an apprentice were guilty of the same crime as a white man, would he be sent to the county gaol or to the workhouse?—I think he would be sent to the workhouse, in the first instance.

4634. Then, practically speaking, a white man is sent to one gaol and an apprentice is sent to another gaol?—The apprentice would be sent to the gaol where he is tried; if he is tried in the parish of Saint Mary's, he would be sent to Saint Mary's workhouse.

4635. Sir George Grey.] Suppose an apprentice was committed for manslaughter for trial at the assizes?—He would be sent to the county gaol.

4636. Are all apprentices kept in the workhouses who are not under sentence of punishment, but who are committed for trial at the assizes or quarter sessions?—They are sent to the workhouses to wait their trial generally, but if it is any thing that is to be brought forward in the assize court, they are sent to the county gaol.

John Oldham, Esq.
22 July 1836.

4637. If they are to be tried at the assizes, are they sent to the county gaol, and if they are to be tried before any tribunal inferior to the assize court, are they sent to the workhouse?—Yes

4638. Mr. Gladstone.] In fact, is the mode of procedure regulated not by the class to which the party accused belongs, but by the nature of the offence, and by the court before which it is tried?—Yes.

4639. Sir George Grey.] If a free man of colour was committed for trial at the quarter sessions, where would he be sent to?—To the workhouse.

4640. Then the ground of distinction generally is the nature of the offence?—Yes.

4641. Mr. Buxton.] Suppose a white man commits an aggravated assault, where is he sent to?—He would be brought before the local magistrates, and they would decide whether it should be the quarter sessions or the assize court.

4642. If he was sentenced to imprisonment, where would he undergo the term of imprisonment?—If it was for a short period, he would be sent to the workhouse.

4643. Practically, do you think the white prisoners are chiefly confined at the county gaols, and the apprentices at the workhouses?—I do not think there is any distinction.

4644. Did you ever see any white men in the workhouses during the time of apprenticeship?—Yes, I have seen a few cases; they are generally seamen or idle vagabonds.

4645. How many cases have you seen?—There are many seamen sent to workhouses; they are frequently sent there.

4646. You have, in visiting those houses, seen two or three white persons sent there?—I have known them sent there by order of the magistrates.

4647. Have you seen them confined there?—I have.

4648. Are you aware that any of them have been detained in the workhouse for any considerable space of time?—I believe they are allowed by law to sentence them 30 days.

4649. Have you ever seen one that has been confined that period?—I cannot say as to the number of days; but I have known cases where they have been sentenced 30 days.

4650. Sir James Graham.] Is the place of punishment at the workhouse more severe and more disagreeable than the county gaol?—I should say not.

4651. Mr. Buxton.] Have you ever seen a white man working in a penal gang?—I never have.

4652. Would it be offensive to the feelings of the white inhabitants of the colony if a white man were placed in a penal gang, and worked in chains in the street?—I do not think they would sentence a white man to a penal gang.

4653. Sir George Grey.] What has been the practice adopted among the 4,000 apprentices that have been under your control since the first of August 1834, as to the allowances they used to receive during slavery; have they been allowed to retain those allowances?—They receive their allowances the same as before the Abolition Act came into operation.

4654. Has any distinction been made in the allowances?—Immediately after the 1st of August I know that the indulgences were withheld; but it was in consequence of their refusing to work for money or payment of any kind, for extreme bad conduct, setting the magistrates and every body else at defiance.

4655. Sir James Graham.] Do you make a distinction between indulgences and allowances?—Certainly; in their clothing there has been no alteration.

4656. Will you state what you include under the head of allowances, and what under the head of indulgences; first, what are the allowances?—A negro is allowed his house, a certain quantity of clothing; he is allowed every thing that is ordered by the medical man in the hospital; and the mothers of children are allowed a certain quantity of sugar, flour or rice; those I consider under the head of allowances; and we are also bound to furnish them with sufficient land to raise provisions, and a cottage and garden close at home. The indulgences were, on some estates, a certain quantity of fish, herrings and other things; there are many estates in the island that have never had them; they are no part of their allowances; in many estates they were never allowed any.

4657. Then

4657. Then, when the conduct of the slaves was refractory, you stopped the indulgences, but you continued the allowances, and never withheld any portion of the allowances?—None whatever.

4658. Sir George Grey.] Was the stoppage of the indulgences universal among the 4,000 negroes upon the estates under your superintendence?—No.

4659. Did it continue long?—No, it was only temporary; it did not remain in force more than six weeks upon any of the estates.

4660. Sir James Graham.] When you left Jamaica the allowances and all the indulgences were in full operation?—They were.

4661. Mr. Buxton.] Was it the practice, during slavery, to provide water for the negroes in the field?—Yes, and it has been done since.

4662. Was it the practice to provide a person in the field to take care of the children?—Yes, and that continues. I heard that that had been discontinued in some parts of the island; but the moment the proprietor or attorney heard of it they ordered them to be given back.

4663. Chairman.] Do you mean that you give the allowances for the time which the negroes are bound by law to work, without requiring from them to work any extra time in consideration of those allowances?—They receive their allowances for 40½ hours of work in the week.

4664. And the indulgences?—The indulgences they receive for good conduct.

4665. Sir James Graham.] Do you make the indulgences then dependent upon their working extra hours for wages?—Yes.

4666. Mr. Gladstone.] Is that the case not only upon all the properties under your own management, but upon the generality of those with which you are acquainted in the neighbourhood?—I should say generally it was the case.

4667. Mr. Buxton.] Do not you know any case in which the extra time of the negro is required, either in exchange for indulgences or allowances?—Yes, for indulgences.

4668. Sir James Graham.] Your answer did not apply to the 4,000 apprentices under your charge, but it applied to some instances which you knew in other parts of Jamaica?—It applied to both.

4669. With respect to the 4,000 negroes under your charge, in any case has the grant of indulgences been made dependent upon the consent on the part of the negro to work extra hours for wages?—The indulgences have been continued to the negroes for good conduct when they work the number of hours prescribed by law, and did not refuse to work for wages.

4670. Under the head of good conduct, then, do you mean to include the stipulation to work extra hours for wages?—Yes; if they refuse to work for wages the indulgences are stopped; but they receive the same wages for their time which I pay to the owner of jobbing gangs, which is 1s. 8d. for ten hours.

4671. Then it appears that the indulgences are made by you contingent upon the promise to work extra hours for wages; does that extend to the allowances?—Not at all.

4672. Then they get their allowances, whether they consent to work extra hours or no?—Yes.

4673. But the indulgences you would not extend to negroes that would not work extra hours for wages?—No, I would not.

4674. In granting their wages, do you take their indulgences into account?—Not at all; we pay 1s. 8d. for a day of ten hours, and that is what I am paying to the proprietor of a gang when he sends his own people to me to work.

4675. And for single hours you pay in that proportion?—Yes, 2d. an hour.

4676. Then you pay universally for extra hours?—We do.

4677. And when you so pay, do you grant the indulgences as a matter of course in addition to the allowances?—Yes.

4678. Do the jobbing gangs who are paid at the rate of 1s. 8d. receive both indulgences and allowances?—They receive allowances; but how far they receive indulgences I do not know.

4679. Mr. Buxton.] Are you speaking of the amount in currency which is paid to them, or in sterling?—In currency.

4680. What is the proportion between the amount in currency and the amount in sterling?—The English shilling is called a maccaroni in Jamaica, 20d.

4681. Are you aware, that during the time of slavery, in committees that we had of the House of Commons, and in committees of the House of Lords, there was not that distinction made which you have now made between indulgences and allowances; allowances; but credit was taken on the part of the West Indians for all the allowances which were made to the negroes as being the customary and universal allowances which the negroes received?—The allowances have always been the same.

John Oldham, Esq.

2 July 1836.

4682. Did you then hear of the term “indulgences” applied to herrings and articles of that kind?—They were always in the habit of stopping them for misconduct.

4683. Were they called indulgences?—They were.

4684. Were they considered at the disposal of the master?—They were.

4685. Sir James Graham.] How long has this term “indulgences” been in use; has it come into use since the introduction of the apprenticeship in place of slavery?—Ever since I have been in the island.

4686. How long is that?—Twenty-two years.

4687. Chairman.] Do you know whether the consumption of herrings in Jamaica has generally diminished the last few years?—Yes, I think it has; because we get fish much cheaper from British America.

4688. Does the negro like the American fish as well?—Yes, they prefer the shad to anything that we can send out from England.

4689. Do you conceive that the consumption of salt fish generally has diminished in Jamaica?—No, I do not.

4690. Sir James Graham.] Is there any duty of customs by which the quantity imported may be ascertained?—No duty; but the import is easily ascertained from the Custom-house.

4691. Is it matter of certainty from the official returns?—Yes, it can be ascertained from the returns.

4692. Sir George Grey.] You stated there was an indisposition during the first six weeks of apprenticeship on the part of the negroes to work for wages?—Yes, they appeared to do every thing they could to keep the work of the estate back, fancying they were free.

4693. Was there a misapprehension existing at that time on the minds of the negroes, as to the condition in which they had been placed by the operation of the imperial Act?—I think there was.

4694. Subsequently to that period, speaking of the 4,000 apprentices whom you had superintended, has there been a disposition to work for wages in their own time?—There has.

4695. Are there any estates on which they have refused to work for wages?—I have not heard of any since the 1st of January 1835.

4696. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean that that is the case neither among those under your own care or others within the range of your knowledge?—There are none under my own care, nor any within my own knowledge.

4697. Sir James Graham.] Speaking of the negroes as under your own care, should you say that their willingness to work for wages has been progressively increasing?—It has.

4698. Has any taste for luxury been growing, consequent upon the receipt of wages by them?—Decidedly; I was one of those that fancied that it would have been better that the apprenticeship should have been done away with, but I now see that it is advantageous to both parties; the feeling has altered so much, and the negroes understand their own rights and duty much better than they did.

4699. Are they acquiring a knowledge of the value of money, and of the comforts which the possession of money commands?—They are.

4700. Has the furniture of their houses been improving, and their little comforts increasing?—Every thing. They object to the clothing they used to have; they now take money, and buy a better description of clothing.

4701. Then the practice of barter of commodity for commodity is diminishing, and the actual purchase by money is spreading?—It is.

4702. Has any alteration in their moral character been produced by this?—Very great, and has been improving ever since.

4703. What are the particular marks of change?—They attend regularly at church, and are very willing to attend when a clergyman calls them upon the different estates and assembles them together.

4704. Is that willingness to attend to religious duties becoming more general?—More general; the churches are crowded, and we are building others.

4705. Should you say that civilization is evidently progressing among them?—Decidedly.

4706. Chairman.]

4706. Chairman.] Are marriages increasing?—Very fast.

4707. Sir James Graham.] As far as your judgment would go, you would say that the general tone of feeling of the negro population has improved under the apprenticeship system?—It has improved and is improving; and I have no doubt that we shall go from one state to the other almost imperceptibly, from the apprenticeship to the free labour system.

4708. You would view that transition with less alarm than you would have witnessed a sudden and complete emancipation at the time of the passing of the negro apprenticeship law?—Certainly.

4709. That is the result of your experience, not having been originally favourable to that middle state?—Yes.

4710. Mr. Gladstone.] Has the working of the apprenticeship system made converts of many others besides yourself, who were at first unfavourable to it?—Yes, I believe the majority of the people in the island are favourable to it.

4711. Mr. Buxton.] Do you mean by that to include the negroes?—I mean the managers and proprietors.

4712. Mr. Gladstone.] Should you include the negroes or not?—I dare say the negroes would wish to dispense with the apprenticeship; they are fond of any change.

4713. Sir George Grey.] Have you made any preparation with a view to the expiration of the apprenticeship upon the property under your care?—I have.

4714. Have you introduced any regulations which improve their condition?—Yes; long previous to the Abolition Act I did away with corporal punishment as far as females were concerned, and would not allow it in any but extreme cases with males.

4715. Sir James Graham.] Do you think the desire of money and the love of luxury is becoming generally so strong among the apprentices, that, at the expiration of the apprenticeship, they will in future labour for wages and for luxuries, rather than not labour and not have money, and lay aside their luxuries and revert to their former wild condition?—I consider that the majority of them will work for wages.

4716. Mr. Buxton.] Do you consider that they are working for wages now, when wages are fairly offered to them?—I do.

4717. If the negroes are working for wages at this moment, what reason is there that they should not have the same freedom that is enjoyed by persons who work for wages in this country?—If the apprenticeship were done away with we should have to call upon them for rent for their cottages and for their land, and pasturage for their horses, pigs and cattle, and everything they keep now, and for which they do not pay anything. If the apprenticeship was done away with, we should have to pay wages and charge them for those things.

4718. Would it not be a great motive to them to work diligently, that the supply of their wants depended upon it?—I think they would, after the apprenticeship, after the year 1840.

4719. Have you ever met with any body of negroes that preferred the state of apprenticeship to the state of freedom?—I have not; I never spoke to them upon the subject.

4720. Do you believe that there exists a slave upon the whole island that would prefer the apprenticeship?—No, none.

4721. In point of fact, they consider it a hardship, but if they were made free they would begin to consider themselves benefited?—I do not think they consider it a hardship; they appear to be very much pleased with the change.

4722. Sir George Grey.] Have you any doubt that it is a benefit to the planters?—I think both parties are benefited by it.

4723. Sir James Graham.] Have you any doubt that the condition of an apprentice is a happier condition than the condition of a slave?—Their condition is very much improved.

4724. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you believe that there is a strong desire among the apprentices for immediate unqualified freedom?—I think there is.

4725. Is that desire such as materially to interfere with their contentment and satisfaction in their present state?—No, they do not expect it; they expect to serve out their time as apprentices.

4726. Do you think they are well contented with that prospect?—Yes.

4727. Sir James Graham.] Do they clearly comprehend that their present state will end in 1840?—Yes, they are perfectly aware of it.

John Oldham, Esq.

22 July 1836.

4728. Do they look forward with hope and good humour to the expiration of their present condition, or do they view their present condition with bitterness, and look back with disappointment that their freedom is not complete at once?—They did at first, but they now appear perfectly satisfied.

4729. Then you do not anticipate any attempt by force to shorten that period?—None whatever.

4730. You think they will be satisfied with the hope and expectation of the period passing away and now rapidly passing away?—Yes.

4731. Mr. Gladstone.] Then is there, practically, any strong desire among the negroes for immediate unqualified freedom?—Certainly, they would like to be clear of their apprenticeship.

4732. Mr. Burston.] Do you know any reason why, at the expiration of their apprenticeship, they should not have unqualified freedom?—No; and I do not think there are any parties that wish it continued beyond 1840.

4733. The wish of the planters is, that they should have entire and unqualified freedom in 1840?—Yes.

4734. Do you object to any law being introduced which should cripple that freedom?—Yes; but we should require something in the shape of a Vagrant Act, because now the well-disposed people are alarmed, being fearful the bad-disposed will live by robbery then.

4735. What kind of a Vagrant Act would you require?—Mr. Burge would be better able to answer that question.

4736. What restraint would you place upon the liberty of the negroes?—None that I would not place upon whites.

4737. But you would not propose a restraint which should nominally extend to both, but in practice should only extend to the blacks?—Certainly not.

4738. What recommendation would you offer with respect to a vagrant law?—Some law to compel a man to work for his livelihood, or show how he gets his living; many people are living in towns by robbing others; there must be some law to check that; a white man going about the country is taken up if he cannot show how he gets his livelihood.

4739. Would you be satisfied by a law similar to the English law for preventing a person living by theft?—Yes.

4740. Sir James Graham.] We have laws in this country with respect to rogues and vagabonds, would those laws be satisfactory in Jamaica?—I should think so.

4741. Chairman.] Do you believe that the black population will speedily acquire property on becoming free?—Property is not acquired so easily; there are many that will, I have no doubt.

4742. Sir George Grey.] In looking forward to 1840, do the apprenticed population clearly understand that they will then lose their right to the house and pasturage and other indulgences to which you have adverted?—Yes, they are perfectly aware of it.

4743. Do you find any difficulty in obtaining work of any kind at fair wages?—No; the reason there has been so much said about their not working for wages is, that the negroes have a great objection to working on Saturday, and I think they are perfectly justified; they wish to have Saturday to themselves.

4744. Is there any difficulty in getting hoe work done for wages?—None whatever.

4745. The work in crop time, have you any difficulty in getting that done for wages?—None.

4746. Sir James Graham.] The night-work in crop time, is there any difficulty in getting that done for wages?—No, they are anxious to be employed.

4747. Mr. Gladstone.] Have those that are employed about the boilers the same wages as the others?—One shilling and eight pence for ten hours.

4748. Have they no higher wages?—It makes no difference; they prefer working in the manufactory to the field.

4749. Sir James Graham.] You say the negroes are preparing for the change to take place in 1840; are the planters generally preparing for it?—They are.

4750. You think, therefore, that prospective arrangements on both sides are made with a steady view to that change?—I think they are.

4751. Sir George Grey.] You do not think they, the planters, look forward to any extension of the period?—No, they do not wish it.

4752. Sir James Graham.] They are shaping all their arrangements perceptibly with a view to that change?—Perceptibly with that view.

4753. Chairman.]

4753. Chairman.] The public mind is quite settled upon that subject?—It is. John Oldham, Esq.
4754. Mr. Buxton.] It was held by a body of persons in this country, and almost universal in the West Indies during the time of slavery, that it was a romantic and foolish notion that negroes would work for wages; do you think that that notion has proved absurd, or that it is well founded?—I always thought it was absurd to suppose that negroes would not work for wages.
4755. Sir George Grey.] And experience has confirmed your former opinion?—Yes.
4756. Mr. Buxton.] That opinion being, that it is an absurd thing to suppose that negroes would not work for wages?—Yes.
4757. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware whether there were also a class of persons in this country, those most favourable to the interest of the negro, who maintained that the establishment of an intermediate state, like the system of apprenticeship, was a plan of all others the most chimerical and the most impossible to carry into execution?—No, I was not aware of that.
4758. Chairman.] What is the amount of the elective franchise in Jamaica?—I think it is a house of the annual value of 10*l.* currency.
4759. In 1840, will a great number of blacks be in possession of the elective franchise?—I think the best disposed among them will save money during the apprenticeship and purchase lands and houses.
4760. Do you think a sufficient number will be in possession of the elective franchise to give them a considerable influence in the House of Assembly, in case there was any disposition in any portion of the Assembly to treat them unjustly?—A great number of blacks are now freeholders, and our apprentices will be upon a footing with them.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

---

John Oldham, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

4761. Mr. Buxton.] YOU accounted for the desire which you thought the negroes felt for freedom, by saying that they were fond of change at all times?—They are very fond of a change, either of managers or special magistrates. John Oldham, Esq.
4762. Do you think they have no other reason for the desire of complete emancipation except the desire of change?—I think they have no other reason. 26 July 1836.
4763. Would they be equally well pleased to change their situation of apprentices to that of slaves again?—No, I do not think they would; and I doubt whether the planters would wish it, the thing having gone so far.
4764. How many hours do the negroes now work in crop time?—They only work eight hours by law; any hours that they work beyond that they are paid for at the rate of 2*d.* an hour; we seldom employ them more than 12 or 14 hours; it is not our interest to do so.
4765. How many hours consecutively can negroes be employed according to law?—They can only be employed nine hours out of the 24.
4766. Are you a magistrate?—I am a magistrate and assistant-judge for St. Mary's and St. George's.
4767. Are you in the habit of acting as a magistrate?—No; I seldom do unless to take affidavits. I confine myself to my own business in the country.
4768. Are you aware that there are two systems carried into execution in different parts of Jamaica, the one the eight-hour, and the other the nine-hour system?—There are. We work the nine-hour system when the mill is about, in crop time.
4769. Do not you think that the negroes feel themselves aggrieved by the eight-hour system?—No, I do not. We generally make an arrangement to suit the negroes. In some situations they prefer working till seven o'clock, and

John Oldham, Esq. taking Friday afternoon to themselves. On other estates they prefer having three or four hours in the middle of the day. It depends upon where their gardens or provision grounds are.

26 July 1836.

4770. Do you make the arrangement according to their wish and convenience?—We find it our interest to do so; they do more work when they are satisfied with the arrangement.

4771. Then you adapt the system to the convenience and to the desire of the negroes?—We endeavour to do so as much as possible.

4772. Do not you think that it would be desirable that the system which the negroes might find the most convenient to themselves should be adopted upon all the estates?—Yes, it generally is. The same system would not answer upon all estates.

4773. Have you heard of any case in which the eight-hour system has been imposed on the negroes as a kind of penalty for offences?—I could not name any cases.

4774. Mr. Gladstone.] Has the eight-hour system been generally in operation upon the properties with which you have been concerned, or the nine-hour system?—Both. Upon some estates the people work the eight-hour system, and upon others the nine.

4775. Which do you think is the most popular among the negroes?—I cannot say whether the greatest number of estates work eight or nine hours.

4776. Which system do you think is most popular among the negroes?—The negroes would prefer working four and a half days, that is, the nine-hour system.

4777. Is that preference so decided as to cause considerable discontent if the eight-hour system is adopted?—No, I do not think so.

4778. When they work the eight-hour system, can they employ the time beneficially to themselves on their gardens and provision grounds?—Yes.

4779. You said that the negroes can only be employed nine hours in a day according to the law; is that an opinion which you yourself have formed from inspection of the law, or do you merely report the current opinion in Jamaica?—I should say that is the law; they work 45 hours in each week. In crop time five days of nine hours.

4780. Are you aware whether the special magistrates assume that to be the law in the administration of the Abolition Act?—I cannot say; I should suppose so.

4781. Supposing you were to desire a negro to work 12 hours in the day without any offer of wages, would he consider himself bound to obey it?—He would not obey it.

4782. Are you aware whether, in case of a negro making a complaint upon such a subject, the special magistrate would adjudicate, or whether any such complaints have been made, and the special magistrates have adjudicated that they cannot be worked more than nine hours a day without remuneration?—The negroes are sensible that the law does not allow it to be done, and I never heard of any person attempting to enforce it.

4783. Practically, are you aware of any case in which an attempt has been made to make the negroes work more than eight hours without wages?—No, I am not, except in crop time, when they work nine.

4784. Do you know whether a legal question has been raised in Jamaica as to the right of a master to exact a greater quantity of labour?—No, I never heard it raised.

4785. Can you give the Committee any information as to the proportion in which the nine-hour system and the eight-hour system prevail over the island of Jamaica, according to the best of your belief?—It is not in my power to do so.

4786. Do you think the greater number of estates are worked by the nine-hour or the eight-hour?—I should think the greater number of estates are worked by the eight-hour system.

4787. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware of negroes having been worked at the rate of 10 hours a day for the allowances?—No, I do not believe the negroes would do it.

4788. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware whether Lord Sligo has exerted himself lately, so far as recommendation goes, to secure the adoption of the nine-hour system in preference to the eight, as being more acceptable to the negroes?—No, I am not.

4789. You

4789. You are not aware of the instructions he issued to the special magistrates upon the subject?—No, I have seen very few of them. There was a system of keeping mills about 16 hours in the day, but it was not the same negroes. The negroes who came on spell at four A. M. attended the mill until 12 A. M., and another gang relieved them at 12, and worked until eight at night,

John Oldham, Esq.

26 July 1836.

4790. Mr. Gladstone.] You have stated that no negro works more than nine hours a day upon the properties under your care, upon any estates within your knowledge, without wages. Can you state the extreme number of hours which a negro ever works within your knowledge, wages included?—I have known negroes working for wages to keep the mill about till 12 at night.

4791. From what hour in the morning?—Commencing at six.

4792. With regular intervals for meals, or getting his meals at spell times?—The way we arrange for the meals is to give an extra hand; for instance, among the cane carriers we put four instead of three, so that there is always one sitting down.

4793. How many hours of actual labour would there be in the case you have mentioned, the working from six in the morning till 12 at night?—About 10 hours.

4794. And that is the extreme which has fallen within your knowledge?—I have no doubt that the negroes would be willing to work longer than that for wages, but the manager would not allow them, because they would not be able to do a fair proportion of work the next day.

4795. You think there is a disposition in the negro to extend the time in which he works for wages, and in the manager to restrict it within certain limits?—Yes; negroes have applied to me to work the whole spell, but I would not allow them to do so; if the negro works the whole night for wages, he is not able to do a fair proportion of work for me in the eight or nine hours the next day.

4796. How many hours are included in the term you use, "the whole spell"?—The whole night; but it is not the interest of the proprietor to allow it. I beg to observe that Mr. Beaumont stated the other day that on an estate with 500 negroes there were only 240 that could keep spell. I should have no objection to allow that, although incorrect. He stated that they were divided into two spells of 120 each. I beg to state that the largest gang on spell I ever heard of in Jamaica was not more than 30; consequently each of those spells could be divided into four. We do not require more than 30 hands upon spell for a large estate, and 20 for a small one.

4797. Sir George Grey.] When you speak of a large estate, should you call the example mentioned by Mr. Beaumont a large estate or a small one?—I should call that a large estate with 520 negroes; he stated that there were 240 to keep spell; I state that 30 on each spell are sufficient.

4798. Mr. Gladstone.] Is the mill put about all night upon any of the estates under your management?—None under my management; I only know one estate, Shrewsbury in Portland, and upon that estate the negroes do so willingly for wages.

4799. Does your general knowledge extend to many estates in the island?—A great many on the north side.

4800. Are the estates under your management generally full-handed estates, or weak-handed?—Generally full-handed.

4801. Do you find it quite practicable to get off the crop and to grind the canes without continuing the work through the night?—Yes; it is not continued through the night upon any one estate.

4802. Sir George Grey.] Can you give the Committee any accurate information as to the quantity of sugar made upon any estate under your management in the last year?—Yes; on Esher estate in St. Mary's, the property of Messrs. Mitchells, they had equal to 400 hogsheads.

4803. How many negroes were upon the estate?—About 400.

4804. Was that the first crop after the apprenticeship system came into operation?—Yes.

4805. What was the amount of that crop as compared with the previous year?—It had made 400 hogsheads the three previous years.

4806. What was the prospect for the next crop when you left Jamaica?—I expect to make from 350 to 400.

4807. Can you state the particulars with respect to the other estates?—I have an estate in St. Mary's, called Orange Hill Estate; it is a fine property, the land is very good; we have 246 apprentices upon it, and the crop was equal to 340 hogsheads.

John Oldham, Esq.

26 July 1836.

4808. What proportion did that bear to the crop during the three years immediately preceding?—There was a difference of 10 hogsheads. I do not know whether it was more or less.

4809. What was the prospect upon that estate this year?—I expect to make the same.

4810. With reference to the other estates, were the results much the same?—Much the same upon the whole of them.

4811. Was there any sensible falling off in the first crop after the apprenticeship system came into operation as compared with the crops the few years preceding?—No, there was not; there would have been if the negroes had not agreed to work for wages.

4812. But in point of fact, about the same quantity of sugar was made upon those estates?—Yes; and I have paid about 2,000 l. wages to the negroes since August 1834.

4813. That would include the crop of the first year and the preparation for the second?—Yes.

4814. Upon the whole was the appearance of those estates for the next crop as good as it had been in the preceding year?—Yes.

4815. You mean that the wages you gave for the extra labour performed upon the several estates under your management had amounted to about 2,000 l. currency up to the period of your leaving the island?—Yes, on the 29th of May last.

4816. Between the 1st of August 1834 and the 29th of May 1836?—Yes, and additional jobbing.

4817. Is it your opinion that upon the present system the cultivation of sugar may be carried on with the same advantage to the proprietor as it was under the previous system?—I think it might if there was not any interference in England, which only tends to perpetuate the unpleasant feeling which existed immediately subsequent to the 1st of August 1834. I am afraid that the negroes will hear that something is going on in England, and as they invariably misconstrue everything, they will fancy that the apprenticeship is about to be done away with, which will unsettle the minds of the negroes and the present favourable state of things.

4818. Have you invested any property in the purchase of land in Jamaica?—Yes; I have purchased an estate since the Act came into operation.

4819. Are you contemplating any further purchase?—Yes.

4820. Mr. Buxton.] How many negroes are under your direction?—Under 4,000.

4821. What was the amount of compensation received for those 4,000 negroes?—I do not know; we have nothing to do with it in Jamaica; it was all paid in England. I merely had the people valued, and sent home copies of the valuations; I do not know what the parties received.

4822. Can you state about how much?—I should say about 19 l. sterling all round.

4823. That would be about 76,000 l. sterling for the 4,000?—Yes.

4824. What would be the interest of that for the period of 22 months, at 4 l. per cent.?—£. 5,573 6 s. 8 d. sterling.

4825. What would that be in currency?—At 10 per cent. premium, about 8,582 l. currency.

4826. So that in point of fact the planter does not appear to have been a great loser, because he has paid 2,000 l. currency for wages, and he has saved, allowing four per cent. to be the rate of interest, 6,000 l.?—Yes, but he runs a considerable risk; we do not know how the thing will work after 1840.

4827. In this case it is assumed that the rate of interest is four per cent. What was the rate of interest that the planters were charged by the mortgagees in England before?—Five per cent.

4828. Was there not also some condition of sending their consignments to the merchant in London, which also considerably enhanced the payment that was made by the planter?—It was an advantage certainly to the merchant to have the additional business, but the proprietors would have been obliged to consign to some other merchant, if not to him.

4829. Was not there a commission also charged?—The usual commission that would have been charged whether the money had been advanced or not.

4830. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware whether mercantile houses in any branch of trade are in the habit of doing business without commission?—I should think not.

4831. Mr.

4831. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe that any party who was totally unencumbered with any mortgage on his estate could not have made arrangements more advantageous than those persons who were in embarrassed circumstances, and who had mortgages on their estates, did make with their merchants?—No, I see no difference. Upon my own estates, which are unencumbered, the charges are the same.

4832. You think it is no disadvantage beyond the payment of the interest that the planter should have his estate under mortgage?—No, I do not see any.

4833. Then the planter whose estate was mortgaged, supposing that he had the same number of negroes that were under your management, and supposing that the amount of mortgage was 76,000*l.*, has saved five per cent. upon that sum between the 1st of August 1834 and the 31st of May 1836?—He has saved that by paying off part of the mortgage.

4834. Supposing a planter was at this moment in debt 76,000*l.*, paying interest at five per cent., with whatever loss he might also sustain by the commission in the next 22 months, what would be the amount of interest that he would have to pay at five per cent.?—It is 6,966*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* sterling.

4835. What is that in currency?—About 10,728*l.* in currency.

4836. So that in point of fact his loss has been in the last 22 months 2,000*l.*, paid in wages in currency, and his gain will be a saving of 10,000*l.*, making an advantage to him of 8,000*l.* currency?—Yes, for the risk he runs of total failure after the expiration of the apprenticeship.

4837. Sir George Grey.] Do you anticipate a total failure after the expiration of the apprenticeship?—I do not, but the majority of the people do, who are as capable of judging as I am.

4838. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you anticipate that after the expiration of the apprenticeship, supposing all things to go on well, sugar cultivation may be continued as profitably to the planter as it has been in ordinary times?—No, I do not think it can.

4839. In point of fact, what is the general view you take of the income that the planter derives during the apprenticeship. Do you think a prudent man ought to regard it his income, or that he ought to regard it in a considerable degree as the recovery of the capital?—As the recovery of capital.

4840. Can you state what you take as the basis of your own calculation, in determining the price which you offer to give for properties in the West Indies, at how many years' purchase you calculate them?—I would not give more than four years' purchase.

4841. Chairman.] And yet you said that property sells better now than it did immediately before the Emancipation Bill passed?—Immediately before the Emancipation Bill passed negroes could be purchased for almost any sum.

4842. What could landed property in Jamaica be purchased for immediately before the Emancipation Bill passed?—There were no sales.

4843. Do you consider that at this moment landed property is of higher value than it was immediately before the passing of the Emancipation Bill?—I think it is, in consequence of the advance in the price of produce.

4844. You think that the depreciation had gone so far immediately before the passing of the Emancipation Bill, that the state of the market was unnatural; but that now the value of property is in a healthy state, and that there are now some data for calculation, whereas before there were none?—There was none before.

4845. Mr. Thornely.] You are yourself willing to become a purchaser?—Yes, but I am not willing to give more than four years' purchase.

4846. Chairman.] What did estates sell for five years before the Emancipation Act passed?—Estates had been decreasing in value from 1823. The estate which I purchased cost the proprietor 35,000*l.* and I paid 12,070*l.* for it.

4847. Did the 35,000*l.* include the negroes?—Yes.

4848. Can you state any period at which the same estate would have sold for the sum which it is now selling for?—No; I purchased it immediately after the Abolition Act came into operation, at the very worst time.

4849. Are you aware of any estate which has been sold recently?—I was offered Mr. Morris Jones's two estates (he told me they had cost him 50,000*l.*) for 9,500*l.*

4850. When did they cost him 50,000*l.*?—He has had them 25 to 30 years.

4851. For how many years' purchase would you buy those estates?—Those estates had been badly managed, and would take 12 to 18 months to bring them up;

John Oldham, Esq.

26 July 1836.

up; I should say they would not clear themselves in four years, consequently I did not make the purchase.

4852. Mr. Buxton.] When was the estate purchased for which 35,000*l.* were given?—I think in 1822.

4853. Sir George Grey.] Has the price of sugar increased considerably since the alteration in the system?—It has; which is, I believe, in consequence of the labouring classes being in full operation; if sugars had remained at the price they were 12 months previous to the Abolition Act, half the sugar estates in Jamaica would have been discontinued as such.

4854. Mr. Gladstone.] You think that even granting all the other favourable circumstances, supposing the negroes willing to work for wages, and the proprietors willing to pay them wages, still the cultivation of sugar could not have been carried on upon more than half the properties unless there had been a rise in the price of sugar?—Yes.

4855. Do you think the West Indians have any right to calculate upon the present prices of sugar as likely to be permanent?—I fear not; if sugar should go down again to the prices which existed from 1830 to 1834, a large portion of the estates will be discontinued.

4856. The question does not refer to the consequences of a fall so low as that, but whether you think you can calculate upon prices being maintained for any considerable time at their present height?—I am afraid they will not, in consequence of the duties being equalized upon East India sugar.

4857. You have stated that you raised about the same quantities of sugar upon the estates under your own management in the year 1835, as in the three previous years; will you state how you consider that the crops of those years, respectively, were affected by the seasons?—The seasons were very fine, both in 1835 and 1836.

4858. Were they finer than during the three previous years?—It has been remarked in Jamaica that the seasons were finer in 1835 and 1836 than for many years previous.

4859. Do you know whether a decrease has taken place in the sugar production of the island generally?—Yes, of from 8,000 to 10,000 hogsheads.

4860. To what cause do you ascribe that?—The negroes on some parts of the island were not so willing to work as upon others.

4861. Were your own estates full-handed estates, and in general more favourably circumstanced?—They were; the majority of them are very fine estates.

4862. Are you aware what amount the owners have had to pay for wages to the negroes?—I have heard of as much as 15*s.* a hogshead.

4863. You have stated the amount you have paid for wages upon your own estates under your own charge, and you have enabled the Committee to compare that amount with the amount of interest of the compensation money; can you state the relation between the amount of wages paid, and the interest of the compensation money, upon other properties?—No, I cannot; there are many that have paid more, and others less.

4864. Do you believe that, generally, the estates have paid more or less relatively to the quantity of sugar produced?—It depends upon the nature of the estate. Upon some properties they require very little spell-keeping, upon others they keep about till 12 o'clock.

4865. Do you consider that generally upon the estates in Jamaica the planter can continue to produce the same quantity of sugar as he did before the abolition, at the same time only paying annually to his negroes, in the shape of wages, one-fifth of the amount of the interest on his compensation money?—I think he may during the apprenticeship, with additional jobbing, but not afterwards.

4866. Without going beyond that limit, generally speaking, in wages?—I think he may.

4867. Sir George Grey.] You have stated that one reason to which you attribute the deficiency of the crop, generally, through the island, was, that the negroes on all the estates were not equally willing to work for wages; are you aware also that when the system began there was an indisposition among many of the managers to offer wages?—No, I never knew an instance of it; it has been reported, but I never knew an instance of it.

4868. Have you seen a return of the estates on which wages have not been offered?—I have seen it in what is termed the Blue-book.

4869. Have you any means of stating the correctness of the information contained in that return?—I think it is incorrect, because I observed that Lord Sligo has made some remarks against the reports himself, stating that they were incorrect.

4870. Have

4870. Have you looked at the table of estates on which wages have been offered and taken, and of those upon which wages have been offered and refused, and of those upon which wages have not been offered?—No, I have not looked particularly into them; I saw there were some estates where wages had not been offered, but I believe it is incorrect. There is an estate which is under my management, and where it is said that no wages were offered, but I can prove that a considerable sum has been paid to the negroes upon that estate.

John Oldham, Esq.

26 July 1836.

4871. Do you think that there was in the early period of the apprenticeship a general impression, on the part of the managers, that the negroes would work for wages?—No, they were fearful that they would not; they were anxious that they should.

4872. Do you think that fair wages are generally offered?—The negroes at first would not take any wages; they wanted 5s. a day, which it was impossible to give.

4873. Can you form any comparative estimate of the amount of work done by the same number of negroes now, with what was done during slavery?—I think the negroes do as much work during day-time now as they did during slavery.

4874. When you say during day-time, you mean in nine hours?—Yes.

4875. Have you made any comparative estimate of the amount of work done by the same number of negroes when they worked for wages and what they would do under compulsion?—Yes; when they work for their master they dig from 60 to 70 cane holes a day, and when they work task-work for wages they will dig 120.

4876. Mr. Gladstone.] You say they do as much in a day as they did formerly under slavery; you mean that taking the same number of hours a day, they do as much in nine hours now as they did before, under compulsion?—Yes.

4877. Do you include in working for wages working in task-work?—Yes.

4878. Mr. Buxton.] The total amount of work done during the apprenticeship is then as great as the total amount of work done during slavery?—In the same number of hours.

4879. When they are working for their master, they do the same as during slavery; but where they are working for wages, they do a great deal more?—Yes.

4880. And therefore though it is said that there is less time in which they are employed, yet, as they work harder, is the total amount of work done now equal to the total amount of work done in former periods?—In the same number of hours; they do as much now in nine hours as they did before.

4881. Mr. Gladstone.] Is the same amount of produce made?—By hiring them extra hours.

4882. Mr. Buxton.] During crop time do the negroes do as much work now as they did in crop time before?—In the same number of hours.

4883. Sir George Grey.]—Putting the whole together, is the aggregate amount of labour performed by a given number of negroes the same that it was before?—Yes.

4884. Mr. Buxton.] What was the total produce of your crops during the 22 months?—I cannot state that without reference to my books.

4885. They produced as much sugar as in former times?—They did.

4886. May it not be inferred from that, that the negroes did as much work?—They did, by being paid for their extra hours.

4887. Ten shillings currency, how much is that sterling?—About 6s. 8d.

4888. In the 22 months you have paid amongst the 4,000 negroes 2,000*l.*, that is 10s. currency per head; now 10s. currency is 6s. 8d. sterling, so that for the 22 months, upon the average of the whole population upon those estates, the wages is 6s. 8d. sterling, or about 4s. a year; is that an accurate statement?—The question refers to money paid for wages. The estates have gone to a considerable expense for jobbing, in addition to the money paid to their own negroes. An estate that paid 300*l.* for jobbing before, is now paying 500*l.*; this must be taken into calculation; I am speaking with reference to money paid to the apprentices; our jobbing accounts are now nearly doubled.

4889. Chairman.] How many of the 4,000 apprentices really receive the money?—I should say not more than 1,000 or 1,500 of them.

4890. Did the rest refuse to work for wages?—No, they did not; we do not employ them upon Saturdays; we get jobbers.

4891. Sir George Grey.] Do you employ, upon the estates under your care, only the able-bodied labourers, or do you hire them all round?—We allow them to take turns.

4892. Then part of that has been paid to women and children?—Yes, if they wish it.

0.58.

4893. Mr.

John Oldham, Esq.

26 July 1836.

4893. Mr. Buxton.] And the average of what they have received has been 6s. 8d.?—A considerable deal more, and nearly double was paid for jobbing, which must be taken into the calculation; and I should say that after deducting that, we shall find nothing left for interest, even taking it at four per cent.

4894. Then the Committee are to understand that when the negroes are said to be in a state of freedom, and that they are enjoying a considerable portion of wages, what is meant by that is, that they get 4s. a year sterling wages, besides the advantage they may derive from their Saturday?—They could get more if they wished to work for it. I said that there were not more than 1,500 working for wages, which would be 2l. 13s. 4d.

4895. Are there as great a number of persons engaged in the work now as in former times, as many negroes disposed to work as in the time of slavery?—We do not require them; they only work in spell-time upon the estates. They object to work upon the Saturdays; they work their own grounds, and we employ jobbing to the amount of about 200l. a year extra; I should say that would cover the amount received for interest, which has been my calculation in my letters to the parties for whom I act.

4896. Will you state how you make out that calculation; you have stated that you have paid 2,000l. in 22 months for wages, and that you pay at the rate of 300l. or 400l. a year currency for extra jobbing gangs; how do you make that to amount to the 10,000l. that may be saved in cases where the estates are not mortgaged?—On sugar estates, upon an average, there is from 200l. to 300l. a year for extra jobbing.

4897. Mr. Gladstone.] Are there any extra expenses incurred upon an estate under the apprenticeship, besides what you have mentioned?—Yes, for machinery. Steam-engines upon some estates have been got out since.

4898. Surely they might have been got out even if slavery had been continued?—No; the negroes were divided into three, four and five spells; the work used to be continued night and day, but now we do not employ them during the night.

4899. Can you state to the Committee what is the entire amount that you paid upon the 20 properties under your charge in the 22 months of the apprenticeship for jobbing gangs?—I should say it is equal to the interest of the compensation money, reckoning it at three and a half per cent.

4900. Cannot you state either the gross sum you have paid, or how much you have paid upon some particular estate, or the average?—I should say an average of 250l. a year for extra jobbing for each estate, and about 100l. a year to the negroes.

4901. Is this 350l. for jobbing upon each estate a charge no part of which would have been incurred under the old system?—It is.

4902. If you have paid 350l. a year for extra jobbing, does not that give a sum of 7,000l. currency in a year, and above 12,000l. currency in 22 months of the apprenticeship?—Yes; my calculation was that the interest of the money, at three and a half per cent., would not do more than cover the extra expense.

4903. Mr. Buxton.] Will you be kind enough at the next meeting to produce to this Committee the actual sum that you have paid for jobbing gangs, and what that would be extra to what you were in the habit of paying before?—I cannot do that without being in my counting-house in Jamaica.

4904. Cannot you get it from the returns you sent to this country?—No.

4905. Mr. Gladstone.] Have not you the same account of what you have paid for jobbing gangs that you have of what you paid for wages?—I have in Jamaica.

4906. Mr. Buxton.] Are not the proprietors of those 20 estates able to produce the amount that you have paid for jobbing gangs?—They have not all of them got their accounts.

4907. They have for the first year of the apprenticeship?—Yes, most of them.

4908. Can you produce those?—It is impossible for me to get them, they are in all parts of England.

4909. Sir George Grey.] Could you, by any means to which you have access in this country, obtain more accurate information upon this point without producing the documents themselves?—I will try if I can do it.

4910. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you sure that you are correct in stating that you have paid so large a sum as 350l. upon each estate annually for extra jobbing gangs during the apprenticeship; because that gives a total of between 12,000l. and 13,000l. currency for jobbing gangs, and adding to that the 2,000l. wages, we get an amount of between 14,000*l.* and 15,000*l.*, which greatly exceeds the interest of the compensation money, which you took as the basis of the calculation of the expense of those jobbing gangs?—I stated to the parties at home that I thought I should be able, taking the interest of the compensation money into consideration, to keep up the cultivation.

4911. Do you still think that the amount was so large?—It is impossible to state, without having the books. I know that upon one estate, Decoy, the amount was 700*l.*, where it used to be 360*l.*

4912. Sir George Grey.] Have you found that the calculation you have made was an incorrect one, and that the interest of the compensation money did not cover those expenses?—No, I do not think I have.

4913. Do you think there was any wide difference?—No.

4914. Mr. Buxton.] Who is the proprietor of Decoy estate?—It belonged to Mr. Archdeacon Pope; he has just returned to Jamaica.

4915. Will you take upon yourself confidently to state that you have paid upon the average 300*l.* a year additional for jobbing gangs?—On reference to my notes, I find the 300*l.* is for 22 months, and not for each year.

4916. Then you have no doubt that about that sum has been paid?—There has been about 300*l.* for 22 months; but I should wish to refer to my books in answering these questions, because it is impossible to be accurate without.

4917. Will you state the names of the estates upon which this 300*l.* a year was paid?—Fort Stewart estate.

4918. How many negroes?—I cannot go into that unless I have my accounts.

4919. Cannot you tell whereabouts?—I must object to answer these questions, unless I can give a decided answer. The numbers are altered considerably since the children under six years of age have been withdrawn: I think Fort Stewart has 440 negroes.

4920. What is the next estate?—The Decoy estate.

4921. Can you prepare a list of these estates for the Committee?—Yes; but I do not see how I can put down the number of negroes upon the estates.

4922. Will you put them to the best of your knowledge?—I will send a list, to the best of my knowledge.

4923. To the best of your recollection, without pretending to be accurate, what do you suppose to be the number of negroes upon each of those estates?—Agreeably to the request of the honourable gentlemen composing this Committee, I give the number of sugar estates, with the total number of negroes upon them; also the number upon the breeding pens; but, with every sentiment of respect, I trust I shall be excused giving the names of the estates:—

14 Sugar estates	-	-	-	3,350 negroes.
5 Breeding pens	-	-	-	500 ditto.
				3,850

4924. How do you divide the spells of the negroes upon the Mount Pleasant estate?—They do not keep spells; they do not work after seven or eight o'clock at night.

4925. Do you pay them wages?—Yes, for their over hours.

4926. Mount Pleasant is a sugar estate?—It is.

4927. How do you manage without keeping spell?—We make the quantity of sugar in the day-time.

4928. Without having any night-work?—We have the mill about from six in the morning till seven at night, and the boiling-house until about nine.

4929. Chairman.] Are the Committee to understand that those negroes who do not work for wages upon the estates which you have managed might do so if they pleased, and that you would prefer their services to those of the jobbing gangs?—Yes.

4930. But there were only 1,500 out of the whole number who received wages?—Yes.

John Oldham, Esq.

26 July 1836.

4932. You spoke of machinery as an extra expense belonging to the apprenticeship; was not that machinery ordered upon the general principle of saving labour, and do not you suppose that its results will be beneficial in that way?—Upon the estate that I got out a steam-engine, we found the water-mill sufficient by keeping it about 24 hours, and now we have a steam-engine, that is not necessary. The proprietor would not have gone to the expense under the old system.

4933. Have the expenses of machinery so procured, in order to effect a diminution in the quantity of labour required, been considerable upon all the properties under your charge?—No, that is the only estate which I have got a steam-engine for since 1 August 1834.

4934. Are you aware whether that is a singular case, or whether a great number have been imported?—I have not heard of steam-engines being imported; I have heard of machinery being put up.

4935. Do you think that any great expense has been incurred under the apprenticeship, except that of wages to the negroes for extra time, and increased charge on account of jobbing gangs?—No considerable expense.

4936. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that machinery may be made applicable to the cultivation of sugar?—Yes, there is great room for improvement.

4937. Do you think that by the introduction of steam-engines there might be a great saving in the amount of labour in the cultivation of sugar?—Yes.

4938. Mr. Gladstone.] How would you apply it?—In grinding canes and carrying the canes to the mill, and various other ways.

4939. Is there any other part of the process to which it can be applied beneficially?—No, I do not know any other.

4940. Is the use of the plough increasing in Jamaica?—It is; I have had them in use for many years.

4941. Sir George Grey.] And it answers the purpose?—Yes, and saves a considerable expense to the proprietor.

4942. Mr. Gladstone.] Is there a tendency in the rate of wages to increase as the apprenticeship advances?—No.

4943. Then there is no principle of competition sensibly in operation?—No; it is pretty generally understood that a negro works a day for a macaroni.

4944. Is there any tendency to decrease?—No; if I was to refuse 1 s. 8 d. the people would get employment elsewhere.

4945. Have you known instances of negroes upon an estate getting employment elsewhere in their own time?—Yes; I have employed other people's negroes; there is no objection to it whatever.

4946. Do you in that case employ them by an agreement with them, as you would a jobbing gang?—I agree with them for their own time.

4947. Mr. Buxton.] Do you think that in general persons would have any objection to their negroes being employed by others?—No; I should have no objection to my own negroes being employed if I did not want them myself; I should like them to have an opportunity of getting wages.

4948. Mr. Lushington.] Have the negroes been known to confederate for the purpose of obtaining high wages?—Immediately after the Abolition Act came into operation they did, but not recently.

4949. To what do you ascribe that change?—A better feeling; they were not aware at first what they ought to ask for wages.

4950. Do you ascribe it to any indifference as to obtaining a larger amount of wages after they have provided themselves with the mere necessaries of life?—Not at all.

4951. Sir George Grey.] What is the distance of the provision-grounds generally from the estate where the negroes are employed upon the estates under your management?—Upon nine estates out of ten it is not more than a mile or a mile and a half.

4952. How far are those provision-grounds from any market generally?—The greatest distance is about 10 miles.

4953. What is the average distance?—About five or six, because some of them are very near the market.

4954. Mr. Buxton.] What is the greatest distance which the provision-grounds are from the estate?—I do not know any that are two miles on the north side. On the south side of the island they cannot have provision-grounds upon the estate, and there the negroes have an allowance of corn.

4955. Sir

26 July 1836.

4955. Sir George Grey.] What is the state of cultivation in the provision-grounds generally; do they cultivate the land well?—Yes, they cultivate a considerable quantity of provisions, but they pay no attention to the soil; as soon as the soil becomes exhausted they leave it and take fresh land.

4956. Mr. Gladstone.] Is it uniformly the case that where the negroes have mountain grounds they receive an allowance of corn?—Yes, I have understood that upon the south side some estates have paid as much as 1,000 l. a year for corn, when the corn crop had failed.

4957. Upon the north side of the island what is the quantity of provision-ground generally given?—There is no quantity given; they take what they think proper; there is no limit whatever.

4958. What sized patches do they generally occupy?—They have as much as they think proper; about half an acre each. They carry an immense quantity of provisions to market. Now it is so abundant in the island, that it will scarcely pay them; consequently they are more willing to work for wages.

4959. Will any one negro have an acre or two acres?—One negro would be able to raise as much provisions as would supply a family of ten upon one acre of ground.

4960. Is the quantity of provision-ground ever the subject of dispute between the negro and his master?—I never heard of such a thing.

4961. Are you aware whether special magistrates are in the habit of giving awards of wages to be paid to negroes when they have been unduly withheld — I never heard of such a complaint. The magistrates will sanction any arrangement that they make, but the negroes object to that; they prefer making their own arrangement.

4962. You never heard of any case having arisen in which a contract was broken?—No.

4963. Mr. Buxton.] Are you acquainted with the parish of St. Elizabeth?—No, I am not.

4964. You have stated that the provisions are extremely abundant now; are they more abundant than they were during the time of slavery?—Yes, certainly; the negroes having so much time, they have been planting provisions, fancying that they would get the same price for them as formerly.

4965. You have stated that as much work is done now as formerly, and as much sugar produced upon the estates under your care, and there is a much greater quantity of provisions now than formerly, and that machinery has been introduced?—Machinery has been introduced upon one estate under my management, on Lennox estate.

4966. Have you known any instances of machinery being introduced in former times?—Yes.

4967. Is not machinery getting more in use now than it was in the time of slavery?—Ploughs are becoming more general in the island.

4968. You have stated that the negroes do double work for wages in their own time compared with what they did during slavery?—If a negro is employed to work task-work, I have known them dig 120 cane-holes, and the manager never exacts more than 60 to 75.

4969. You have stated that the proprietors of the estates under your management could have got very little for their estates at the time immediately preceding the abolition of slavery, and that they have since that been entitled to receive 76,000 l. and have the estate still?—The estates were depreciated in value in consequence of the abolition of slavery.

4970. And they have either received, or are entitled to receive, 76,000 l. as compensation?—Yes, which is about one-third of their former value.

4971. Sir George Grey.] Do you know instances in which young children have been apprenticed in consequence of the parents not maintaining them, under the 13th clause of the Abolition Act?—Not a single instance.

4972. Is it the fact that the parents maintain their free children?—They do; I never heard an instance where they wished to apprentice any of them.

4973. Mr. Gladstone.] Does the estate contribute nothing to the maintenance of the children under six years of age?—I allow them everything the same as before.

4974. Then do the parents maintain them or do you maintain them?—The parents are bound to maintain them, but I assist them.

4975. You furnish clothing and you furnish medical attendance?—Yes.

4976. Who

John Oldham, Esq.

26 July 1836.

4976. Who furnishes food for the children?—They are fed out of the provision-grounds of the estate upon which their parents work. As soon as any free children are old enough to work for wages, if they refuse to do so they are struck out of the list, their indulgences are withheld.

4977. Sir George Grey.] Have many applications been made by the negroes upon the estates under your control for an appraisement, under the compulsory manumission clauses?—In two or three instances on each estate.

4978. Are you aware of any instance in which an appraisement having been made, the money has not been paid, and consequently the apprentices have remained subject to the apprenticeship?—Yes, I have known such cases.

4979. Are those cases in which the money has been permanently unpaid, or has the payment merely been postponed?—Both; I have known cases where they have been valued, and after deciding the amount they were to pay, they have refused to pay the money.

4980. How many negroes upon the estates under your management have availed themselves of the compulsory manumission clauses and obtained their freedom?—I should say from two to three upon each estate.

4981. What have they turned their hands to after they have got their freedom?—They have not in any instance hired themselves to the property; they have generally gone to the towns.

4982. Of what class of apprentices have they been?—Generally the best people upon the estate, and the most able.

4983. Tradesmen?—Tradesmen and field negroes.

4984. Can you state the value which has been placed by appraisement upon those negroes in the instances to which you have referred?—A field negro from about 25*l.* to 35*l.* currency.

4985. Have you known any valuations of a higher rate than that?—I knew one, a man that was valued immediately after the Abolition Act came into operation. He was a very valuable tradesman; he was worth 50*l.* a year to the estate, and he was valued at 120*l.* He refused to pay the money, and subsequently he came forward, and a reduction was made for the length of time that he had been working, and he paid the remainder. He is now free.

4986. Do you mean to say that the labour he had performed in the interval was taken into account as part of the money?—Yes.

4987. Do you mean to include in that the labour performed during the time when he was compelled by law to work for his master?—Yes.

4988. The whole labour performed in the interval was valued and deducted from the price?—Yes, it was reduced to about 80*l.* or 90*l.*

4989. Have you been aware of any transfers that have taken place of the services of apprentices from one employer to another?—Yes, I disposed of some myself.

4990. How many?—Twenty-six.

4991. In one lot, or separate?—In one lot.

4992. What did those 26 comprise?—Principally tradesmen, field negroes and invalids.

4993. Were they families?—Yes.

4994. Any children?—One or two.

4995. Any women?—Yes, I suppose 10 females.

4996. Do you know the price paid for the transfer of those?—I got 1,300*l.* for them.

4997. At what time did that sale take place?—Early in 1835.

4998. Were they prædial or not prædial?—They were prædial.

4999. Then they had about 5½ years of the apprenticeship to run?—Yes.

5000. What proportion would that 1,300*l.* bear to the price to which those negroes would have been sold as slaves in the early part of the year 1834?—I think they would have sold at that time for the same money.

5001. What do you suppose they would have sold at three years before that?—Some years before that they would have averaged 100*l.*; I paid more than 100*l.* for them myself.

5002. If those negroes could have been sold separately, what do you suppose would have been the price that could have been obtained before the apprenticeship, the best among them?—I should say 200*l.* or 300*l.* for tradesmen, coppersmiths and plumbers. Mr. Bell, the proprietor of Woodstock, a short time before, paid 300*l.* for a tradesman, a coppersmith.

5003. When

5003. When was that?—I do not know; I suppose he has now had him in his possession about seven years, about five years before the apprenticeship began. John Oldham, Esq.

5004. Mr. Buxton.] Do you rank medical attendance among allowances, or among indulgences?—Among allowances. 26 July 1836.

5005. Do you rank salt among the allowances, or among indulgences?—Indulgences.

5006. Sir George Grey.] You stated that in the case of one individual 80 l. was paid by him; do you know whether that money was furnished by himself, or by other people?—No.

5007. Do you know whether the apprentices have been in the habit of accumulating any money?—The industrious ones have the power to accumulate considerable sums of money.

5008. Is there any mode of investing their money?—No.

5009. What do they do with the money?—They generally keep it themselves.

5010. Are there any savings banks established?—No, there are not; it would be a very desirable measure.

5011. Do you think that would be a desirable institution to introduce in Jamaica?—Very desirable.

5012. Would there be any indisposition on the part of the legislature of Jamaica to sanction the establishment of saving banks?—Not at all.

5013. Are you aware of an Act passed in the last session to sanction the establishment of savings banks?—No; but I have understood that there was.

5014. Do you think if savings banks were introduced, the negroes would be induced to invest their money in those banks?—I think they would.

5015. Mr. Gladstone.] Are the medical men in general pretty well qualified?—Yes.

5016. Do the same medical men attend the negroes upon the estates that attend the whites?—Yes.

5017. How are the hospitals supplied?—There is medicine sent out annually, which costs about 10 l. sterling for 100 negroes.

5018. Would you anticipate very unfavourable consequences from a premature dissolution of the apprenticeship?—I should.

5019. You think its continuance affords the best hope for a final satisfactory issue to the state of slavery?—I do.

5020. Were you much in the habit of confidential communication with Lord Sligo?—No, I had not that pleasure.

5021. Sir George Grey.] Are there many schools upon the estates under your management?—Yes; we have gone to considerable expense upon some of the estates in building school-rooms.

5022. Is there a disposition on the part of the negroes to send their children to schools?—There is now, there was not at first.

5023. Are the schools free-schools, or do the parents pay anything for the education of their children?—They do not pay anything for the education of their children.

5024. Chairman.] Do they attend religious worship regularly?—Very regularly.

Henry Shirley, Esq., called in; and Examined.

5025. Chairman.] YOU are an extensive proprietor in Jamaica?—I am proprietor of Hyde Hall and Etingdon estates, on which are 650 negroes. Henry Shirley, Esq.

5026. When did you visit Jamaica for the first time?—In March 1834.

5027. How long did you remain there?—Nearly 14 months, that is, till April 1835.

5028. Till that time you had resided in this country, and had been educated here?—Entirely.

5029. When you were in Jamaica did you reside constantly upon your estates?—Almost entirely, with the exception of two or three months in the aggregate, during which I might have been absent upon what I called farming tours, in company with experienced persons, and six weeks that I was with the House of Assembly in Spanish Town.

5030. You were a member of the House of Assembly?—I was.

5031. When you were there, residing upon your estates, did you attend to the details, and the manner in which they were conducted, and to the habits and feelings

Henry Shirley, Esq. feelings of the negro population?—I may say exclusively, if I except the agricultural management also of the property.

26 July 1836.

5032. Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee what is your general impression of the manner in which the apprenticeship system is working in Jamaica?—That opinion must entirely be founded upon my own experience, which is principally confined to my own estates; but imagining that between 600 and 700 negroes upon any two given properties must be influenced by the same feelings that other negroes are influenced by, I have come to the opinion that the negro apprenticeship system, generally speaking, does work well, or may be made to do so.

5033. What do you mean by the expression, may be made to do so?—If proper arrangements are made which may be satisfactory to all the parties concerned.

5034. Do you mean that alterations in the law are desirable, or that you think that if the proprietors and managers understand their true interest, and deal fairly by the negroes under the present state of the law, everything which can be done is requisite?—I mean with regard merely to local arrangements as between master and man.

5035. You mean with regard to the times of labour and extra allowances?—With regard to the legal time, and with regard to extra allowances, and with regard to wages.

5036. What regulations were made with regard to wages upon your estates?—The wages that I agreed to give them, on an understanding that they should give me a ten-hours day instead of a nine-hours day, were 2*s.* 6*d.* currency to each able person. When I say a ten-hour day, I mean a day as was usually practised or worked during the old system, that is from day-break to dark. I agreed to give them 2*s.* 6*d.* currency for such a day's work, or 1*s.* 6*d.* sterling. My arrangements were made with my own negroes, entirely independent of any other arrangements upon other properties.

5037. What was the sum which the negroes upon your property, who were willing to work for wages, could earn during a week by working for wages in their own time?—Out of crop they earn 2*s.* 6*d.* a day; but if the Committee will give me leave, I will explain myself upon the matter of time, which I consider was the basis of all my other arrangements. When I found that the law involved a quantity of time equal to 45 hours per week, four hours and a half of which, if demanded of the negro one week, might be repaid to him another, I thought such a debit and credit account of time might involve some difficulty, that the negro would find it difficult to understand how time should be taken from him at one period, and repaid to him at another, and therefore I made it a clear account of 40  $\frac{1}{2}$  hours of time which the negro owed to me. I told them collectively, that that four hours and a half of time should never be a matter of discussion between us. Then with reference to the other 40  $\frac{1}{2}$  hours, that I thought it more for their convenience as well as for my own, that I should take it from them in four days in each week throughout the year. At one period of the year the day might be longer, and at another period less so; but that throughout the year we should stand equal on both sides, that that would enable them to turn out at the usual hour in the morning, and to remain as long as usual in the evening, and then it would give them the other day to themselves, Friday, which I thought it would be more for their advantage that they should have, in order that they might do what they pleased with it, either work in their own grounds, or hire themselves to me. They were exceedingly pleased with that arrangement, and having acceded to that, I then told them what arrangement I thought it proper to make with regard to the extra allowances. I told them that it would be quite impossible for me and useless for them to enter into any arrangements which were not calculated to be of a lasting character; that the negroes and the proprietor must hold together; that their subsistence, their clothing, and everything derived from me was derived from the soil; that unless that soil was maintained in its usual degree of fertility, we neither of us could expect to derive the same benefit that we had heretofore derived, and that therefore it was quite necessary, while I was entering into arrangements with them, that I should study economy in those arrangements at the same time that I endeavoured to study what might be agreeable and useful to themselves. They immediately acceded to that principle, and, in fact, I here take the opportunity of saying that I always found them ready to accede to whatever was moderate and reasonable.

able. I told them, with the view of being able to reward them properly for their labour, it must be in my power to do so; that unless I had the money I could not hope to be able to do so; that if they had adequate wages, such as the estate could afford to pay them, they would have it in their power to supply themselves with what as a matter of account I felt it necessary to deduct from their usual allowances, comprehending in that term the legal allowances and the extra allowances.

5038-39. What is the distinction you make between legal allowances and extra allowances?—Those are legal allowances which are fixed by the vestry in each parish every year, according to an Act of Assembly, which at a former period has rendered it necessary. The extra allowances are comprised under the term of fish, and an occasional supply of food, such as rice and corn, sugar and rum, and certain articles of clothing, also scissors and thimbles, and a few trifling articles of that sort.

5040. Did you find that the negroes drew a wide distinction between the tenure upon which they held what you call the legal allowances and the extra allowances?—I did not find that; in fact it would not have entered into my idea to propose to them to relinquish their fish, unless I had understood from one of my overseers that he did not think the people cared much about their fish if they could get adequate remuneration for their labour.

5041. Do you conceive that the negroes have been in the habit of considering that they were not entitled to the extra allowances, in the same way that they were entitled to the legal allowances?—That was my impression.

5042. Did it appear to you that they considered that any hardship was done to them by withdrawing those allowances?—Not at all, because I convinced them that they would have an equivalent.

5043. Sir George Grey.] Did you regulate the wages that you offered them upon the hypothesis that they were not to have those allowances, and, therefore, that the wages were to include the value of the allowances, so as to enable them to purchase them?—Precisely so, and I think I can prove that such was the case. I then told them what I would give them for a full day's labour, which was the highest price at that time of jobbing labour in the parish of Trelawney, in which my estates were situated. I divided them upon the subject; it was only to able people that I promised 2 s. 6 d.; to what we called the second gang I promised 1 s. 3 d., so that in fact there was a gradation of price; and young children, who at the age of six are brought into some little sort of occupation, were to receive 5 d.

5044. Mr. Gladstone.] You had three classes?—There are three gangs upon every estate, besides grass-cutters. I endeavoured to make myself perfectly understood by them, and in fact the head people rather acted as my interpreters. I told them it was necessary, in order to make it binding upon the estate's people, that the majority of them should decide; and this I did upon both estates, Hyde Hall and Etingdon. I told them that the law rendered the presence of a magistrate necessary, but that I felt convinced that the presence of no magistrate would render binding arrangements which were not satisfactory to both parties, and that therefore if they would place their dependence upon me as I placed mine upon what they told me, I should be perfectly satisfied. They almost all assented, in fact I think there were not above three who remained upon the negative side, and from that moment the arrangements were binding and have subsisted up to the present time.

5045. Sir George Grey.] Were they made for any limited period?—They were not made for any limited period.

5046. Was it in the power of either party to have concluded that arrangement, and to have entered into a new one at any period?—I fancy it would have been so.

5047. Mr. Gladstone.] You say the arrangement gave general satisfaction to the negroes?—I have every reason to believe that to be the case.

5048. Did you find the work done cheerfully?—They not only worked cheerfully for wages, but, as the overseers assured me, did their work in the legal time much more cheerfully than other negroes. In fact the people were in good spirits, and they worked well, both for myself and for themselves.

5049. Sir George Grey.] Do you know what amount of wages you paid to the 650 negroes upon the two estates, between the 1st of August 1834 and the 1st of August 1835?—It would be more convenient to state it as I find it in my own accounts, accounts, running on during the space of one year, from the 30th of September 1834 to the same date 1835. Between those dates the amount was 2,769 l. currency; now that is a very great outlay for labour. My object for entering so soon as I did into the spirit of the new Act was, not to allow my estate to get out of cultivation; for in that country, where the land is excessively fertile, a few days' rain or three weeks in point of time will raise such weeds as will very materially injure the plants and canes generally, if not sufficient to destroy any moderate hopes of a good produce; and therefore I did not, even for a day, allow my people to go upon the new system of four-and-a-half days, but they worked as under the old system, from morning till night, under this new arrangement. Now 2,769 l. currency is a very great sum to pay in wages, and could only be met by the arrangements I made, from which I hoped to derive the power of paying them their wages, and from other sources which I will mention to the Committee. In the first place, I considered that the interest of the compensation money was a sum that was most undoubtedly to be paid back to the soil.

Henry Shirley, Esq.

26 July 1836.

5050. Have you any objection to state the amount of it?—Not the slightest; it was 13,000 l., and the interest I reckoned at the rate of five per cent., the interest which my own correspondent would allow me upon it.

5051. You calculated that you were to receive five per cent. sterling upon the compensation money?—Being in the situation of a mortgagor, I paid that sum to my mortgagee. I therefore struck out interest from my debt equal to that amount. That was my first item. My second item was a saving on account of supplies. And in order to make calculations with a view to being perhaps called upon by the Committee, I have ascertained from my correspondents the average amount of those supplies for ten years, ending in 1836. From that average, which was 2,082 l., I deducted the amount of my last year's supplies, the amount of which was of course very much diminished by my having withdrawn the extra allowances. This diminution amounted to a little under 800 l.

5052. There was 800 l. difference between the average of supply in the preceding years and the actual amount of the supplies during the year of which you are speaking?—Yes; therefore that sum was fairly to be added to the 650 l., the interest of the 13,000 l.

5053. Mr. Gladstone.] That was 800 l. sterling?—All sterling. Then there were other deductions from the contingency account, on account of fish or herrings supplied in the island, of medical attendance on free children, and upon rum and sugar, the allowances of which have been nearly discontinued to the negroes.

5054. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that they have been nearly discontinued upon your two estates?—Yes.

5055. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you any estimate of the amount of deduction to be made upon the score of those items?—I have deducted them at 200 l. sterling. I balanced my accounts by between 100 l. and 200 l. in my favour at the end of the year.

5056. Sir George Grey.] You mean that the amount paid in wages was less by 100 l. or 200 l. than the amount you have saved from the items of which you have spoken?—Yes, because that sum of 200 l. sterling, as above, must be turned into currency, and you must allow 15 per cent. premium, which is a short premium on bills, and then it will be found that on contrast with the amount on the other side it leaves me in possession of a credit.

5057. Can you state what 1,650 l. will be in currency?—The saving on the supplies, &c. &c., and the interest on the compensation would be about 2,655 l. currency bills, being at 15 per cent. premium. Then I must also mention that there are 60 people upon an estate called Retirement, which I have hired during the term of the apprenticeship, the supplies, &c. &c. for whom must in a calculation of this sort be subtracted from the amount of the cost of supplies from England during the last year.

5058. Do you include the wages paid to those 60 in the gross amount of wages you have stated?—No; those wages have entirely reference to my own people.

5059. Mr. Gladstone.] In the deduction of 800 l. for supplies, do you include the value of the supplies furnished to those 60 people?—I did not in the first instance, but I deducted it again afterwards from the total cost; therefore that altogether makes a saving of 2,910 l. credits of arrangement under the new system; debits of the same, on account of trades-people and negroes hired throughout the year, 2,769 l.; leaving 141 l. currency balance in my favour.

5060. Sir

5060. Sir George Grey.] You stated that about 1,000*l.* was the saving effected by your withholding the ordinary supplies to the negroes, and the contingencies which had been received by the negroes while they were slaves?—Which had been received in kind.

5061. And the amount of wages paid to the negroes who had before received those articles in kind would be 2,700*l.* currency?—Yes.

5062. What would that amount to in sterling?—About 1,677*l.*

5063. What was the value in sterling money which the negroes actually received for their labour, after deducting the 1,000*l.* for the value of the articles which they received in kind?—About 780*l.*

5064. Mr. Gladstone.] Did you incur any additional charge during that period on the score of jobbing gangs, above what you would have done if slavery had continued?—No.

5065. Sir George Grey.] But you did incur an additional charge for 60 hired negroes beyond what you paid in wages?—I did.

5066. For what period were those hired?—For the whole term of the apprenticeship.

5067. Was that upon the same property on which the 650 negroes were working?—It joins Etingdon, but I have located the people on the Hyde Hall estate, on which they are to work.

5068. Did you hire those 60 in order to supply a deficiency of labour occasioned by the change from slavery to apprenticeship?—No.

5069. Mr. Gladstone.] Do not you charge yourself, in making up the account, with the expense of hiring those 60?—No; because I only want to make the comparison in reference to the estates' negroes of the amount of charges under the new system and the amount of charges under the old.

5070. Have you procured the labour of 60 negroes upon the estate of Retirement, and made their labour available upon your own two large estates?—I have; but it is principally for the purpose of bringing fresh land into cultivation, and for the improvement of the estates. I beg leave to state that I saw clearly that the price of wages could bear no reference either to the price of provisions or to the supply of labour, and felt that all I could do with reference to wages was to pay amongst the negroes what I could afford to do by my compensation and by my savings, feeling that the price of their labour could not be assimilated to the prices of labour in other countries, and could not bear reference to the price of provisions, the supply of labour on every estate being confined to its own apprentices.

5071. Sir George Grey.] Have your negroes provision-grounds?—Yes.

5072. And the arrangement you have described has given general satisfaction?—Very great.

5073. What was the amount of work performed by those 650 negroes, compared with the amount they had performed when they were slaves?—Precisely the same, taking their hired and their legal time together.

5074. Could you if you had required it under that system, without interfering with the satisfaction experienced by the negroes, have obtained a larger amount of labour from them by giving increased wages?—I have no doubt it could have been done by a system of piece-work, or working by the grate, as it is called in this country.

5075. But your object was attained by getting the same amount of work done?—It was. I rather wanted to avoid that system, thinking it would be more open to misapprehension.

5076. What was the produce of your estate the year after the apprenticeship began, as compared with what it had been the two or three preceding years?—I cannot give so precise an answer to that question as I desire, because the hogsheads have been made larger than usual by my own particular desire; but the amount of the produce upon both estates last year was about 630 of the usual-sized hogsheads.

5077. How many hundred weight?—Fifteen hundred weight net.

5078. Do you consider that a fair average produce?—By no means, but, compared to the preceding year, it was rather fair. Three years ago these very same properties made 880 hogsheads.

5079. Then you consider it below the fair average?—Yes.

5080. To what do you attribute the diminution, if the same amount of work was performed by the negroes as formerly?—Upon my own estates, till I was there

Henry Shirley, Esq. there myself, the attornies had discontinued jobbing as much as formerly, and I attributed it entirely to our shortness of hands.

26 July 1836.

5081. Then at the time that the estate produced a larger quantity of sugar, a larger number of hands were employed by the employment of jobbers?—I imagine that that must have been the case, more or less, of late years; but I have known a variation of from 150 to 200 hogsheads between one year and another, consequent on a variation of the seasons, therefore it is no absolute criterion.

5082. Do you think that the produce of 1835 upon those estates was a fair average produce, as compared with the produce of those estates when they had been worked only by 650 negroes in any previous year?—I think it was.

5083. Mr. Gladstone.] You think that if the slave system had continued during the year 1835 you would not have raised more?—I think too much stress has been laid upon the crop of 1835, because it is perfectly well known to every planter that the plants, on which the amount of produce principally depends on planting estates, were all put in under the existence of the old system; and, therefore, it is this crop which is actually in process of making which must determine more particularly the influence of the new system upon the production.

5084. Do you think there would have been more sugar in the year 1835 than there has been if the old system of slavery had been continued?—No I do not. I understand the question in reference to my own estates.

5085. Sir George Grey.] Can you state in what way the negroes have worked as to the preparation of the ensuing crop?—They have made all the usual preparations, because all the usual time of my negroes is either required by law or hired of them.

5086. Have you any reason to apprehend that the crop of 1836 will be a deficient crop, looking at the number of negroes employed upon it?—So far from that, I believe on my own estates it will exceed that of last year.

5087. Mr. Buxton.] And you think the ensuing crop is the criterion by which to estimate the success or failure of the system of apprenticeship?—This year the crops in Trelawney will fall off very considerably, and I have no doubt that the failure of these crops is entirely owing to the bad state in which the cane-field has generally been left between the crops, the managers making it, generally speaking, their object to hire only during the crop; at least such was the custom when I left the island. The continuance of our crops, or the prevention of their being diminished, depends, in my opinion, entirely upon this, whether the negroes are hired out of crop to keep the field in good cultivation and clean.

5088. Sir George Grey.] Do you attribute the expected diminution of the crop in Trelawney in 1836 to the deficiency of labour employed in the preparation of the ground?—Not in the absolute preparation of the ground, but in cleaning the canes.

5089. To what do you attribute that deficiency of labour?—To the deficiency of legal time.

5090. Do you think that hired labour might have been obtained by the proprietors, if they had offered wages to the negroes, to induce them to give that labour which was required beyond the legal time?—I do think so in most instances. With regard to myself, I felt it necessary, in the spirit of the Abolition Act and in reference to the economical management of my own estate, that the negro should feel a greater dependence upon his own exertions than he had been accustomed to feel before, and that, therefore, if any allowances were taken from him he should seek by his industry to supply himself with them. Many persons in Jamaica were inclined to look with an unfavourable eye upon such arrangements as I entered into with my negroes, imagining that they would part with their fish with reluctance, and indeed that it might be productive of disturbances; but I held my course, continuing to do so. A gentleman, Mr. Samuel Barrett, formerly member for Richmond, in Yorkshire, determined upon placing two estates under his own management precisely upon the same arrangements that I had carried into execution.

5091. Was that in consequence of the experiment which you have made?—It was, and it continued for some time.

5092. Did your agreement for wages, in point of fact, include the whole year, as well as the period of the crop?—The whole year.

5093. Chairman.] Are the Committee to understand that the difference between your system of management, and that which was generally followed, consisted consisted merely in this, that you withdrew the extra allowances, and offered increased wages for the whole year, whereas the general system was, to give those extra allowances, but to offer smaller wages, and wages in a more irregular manner?—Precisely so; and therefore many people thought it objectionable at a time when it was the idea that everything ought to be sacrificed to maintain the peace and tranquillity of the country at the period of emancipation. The next reason was, that they thought the utmost limits of the means of the proprietor would enable him only to hire labour to take off his crop.

5094. Do you conceive that the negroes would have considered themselves ill-used, if their extra allowances had been stopped, and that stoppage had not been made up to them by the offer of higher wages than are usually given?—I think so, and if they had continued to conduct themselves well, with reason.

5095. Sir George Grey.] You think that the negroes would have been dissatisfied if you had withheld the extra allowances, and given 1s. 8d. a day as the highest rate of wages, and given that only during crop?—I think so.

5096. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you think in general the interest of the compensation money will enable the planters to pay wages enough to procure the same quantity of sugar to be raised as was raised under the slave system?—I do not think so, for this reason: if the proprietor looks upon the interest of the compensation money only as the amount which he can afford to pay in wages, he must point out to the negro that in aid of the wages that that sum will allow him (the proprietor) to give, he should consider the extra allowances which are still continued to him. With that view my first attempt to get the negroes to work for hire was to offer them 1s. sterling, or 1s. 8d. currency, a day for their labour, and not to do away with the extra allowances. When they, on the first Friday of their working for hire, came in the evening, after their day's work, to be paid by the overseer, there was a general dissatisfaction amongst them, when 1s. 8d. only was offered to them. They refused to receive it, and in exchange for their labour that day, another day was given to them, and then the new mode of treating them was devised, which was the first arrangement to which I have alluded to-day.

5097. Mr. Buxton.] Are the Committee to understand you to say that, as far your knowledge extends, other proprietors do generally allow the extra allowances?—Very generally; indeed I know of no instance, but the instance of Mr. Barrett, in which those were discontinued, and he gave an equivalent.

5098. Chairman.] Mr. Barrett followed your system of giving higher wages?—For some months, and when he ceased to do so he supplied his negroes with the usual quantity of fish.

5099. Mr. Buxton.] Did you become very unpopular in the colony, owing to the system that you adopted, as being thought too favourable to the negroes?—I have reason to think that I did so, and when in the House of Assembly I expressed myself to this effect, that I had confidence in the negro, and that in my mode of acting with them I had been governed by the idea that the negroes were subject to the same influences to which others are subject, I was taunted with my short residence in the island. I was assured that I should find myself mistaken, when I required the help of my negroes to take off the crop, although, at that time, i. e., in November 1834, I had experienced from the 1st of August in the same year nothing but good-will and cheerfulness on the part of the negroes to work for hire.

5100. Sir George Grey.] Does that system continue now upon your estates?—It does.

5101. And you are persuaded that it is the most beneficial system, looking at the interest both of yourself and of the apprentices, that can be adopted?—I am, and perhaps the Committee will think that the account of debits and credits which I have presented will bear me out in that opinion.

5102. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe that other proprietors, upon the whole, generally treated their negroes with the same degree of indulgence that you did?—I should say more. I do not conceive that I treated my negroes with indulgence.

5103. Then you think the great benefit you conferred upon them was in bringing them nearer a state of free labour, and one in which they would receive a certain amount of wages for their labour?—Most decidedly.

5104. An approximation then to real freedom is the benefit which you conferred upon them?—Most decidedly.

Henry Shirley, Esq.

26 July 1836.

5105. Sir George Grey.] When you state that you did not treat them with indulgence, you mean that you did not sacrifice your interest as a proprietor for the sake of indulging the negroes; but you do not mean to imply that you treated them in a way which excited any dissatisfaction in their minds?—Precisely. With reference to my answer to the last question as to the state of freedom, I should say that I consider this probationary state a matter of the first necessity.

5106. Chairman.] Do you believe the public mind in Jamaica, both of the negroes and of the proprietors and managers, is now in a settled state with reference to the system of apprenticeship, and that they now understand that system, and are gradually preparing for the state of perfect freedom which is to follow it?—I think that is the case generally; but the real mode, in my opinion, of meeting the final day of emancipation, with a view to enable the negro to derive all the proper advantages from it, is to make him feel the degree of dependence in which he will then be upon his own exertions, and that therefore the more the negroes are hired, the better that desirable end will be effected.

5107. While you were in the House of Assembly did you not introduce a Bill to permit the marriages of the negroes by dissenting clergymen?—I did.

5108. What was the nature of that Bill?—The intention of the Bill was to enable the dissenting clergy to celebrate marriages amongst their separate communities, and to encourage them in doing so, by rendering those marriages legal.

5109. What was the fate of that Bill?—It was thrown out on the first reading.

5110. What was the objection to that Bill?—It was considered to be one which would give the missionaries too much power over the negroes, and that it would be detrimental to the interests of the Church.

5111. Was there a division upon it?—There was.

5112. What were the numbers?—Seventeen to nine.

5113. Do you conceive the present state of the law to be an obstacle to marriage?—I do, in so far as there is no direct incentive to the dissenting clergy for encouraging marriages amongst the negroes, as they would do from their pulpits were such marriages to be legal.

5114. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that the dissenting clergy do not now inculcate the necessity of marriage to the same degree as they would if they were authorized by law to celebrate it?—I have no direct knowledge. I can say only what I have heard, i. e. that such is the case.

5115. What were the grounds which induced you to introduce this Bill; was it the result of any observation of your own as to the defective state of the law in practice?—It was from the closest observation I could exercise upon the subject.

5116. What was the result of that observation?—That those among my own negroes who were married, and who had families, were decidedly the best conducted and most respectable people upon the property.

5117. What reasons had you to suppose that the existing state of the law tended to limit the number of marriages?—Because the marriages celebrated by the clergy of the Church of England only being valid in reference to the offspring, and the distances at which the greater part of the population were generally placed from those churches at which their marriages might be celebrated, and besides the greater part of the population of Jamaica not frequenting places of worship of the Church of England, I conceived that they were not in the way of hearing as much as was desirable to produce the impression of the advantages of marriage over the state of concubinage, in which the greater part of them undoubtedly exist.

5118. Mr. Lushington.] What was your opinion generally of the character and conduct of the dissenting ministry in Jamaica?—I have no direct means of knowing; and, in fact, I abstained particularly from taking any part in anything that might imply the expression of an opinion as to their past conduct; and with that view I objected to a proposal that was made to me by Mr. Knibb, to lay the foundation stone of a Baptist chapel at Falmouth, observing to him that my reason for doing it was, that as, when in the House of Assembly, my name had been mixed up in some measure with those of the Baptist missionaries, and what were supposed to be their intentions, I would abstain from taking any part which would imply the expression of an opinion as to their past conduct, of which I was ignorant.

5119. Cannot

26 July 1836.

5119. Cannot you state, from information, some general impression of the character and conduct of the dissenting ministers?—I can feel no doubt that they must have been very beneficial to the negro population at large.

5120. Do you consider them to have been generally upright and conscientious in their ministrations?—I had no knowledge of them individually, I only judge by the effects produced upon the negro population.

5121. With that impression, generally favourable as regards the intentions of the dissenting clergy, is it likely that in their exhortations to their flocks with reference to marriage they would be induced to endeavour to increase the number of marriages for the purpose of their own personal gain?—I do not imagine that to be the case with any conscientious man, nor do I wish to suppose a man otherwise than conscientious when I do not know that he is so.

5122. Sir George Grey.] Looking at the altered state of feeling which exists now as compared with the period of the abolition of slavery, do you think the Assembly of Jamaica would be more likely to pass a Bill of the nature to which you have adverted, particularly if that Bill came recommended to them from the Government of this country?—I think such a recommendation would have the greatest and the best effect upon the Jamaica Assembly, for this reason, that one of the objections made to me upon my introducing the Bill was, that I must “needs go beforehand with the British Government in the introduction of such a measure.” I was considered a great innovator on account of being in advance of the state of feeling in England.

5123. Then assuming that such a recommendation has since been sent, do you despair of seeing a Bill which would remedy the existing defects passed by the Jamaica Assembly?—I do not, but I think it will require all the perseverance and all the influence which the British Government can by law make use of in effecting that object.

5124. Chairman.] Looking at the influence which the dissenting clergy have with the negro population, you think that such a law would be practically a great incentive to marriage?—I do, most undoubtedly; and I think moreover that it would have a great influence in inducing the dissenting clergy to discuss before their congregations the utility and expediency of marriage generally. In this country, where it is universally practised as the rule of society, ministers may discourse upon the duties of the marriage state; but in the colonies that has not been so much matter of necessity, the expediency of marriage itself being the first point to be discussed.

5125. Mr. Lushington.] Do not you think that a recognition of the right of dissenting ministers to marry, and consequently making the offspring of such marriages legal, is an act of justice which the negroes have a right to expect?—Most undoubtedly.

5126. Viewing especially the very large predominance of dissenters which exists in Jamaica?—Most undoubtedly.

5127. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you any idea of the proportionate numbers of persons professing to belong to the communion of the Church of England and to dissenting communions in Jamaica?—I have not sufficient information to give any correct data to the Committee, but the Baptists I have often heard exceed in number 100,000.

5128. Is it your impression that a majority of the whole population belong to dissenting communions?—Most assuredly.

5129. Chairman.] Have you heard that there are parts of Jamaica where the negroes will not work for hire?—Those parts now I believe form a great exception to the whole.

5130. To what should you attribute such a circumstance, if it exists? I should attribute it now to the existence of very fertile provision-grounds, and to that of a good market.

5131. Have you schools upon your estate?—Yes; I believe now that the system of schooling is much more pursued than it was when I was in the country.

5132. Is it left completely to the management of the proprietors, or is there any public system?—It is left completely to the management of the proprietors and their agents, the public system existing only in towns.

5133. Do you conceive that the proprietors and their agents are generally exerting themselves to diffuse education throughout the negro population?—
I imagine

Henry Shirley, Esq. I imagine that that is rather the case, although I cannot say at present that I have any direct means of knowing it.

26 July 1836.

5134. Sir George Grey.] Do you think there is any general apprehension of the effect of education upon the minds of the negroes?—No, I have no idea that such an apprehension exists.

5135. Chairman.] Do you think that you possessed an influence as a proprietor going out from this country and residing upon your own property, that the attorney or manager would not have had with your negroes?—I think a proprietor for some time after his arrival does possess that sort of influence; but, like all other influences, if it does not rest upon a solid and good basis, it will soon evaporate.

5136. With reference to the arrangement between you and the negroes, do you think they placed more confidence in you, and were therefore more willing to come into that arrangement than they would have been if the arrangements had been proposed to them in your absence by your attorney?—I think so, without any disparagement to the attorney or overseer.

5137. Did you make any change in the system of management upon your own estates before the 1st of August 1834?—Not the slightest; not even putting down the whip in the field, which, however, I had frequent opportunities of ascertaining was not used; but I desired that it might not be put down, in order that the negro might not consider that anything had been conceded to him in consequence of my coming out.

5138. Did you desire that it might not be used by private directions to persons in your employment, or was it a public direction?—I requested the overseer to hint to the driver not to use his whip.

5139. Then, in point of practice, was the whip disused for a short time previously to the 1st of August 1834 to a greater extent than previously?—Not upon my own properties. I am inclined to consider the whip as an instrument of coercion held over the negro, and considered more in terrorem, than as an instrument that was positively in the habit of being used.

5140. Mr. Buxton.] Have you ever seen the returns of the number of punishments that took place in Jamaica prior to the abolition of slavery?—I have not.

5141. Do you believe that in Jamaica the whip, prior to the abolition of slavery, was not in frequent use?—I heard that on some properties it had been relinquished in the field.

5142. But do you believe, generally speaking, that it had been relinquished, or was continued in use?—I believe that it was generally carried to the field, but I never set myself to inquire that fact, not considering it of much importance; the real matter of importance was, to know whether it was much used. Now, as far as regards my own properties, I know that it was not.

5143. Do you mean to infer, that because it was not used on your own property, it was not generally used in Jamaica?—I conceive that it is but fair to suppose that the negroes would be treated in other places as they would be treated upon my own property.

5144. Do you really, in your own mind, believe that to be the fact?—I do.

5145. Sir George Grey.] Had you any personal means of observation, for any length of time, before the introduction of the apprenticeship system?—I was upon my own property five months before the 1st of August 1834.

5146. Mr. Buxton.] How many hours in a day, during crop time, is it necessary for the negroes to work, in order to take off the crop in a proper manner?—My own negroes do now, in 16 hours, take off the same crops that were formerly taken off only in the 24 hours.

5147. Do they work now at the rate of 16 hours a day in crop time?—They do.

5148. How many hours used they to work?—Twenty-four.

5149. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean that the same individuals worked 24 hours at a time?—On large estates in Trelawny, an estate's people, which would be divided into three spells, each spell would take 24 hours a time, and then come on in rotation, attending all the time to the necessary agricultural part of the business.

5150. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that they worked 24 hours in succession, and that they at other times performed the usual agricultural labour; how many hours altogether, during the week, do you suppose them to have worked?—Each spell would come twice in the six days, which would make 48 hours.

5151. And in the other four days how many hours would they be employed?—Henry Shirley, Esq.
Ten or 11 hours a day, according to the length of the day at particular periods of the year.

26 July 1836.

5152. Do you believe that those persons, receiving at the time no wages, could have been induced to work 88 hours in a week without either severity exercised or severity dreaded?—I do not; it must have been only by compulsory means, or by the understanding that such means existed.

5153. Then the whip, if it was not actually in use, was present and ready for use?—No doubt of it.

5154. Do you use the plough upon your estates?—I do, it was introduced by myself; as yet it is only partially used.

5155. Does it answer the purpose?—Very much so.

5156. Is it likely to be used more generally by other proprietors?—Their using the plough depends very much upon the nature of their own cane-field. If the land is flat and favourable for the use of the plough, I have no doubt it will be brought into general use.

5157. Sir George Grey.] What is your opinion of the comparative state of the negroes now during apprenticeship with what it was during slavery?—It is much superior.

5158. Do you think they are sensible of that improvement?—I do indeed, very much so.

5159. That they appreciate the apprenticeship as compared with slavery, and consider that a boon has been conferred upon them?—I should say most decidedly; and I myself took the greatest possible trouble with my own negroes to make them feel the handsome manner in which the people of England were behaving to them; that they were putting their hands into their pockets, in a manner, in order to give them greater advantages than they before enjoyed.

5160. Chairman.] Do you believe that there is a reasonable ground for hoping that at the expiration of the period of the apprenticeship the negroes will act in such a manner as to enable the state of society, and the cultivation of the estates to be carried on satisfactorily?—That question, with regard to Jamaica, I must confess is one, the consideration of which often perplexes me. I sometimes think that the negroes, finding themselves in the enjoyment of freedom, will be happy to work for what must be a much smaller remuneration for their labour than that now given them. At other times I think that my own negroes will be happy to go on in the same condition, and under the same arrangements which subsist between us at the present day. But all depends entirely upon the civilization which their minds undergo during the intermediate space of time. By the word civilization I mean the greater degree of knowledge they possess as to their own resources, and as to the means of profiting by them. The present state in Jamaica of the apprentice may be compared almost to the feudal state, as it existed even to a late period in some countries in Europe, where in exchange for certain advantages furnished to an individual by his lord, he is obliged to perform certain services. In Jamaica the negro, in some respects, possesses advantages over those populations in not having to perform services for his lord, such as the conveyance of himself, his family, or his baggage to any distant part of the country; that the negro has not to perform; but he is obliged, by fear of punishment, to fulfil his obligations under the law to his master. I think myself the negro will work for wages at the end of the period without having recourse to the fastnesses in the interior of the island, which it is supposed by many will serve as a place of refuge.

5161. Mr. Gladstone.] When you spoke of civilization, did you include in the signification of the term as a principal element the religious instruction of the negroes?—Everything that tends to open the mind of man as to the knowledge of himself and his wants.

5162. Chairman.] Do you consider that it would be either safe or expedient to limit the freedom of the negro after the period of apprenticeship has expired by the enactment of any vagrant law that will place him in a different condition from the white inhabitants?—I conceive that only the defensive regulations which society have a right to make would be proper.

5163. Mr. Gladstone.] But you do not conceive that any regulations need be established, making any distinction between the white population and the negroes?—No.

5164. Mr. Buxton.] You think the same kind of provision should be made for securing

Henry Shirley, Esq. securing the peace and good order of society in the West Indies, as those which exist in England?—Yes.

26 July 1836.

5165. You do not wish to go further?—No.

5166. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you sufficiently acquainted with the nature of the vagrant laws in England to be able to pledge yourself to the provisions of the vagrant law?—I do not possess an intimate knowledge of the vagrant law in England, but I suppose a vagrant law is one which society passes for the purpose of defending itself against the irregularities and ill conduct of vagrants.

5167. Sir Stratford Canning.] Do the better educated negroes appear to have much advantage over those that are not so?—Very much so.

5168. Is that influence likely to operate when the next change takes place in their condition?—I have no doubt it will, not only in their more direct influence with other negroes, but by the influence of example.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

William Burge, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

Wm. Burge, Esq.

27 July 1836.

5169. Chairman.] Is there anything you are desirous of stating to the Committee upon the subject of registry?—In consequence of the desire expressed by the Committee the other day, that I would furnish them with the state of the laws in Jamaica relative to the registration of slaves, I have looked into the Acts passed by the Jamaica legislature on this subject. It seemed to be assumed by the witness under examination the other day, that the only measure adopted by the Jamaica legislature was the Act for the Registration of Slaves. That Act was, however, only a part of the legislation which took place in Jamaica in 1816, in relation to the objects for which the registration of slaves was desired by the Government. The Registration Act was passed in 1816, and it required a return to be made in 1817, of all the slaves in the possession of any person, in whatever character or by whatever right he held the possession of them. It was to state their ages, sexes, whether African or Creole, and those who were the issue of any of the females in the return were particularized as being such issue, and the names of the mothers were mentioned. The Act requires that there should be a further return every third year. This triennial return must account for any difference between the numbers in that and in the preceding return. If there be any increase or decrease, the cause of the increase or decrease must be specifically stated. If it be by birth, the name of the mother must be stated, by reference to the former return; if by purchase, devise or descent, all the particulars of this acquisition are stated, so as to render it impossible, that if the cause of increase assigned be untrue, its falsehood should escape detection. The same particularity in the returns is required if there has been a decrease. There is no particular officer appointed by the Act to compare the one return with the other. They are made first to the clerks of the vestries, where they are registered; they are then sent to the secretary of the island, and by him entered in his office; certified copies are delivered by him to the governor of the island, by whom they are transmitted home to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who causes them to be delivered to the registrar, for the purpose of being registered in the office here. But this Act was only one of the measures adopted by the Jamaica legislature in 1816 upon the recommendation of the British Government. The great object of the Government, as communicated to the Jamaica legislature by the Governor's Message in that year, was to guard against the possible infraction of the Slave Trade Abolition Acts, for which it was considered that the peace with the whole world afforded facilities. The particular mode in which this object should be attained, and that evil guarded against, was left to the legislature; nor was it required that there should be any particular officer in the colony for the purpose of inspecting and comparing the returns. Abundant means for making that comparison by the persons in the colony and here, were afforded by the Act. The Jamaica legislature considered that the most effectual mode of accomplishing the great object of the Government, and

and of preventing any infraction or evasion of the Abolition Acts, was to render it impossible for any vessel to arrive in Jamaica with a negro on board without that circumstance being known to certain public officers, whose special duty it should be to board all vessels entering any port or harbour or creek in the Island of Jamaica. No negro could be landed without a previous report of his being on board, to be made by the master of the vessel; the name of the negro, his occupation, and the place from whence he came, must be reported. The naval officer, a public officer appointed by Government, was authorized to go on board and stop any vessel, and ascertain whether any negro was on board; and if there was any negro on board, to ascertain every circumstance connected with his being there. The Committee are aware that, under the British Act for the Abolition of the Slave Trade, no negro can be on board a vessel in any character, even as a domestic attending upon his master, without his name being entered in the clearance of the vessel, with his particular occupation stated, and if there is any mistake with respect to the description of a negro in that clearance, he becomes immediately forfeited to His Majesty as an illegally imported African. The construction given to those Acts by the Courts of Admiralty in Jamaica, and on appeal to this country, has been, that any mistake in the description of the negro, and à fortiori, an omission to name in the clearance the particular character of the negro is fatal, and the negro becomes forfeited. The security afforded by the Slave Trade Abolition Acts was greatly increased by the Jamaica Act passed in 1816, from the very extensive powers it gave to the naval officer, and from its various provisions. The 16th clause enacts that, "it shall not be lawful for any negro arriving in any ship or vessel, from any port without the said island, in any port or place within the same, otherwise than as hereinafter is mentioned and permitted, to land without a permit in writing from the naval officer or his deputy of such port where the ship or vessel shall have arrived, (except such seafaring negroes as shall be bonâ fide employed as mariners on board such ship or vessel,) on pain, if free, of being liable to be apprehended," and, if a slave, of being proceeded against as having been imported contrary to the Slave Trade Abolition Act; and if it is not proved that the negro is legally imported, he is forfeited to His Majesty. The 17th clause enacts, "That after the passing of the Act, the master or commander of any ship which shall arrive in any port," then it goes on in a subsequent clause, in any bay or creek or elsewhere on the sea coast of the island, may be taken up and carried before a magistrate, who shall condemn such negroes as unlawfully imported slaves, and as forfeited to the Crown. The appeal from the magistrate's condemnation is to the Governor in Council. There are various other provisions in the Acts which are all directed to the great object of preventing any illicit importation of negroes. This Act and the Registration Act were considered as a full compliance with the recommendation which had been made upon the subject by the Government; for the governor was instructed by the Prince Regent to express himself in his speech, on opening the session in 1817, to the House of Assembly, in the following terms: "The Prince Regent has been pleased to express his entire approbation of the measures which you adopted during the last session, for preventing any evasion of the laws relating to the abolition of the Slave Trade, and for improving the comforts of the negro population." These Acts, therefore, passed in Jamaica in 1816, were considered to have effected that which had been required by the British Government, and were deemed by the British Government perfectly sufficient; and there never has been, that I am aware of, any instance in which there was an evasion of those Acts. I will mention a case which occurred in 1818; it will show there was no desire in Jamaica to evade the Slave Trade Abolition Acts. A foreign slave-ship, called the St. Antonio, was captured in the year 1818, on the coast of Brazil, by the Oriental, a South American privateer; a person named Hudson and part of the crew of the privateer were put on board the privateer; they called at St. Thomas's, and afterwards sailed along the north coast of Jamaica. Hudson landed at Rio Nova Bay, and the first person to whom he offered the negroes, on board the privateer, actually gave the information, upon which Hudson was immediately apprehended, and the vessel and 44 negroes were seized. A prosecution was immediately instituted against him, he was tried and convicted under a commission issued under the authority of the British Act 46 Geo. 3. He was convicted and sentenced to transportation for 14 years. A month had not elapsed between the time of his landing on the shores of Jamaica and of his being on his way to England in execution of his sentence. The vessel and the negroes on board were condemned to His Majesty, as forfeited under the Slave Trade Abolition Act. That is the only instance which has occurred. It shows that those laws had been perfectly effectual in preventing that which it was the object of the legislature to prevent, namely, the introduction of Africans into the colony.

5170. Sir George Grey.] Do you apprehend at the present moment any practical difficulty can arise in ascertaining what negroes were registered, and what were not, at the last registration?—None whatever.

5172. Would there be any difficulty in ascertaining their identity?—None whatever; all the negroes on the estate know each other very well, and there would be abundant evidence on the estate to ascertain identity.

5173. Are you aware of many negroes having been released since the law came into operation, in consequence of their having been omitted in the last register, having been comprised in the former ones?—I have understood a very considerable number on the property of Mr. Scarlett, the nephew of Lord Abinger; they were not correctly returned in the last registration. There was no pretence for supposing any of those negroes had been illicitly imported; they were negroes settled on the property long before the abolition of the slave trade. They had been all in the former registers, but they were not in the last registration. A very important question arose, whether, it being quite apparent that the negroes had been returned in all previous registries, an omission of them in a subsequent registration did in fact subject them to forfeiture; I presume not to say anything upon that subject.

5174. Was not the question, not whether it subjected them to forfeiture under the laws to which you have been referring, but whether, in the case of those apprentices to which reference has been made since, the terms of the first clause of the Slavery Abolition Act were complied with, which required that the negroes to be subject to apprenticeship should be duly registered as slaves in the colony, in conformity with the laws in force in the colony, on a particular day?—Yes, I used the expression forfeiture with reference to the case you have put; I meant the forfeiture of the apprenticeship term, and the services of the negroes during that term.

5175. That was the question which was raised?—Yes; and I believe it applies to the apprentices belonging to Maroons; and there might be cases of apprentices belonging to free persons of colour who had not been duly registered.

5176. Mr. Gladstone.] Suppose the case of an addition made by purchase to the slaves on an estate during the state of slavery; would those slaves be entered individually in the next return from that estate?—Yes, as increase. The return would state the negro John Nokes, or whatever his name might be, purchased from A. B. of such a parish, included in the return of such a year for that parish, so that you might trace the negro back from any person from whom he had been acquired between the one registration and the other.

5177. Would the registry office contain individual records of the entire negro population?—The entire negro population from the period the first registration took place in the year 1817.

5178. Mr. Thornely.] Is it not prima facie a case of suspicion that the negro has been smuggled into the colony, if he is found in slavery and unregistered?—The effect would be, no matter how innocent the party might be to whom the negro belonged, if the negro were not found upon the registry of 1817 (the original registry), that the Attorney-general, under the provisions of the Registry Act, would proceed against him as having been illegally imported; the onus of proving that he was legally imported would be thrown upon the claimant, and if the claimant could not make out that he had been legally imported, by tracing his birth, or the fact of his having been imported prior to the abolition of the slave trade in 1807, the necessary consequence would be that he would be forfeited to the Crown, and treated as having been illegally imported, and he becomes subject to apprenticeship, in the same manner as any other illegally-imported African. The fact of his not being in the registry would not raise a moral presumption that he had been illegally imported into the island, but it would be the legal presumption under the Jamaica Act, for the purpose of instituting proceedings thereunder.

5179. That would be the groundwork of the inquiry?—Yes, the groundwork of the information. I will call the attention of the Committee to a clause of the Jamaica Registration Act: the provisions of that and of the other Acts to which I have referred were, I have reason to believe, known and approved of by the Government here before they were made the subject of legal enactment in Jamaica. By this clause the party subjects himself to a penalty for the omission; and when judgment thereon is pronounced, "an information shall be filed, ex officio, by His Majesty's Attorney-general, in the next succeeding grand court, against the slave or slaves for the omission of whose return such penalty has been recovered, as and for an importation of Africans or slaves contrary to the said Abolition Laws; and the record of such judgment shall be sufficient evidence to maintain the said information. And to every such information so filed as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for the person or persons against whom the judgment for such penalty has been recovered, to take the defence in his or their own name or names, or in the name or names of the person or persons for whom he, she or they held possession of the slave or slaves left unreturned as aforesaid, or for such person or persons for whom possession was held, to take the defence in his, her or their own name or names, and to plead 'not guilty,' and thereunder to prove that the slave or slaves included in the said information was not or were not imported into this island contrary to the said Abolition Laws. That in case the defence to the said information shall not have been taken as aforesaid during the court for which the same is filed, the said information shall be continued over until the next grand court, in which court it shall and may be lawful for any person claiming any estate or interest in the said slave or slaves included in the said information, either in reversion or remainder, or other estate expectant, upon the determination of the estate of the person for whose interest the possession of such slave or slaves was held, or any mortgagee of the said slave or slaves, or any judgment-creditor of the person or persons, or estate, for whose interest such possession was held, to take the defence of such information, by leave of the judges of the said supreme court; and it shall be lawful for the person so taking the defence of the said information to plead 'not guilty' thereto, and thereunder to prove that the said slave or slaves included therein was or were not imported contrary to the said Abolition Laws, and was or were subject to such right, title or interest as they claim therein."

5180. Then under those provisions non-registration does not, per se, work a forfeiture; it is only a ground of inquiry?—It does work a forfeiture if the person cannot prove that the negro has been legally imported; the onus is cast on the person who has been guilty of omission to register, of proving that he was legally imported.

5181. Sir George Grey.] When you say those regulations do necessarily work a forfeiture, you refer to that which was the practice when slavery subsisted; at present non-registration by the Act is made the basis of slavery or of freedom?—Yes.

5182. The fact of non-registration now entitles a negro to his absolute freedom?—Yes, beyond all question; and the only question which has ever arisen has been the difference between no registration at all, and the case where a registration having been made in 1817, and continued down till 1830, there has been an omission to register in the subsequent year.

5183. Mr. Thornely.] You say it is the duty of the Attorney-general to institute proceedings?—It is his duty to file an information, ex officio.

5184. Is he bound to do so unless moved to do so by official instruction?—Clearly so; it is the duty of the Attorney-general. I filed an information in the case of the St. Antonio, as I did in other cases, on my own judgment, and without any directions from any person. I should obtain the evidence which would furnish a probable ground for instituting the proceeding. The Attorney-general has all the same powers which the Attorney-general here possesses, or I ought rather to say, which the Lord Advocate of Scotland possesses.

5185. In what way is it probable the information would be received by the Attorney-general?—There are the naval officers and custom-house officers.

5186. The naval officers board the vessels?—They board all the vessels.

5187. Has he any control on shore?—He has powers under the Act even on shore. There are abundant means through the intervention of naval officers, custom-house officers, magistrates and constables, of obtaining the information. It is quite impossible that such a thing could have taken place in Jamaica without its being known to some one, and without that person communicating the fact to the Attorney-general. This question seems to suppose that there was a desire in Jamaica to continue the slave trade; there was no such desire. The slave trade was supported by the London, Liverpool and Bristol merchants, not by the planters of Jamaica. In 1777 commenced a series of measures by the Jamaica Assembly to put an end to this atrocious traffic; they were defeated by the resistance given by the mercantile interests in England. I refer you to the decision of the Board of Trade in 1777 on their petitions against the Jamaica Acts, and the instructions given to the governors. That the continuance of that trade was not in accordance with colonial feeling is now matter of history, beyond the possibility of doubt. I refer you to the documents in the Appendix to the Evidence before the House of Lords in the Slavery Abolition Committee.

Mr. Robert Russell, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Robt. Russell.

5188. Mr. Buxton.] HAVE you been in Jamaica?—Yes.

5189. What situation did you hold there?—Confidential clerk in the governor's office.

5190. For what time?—Upwards of four years.

5191. From what dates?—I commenced, I think, in March 1832, and quitted the 5th of May 1836.

5192. Had you access to information officially received?—I had.

5193. Mr. Gladstone.] Were you four years in the situation of confidential clerk, or did you rise to that situation?—I was the head clerk in the office the whole period of four years, but it was not till the commencement of the apprenticeship system I obtained the information now sought to be elicited from me.

5194. Were you during the whole four years in a situation to become confidentially acquainted with whatever went on?—I was.

5195. Sir George Grey.] What do you mean by confidential clerk?—Writing all the governor's despatches.

5196. And reading those he received?—Yes.

5197. Both from himself and the Government here?—Yes.

5198. You mean copying the governor's despatches?—Yes.

5199. Mr. Buxton.] Did you gain any information as to the workhouse system throughout the island?—Yes.

5200. Did you learn that females were confined in chains in the workhouse?—I cannot directly state that; I have learned they were confined in chains, but I know that it was reported at the King's-house that females had been punished in the workhouse.

5201. Chairman.] By reported, do you mean that that circumstance was officially reported, or that you heard it in conversation?—Officially reported by special magistrates.

5202. Mr. Buxton.] Does that apply to one single workhouse, or the workhouses of many parishes?—Workhouses of many parishes.

5203. Mr. Gladstone.] What parishes?—The parish of Trelawney was reported; the parish of St. George was reported; the parish of Kingston was reported; there was a female punished there.

5204. Sir George Grey.] What do you mean by punished?—Flogged; the particulars of those cases have been sent to the Colonial-office.

5205. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you any information to communicate over and above what has been sent to the Colonial-office?—No.

5206. Mr. Buxton.] Do you recollect how many cases there were in which reports were made of corporal punishments inflicted on females?—No, I do not recollect the exact number.

5207. Where did those happen?—There are 21 parishes in the island, and about 18 of them have houses of correction.

5208. From what proportion of those have they been reported?—I do not think that more than one-third of that number were reported; about six or seven.

5209. Sir George Grey.] You mentioned three; have you the names of the other other three?—I cannot exactly recollect now; but I can refer you to the Colonial-office, where you would have the whole particulars. Mr. Robt. Russell.

5210. Can you refer the Committee to the other parishes?—There were instances reported just before I quitted Jamaica of punishments having taken place in the parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East on females; how far the report was true I know not, but the governor directed an inquiry just as I was leaving.

5211. That was an official report from a special magistrate?—I think it was; and partly by a newspaper report.

5212. The governor directed an inquiry into it just at the time you left?—He did.

5213. Do you recollect the other three?—I cannot state particularly as to the number; those I have given I know officially as having been reported, and I think others have been reported, but I have no documents; all I state is from memory.

5214. Do you mean that the four you have referred to have been officially reported?—Yes, by the special magistrates and by other persons.

5215. Was there inquiry instituted with regard to the others, besides that you have last referred to?—Yes; Lord Sligo directed inquiry into them.

5216. When were the inquiries made?—Immediately on the receipt of the information.

5217. When was the information received?—I cannot state the time; but I know it was immediately after the abolition of slavery.

5218. You say the case in St. Thomas-in-the-East was reported just before you left?—Yes; and an inquiry was directed to be made just as I was on the point of leaving the island.

5219. Had the others been some time previous, or about the same time?—They were some time previous.

5220. Were any others of them near about the same time?—I think not.

5221. By what means was the inquiry directed?—The governor first sent to the special magistrates, and issued circulars to the custodes of the parishes, requesting them to refrain from inflicting punishment in the houses of correction.

5222. Do you know the date of that circular?—No, it was issued last year, I think. I think a copy of the circular was sent to the special magistrates also, to let them know what was done.

5223. Mr. Buxton.] Was the governor enabled by law to put an end to the system of the corporal punishment of females in the workhouses?—No, he was not; one reason assigned for its continuance was, that the Gaol Act, the Act for building Houses of Correction and Gaols, gave the power to the local justices to frame such rules and regulations for the government of prisons as they thought fit.

5224. Chairman.] By whom was the punishment directed?—By the custodes and justices of the parishes.

5225. Was it in an official communication made to the Government which came to your knowledge, that this was stated?—Yes.

5226. Sir George Grey.] Was that the general answer from all the custodes, or did they give a separate answer?—They sent in separate answers; some of them, I think, gave that as a reason for its continuance.

5227. They did not all concur in this view of the law?—No.

5228. Chairman.] Do you know who were the custodes that did not take this view?—No; we had answers from, I think, about 13 parishes in the island, and being a matter on which I did not expect to be examined, I did not remark the names of the different custodes, but I know that that was assigned as the reason by some.

5229. Do you mean to say that the custodes differed in their view of the law, and that while some proposed it should not continue, others asserted that the practice was legal, and defended it?—I do not assert that any of the custodes acknowledged that the practice was illegal, but that some promised it should be discontinued. About the same time a circular was written, requesting them to desist also from the practice of cutting the hair off the heads of females; and it was also assigned as a reason that they were authorized to continue the practice, as the law gave them power to frame such rules and regulations as they thought fit for workhouses.

5230. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of an action being brought against the supervisor

27 July 1836.

Mr. Robt. Russell.

27 July 1836.

supervisor of a workhouse for the flogging of a woman?—No; I know of prosecutions having been instituted against some for flogging men.

5231. Do you know the name of Mr. Slowly?—Yes, I have heard of his name; he was a supervisor.

5232. Was not the complaint respecting the Trelawny workhouse one affecting him?—Yes.

5232. Was there a prosecution against him for the act complained of?—Yes, there was.

5234. What was the result of the prosecution?—I think the Bill was ignored, or that the man was acquitted at the Cornwall assizes.

5235. Was the Attorney-general the prosecutor?—Yes.

5236. Did the Attorney-general concur in the view of the law taken by the custodes?—I should think not, or he would not have prosecuted the man.

5237. Mr. Buxton.] You know a prosecution was instituted?—Yes.

5238. You know that the man was not convicted?—I know that he was prosecuted, but I cannot positively state that he was tried or acquitted; the particulars have been sent also to the Colonial-office.

5239. Do you know whether he was or was not punished?—I have no recollection whether the man was punished. I brought a slight memorandum which I gave to Captain Oldrey, that I wrote down just before I left. Mr. Jenkins, the supervisor of another workhouse, was, I think, convicted; there was one conviction out of three or four prosecutions.

5240. Sir George Grey.] Was a prosecution instituted in reference to any of these charges; and was any one convicted while you were there?—I have already said that prosecutions were instituted, and that a conviction took place; and there was also a prosecution ordered against the supervisor of the St. Elizabeth workhouse, a man of the name of Calder, for punishing an old negro man named David, but Calder died before the prosecution went out.

5241. You have considered the case of Slowly as one in which he had punished a woman, and was prosecuted for it?—No, I said he was indicted for inflicting punishment in the house of correction; I do not think it was a woman; I think, in the case of Mr. Slowly, it was for punishing males in the house of correction.

5242. With respect to the three cases of Trelawny, Hanover and St. George's, which were reported to the governor, were steps taken for the prosecution of the offenders?—The custos of St. George's was written to on the case of the woman.

5243. Written to; for what purpose?—An inquest took place on the body, and this was reported in one of the public newspapers; the governor sent a copy of the newspaper to the custos, and requested information; there was no prosecution in this case.

5244. There was an inquest on the person who died?—Yes; who died in the workhouse.

5245. Will you confine your answer to the complaint made to Lord Sligo of the conduct of the supervisor of St. George's, and whether any prosecution took place for flogging that female?—I do not think that any prosecution took place in the St. George's case.

5246. On whom was the inquest?—On a woman in the workhouse; all persons dying in workhouses and gaols there, have inquests held on their bodies; and it was in consequence of the report of that inquest that Lord Sligo was induced to write to the custos on the subject.

5247. What was the verdict on that inquest?—I do not exactly remember; I do not think it was death from flogging.

5248. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware that the treadmill is used for females to work in the workhouse?—Yes.

5249. Chairman.] You never yourself visited a workhouse?—No.

5250. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware whether the practice of punishing females in the workhouses went on without the governor's knowledge?—I should think so, for this reason; I was told by a person of his having seen weals on the backs of females in a workhouse in Jamaica, and I knew that that was not reported to the governor.

5251. Sir George Grey.] Did you not report that fact to the governor?—No, I did not, because I did not like the authority.

5252. Do you mean that you distrusted the authority?—No, I did not distrust the

the

27 July 1836.

the authority; but the man was rather in a humble sphere of life, and he himself was unwilling that he should be brought forward as a witness.

5253. Did he tell you the workhouse in which he had seen that?—Yes, he did.

5254. Did you institute any formal inquiry into that yourself?—No, I did not.

5255. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware whether white persons are committed to the workhouses?—I do not know; I rather think the gaol is the prison to which they send whites.

5256. Mr. Gladstone.] With reference to sending white persons to workhouses or gaols, have you any means of knowing whether any distinction prevails, or whether any regulations were determined upon of sending each culprit to one or the other?—Apprentices are sent to the workhouses and white persons to the gaols; I believe instances have occurred where, for the purpose of degrading whites, they have been sent to the workhouse; the police, for instance.

5257. Are you aware whether, when an apprentice is tried and convicted, it is usual to send him to the workhouse or the gaol?—I think they have been sent to both.

5258. Are you aware whether it is usual to send them to one or the other?—I think it is more usual to send them to the workhouse.

5259. Though tried before the Court of Assize?—Yes.

5260. Your opinion is, that except with a view to personal degradation, no white person is sent to the workhouse?—I believe only in the case of the police; they are usually sent to the workhouse to be worked on the treadmill.

5261. Do you suppose it is with the intention to inflict a punishment more severe upon them than would be permitted on any other white man?—I do not know that it is intended for that; but, under the Police Act, the governor is authorized to frame such rules and regulations for the government of that body as he shall think fit; and the sentence for certain offences is mulcting them of their pay, or sending them to be worked on the treadmill.

5262. You expressed an opinion that no white man was sent to the workhouse, except for the purpose of inflicting upon him peculiar degradation, will you state the ground on which that is founded?—I mentioned the police; it is considered a great degradation to be confined in a workhouse in Jamaica.

5263. Do you not conceive that was the intention on the part of the Assembly, to inflict upon the police, in case they offended, a degradation they would not inflict on any other persons?—That regulation was not made by the Assembly, but by the governor.

5264. Do you conceive it was the intention of the governor to put more degradation upon them than on other white persons?—I do not know whether he might conceive it a more safe and efficacious mode of punishment.

5265. Do not you conceive that tends to support your opinion, that no one is sent there but with a view of degrading him?—It is considered by the community of Jamaica a great degradation: I conceive, therefore, that it is for the purpose of degradation it is done.

5266. Have you known others sent there?—I do not know of any others; I will not say there are not others.

5267. Is it not usual to send free coloured persons to the workhouse?—I believe not, since the passing of the Privilege Bill; at least, I have not heard of any case.

5268. Do you think if a white man was tried before the quarter sessions and sentenced to imprisonment, he would be sent to the workhouse, supposing he were not a policeman?—I cannot offer an opinion upon that; I think it is discretionary with the judge of the court where he shall send him, according to the nature of the offence.

5269. Do you know that if an apprentice is tried at the assize court he would be sent to the workhouse?—He has been sent both to the workhouse and to the gaol.

5270. Did you ever hear it was matter of favour to the apprentice to send him to the gaol instead of the workhouse?—No, but I have no doubt he would consider it as a favour; he undergoes no punishment in the gaol except the confinement.

5271. Do all those sent to the workhouse undergo hard labour?—Some are sentenced to hard labour; and are kept at hard labour in breaking stones, and so on.

5272. Are

Mr. Robt. Russell.

27 July 1836.

5272. Are there no persons in the workhouse without hard labour?—Yes; persons sentenced to solitary confinement, and those confined as lunatics.

5273. Do you derive that information simply from documents that have passed through your hands?—Simply from documents that have passed through my hands.

5274. Mr. Buxton.] Have you ever seen any females working in gangs in the capital of the island?—Not lately.

5275. Do you happen to know whether any complaints were made after the commencement of the apprenticeship system, of the allowances to the negroes being withheld?—Yes.

5276. Have you from any source of information, whether from documents you have seen in the office, or your own personal information, come to the knowledge of the fact that complaints of the withdrawal of allowances were made at early periods after the abolition of slavery?—Yes; I am aware they were withdrawn.

5277. From what source do you derive that information?—Officially; the reports sent in to the governor.

5278. Sir George Grey.] By whom?—By special magistrates.

5279. At what date?—Immediately after the commencement of the apprenticeship system.

5280. Were those official reports transmitted to England?—They were.

5281. Have you looked at this volume of Parliamentary Papers laid upon the table of the House of Commons?—I have seen it in Jamaica; but I have not read it throughout.

5282. Have you been able to look at the special magistrates' reports in this book with sufficient care to state whether those reports contain the information to which you now refer?—No.

5283. Chairman.] You have stated that complaints were made of the withdrawal of allowances at the beginning of the system of apprenticeship; did those complaints continue up to the period of your leaving Jamaica?—No, I will not say that they continued; no report of their continuance was made immediately previous to my quitting; but a case was reported as lately as December 1835 of the stoppage of the usual Christmas allowances having occurred on a property in the parish of Port Royal.

5284. Official complaints of that kind did not continue?—Not up to the time I left.

5285. Are you able to give the Committee any reason for the discontinuance of those complaints?—No; I do not know anything about the internal management of an estate.

5286. Sir George Grey.] Was it your duty to look over the reports sent in by special magistrates, and to transmit them to England?—Yes; many of them formed enclosures to the despatches.

5287. You have stated that the reports of the special magistrates were sent to England; were those the reports, or correct copies of the reports, sent to Lord Sligo?—I believe many were abridged, and some given in detail; some I examined, but they were of so voluminous a nature they could not all go through the hands of one individual.

5288. So far as they went through your hands, are you able to state whether the abridgment contained a fair statement of those reports?—Yes.

5289. Was it your duty to abridge them?—Some I abridged myself, others were abridged by Lord Sligo.

5290. Did those that were abridged by you come under Lord Sligo's notice?—Yes, every page underwent his inspection.

5291. Have you any doubt of the accuracy of the reports transmitted?—I have no doubt that they are correct.

5292. Are you able to furnish any information beyond that which appears upon those reports with regard to the questions you have just been asked?—I am so far able to give information by referring to cases which have been subsequently sent to the Government here since the publication of that blue book.

5293. These reports come down to June 1835; have there been complaints of the withdrawal of allowances that have come under your notice since the month of June 1835?—No, I have already stated that there have not been, except the one reported in December 1835.

Mr. Robt. Russell.

27 July 1836.

5294. Mr. Buxton.] Do you consider that practically the negro had any redress in a case in which he might feel himself aggrieved against a special magistrate, unless he happened to be in the immediate neighbourhood of a special magistrate, or some friend of the negro who would advocate his cause?—I do not think that he had; I will explain the reasons that actuate me in coming to this answer. An apprentice might be aggrieved in a parish that is very distant from the King's-house; there might be no friend there to espouse his cause, and he is unable to undergo the fatigues of the journey, or is fearful himself to come before the governor to complain against the special magistrates; cases have occurred where complaints have been reported against the special magistrates' adjudications in the case of apprentices.

5295. Can you give any information to the Committee as to the disposition of the negroes to work for wages?—Yes; if the Committee will receive the information of the special magistrates furnished to the governor, a tabular statement of which I made out.

5296. Sir George Grey.] Is it from that tabular statement you derive your information?—Yes.

5297. Have you any other information than that to be derived from that tabular statement?—No; it was abridged from the special magistrate's reports.

5298. Mr. Buxton.] As to the appraisalment of the negroes, have you any further information than that contained in those documents?—The only information I can give is its having been frequently reported to the governor the excessively exorbitant valuations fixed by the local justices on the apprentices.

5299. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you any information on appraisements, distinct from that contained in the documents before the Committee?—I do not know what the documents before the Committee are.

5300. Sir George Grey.] Have you any information on this or any other subject, except that you derive from the official documents passing through your hands in the Government-office?—No.

5301. Do you possess any of those documents now?—No.

5302. All your evidence has been founded on your recollection of those documents?—Yes; there are two or three cases fresh in my recollection.

5303. Mr. Buxton.] Has it come to your knowledge that any obstructions have been given to special magistrates in the discharge of their duties?—Yes.

5304. Sir George Grey.] Is that information procured from the same source?—Yes, the information I have, I derive from the same source.

5305. Mr. Gladstone.] You have been in the habit of paying short visits to sugar estates since the apprenticeship commenced?—Yes.

5306. Were you in the habit of visiting in the same way before the apprenticeship commenced?—No, not in the same way.

5307. Do you feel competent from what you have seen personally yourself in Jamaica, to communicate to the Committee any information or opinions respecting the working of the apprenticeship system, except from the knowledge you have derived from official documents?—No.

[The Witness was allowed in revising his Evidence to make the following addition.]

I beg to state, in addition to the answer I gave respecting prosecutions against supervisors of workhouses, that I have since been informed by a gentleman now in England, and who was present at the trials of Slowly and Jenkins, that the former was convicted of flogging a female, and the latter tried for ill treatment of a male, but was acquitted by the jury. I would also add, that I have learnt from conversation with some gentlemen from Jamaica, that free persons are confined for certain offences in the workhouses, without regard to their complexions.

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

Maurice Jones, Esq., called in; and Examined.

Maurice Jones, Esq.
29 July 1836.

5308. Chairman.] YOU are a proprietor of estates in Jamaica?—I am.

5309. Are you the custos of the parish of Portland?—I am.

5310. Are your estates situate in the parish of Portland?—I have two estates in Portland and two in the parish of St. Thomas in the East; that is to say, one of my own estates is in Portland, and another in St. Thomas in the East, and one I rent in Portland and another in St. Thomas in the East.

5311. In what part of the island is the parish of Portland situate?—In the north-east end of the island.

5312. How long have you resided in Jamaica?—I have been there 52 years, with the exception of five years that I came to this country. I went out in 1822; I have been out 15 years since.

5313. Have you during that period constantly resided on your properties?—Always, and managed them, since I have become the proprietor of the estates.

5314. When did you leave Jamaica?—I left it on the 19th of May last.

5315. What is your opinion generally of the manner in which the apprenticeship system is working?—It is generally improving to what it was at the first commencement; the Bill was not generally understood by the negroes, nor was it acted on by the special magistrates in the first instance; there was a great deal of fear and timidity on the part of the people that they might commit themselves under this Act, and therefore they permitted many things to go by default; but since the Bill has become more generally understood by all parties, I consider that it is every day improving.

5316. What number of negroes are there upon your properties?—About 400 upon my own estates, and about 200 on the estates I rent.

5317. What is the system upon which the negroes upon your estates work?—They work five days in a week, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday; Saturday they have to themselves; every alternate Saturday they volunteer their services to dig cane-holes on my estate or any neighbouring estate where they are hired.

5318. What wages do you give them for the extra time they work?—I give them at the rate of 5 d. for every 12 cane-holes; it is laid down by the special magistrates that, according to the texture of the soil, they shall dig from 70 to 80 cane-holes in the day.

5319. In how many hours?—In the eight hours and a half.

5320. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you take eight hours and a half as the legal time for which the negroes work during the day?—They work 40  $\frac{1}{2}$  hours in the week; they turn out at six in the morning, they get half an hour for breakfast, three hours for dinner, half an hour surplus, taking away four hours, leaving eight hours in the day to work, and half an hour is taken to turn out after the shell-blow; they are never in the field within half an hour; it is half a mile or a quarter of a mile.

5321. Do they work five full days?—They work five days at the eight hours a day.

5322. How do they employ the three hours given them for dinner?—Their grounds are so near, they run to the grounds, or employ it as they please; I never interfere with them; it is a choice of their own.

5323. Do you ever attempt to hire them for that interval of time?—When the mill is going some are employed about the works of the mill, and I give them 5 d. for their own two hours, that the mill should not be stopped during the dinner-time. Maurice Jones, Esq.
29 July 1836.

5324. Do you find any indisposition to accept that hire?—None at all.

5325. Are you aware that they prefer the nine-hours' system to that on your estate?—There is a great diversity of opinion; some prefer one, some another; it is generally the result of their own choice.

5326. Is it the result of their own choice to work on the eight-hours' system on your estate?—Yes; I do not dictate to them which way they work; they prefer that.

5327. On all the estates under your management are the Committee to understand that the negroes prefer the system of working under that system?—Yes.

5328. Chairman.] Do you mean that you left to them the option?—Yes; if they took the Friday afternoon they would work the nine hours; I left it to them whether they would work the Friday afternoon, or work the eight hours and a half.

5329. Were they unanimously of opinion that that was the best?—The leading people were of that opinion; I found when the Friday came that they worked through it.

5330. Sir George Grey.] At what period was this choice made by them?—Immediately after the commencement of the Act; I have never varied it; I considered it a dangerous thing to be making alterations.

5331. Has the nine-hours' system ever been in practice on any of the estates under your charge?—I do not think it has, to the best of my recollection.

5332. Mr. Gladstone.] Is the eight or the nine-hours' system most generally in practice in Jamaica, as far as your own knowledge extends?—The eight-and-a-half-hour system.

5333. By that you mean the system in practice on your estate?—Yes.

5334. When you speak of 5 d., do you mean currency or sterling?—Five pence sterling.

5335. Sir George Grey.] Are you aware of the distinction of that system going by different names, the eight-hour and the nine-hour system?—Yes.

5336. When you speak of eight hours and a half, do you speak of the eight or the nine-hour system?—I speak of eight and a half; they take three and a half for themselves.

5337. Is that the eight-hours' system as distinguished from the nine-hours' system?—I believe it is.

5338. You conceive the system usually known as the eight-hours' system is distinguished from that known as the nine-hours' system?—Eight and a half is the system generally adopted; in the neighbourhood in which I live they work the five days.

5339. Mr. Gladstone.] Does not it appear you get  $42\frac{1}{2}$  hours' labour from them; and is not that more than you are entitled to?—They are never punctual in their turning out; there is generally half an hour lost that we never calculate on; they do not turn out at six o'clock; it approaches nearer to seven.

5340. You do not consider that you get more than seven and a half hours' labour?—I consider we get eight hours' labour.

5341. Chairman.] Do you include within the time of labour the time which the negroes require to come from their huts to the field, or do you exclude that time?—In the afternoon there is half an hour allowed; they get three hours and a half, and half an hour to go to the field; that is three hours and a half in the morning; they ought to be in the field at six, but it is generally half after six or near seven.

5342. What are the names of your estates?—The one is called Boston, the other Hertford.

5343. Mr. Gladstone.] Then, according to that calculation, the effective labour you do procure would be about seven hours and a half?—No; we get about eight hours, losing the half hour at turning out and the half hour afterwards.

5344. Chairman.] Had you occasion to make frequent complaints to special magistrates of the conduct of the negroes on your property?—I never made any complaint but one, when I found they were relaxing.

5345. Have you never had occasion to complain since?—Never since the negroes

Maurice Jones, Esq. negroes have done their duty better: there was a case of theft once; a man stole some rum.

29 July 1836.

5346. That is not the complaint you just alluded to?—No; the complaint I made was their not turning out early in the morning, which was about a twelve-month ago.

5347. Mr. Gladstone.] In general, have the apprentices any considerable distance to go to the field, or a short distance?—At Boston estate and Hertford estate the works are in the centre of the cane-fields; they have about a quarter of a mile to go.

5348. Can you give the Committee any general idea whether it frequently happens that the negroes have to go a considerable distance?—It is policy to keep the gangs as near the works as possible.

5349. Do they generally contrive to do so?—They do, with the exception of worn-out land about the works; when the works are first settled they will take any land near the works; that is abandoned when it is worked out.

5350. Would you say that the negroes, on the average, have to go as far as a mile?—No; three-quarters of a mile would be the farthest, which would be to the extreme; but that is only when they are working to the extreme point of the estate.

5351. Sir George Grey.] You speak of the estates of which you have charge?—Yes; on my own estates they have not to go half a mile; but I speak generally of that part of the island.

5352. Chairman.] There is a distinction made in Jamaica between what are called allowances and what are called indulgences given to negroes, is there not?—The allowances are those that were always furnished under the slave law; they have never been withheld that I am aware of; I have never withheld them on my properties. The indulgences are in point of encouragement when they behave well.

5353. Have you continued both the allowances and indulgences to negroes on your property?—I have.

5354. Have you continued the indulgences, without requiring from them, either directly or indirectly, payment in any manner?—When I consider them as working beyond their lawful hours' labour, I pay them for it in money, and when they do it cheerfully I give them their indulgences cheerfully, and when they do not I abridge them, and say, "You have not done as you ought, so you cannot blame me if I stop your salt pork or your rice," and so on, which are indulgences.

5355. You continue your indulgences as they were given, only stopping them in case of misconduct?—Yes.

5356. Sir George Grey.] Were they stopped in case of misconduct in the time of slavery?—Certainly, if they did not do their work well.

5357. Mr. Buxton.] Do you conceive that the refusal of a negro to work in over-hours for his master is a species of offence for which he should be deprived of his indulgences?—Certainly not; I leave that entirely to themselves.

5358. Whether he works for his master or not, he still has in both cases his indulgences?—Yes, if he works cheerfully.

5359. Chairman.] Is this mode of treating the negroes in respect of indulgences general throughout the island, as far as you are acquainted with it?—Yes.

5360. What is the total amount of wages you have paid from the 1st of August 1834 to the nearest time you can give it?—I cannot recollect; I have brought none of my vouchers with me, not expecting to be examined.

5361. Are you enabled to give the Committee any approximation to the amount you have paid for wages?—I can tell after the rate we pay. I know the number of acres of cane-hole; they have dug probably 30 acres of cane-holes, at the rate of 5 l. 10 s. an acre, on one estate. I always give them the preference of digging the land to a jobber; that is every alternate Saturday.

5362. Is there no account in England which would enable you to give the Committee the amount you have paid for wages?—None; they are paid at the rate of 5 d. for 12 cane-holes.

5363. Sir George Grey.] What other work do they do?—Only working at their dinner-hour; they never take any spell.

5364. Can they at any time have that employment during their dinner-time?—Every day; when the meal is about those that come in go to keep the mill going during during the two hours of dinner-time, when they might be in their houses; I give them 5 d. for the two hours, as I have stated. Maurice Jones, Esq.

5365. To how many?—There are 20 employed on the Castle Mill estate about the works, and 14 on the Water Mill estate. 29 July 1836.

5366. Are the same persons employed from day to day?—They have only one spell in the week; it is a well-handed estate.

5367. Is the extraordinary employment at dinner-time a matter of competition; do you find many volunteers?—All volunteers; they have but one spell in the week.

5368. Out of 400 negroes on those estates, you have found them rather anxious to be selected to work during the dinner-hours?—I never heard any objection to it; they know when it comes round; they go to it, and when the Saturday comes they come and are paid.

5369. Mr. Gladstone.] Have you found it necessary to employ jobbers to a greater extent since the apprenticeship began than you did previously?—The labour being circumscribed, having only eight hours out of 12, I have abandoned one-third of the cultivation of the land; with the same number of negroes now, I carry on only two-thirds of the cultivation.

5370. When you say eight hours instead of 12, do you mean it to be understood that you got 12 hours of efficient labour in the day formerly?—No, never; it was considered from sun to sun, with the exception of breakfast and dinner-time.

5371. How many hours of efficient labour do you conceive you were getting in 1833?—Nine hours and a half; they had half an hour for breakfast, and two hours for dinner.

5372. Calculating the wages you should give to your negroes during the apprenticeship, did you regulate the rate by reference to the interest of the compensation-money you were to receive, or simply by the money you found necessary to induce them to work?—I paid them after the rate I used to pay jobbers before the Emancipation Bill took place.

5373. Can you state whether what you paid to them for this work as well as what you have paid jobbing gangs, if you did employ them, exceeds or falls short of the interest of the compensation-money due to you on account of your estate?—I have not got my papers with me to know the quantity of money I have expended.

5374. Sir George Grey.] You are not able to make a loose calculation of the amount you have expended for wages?—Last year, taking the year 1835, I suppose I spent about 150 l. on the negroes, and about 150 l. on the jobbers. I have a certain number of cane-holes I dig uniformly on the estate.

5275. Mr. Gladstone.] Does that answer refer to one or two estates?—It regards my own estates.

5375*. You have 400 negroes on those estates?—Yes.

5376. Sir George Grey.] Were those jobbers all extra to what you would have employed under the old system, or should you still have required jobbers in addition to the slaves?—I have abandoned one-third part of the cultivation, because I could not keep it up.

5377. Should you have required the jobbers for that cultivation before the Abolition?—Yes; we always used to have 100 l. a year jobbing on each estate; we pay jobbers still; the apprentices are not able to dig the whole.

5378. You have paid the jobbers 150 l., and you would have paid formerly 100 l.; are you to be understood that you have incurred 50 l. additional expense under the head of jobbing, and 150 l. for wages to your own people?—Yes, I should imagine that is correct.

5379. Mr. Gladstone.] What proportion of sugar have you raised in the year 1835, as compared with the years 1833 and 1834?—I think, to the best of my recollection, our crop in 1835 was 200 casks.

5380. What relation did that bear to the previous years?—The estates used to make 400 hogsheads, 200 each; they are now brought to 100 each.

5381. Taking the years 1832, 1833 and 1834, what was the average?—We have fallen off about one-third.

5382. Sir George Grey.] One-third of the land is gone out of cultivation?—Yes.

5383. Do the two-thirds which are cultivated produce the same amount?—Yes; we give up the cultivation of one-third, with the conviction that the labour would not bear us out.

Maurice Jones, Esq.

29 July 1836.

5384. Have you made any attempt to procure labour for this additional third, or do you think it would not remunerate you?—At the late prices it would not have repaid me.

5385. At the present prices would it repay you?—The present prices are very flattering; but there is a difference of 13 s. which could not be calculated on.

5386. If it were to come over again should you let that one-third go out of cultivation?—I should abandon that one-third, keeping to the best land, and not having occasion to go to so heavy an expense.

5387. Mr. Gladstone.] Perhaps the third you abandoned was not so favourably circumstanced?—Of course it was the old land, and required more manure.

5388. Should you have continued the cultivation if the slave system had continued?—Certainly, I should; but I should not have had to pay them for their time.

5389. Do you mean to state to the Committee, that with the extra expense to the apprentices for their extra time, you raise only two-thirds of your former produce?—Certainly; I should be very well satisfied with that.

5390. Mr. Buxton.] How much were you in the habit of paying for those estates of which you have spoken, for jobbing gangs, during the time of slavery?—I must confine myself to my own estates; the other two I have hired only since the Abolition Act; I used to pay for jobbing 200 l. a year.

5391. How much do you now pay on those two estates?—I job 45 acres of cane-holes, at 6 l. an acre, on the two estates; that is the regulation I have laid down; that is done by extra labour; that is about 270 l.

5392. Sir George Grey.] Is that the only kind of work done by jobbers?—That is the only kind of work done by jobbers, with the exception of dinner-time; we make a hogshead a day, probably; there are a hundred dinner-times, at a dollar a dinner-time; 33 l. for their dinner-time in taking off the crop.

5393. Mr. Gladstone.] You do not mean by 45 acres at 6 l. an acre, what you get in extra labour from your own negroes?—From them and the jobbers together.

5394. All the jobbing gangs and the extra time of your own negroes mixed up together?—That is the expense I go to, giving my apprentices the preference if they can do it.

5395. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that your expense in extra labour beyond the labour which the law gives you amounts to 270 l. a year?—We make a hogshead a day every dinner-time; there are 100 dollars, 33 l. 6 s. 8 d.; and there being two estates, that must be doubled; 66 l. to be added to the 270 l.

5396. Mr. Buxton.] Was anything to be added to the 200 l. you formerly paid?—No.

5397. Sir George Grey.] £. 336 is the whole amount you have paid for extra labour on those two estates you own since the Abolition Act?—I should apprehend it is.

5398. Mr. Buxton.] And 200 l. was the amount you formerly paid?—Yes, and nothing for dinner-times; we never employed them at dinner-time.

5399. Do the negroes, during the time they are employed for wages, work more or less efficiently than they did at former times?—When they are digging cane-holes for me, it is laid down by the special magistrate that they shall dig from 70 to 80, according to the strength of the land, during the day; but when I employ them on the Saturday in their own time, on the same piece, they will all turn out very early in the 'morning, and do all the work, and dig probably 120; then they dig them after the rate of 5 d. for 12.

5400. During the time they work according to law, as your apprentices, do they work more or less efficiently than they did in the time of slavery?—They work less, certainly; they do not work with the alacrity they used to do; they seem to think they have no right to be desired to do beyond what they wish to do.

5401. Do they do as much?—No, they do not.

5402. In what proportion?—Probably in the proportion of 80 to 100 holes; in my time they used to dig 100 cane-holes, now it is 80.

5403. Sir George Grey.] Your time was longer?—Yes, in the old days they used to dig 100 cane-holes.

5404. That being nine hours in the field after deducting the two hours and a half; now they dig 80 in seven hours and a half?—In eight hours and a half; it is to be expected that they are all out at six in the morning, and retire at six.

5405. Do

29 July 1836.

5405. Do they turn out at that time?—No; there is a delinquency of their turning out at that time, as well as other things, and we wink at it.

5406. Do they dig from 70 to 80 now in eight hours?—Yes.

5407. Mr. Buxton.] In the nominal 12 before, they did 100?—Yes.

5408. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you think that statement bears out your general opinion, that the negro does not do so much work for his master in a given quantity of time as he did under slavery?—My opinion is, that they do not do so much, and that they do not do it with the same alacrity; they are improving certainly, but they do not do it with the same alacrity they used to do.

5409. Mr. Thornely.] You were understood to say they dig 120 cane-holes a day for wages?—They do.

5410. Of course, then, they work with great alacrity?—When they are working for themselves they require no compulsion; then they turn out earlier and work later.

5411. Mr. Buxton.] How happened it that the negroes were not overworked at former times of slavery, and grievously overworked when, with smaller assistance from jobbing gangs, and with one-third more land to cultivate, you accomplished its cultivation?—I apprehend they do not work nearly enough now; they were not overworked before.

5412. You admit the fact that the same body of men, with smaller assistance from jobbing gangs, kept one-third more land in cultivation formerly than now?—They did, because they had more time; the days were longer.

5413. Sir George Grey.] Which do they prefer; the apprenticeship or the slavery?—The apprenticeship.

5414. Do you think they are much better off under the apprenticeship than under slavery?—I think they are; in my opinion they are decidedly better off.

5415. What is their own opinion of it?—They are well satisfied now; they did not understand it at first.

5416. Do they show any disposition to go back to slavery?—Decidedly not.

5417. Chairman.] And you think they look forward to the time when they shall enjoy unrestrained freedom with pleasure?—Certainly they do.

5418. Have you any fear, from your experience, that they will refuse to work for wages when they become perfectly free?—I certainly am very feverish upon that point. I will state my opinion on what ground I am led to draw that conclusion: there is one-fifth of the rising generation brought up in idleness; the children, on the 1st of August 1834, then six years of age, will, in 1840, be 12 years of age; if there is not some salutary law to compel them to work for their living, they will be brought up in idleness; they run scampering over the estates, and not at all under direction. There may be about one-tenth on the 1st of August 1834, that were aged and decrepit; on the 1st of August 1840, they will be completely invalidated; therefore if the young ones are not brought up to supply their places in the school of industry, and their morals attended to by salutary laws, I fear the consequence will be very bad in 1840.

5419. Does not it appear that upon the estates the negroes are willing not only to work but to work hard for wages?—They certainly are; I have stated they work more in their own time for wages than otherwise.

5420. Why do you suppose they will not do the same when their time of freedom arrives?—I am afraid those young children growing up will prefer idleness. Some of those boys on my estate (I think I have 50 of those free children), they will not take the 5 d. a day to go and weed the canes; they go and bask on the sea-side, and climb the mango-trees, and scamper over the country in idleness. I make a point of visiting the negro grounds every fortnight, and when I go there I never have found them in their parents' grounds working.

5421. Sir George Grey.] To what do you attribute the unwillingness of the parents that their children should work, when the parents are willing to work themselves?—I cannot account for it.

5422. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean that none of the children who were free on the 1st of August 1834 are now in employment?—I know of none.

5423. Do you speak of your own estate or of others?—I speak of the neighbourhood. I have a fine young gang on my estate; I say, "Let me see them in the yard," but they are so independent they will not come.

5424. Sir George Grey.] How soon did the children begin working during the time of slavery?—Between five and six.

5425. Mr. Buxton.] Have you a school on your estate?—We have none. I have

Maurice Jones, Esq.

29 July 1836.

have given a piece of land to the parish to build a school, and also half an acre for a chapel, and they contemplate the building of a school-room attached to the chapel.

5426. There is no school at present?—None at all.

5427. Sir George Grey.] Who are building the chapel?—The bishop gave us 500 l. and the House of Assembly 500 l., and the parish the difference.

5428. Mr. Gladstone.] Have those children had any instruction whatever, though there was no school on the estate?—They only go to church on the Sunday. There is a small chapel of ease on my estate, and a house is lent to the clergyman to perform divine service every Sunday morning.

5429. Have the children been catechised there?—Yes.

5430. Sir George Grey.] Do the children know how to read?—Some of them do, but very trifling; but I should hope, when the school is erected, they will resort to it.

5431. You think, though disinclined to work, they will not be disinclined to go for instruction?—No; I think that will be novel, and they will go to it; but learning will not do alone; it never could be sufficient of itself to make people give up their usual habits in youth.

5432. Do not you think that the school will have the effect of preventing their basking in the sun and climbing up the mango-trees?—It may.

5433. It will prevent their forming habits of idleness?—It may.

5434. Chairman.] The adult negro population on your estate are well disposed to work?—They are.

5435. Are they fond of the acquisition of money and those comforts money procures?—They are; at first they spurned at it very much, but now they take it very readily.

5436. You have found an improving disposition on the part of the negro?—Yes; they will take more readily to their work, and they work more cheerfully.

5437. Do you not think it probable that if proper care was taken to instruct the rising generation, the same motives that are now operating upon their fathers would operate upon them, and that as they grow up they will be disposed to work for wages in the like manner?—It entirely depends upon those young ones being brought up in industrious habits; the parents have been brought up in industrious habits, and now they pursue a line of industry; but if those young lads are allowed to trifle away till 13 or 14 they will never set down to work.

5438. Sir Stratford Canning.] Is there no obligation on the parents to educate their children?—I think the Act is silent upon that.

5439. Mr. Lushington.] Do you state that there is an indisposition on the part of the youths to work for money?—Yes.

5440. Do you attribute that to their having necessaries provided by their masters?—Yes; now they take them partially.

5441. Is it not likely that when the negroes shall have to provide for themselves and make their way in the world, they will naturally acquire a proper knowledge of the advantage of selling their labour? I cannot answer that question; time must prove it.

5442. Sir George Grey.] Have you had any opportunities of observing how they have expended the money they have got?—The negro character is of this description: when they get a little money they are very sly with it, they do not like to have it known; but they buy finery and clothes, and so on.

5443. Mr. Gladstone.] You say that the negroes showed an indisposition to receive money; was not there a good deal of difficulty in respect of coinage?—There was.

5444. What money had you to use; were there the means existing in Jamaica until of late of paying the negroes their daily wages; had you a small silver coinage?—We had nothing less than 5 d.

5445. Had you five-penny pieces of silver in abundance?—Yes, we had.

5446. Mr. Burton.] Have you ever offered wages to parents for the labour of their children?—No, I have never offered any definite sum to them, but I have offered them to hire their children, and see what I should give them for their day's labour. I have asked them, let your children go and weed the canes; I will pay them whatever the special magistrate shall direct; but I never could get them to volunteer.

5447. Have the parents ever refused to accept adequate wages for that which you you have offered them?—No; we make a bargain; give them 5 d. for every twelve cane-holes, and 5 d. for dinner-time, and if they work the whole day I give them half a dollar.

Maurice Jones, Esq.

29 July 1836.

5448. Have they ever refused to work for money?—Yes; I stated that at first they did; but they have improved upon that, and are glad to take it.

5449. During the time you had no schools upon your estate did you allow sectarian ministers to teach the children?—No; I never saw one upon the property.

5450. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean to say you refused permission?—I never was requested.

5451. Mr. Buxton.] You were a member of the House of Assembly?—I had that honour once; I have resigned three or four years ago.

5452. Are you aware that a member of the House of Assembly declared in the house that he persisted in the eight-hour system to prevent his apprentices going to attend sectarian places of worship at a distance?—About what time was that?

5453. Within the last six or eight months?—No; I cannot say that ever I heard of that before.

5454. You have spoken of salutary laws to compel the negro to work at the expiration of the time?—I mean the rising generation.

5455. Have the goodness to state what would be a salutary law for that purpose?—That would require some consideration, and I should request the assistance of my friend Mr. Burge as to the particular points. I am quite clear that if the legislature of Jamaica were to take it up, they would, from their local knowledge, point out such laws as would induce good habits; that I think would benefit the country after the year 1840.

5456. Sir George Grey.] Do you recommend a law that would render labour compulsory, or which would render it obligatory, or only one to hold out sufficient inducement?—If it could be made effectual, I should recommend a law to compel the parent to bring up his children in industrious habits; I am afraid they will be such wild creatures they will never be brought into subjection; they care nothing for their parents; they are quite independent of them.

5457. Mr. Gladstone.] Supposing those people are in a state to maintain themselves, and to maintain themselves without becoming a burden to the community, do you think you have a right to impose upon them by law the necessity of working to maintain the sugar cultivation of the island?—I should suppose that where there is a rising population, one-fifth part of the whole being brought up in idleness, is very alarming, and it would be very desirable that they should be brought to work; if that cannot be done, they must be brought up in the way they are, and in that case I do despair after the year 1840 of their ever working.

5458. Supposing their parents made them work in a sufficient degree to ensure their own subsistence individually, do you think in that case it would be desirable or right to pass a law compelling them to work for the purpose of maintaining the cultivation of the sugar?—Certainly. I believe that a tenth of the population must go off; I understand that is the number that will be invalided by age and disease in the year 1840; we ought to have something to fill up their places; and if the rising generation is, which I believe it is, in the proportion of one-fifth, supposing one half of that fifth is brought forward to make up the chasm made in 1840 the thing may go on.

5459. Do not you expect a great benefit from the effect of education, as stimulating character; you admit that they have been brought up without instruction?—Certainly, I must admit that.

5460. Do not you anticipate that as they rise up and become sensible of their wants and desire little luxuries, the case of your negroes will be theirs also, and that they will be as willing to work as your negroes at present are?—If I look at the Maroons, who are in a state of freedom, I see that they have never shown a disposition to labour, strong athletic men; and I certainly do think that if the children are not brought up from their infancy to industrious habits and good morals they will never work.

5461. Do not you think there are certain circumstances attaching to the case of the Maroons not similar to those of these young people, and that there is a greater analogy between the case of these children and their parents than between them and the Maroons?—There may be something in that; I cannot judge to what extent.

5462. Sir George Grey.] Have any of those children been apprenticed owing to

to

Maurice Jones, Esq. to the parents not maintaining them?—No; I never heard one instance of that.

29 July 1836.

5463. The parents do maintain them now?—No.

5464. Mr. Gladstone.] How are the young children who do not work clothed; at whose expense?—I never made any difference; I have bought the same quantity of clothing every year, and the same indulgences in every way; I never made any difference.

5465. Is that the case on every estate?—I believe it is; in some instances the mother will not allow her children to take the clothing. I was on the estate some time ago where they could not prevail upon the mother to let her children take the allowances; they had laid in the allowances as usual, but the mother would not do it.

5466. Sir George Grey.] What was the objection?—I have been told that somebody was going about the county to say that if they took anything they would compromise their freedom.

5467. There was an apprehension on that subject?—So I understand.

5468. Chairman.] Do you not think it possible that this notion that seems to prevail among the negro mothers, that the children would be compromising their freedom by accepting the allowances, may always prevail with regard to work, and that that may account for the idleness in which you state the negro children are at this moment?—I never heard of it with reference to work.

5469. Do not you think it likely that some misconception may prevail on that subject as well as on that of their accepting of allowances from the owner?—It may; but I know, with respect to my own estate, Mrs. Jones has always cut out the same clothing herself; and the clothing for the children has been laid out, and the mothers have come up and would not take it; that is all I can say.

5470. If those general habits of the young negroes are to be attributed to anything of that kind, is it not probable that cause will cease to co-operate as soon as ultimate freedom is introduced into the colony?—That is a question I cannot answer; time alone must decide that with certainty; nor do I know that it is actually in operation; it is only an idle thing going about.

5471. Mr. Buxton.] The country having given 20 millions to give entire liberty to the negroes, do you wish to impose fresh restrictions, and subject the negroes to any other restraints than those which relate to labourers in this country?—Decidedly not; but that they should be brought up to industrious habits during the remainder of the term.

5472. Do you wish that there should be any further restraints than those which exist to compel persons to work in England?—Certainly not.

5473. Sir George Grey.] In speaking of the law that was desirable, you meant during the probationary term?—Yes.

5474. Not any new law to take effect after 1840, when entire freedom was established?—Certainly not.

5475. Mr. Thornely.] In addition to your own estates you have rented two other estates since the apprenticeship system commenced?—I have.

5476. For what term are those estates rented?—During the term of the apprenticeship.

5477. Mr. Gladstone.] Have any cases of sales of estates since the apprenticeship began fallen within your notice?—Yes, a great many.

5478. Do you know the particulars of many?—I know an estate adjoining mine, Elmwood, that was sold under circumstances out of the Court of Chancery; the estate was formerly valued at 30,000 l. and it sold for 9,000 l.

5479. What was supposed to be the produce of that estate; how many hogsheads does it bring under the apprenticeship system?—It has fallen off very much indeed: they used to make 200 hogsheads a season, and it has fallen off to 20 or 30. I think it was under very bad management; that I must admit; it was not the cause of the apprenticeship system that reduced the crop.

5480. At what period did it make the 200 hogsheads?—About eight years ago.

5481. Are you able to state whether that estate is still capable of making 200 hogsheads under the apprenticeship system, if it is well managed?—I calculate it would make about two-thirds of them.

5482. You say that estate was sold at 9,000 l. out of the Court of Chancery; if it was a bankrupt sale, as it probably was, it would possibly fetch considerably less than if it was brought to market as the property of an individual?—Certainly.

5483. Sir George Grey.] For what do you suppose it would have sold in the year year 1832?—I suppose the creditor of the estate (it was very much involved) would have taken the estate for his mortgage, about 20,000 l. sterling.

5484. Had there been a great depreciation of property in Jamaica shortly previous to the emancipation taking place?—Yes; there was a nervous feeling, certainly, throughout the colonies.

5485. Can you give an estimate of the value of property shortly before the alteration of the system, as compared with the present?—No, I cannot.

5486. Do you suppose an estate now would sell for less than it did shortly previous to the emancipation?—Most decidedly.

5487. When you speak of an estate, do you include the negroes upon it?—I include the apprenticeship term, of course.

5488. Mr. Gladstone.] Looking to the sugar that estate would produce, how many years' purchase of the estate would you say 9,000 l. was?—That I cannot give an opinion upon.

5489. Sir George Grey.] Are you to be understood that the alteration of the system, and the introduction of the apprenticeship system, has diminished the value of property in Jamaica to an extent to be compared with that estate?—My own estates cost me 20,000 l. each; I bought one in 1814, the other in 1815; I have put, I suppose, 5,000 l. of stock upon each estate, additional negroes and stock; they were valued at 50,000 l.; I got 10,000 l. in the shape of compensation-money, and I offered those estates to a house in this town for 10,000 l. sterling, principally on account of this measure; I would not have parted with my estate but for that.

5490. You would not give the same for an estate now as you would have done three years ago?—I cannot put that more clearly than by stating what I have done with my own estate; I have received only 10,000 l. compensation-money, but if I could sell the two estates for the sum of 10,000 l. I would cut Jamaica at once.

5491. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware whether the house is likely to accept it?—It was accepted in the first instance and rejected ultimately.

5492. The estates are unincumbered?—Yes.

5493. Mr. Buxton.] You have not told the Committee what is the relative value of that estate now, with what it was three years ago?—I considered the value of my estate not less than 50,000 l. or 60,000 l.; everything depended upon the state of the rise and fall of the market.

5494. The question is, whether that estate has risen or fallen in value since the year 1832?—It has fallen in value.

5495. What was the value of it then?—The proper value of it I suppose was 50,000 l.; I mean the two estates.

5496. What could you have got for them?—I could not have got anything for them; there was nobody in the market; it was altogether nominal.

5497. Sir George Grey.] You think purchases have been made at a lower price since the apprenticeship system came into operation?—In some instances they have bought estates very cheap.

5498. Mr. Buxton.] Could you have got 20,000 l. for your own estates in 1832?—I could not.

5499. Mr. Gladstone.] Would you have taken it if you could have got it?—I do not think I should in 1832; I was not desirous of selling then.

5500. Sir Stratford Canning.] Were there any transactions of purchase at that time?—No, I am not aware that there were.

5501. Chairman.] Do you consider property more saleable at this moment than it was in the year 1832?—At a certain sacrifice.

5502. It was absolutely unsaleable in 1833?—I believe it was.

5503. Mr. Buxton.] How happens it that you agreed to rent two other estates?—I had two sons, and I wished them to be employed; and I rented one estate for one son, and the other for the other.

5504. You think it is possible that capital may be employed beneficially in hiring estates in Jamaica for cultivation?—It could only be in this way: those estates belonged to non-residents; my sons intended to reside upon the estates themselves, and by putting increased stock upon it, I mean fresh stock of males, and an increase of manual labour, I could bring forward the crops better than it had been done.

5505. Did you ever hire, or offer to hire, any estate during the time that slavery prevailed?—No, I cannot say that I did.

5506. Are

Maurice Jones, Esq.

29 July 1836.

5506. Are your estates near the parish of Vere?—No; in the parish of Portland.

5507. You are not able to give any information as to the parish of Vere?—No, I am not.

5508. Mr. Gladstone.] For how many hours out of the 24, during your time, has the mill been put about upon your estates?—It is impossible for me to answer that without my diary; we never work at night.

5509. Do you work, during the 12 hours, from sunset to sunrise?—We work from six to six; the sun varies; we do not take that into account; the negroes generally go to work at sunrise and leave off when it sets.

5510. Is the whole period about 12 hours out of the 24?—No; I made a contract with them; they were to give me 1,800 gallons of liquor in the 12 hours; when they have ground that quantity, it is task-work, then they are off.

5511. Under those circumstances, have you found any difficulty in carrying on the planting of canes for the next year at the time that you have been taking off the crop of the current year?—Not on the system which I adopt on the estates I own, Boston and Hertford estates; I have circumscribed the cultivation that I might have fully the means of carrying it on with spirit, and doing justice to the land.

5512. Are you aware whether in any case negroes are worked compulsorily more than nine hours in the day in Jamaica?—I am not.

5513. Are you aware what is the law upon that subject, whether the law forbids any master to work more than nine hours a day compulsorily?—Every manager has the law in his house, and the special magistrate takes it round with him.

5514. Are you aware what is the interpretation of that clause?—I believe that that has been decided by his Excellency the Governor, under the advice of the Attorney-general.

5515. Has it been decided that no master can work his negroes more than nine hours?—I believe so.

5516. Do you believe they would work if they were to be directed to work beyond the nine hours a day?—No; I believe they would not, unless they were compensated; they know their own rights very well.

5517. Mr. Buxton.] What clause is there in the Act which prohibits the negro being worked more than nine hours in the day?—I believe it does not prohibit specific hours, but if the law specifies the hours they shall be worked, that of course must imply that they shall not be worked for more.

William Burge, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

W. Burge, Esq.

5518. Chairman.] AS agent of Jamaica, have you had occasion to apply to the Government for a considerable supply of small silver coin, that has been required for the circulation of the island in consequence of the payment of wages to the negroes?—Yes. Under the Act which granted a loan to the different West India colonies, 500,000 l. was appropriated to the Island of Jamaica; a part of it, namely, the sum of 300,000 l. was lent to individuals on the security of their estates, the remainder, being 200,000 l., was lent to the island, on the credit of the island. The Assembly of Jamaica directed me to remit this sum in small coins of shillings and sixpences. It was the object of the Assembly, by means of this coin, to afford facility to the proprietors of estates in paying wages to their apprentices. I applied to the Government, and every facility was afforded me by the Government and by Lord Auckland and the officers of the Mint in procuring this sum. Subsequently, the Assembly, with the same view, directed me, and for that purpose made me a remittance to this country, to procure 10,000 l. more in still smaller coin; that was 3 d. and 1½ d. silver coinage; and I owe it to Lord Auckland and the Government to acknowledge the readiness with which I was afforded the means of transmitting this latter sum. The 1½ d. was, in fact, a new coinage. The Government also afforded every possible facility in the export from this country of that coinage. In consideration of the emolument the Government has from the coinage, the whole of the 200,000 l. was actually sent, packed at the expense of the Government, in a steamer, and put on board a vessel of war. I know the legislature of Jamaica directed this coin to be sent, in order to have the means of placing in the possession of the proprietors money to pay the wages to their apprentices.

5519. Was it the case that, during the period of slavery, this small silver coinage coinage was ever required for the wants of the island?—I do not believe an application was ever made for such a coinage before; this species of coinage was expressly adopted to correspond with the current Portuguese coin of the colony; and being an accurate representation of the value of those coins current, they have remained in the colony, and I am not aware that any part has been remitted back here.

Sir George Grey, Bart, a Member of the Committee, Examined.

5521. What is the date of the last which has been printed?—I think the month of June or July last year.

5522. How many have been received since that?—A great many; there is a monthly report. I have recently looked through a large number of them, and I am enabled to state that they uniformly are favourable to the working of the present system; I mean that every successive report received from Lord Sligo gives a favourable account of the working of the system generally, an increasingly favourable account, subject of course to exceptions, consisting of individual instances of misconduct, oppression, and cruelty; but those instances are stated as exceptions to the general rule. I believe Lord Sligo reports all of a serious nature which come within his own knowledge; and it would be most unfair to take them as a representation of the state of society in the colony instead of exceptions to the general state of things. I will refer to some of Lord Sligo's despatches, which have not yet been printed. The first is dated the 28th of November 1835. Lord Sligo, in a despatch of that date, states, "I have been in conversation with very many of the country gentlemen, since they have come up to the assembly and to the races here, which have been going on during the last week, and I have not had a dissentient opinion given to me; all agree in saying that things are now going on vastly beyond calculation better than a short time ago. Speculations are rife. The system of working for wages appears to be becoming general, at least I have heard no one complain of the reverse." He states in a subsequent part of the same despatch, "I think that a great change has also taken place in the feelings as to the management of properties; there does not appear now to be that anxiety for corporal punishment, which its prevalence for many years had caused them at first to think indispensable." He states in many of his despatches, and there is a statement in this, with reference to the same subject to the following effect, that a great increase of crime is alleged to have taken place among the negroes since the emancipation. He says, "My own view is that this is not the case, for though the cases adjudged in open court are much multiplied, I think that the same number of offences were before committed, but that they were punished on the estates in a summary manner, and no public notice taken of them. I do not, therefore, on the whole, think that the number of offences has increased, though public notice is more called to them. I know of more than one instance of overseers having been dismissed for cruel and improper conduct; and, in short, I feel that I am fully warranted in making this report one of a favourable nature, though I think it not at all improbable but that I may not be able to make similar ones on all occasions in future; the balance, however, I feel assured will be of a pleasant nature." In a subsequent despatch, of the 13th of December 1835, Lord Sligo, after alluding to the state of the crops, says, "The more agreeable part of this report must be the extraordinary revolution which has taken place all over the island, with particular exceptions, in the mutual feelings of master and apprentice. In what this has originated it is hard to say, but the conviction is strong upon my mind, as well from my official reports as from the private conversations I have had during this session with most of the members, and with other persons well acquainted with the real feelings of the country, there has sprung up a spirit of mutual confidence, which I hope may be nurtured, and think it will. Nothing can be so likely to promote the success of the new system, and, in fact, without it none could be expected." He states in a subsequent part of the same despatch, "I am not aware of any exception which I can make to the general report of a favourable feeling existing. By a separate return which I have had the honour to enclose to you, your Lordship will see how small a proportion of convictions, in comparison with their numbers, has fallen on the apprentices. I deny totally the fact that crime is on the increase, and has been so since the 1st of August; it is, if any, generally admitted that offences are now brought forward for trial which were formerly punished by flogging on estates, and never heard of, and that the apparent increase is to be attributed to that circumstance. I have, besides, the assurance of high legal authority that even the apparent increase of crime is only in one particular county." On the 1st of January 1836, Lord Sligo in another despatch of that date states, "I must say that the majority of them" (the reports of the special magistrates) "have given me the greatest gratification, inasmuch as they confirm, almost to the point, all those opinions which I have lately given you in my private as well as public despatches respecting the improved state of feeling which has lately appeared to exist between master and apprentice. There is not one, I am happy to say, which announces anything unfavourable in the main, though in some districts the apprentices are less civilized than in others." He then proceeds to express his opinion in the following terms: "I am persuaded that the planters have become aware of the perilous consequence of harshness; they have lost their former habits of dominion; and I think I am not deceived in saying, that, with a few very obstinate exceptions, a totally different manner of treatment of the apprentices, which promises the happiest results, has been adopted. However ignorant are the apprentices, they are perfectly sensible to their altered condition, and were so from the commencement. Finding now that they are effectually protected, they are not so anxious to maintain in all their strictness their newly-acquired rights, and very very few complaints indeed are made by them against their masters. In like manner they know that the law will be enforced against them, and they give but few causes of serious complaint, in comparison to what they did at the commencement of the new system. That they are indolent and often turn out late, that is, on ordinary occasions they do not exert their best energies for their masters, is most true; but until it shall be proved that the negroes are different from persons of another colour, it is but common sense to feel that they will not work as energetically when they get so little for it, as they do now in their masters' legal hours, as when they feel that the quantum of labour performed increases their gains. In one of the reports enclosed herewith, your Lordship will see that now they do 160 cane-holes for hire in the time they used to dig 90 during slavery. I do begin to hope, therefore, that the treatment now adopted by the planters, will be found so beneficial to the interests of the island, that it will gradually be ameliorated till the conclusion of the apprenticeship; that the conduct of the apprentices will in a corresponding ratio improve also, till at last, in 1840, the change from apprenticeship to perfect freedom will be accompanied by none of those ruinous consequences which are still anticipated by many." Then he mentions some exceptions, which it is but fair to state: "There are, however, many here, who though they behave in a perfectly satisfactory manner towards the apprentices, feel an internal conviction that they will not be able to assure to themselves the services of one apprentice after that period. These people, under this feeling, take no steps to prepare for the change they may suffer, and I fear will, but it will be their own faults. It is, however, time enough for that fault to be remedied, and I think that the greatly increased confidence which has been very generally exhibited will extend to them also." Then he gives one of the instances of misconduct to which I have adverted, which shows he does not take a blind view of the state of society in Jamaica, and overlook any of those circumstances which might be considered as detracting from the general character of his reports. "There was one overseer, a few weeks ago, whom I detected ordering for the apprentices under his charge, whenever they gave him any annoyance, the pleasing amusement of walking before his door, for such period as he might choose, with half-hundred weights upon their heads; this in the sun, and at the time of day likely to make it the most serious punishment. This having been detected by that active magistrate, Mr. Lyon, and reported to me, I named it to Mr. Duncan Robertson, the attorney for the property, who immediately went down there, in company with Mr. Joseph Gordon, who is, I fancy, the co-attorney of it, and after a rigid examination, discharged the man, and with such a character as will, I fancy, prevent his getting any other situation. These instances, however, are rare, and being noticed noticed as this has been by the attorneys, will not, I trust, be repeated anywhere." He afterwards says, "I hear from almost all quarters that in consequence of the excellent conduct of the negroes during the Christmas holidays, it is the intention of a great majority of the managers to give them this day as an holiday, though not one by law; I am confident that they will benefit by this act of kindness. It has been generally remarked that there has been this year by far less of the John Canoeing, and the barbarous accompaniments, which heretofore have been practised at this season. The Christmas-day and Sunday has been, with the exception only of Kingston, passed in a remarkably serious manner. There, in so large a town, there must be enough of idlers to make an appearance of the sort; but it was remarked even there that the season passed off much more rationally than ever was before known." The next despatch is the 14th of January 1836. Lord Sligo in this confirms his former opinion. I will read one extract referring to an enclosure: "Enclosed herewith also goes a detailed account of the money paid by Mr. Mac Neil, of Westmorland, an excellent and extensive attorney, last year, for labour actually performed by the negroes, by which you will see that on the 12 estates therein specified, the apprentices have made equal to 440½ hogsheads of sugar in their own time, and received the sum of 665*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.* for so doing." The account is in a tabular form, and I will put it in, for the information of the Committee. On the 6th of February 1836, Lord Sligo states that the number of estates where no complaints are made was regularly increasing in proportion, which he considered to be a most favourable symptom. On the 2d of April 1836, he again gives a generally favourable report of the same kind; it is thus expressed: "The altered and increased good feeling between the masters and apprentices, which I have before communicated to you, is fully confirmed." On the 7th of May Lord Sligo again adverts to the prevalence of theft alleged to exist among the negroes; he says, "I have only to regret the prevalence of stealing produce, which appears to be a serious evil. I do not imagine it to be of more frequent occurrence than it was, not even so general; but it being now wisely made the interest of the policemen to apprehend the perpetrators, the detections are frequent, and I am confident that the serious check which this body will put on this evil will of itself repay the expenditure which the island incurs in keeping it up." He also, in this despatch, calls Lord Glenelg's particular attention to the great decrease in the number of lashes inflicted by the special magistrates. In the month of April, as compared with the month of March, the decrease was about 50 per cent. I will read an enclosure to that despatch, a letter from Mr. Pryce, a special magistrate. "The apprentices," he says, on the estates under his care, "are receiving a great deal of money for extra labour. Where they are liberally paid, they give the managers great satisfaction; in short, they perform double the quantity of work in a day for 2*s.* 6*d.* which they do for 1*s.* 8*d.*; they not only work extra hours, but with increased assiduity." He proceeds to state a fact which is an important one, because it was apprehended that there would be great difficulty in inducing them to work in the field. "The work they like best," Mr. Pryce says, "is cane-hole digging, by which they can earn the most money, some even 5*s.* or 6*s.* 8*d.* per day." On the 24th of May Lord Sligo sent another report, in which he states that complaints were diminishing every day, as the parties understood the law better. There was a table prepared about five or six months ago, in order to submit in one view in a tabular form the substance of the facts stated in one series of the monthly reports of the special magistrates. It is in fact a summary of those reports, prepared with great care by Mr. Spedding, a gentleman in the office. The reports were for the month of October, last year. Another table of a similar kind, for a recent period, is now in preparation. I think it important that these should be in the possession of the Committee; and I am sure the more information is obtained as to the substance and nature of the reports of the special magistrates, the less will it appear that they are what they have been represented to be, the mere agents of the managers in coercing the negroes. These reports, though varying to a certain extent, according to the character of the men and the circumstances in which they were placed, show a spirit and temper which is very satisfactory, and cannot fail to remove any unjust suspicion which may have attached to the character and conduct of the special magistrates. With reference to this subject, I feel it necessary to advert to a copy of instructions addressed by Lord Sligo to the special justices, dated January the 1st, 1836, and which I will leave with the Committee. They refer to several of the subjects which have been adverted to in the previous evidence before the Committee, and are of importance to be considered in connexion with that evidence. It has been presumed, that owing to the special magistrates acting only under their special commission, they could not act with full effect for the protection of the negro. That point was brought by Lord Sligo under the notice of the Government last year. He suggested that they should be furnished, where necessary, with a local commission also; the only difficulty arose from the payment of fees upon the local commission. It was not considered fair to charge that upon the special magistrates, and require them to take out the commission at an expense to themselves, and it was not likely that the expense would be defrayed in the colony. On the recommendation of the Secretary of State to the Treasury, Lord Sligo was authorized to defray the expense, and to give a local commission to as many of the special magistrates as he thought fit; the consequence is, that the whole, or a great majority of the special magistrates, have received that commission, and Lord Sligo calls their attention to this circumstance in the instructions which I hold in my hand; he says, "You will recollect that you are a magistrate, for the purposes of this Act, all over the island, and that you therefore can everywhere in Jamaica act between master and apprentice in their respective relation to one another, or between apprentice and apprentice, and between apprentice and any other person not his master and mistress, as far as the punishment of the apprentice goes." I read that passage, because it has been presumed in evidence that under the Act for carrying into effect the abolition of slavery the means existed of punishing apprentices for acts committed against third parties, and that no means existed, through the agency of the special magistrates, of punishing third parties for offences committed against the apprentices. Lord Sligo goes on to say, "And that your jurisdiction as local magistrate of the parish in which you reside enables you to inflict any punishment on any individual, not his employer, who may ill use him; you must, however, look to the law as your guide in this respect, as in many cases, such as assault, &c., it will require two local magistrates to act." There is another point particularly noticed in these instructions; the expediency and desirableness of reducing corporal punishment within the narrowest possible limits, with a view to its total extinction.

5523. Are there any other points connected with the conduct of the magistrates on which you are desirous of making any observations to the Committee?—There are very full instructions given in this document on almost every point that could come before them. There is one point on which the Committee have received a good deal of evidence. The 23d article of those instructions is as follows: "Where the apprentices have to go a distance to work off the property on which they live, you will allow them, out of their master's time, at the rate of three miles an hour to reach the ground." That is the general instruction on that point, under which the magistrates are bound to act, under Lord Sligo's authority; they are called upon also to give very minute returns to him of all the cases which come under their cognizance, and the evidence on which the adjudication takes place. With reference, again, to the sick people, they are desired to be careful in their inquiries on all occasions as to medical attendance, supply of clothing, attention to sick, feeble, old and sitting down people. "Sitting down people" is an expression perfectly understood in Jamaica. During the period of slavery they were a recognised class of people, and they appear to have enjoyed the same exemption from labour since which they did previously. The magistrates are further required to visit the hospitals and cells frequently, and at uncertain times, and report specially in their weekly diary, after each estate's name, that they have done so; they are to see that they are clean and in good order.

5524. Mr. Buxton.] With regard to the power given to the special magistrates of acting as local magistrates, even as things now stand, it does not appear at present whether managers are liable to any other punishment than that which the general law of the island inflicts?—Clearly not. As local magistrates, they possess precisely the power which other local magistrates would as between free persons; with respect to wages, for instance, the special magistrate has power to interfere by his local commission, even if his special commission did not give it him, which I am not prepared to admit. In case of assault, or any ill-usage to the apprentice by a free person, not his employer, the special magistrate, by virtue of his local commission, might deal with that just as a local magistrate could act in the case of two free persons.

5525. How long is it since those local commissions have become universal?—I think the correspondence began when Lord Aberdeen was at the head of the department.

department. The recommendation to the Treasury was made by Lord Aberdeen; the answer was received after he left office. I think it must have been about the month of May 1835 when Lord Sligo was authorized to grant the commission.

5526. Mr. Gladstone.] Would a special magistrate, acting between party and party, adjudicate on the general laws of the island?—He would be authorized to adjudicate, by his local commission, according to the general law. Where the Abolition Act described the offence, and imposed a punishment, he would be bound to administer the law which he was sent there expressly to carry into effect.

5527. Would the Abolition Act apply to any apprentice cases between apprentice and apprentice?—It would. In some of the colonies (whether in Jamaica or not, I cannot say; I do not at this moment remember, but I think it is so) jurisdiction is given to the special magistrates over the apprentices where offences are committed against any other person than their employer. Lord Sligo seems to admit, in the passage I have read, that this jurisdiction exists by virtue of the special commission in Jamaica. With reference to pregnant women and women after confinement, it has, I think, been assumed that, according to the strict letter of the law in Jamaica, no provision is made to exempt them from the liability to repay lost time. In the 38th of these instructions, Lord Sligo says, "Questions having frequently arisen as to the liability of pregnant women to repay to their masters the time lost prior to delivery in childbirth and suckling and nursing their children, I beg to draw your attention, when any complaint may be made by the master against an apprentice under those circumstances, to the following observations: As sickness is a lawful cause of neglecting the employer's work, there does not appear any distinction between those ailments which beset the human frame from other causes and those to which it is subject in childbirth and its consequences. With respect to their attendance on sick children, much will depend upon the reality and nature of the illness, and the extent of time devoted to that duty in each particular case. But as it could never be intended, in defining the rights of the employer, to supersede the paramount obligations of a mother towards her offspring in such cases, so would it be more unreasonable to visit, by any penal infliction, a mother who neglected her duties to her employer for the sole purpose of affording her child that aid which the state of the disease might require at her hands. But if such an apology be untruly alleged as an excuse for idleness, or to deprive the employer of the time he is entitled to, it will become a case to be dealt with as any other unfounded pretext for avoiding duty. As often, however, as sufficient cause is shown, and the time taken be to a reasonable extent, women under those circumstances do not appear liable to repay the time lost."

5528. Mr. Burton.] Are you acquainted with the Vere resolutions of the 28th of July 1834?—I think it extremely probable that Lord Sligo may have transmitted a copy of them at the time, which is now two years ago, to the then Secretary of State. I was not then connected with the office, and have no recollection of having seen them before; but on looking at the paper now placed in my hands, I see they profess to be regulations at a meeting of magistrates, vestry and inhabitants at the court-house, three days before the apprenticeship system came into operation. Those regulations, whatever they might be, could not control the directions given by the Governor of Jamaica to the special magistrate.

5529. You do not know whether those regulations are in operation?—No; but if they are at variance with the instructions addressed by Lord Sligo to the special magistrates, they cannot be in operation, so far as regards the special magistrates, who cannot act in defiance of positive instructions of the Governor.

5530. Chairman.] Do you wish to make any statement to the Committee on the subject of the comparison of the two systems, which are called the eight-hour system and the nine-hour system?—A great many communications upon the subject have been received from Lord Sligo. It has been stated, I think, by one of the witnesses, that Lord Sligo himself was an advocate for the eight-hour system, and that he recommended that in preference to the nine-hour system. To a certain extent this is true; but in justice to Lord Sligo, I am bound to state that he has exerted himself recently within all the limits of his lawful authority to establish the nine-hour system in preference to the eight hours, contrary to the opinion he had originally entertained himself of the latter being the most beneficial to all parties. He subsequently ascertained that the negroes preferred the nine-hour system, and that very general complaints had arisen of the eight-hour system being adopted; the result of his observation and the reports addressed to him proved that the negroes liked to have half the Friday for the cultivation of their own grounds, and that they much preferred working nine hours for four days in the week, and having half the Friday to themselves. In addition to the instructions to the special magistrates (No. 20), Lord Sligo has transmitted a copy of a circular letter, of the 25th August 1835, to the custodes of parishes in Jamaica, recommending the adoption of the nine-hour system, though he says distinctly he has no power to enforce it, because the law has left that an open subject, with the qualification, however, which I find attached to it by barristers whom Lord Sligo consulted in Jamaica, that in no case shall the daily labour exceed nine hours. The question appears to be exclusively between the nine-hour and the eight-hour system, and not between a limited period of labour in the day and an unlimited one. I do not remember one single instance of complaint of a negro having been subject to compulsory labour for a longer period than nine hours in the day, unless in cases where the additional hours have been imposed as a punishment by the order of a special magistrate.

5531. You conceive the nine-hour system is preferred by the negroes almost universally?—That is my inference from the reports of Lord Sligo and of the special magistrates.

5532. Do you apprehend there has been a disposition on the part of the planters to accede to the nine-hour system when the negro population showed a decided preference to it?—I should infer, from the general tenor of Lord Sligo's despatches upon this subject, that the eight-hour system has been preferred by the planters, but that in consequence of the exertions which he has used in pointing out to the special magistrates and custodes, and through them to the managers, his views of the interest of the proprietors being promoted by adopting the system which the negroes would willingly fall into rather than one to which they would feel a great aversion, the nine-hour system has in a great number of cases been adopted. There are one or two facts connected with that which I can state. In a despatch of the 21st of August 1835, from Lord Sligo, there is an enclosure from Mr. Pryce, one of the special justices, dated Top Hill Pen, Trelawny, in the following terms: "I have the honour to report to your excellency that the whole of the estates in this district are working the nine-hour system, and getting the half of Friday, which I acquaint the apprentices is granted to encourage them to continue to perform their work honestly and faithfully when on duty in the field, and I feel pleasure in reporting to your Lordship the absence of complaints on this head." In a despatch from Lord Sligo of the 13th of December 1835, there is this passage: "There never was, in my opinion, a more injurious plan than that adopted immediately after last crop terminated, namely, changing the hour of labour from the nine-hour to the eight-hour system. What may have been the motive for doing so it is hard to say; that it was not to get more labour from them I think may be inferred from the fact that during crop, when the greatest quantity of labour which can be procured is sought for, the nine-hour system was universal. It has been said that the reason was that it was considered that by the apprentice having the half Friday to himself he had too much idle time, and that the change was made with a view to prevent that. I must say that if this were their object they exhibit sad short-sightedness. The attempt to lead free people to work is much more likely to succeed than any effort to drive them to it. I suspect, however, that this view of the subject has already struck the more reflecting, as hardly one of those great attorneys, whose conduct has led me to respect and look up to them, have continued to adopt this plan," meaning the eight-hour system. Therefore I should infer, from the general tenor of this despatch, and without having an accurate return of the estates on which the two systems prevail, that although the eight-hour system was generally prevalent, the nine-hour system was substituted for it during crop, after which there was a return to the eight-hour system after crop, but that, owing to Lord Sligo's exertions, the nine-hour system has been adopted very generally since.

5533. Mr. Gladstone.] Is it your impression that the eight-hour system has ever been in operation on the majority of the estates in the whole island?—The passage I read from the last despatch would rather lead me to infer that it has; but I have not sufficient information correctly to judge of that.

5534. Mr. Buxton.] Does Lord Sligo state that the right of resorting to the eight-hour system has ever been used for the purpose of compelling the labour of negroes beyond their extra hours?—I do not recollect that he does; he certainly states that he conceived it was done in some instances to annoy the negroes, and to interfere with the free exercise of their own time. But the interest of the manager would, in some degree, control this, as he would not resort to the eight-hour system when his interest was concerned in an adherence to the nine-hour system.

5535. If he wanted to get work done, the nine-hour system would be adopted; if he wanted to annoy the negro, the eight-hour system?—Yes, certainly; I do not mean to say that Lord Sligo implies that in all cases it was done for that object, but he thought it was so in some cases, as he could discern no other motive; but he himself had been of opinion at first that the eight-hour system was the best for the negroes, and he had changed his opinion owing to the numerous complaints he had received of the dissatisfaction it occasioned in the mind of the negroes, which made him a convert to the nine-hour system. Others may have honestly entertained the same opinion as Lord Sligo.

5536. Lord Sligo stated that the negroes felt a great hardship in the eight-hour system, more than to anything else to which they were subjected under the system, did he not?—I do not think he has in those terms, but he has stated strongly the dissatisfaction it occasioned, and I think this has been almost the only complaint of a general character.

5537. Does Lord Sligo send home the evidence on the complaints of the negroes to the special magistrates?—No; Lord Sligo, in common with the other governors, was desired to retain all those documents in his own office, owing to the mass of copying which would have been required had copies been sent home. It was considered better to require an abstract to be sent home, and that he should retain the evidence, that on any reference being made by the Secretary of State to him, he might be able in any particular case to furnish the evidence on which the special magistrate had adjudicated.

5538. Has any evidence been sent home by which it appears that the negroes have made any complaints of having been worked beyond nine hours a day?—I cannot be certain as to the precise nature of the complaints made by the negroes, but judging from the statement which Lord Sligo has addressed to the Secretary of State, the numerous statements with regard to the distribution of the number of hours of labour, I am quite sure that if complaints of any other description than those which he has noticed had reached him, he would have transmitted them to the Secretary of State, or noticed them. I believe from what Lord Sligo has reported, and from the internal evidence of all his communications, that the fullest information has been afforded by him on every point connected with the working of the system.

5539. Are you aware that many planters, notwithstanding it is for their own interest to work them for nine hours, and notwithstanding Lord Sligo's recommendation, still continue to work them for eight hours?—My impression is that many do; but he states that hardly one of the great attorneys have done so. I have no doubt it prevails to a considerable degree in Jamaica; but I should also state, that if it is a defect in legislation that a more accurate distribution of the time was not fixed by law, it is a defect in our own law, and is not fairly imputable to the colonial legislature.

5540. Chairman.] You have heard the evidence that has been given to the Committee upon the subject of the corporal punishment of females in workhouses?—Yes; and I have endeavoured to collect all the cases which have been alluded to by Lord Sligo upon that subject, and to ascertain so far as I could the prevailing opinion of the legality or illegality of the punishment of females in the workhouses in Jamaica. There are four or five cases of this nature which have been referred to by Lord Sligo. One case reported by him is not a case of a female apprentice having been punished, even under pretence of law, but was a case of very aggravated assault, not committed in a workhouse, with respect to which a trial took place. The first case mentioned by Lord Sligo is contained in a despatch, of the 12th of April 1835, which is before Parliament, in which Lord Sligo states, that having "heard that two female apprentices had been flogged at the house of correction at Kingston, he requested a copy of the examinations which had been taken by orders of the corporation before he heard of the offence having been committed." It appears that the corporation of Kingston, who constitute the magistracy of that place, had interfered before Lord Sligo had heard of it. "These," Lord Sligo adds, "I have the honour to enclose to you, and have not directed any further inquiry, as all the material facts are there clearly laid down. I have caused it to be intimated that such a mode of punishment is illegal, excepting when ordered by a special justice, and that Dr. S——, whether as surgeon to the institution or local magistrate, had no right to order such an infliction." "My reason for not at once deciding on what should be done is, that though the punishment was decidedly illegal, on whom to visit the offence does not appear to me to be so clear. The board of superintendence appear to me to have given a highly illegal order, as they authorized the indiscriminate flogging of males and females, in case they should not stay at the tread-mill the time they were condemned to work at it." "It is true that the apprentices, who very much dislike the constant labour of the tread-mill, do throw themselves off it and refuse to work out their sentences, and that it is very hard to manage them." He adds in a subsequent part of the despatch, "In the house of correction at Black River the gaoler has adopted the use of the cat at his own pleasure, but only on males. The moment I heard of it, of course I stopped it, and directed that they should be brought before the special magistrate, who would direct such punishment as he should deem expedient. If the matter is stopped at the house of correction at Kingston, perhaps it is not worth while to take any further notice of it, but I feel that it would be very wrong for me to have acquired the knowledge that such a matter had taken place without communicating it to your Lordship." That despatch encloses the whole of the examinations in this case. In Lord Glenelg's answer to that despatch there is the following paragraph: "Your Lordship states yourself to have caused it to be intimated that the punishment by the whip is illegal, except when ordered by a special magistrate. I conclude there is some accidental mis-quotation in this passage of the instructions which you have really given, since a special magistrate has no more right than any other justice of the peace to authorize the punishment of women by whipping; indeed, it might be more accurately said that the special magistrate is more clearly incompetent than any other person in the commission of the peace to pronounce such a sentence." The opinion of the Secretary of State, as communicated in that despatch, was, that if the offences of the females in question were committed against the law respecting manumitted slaves (or in other words, the apprentices), then, under the 17th section of the Act of Parliament, their punishment was evidently illegal; but that if they were sentenced under the general law of the island, for crimes which persons not being apprentices might commit, and if by that general law such persons would have been liable to such chastisement on such authority, then, under the terms of the proviso at the conclusion of the 17th section, the proceeding might be legal. He conceived that female apprentices eo nomine were exempted from corporal punishment. That appears to have been the only instance which had come under Lord Sligo's cognizance at that time. On the 5th of September 1835, Lord Sligo enclosed "the proceedings at a coroner's inquest on the body of Anna Maria Thompson, who died in Buff Bay workhouse," in the parish of St. George's, "after having received a corporal punishment." He then stated that there were "one or two other similar cases, not precisely the same, but exhibiting the manner in which the law is perverted, which he had written for, and would send as soon as he could procure them." Here again Lord Sligo seems to have no doubt that the law was perverted or infringed by conduct of this nature, and that the law did not sanction the conduct of the individual. The copy of the verdict is sent: "That the said Anna Maria Thompson, on Monday the 25th day of May instant, at the house of correction at Buff Bay, came to her death from inflammation of the bowels, membrane of the liver and of the omentum, and not otherwise, to the knowledge of the jurors." There was medical evidence taken upon that inquest. It appeared from the evidence on the inquest that the woman had been severely flogged while in the workhouse.

5541. Mr. Buxton.] Have you any information whether the flogging came to the knowledge of Lord Sligo before the death of the woman?—No; it appears to have been a few days preceding her death. The next complaint is reported, in a despatch of the 5th of March 1836, as having taken place in St. Andrew's workhouse. On receiving intimation that improper conduct had occurred in this workhouse, Lord Sligo directed Mr. Bourne, a special magistrate, to hold an investigation, the result of which was, that Mr. Bourne was ordered to take informations against the particular individuals who had committed the offences, in order that they may be submitted to the attorney-general for prosecution at the next assizes. We do not yet know what the result of that prosecution is. Lord Sligo in this despatch mentions that six cases altogether of this nature had come before him.

5542. Do you know the result of any other prosecution?—It does not appear whether any prosecution took place in the case of the woman on whom the inquest was held in the first case I adverted to. The difficulty stated by Lord Sligo was not in proving the illegality of the punishment, but in deciding on whom to visit the offence; the board of superintendence, he stated, had given a highly illegal order.

order. With reference to this, Lord Glenelg in his answer says, "Without undertaking to express any positive opinion whether a breach of the law took place in these cases or not," (that question depending on the fact which I before noticed) "I think that if any penalties have been incurred, they ought to be enforced. I should much deprecate any suspicion of indifference on the part of the local government on such a subject; and if persons of some consideration in the island of Jamaica have really been guilty of infringing a law so intimately connected with the moral elevation of both sexes, I think the rank of the offenders affords a strong motive for bringing them to justice. The example of their punishment would be peculiarly impressive." I am not able to state what steps have been taken in consequence of that opinion.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.
M.P.

5543. Has Lord Sligo referred distinctly to the clause in the local Act authorizing personal correction to be inflicted in the workhouses?—No, I do not think he has; but it appears to be clearly his opinion, and he has been confirmed in that opinion by others, that the clause in our own Act, which has been transferred into the Jamaica Act, which prohibits the punishment of female apprentices by flogging, prevails over every enactment of the Gaol Act which would subject persons in confinement in any gaol to corporal punishment. These cases of corporal punishment appear not to have been cases of substantive corporal punishment inflicted for offences committed; but the corporal punishment has been used in order to compel labour on the tread-mill, or the performance of the labour which constituted the punishment, and which the supervisor appeared to feel himself bound to enforce. It never appeared to have been a part of the sentence that the individual should be confined in the workhouse and subjected to one or more floggings: the flogging was with a view to compel the hard labour, which had been part of the sentence, and it has been held to be clearly illegal. The next case is reported in a despatch of the same date as the last, and that is the case I referred to before, which was not a case of flogging a female in the workhouse, but one of a very violent assault committed on a female apprentice by her mistress, and three other persons, two of them being apprentices, under the direction of their mistress. In that case a prosecution took place, but the principal died before the trial came on. The persons tried were Anthony Britton, an accessory, and the two apprenticed labourers. They were found guilty, and the sentence upon Anthony Britton was to stand committed to the county gaol of Middlesex for the space of one calendar month; and at the expiration of that period to enter into his own recognizance of 100 l. to keep the peace for six calendar months, and Elizabeth Clarke and Job Spencer, the other two, were to be imprisoned in the gaol for seven days. In this case the prosecution took place at the assizes, and all three were sentenced to the gaol. I would observe, not particularly with reference to this case, but with reference to the question which has arisen as to places of confinement, that I believe apprentices and freemen are alike sentenced to the same place by the same courts, and that it depends upon the court by which they are sentenced to what place of confinement they are sent. I am not certain of the fact, but I believe that prisoners sentenced at the assizes are confined in the gaol, and that those sentenced at the quarter sessions and by the special justices are sent to the workhouses.

5544. Mr. Burton.] You think there is no distinction in the place as between freemen and apprentices?—No, I think not, by law. The apprenticed labourers are more frequently sent to the workhouse, as they are chiefly sentenced by the special justices. Supposing the quarter sessions to sentence to hard labour, I believe that the prisoner would in that case be sent to the workhouse. The next case is in a despatch of the 30th of March 1836, which encloses the report of the trials of two persons, one of the name of Jenkins, the supervisor of Hanover workhouse, and the other of the name of Sloy, the supervisor of Trelawny workhouse. Jenkins's case was not a case of female punishment. He and two others were indicted for murder. The verdict was "Not guilty," but with this addition by the jury, that the prisoners were guilty of cruelty, and evinced a great want of feeling and humanity towards the deceased. There is a curious fact mentioned by Lord Sligo in this case. He says, "The jury staid on for a long time, I fancy 60 hours, and at length gave their verdict of acquittal, accompanied by some remarks, which I have requested the attorney-general to put on paper for me. It was notorious that all the jury, except one individual, were for an acquittal, and that he at last gave way in consequence of his circumstances. The measles suddenly broke out in his family, and every one of his children were attacked by it. This of course affected him very much; and besides that, being a Jew, he had religious scruples about eating the food provided for the rest of the jurors."

jurors. He, however, declared, when the verdict was given, that he was still convinced of the guilt of the prisoners, and that exhausted nature, and not his conviction, made him give way." In consequence of this verdict, it was the intention of the attorney-general to indict Jenkins for an aggravated assault at the next Montego Bay assizes. In the case of Sloly, a verdict was obtained, and the law therefore appeared to be settled, so far as it could be by the decision of a jury, in Jamaica as to the illegality of the specific offence of flogging a female in the workhouse. He was the supervisor of the Trelawny workhouse.

5545. Mr. Buxton.] Was the case one in which the magistrate had given the order for the punishment?—The case was one in which a special magistrate was stated by Sloly to have given the order for the punishment; but I think there is satisfactory proof that the magistrate had given no such order. I will state to the Committee the grounds of that opinion.

5546. Chairman.] Do you conceive, after this conviction, it is impossible that a female should be flogged in the workhouse in Jamaica under any circumstances, or on any pretext whatever?—I should have considered the illegality of the punishment finally decided, had it not been for the next case, in which the grand jury ignored the bill. It appears to me that the grand jury in that case took a different view of the law to that which both the grand jury and petit jury had in Sloly's case. That has thrown an uncertainty, not on the law, but on the construction which may be put on the law, in Jamaica.

5547. Mr. Buxton.] Does Sloly's case prove more than this, that where a master of a workhouse administers this punishment without the authority of a special magistrate, he is liable to be punished; but that where it is with the order of the magistrate, he is not subject to punishment?—I think not. It appears that Sloly stated that the special magistrate had authorized the punishment, but no proof was given of it. When the verdict of "Guilty" was returned, the chief justice appears to have remarked that it was both necessary and proper that such an indictment should be brought, for the purpose of trying the legality of such punishment; but he did not conceive the traverser would ever be called upon to receive sentence. The chief justice conceived the illegality of the punishment was ascertained by that trial.

5548. Did not the jury convict Sloly on the ground that he had no authority from the special magistrate to inflict the punishment?—It is impossible for me to state the grounds which influenced the jury; but judging by the report transmitted by Lord Sligo from the newspaper, the question raised was the legality of punishing a female apprentice in the workhouse by flogging. Without knowing more as to the reasons which influenced the chief justice, it is difficult to express a positive opinion as to the omission of any punishment in this case; but Lord Sligo has regretted it, adding that he felt it impossible for the attorney-general, after what fell from the judge, to bring Sloly up for judgment. The chief justice appears to have thought the object of the trial was merely to establish the illegality of the practice, and that that being ascertained, it was not necessary to go further. Lord Glenelg, in his despatch to Lord Sligo, presumed that some weight may have been given to the statement that the special magistrate's authority had been obtained. On this point Lord Sligo called on the special magistrate for explanation, and I have some documents transmitted on this subject, which I think are material, as it respects the conduct of the special magistrate. Mr. Davis says, "In answer to your letter of 29th inst. (No. 2078), and relative to my sanctioning corporal punishment in the house of correction, Falmouth, I beg to say I gave no such orders; and on my hearing that such was the case, I went to the house of correction, and asked Mr. Sloly, the workhouse master, in, I believe, the presence of Mr. Hill, by what authority he did so, and that I neither had nor could give him any such power; and, if I am not much mistaken, he said at the time he did not desire his authority from me." Mr. Davis wrote another letter to Lord Sligo, in which he says, "I have the honour to write your excellency in reference to letter of 9th inst. (No. 2285), that I have not at any time given Mr. Sloly, supervisor of the Trelawny house of correction, any authority for him to enforce penal labour by using the whip on female apprentices." There is another letter from a Mr. Kelly, a local magistrate, confirming Mr. Davis, the special magistrate, in his statement, he having been present with him on the occasion referred to; and there is a subsequent letter, from Mr. Knibb, the Baptist missionary, to Mr. Kelly, in these words: "My dear Sir,—With much pleasure, in reply to your request, I inform you that when I interested myself in the case of Catherine Reid and others, who were flogged on the tread-wheel, in the first instance instance I went to Mr. Special Justice Davis; that he assured me it was without his orders or knowledge, and that he instantly accompanied me to the house of correction, from which I was rather unceremoniously told to depart. It is merely justice to him which makes me send you this communication."—I think, therefore, Mr. Davis is free from the imputation cast upon him by the statement of Sloly, rebutted, as it is, by this evidence.

5549. Did the chief justice distinctly say, in that trial, that the magistrate had not the power to give such an order?—I have no copy of the summing up, but merely the observation which I have read. The last despatch which we have had on this subject is dated the 25th of last April, in which Lord Sligo encloses the judge's notes of the trial of Martin, an overseer, not for flogging a female, but for manslaughter, and also a report of evidence of cruelties committed in St. Andrew's workhouse, on which the bills against Whiteman, the white overseer, and one of the drivers, were ignored by the grand jury in the preceding week. The case contained in this enclosure is a report from Mr. Anderson, dated Kingston, 18th of April, in which he states, "Mr. Special Justice Bourne called on me a few days ago, and stated that certain floggings of females had taken place in the workhouse at Halfway Tree, which your Lordship was desirous to have brought to trial as soon as possible." It appears there had been a previous report of this to Lord Sligo, and he had desired Mr. Bourne to make an inquiry. "I sent in three bills to-day; first, against John Whiteman, the late overseer; second, against Nelson, the driver; and third, against Philips, who is also a driver. The two first were ignored, the latter has been found. I think it right to submit to your Lordship a statement of the evidence in support of the ignored bill, because I fear it may have been rejected on a ground which, if mentioned, will utterly frustrate one of the most important enactments of the Abolition Act, namely, that which forbids the flogging of females on any account. In the case where the bill was found, the flogging was in the field, and was connected also with one or two revolting circumstances." It appears, though it is not distinctly stated, either by Lord Sligo or by Mr. Anderson, that a distinction was taken between the case of flogging in the field and flogging in the workhouse; that has thrown a doubt again upon the construction which may be put upon the law in Jamaica upon that point. The prosecution in this case was by order of the attorney-general. A despatch was consequently addressed by Lord Glenelg to Lord Sligo, stating, "If any doubt exists in the law, it is right it should be set at rest by some legislative enactment in Jamaica; that two points arose in the consideration of all these circumstances; first, whether the law could not be brought to the test of a judicial decision by some other form of proceeding; the second, whether it might not be either amended or relieved from the ambiguity with which it is at present invested. On the first of those questions, your Lordship will have the goodness to consider whether the attorney-general could not proceed by way of ex-officio information, so as to pass by the grand jury. I am aware of no legal impediment to such a prosecution, and it seems to me that the interests of public justice require that it should be instituted. If the law of Jamaica really authorizes this practice of whipping females on the tread-mill, or if any reasonable doubt exists respecting its legality, there is the most urgent cause for the interference of the Legislature." The papers before the Committee show that there has been a distinct allegation on the part of the House of Assembly in Jamaica that they concur in the illegality of such a punishment; and Lord Sligo has stated the same, and at the same time has recommended them to pass a law upon the subject. I conceive he has taken very much the same view that Lord Glenelg took of the case; namely, that it was not necessary to render that illegal which was already contrary to law, but that any ambiguity as to the right interpretation of the law should be removed by an Act of the Legislature.

5550. Chairman.] If in fact there is any doubt upon the state of the law, you do not anticipate any difficulty in obtaining a declaratory statute upon the subject from the House of Assembly in Jamaica?—I really think not; when this despatch is laid before them, as it probably will be, and when the point is fairly stated to them, I should be very sorry to anticipate that they would refuse to remove any ambiguity which exists in the law, they having solemnly declared their conviction that the practice is illegal.

5551. Mr. Buxton.] How have they declared the practice to be illegal; by what document does that appear?—I was referring to a paper printed for Parliament, in which Lord Sligo having proposed in the House of Assembly to make an enactment upon the subject, they objected on the ground that no enactment was necessary, the present law being sufficient.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.
M.P.

29 July 1836.

5552. Chairman.] Would the Governor have the power to put an end to this practice, by sending down a direction to the keeper of the workhouse?—He mentions an instance in which he put a stop to improper severity on the part of a gaoler the moment he heard of it.

5553. Are you aware whether any general directions have been given by the Governor to the keepers of workhouses, strictly forbidding the practice of corporal punishment on females under any circumstances?—No, I think the supervisors of workhouses have had no such general directions from the Governor. They act under the directions of the visiting magistrates.

5554. You conceive the Governor would have no power, either directly or indirectly, to forbid such a practice taking place in the workhouses?—Indirectly he can prevent it. The special magistrates are bound to report the proceedings which take place in workhouses, and which they conceive to be illegal, and the Governor has the power of directing a prosecution; I am not aware that he can exercise any summary power in such a case.

5555. Do you know that the Governor has called the attention of the visiting magistrates to that circumstance, with a view to issuing orders to the supervisors of workhouses, which will prevent the recurrence of this offence?—I am not aware whether he has or not, but I am confident, from the strong opinions which he entertains on this subject, that he has left no lawful means untried to prevent its recurrence. It has been suggested to him, that if the practice could not be checked, the special magistrate should be directed not to commit to any workhouse where the practice was supposed to exist.

5556. Mr. Buxton.] Has not Lord Sligo stated, that in order to prevent the punishment of females, he had directed the special magistrates not to commit to the workhouses where those punishments were inflicted?—I do not recollect that he has stated that, but a suggestion to that effect has been made.

5557. Mr. Gladstone.] You are not aware whether in the cases where the bills were ignored by the grand jury, it was on the ground of insufficient evidence, or a doubt of the authority of the law?—No, certainly not; and therefore it is distinctly said in the despatch itself, that “It does not appear on what ground the grand jury did throw out the bill; but if the witnesses whose depositions are annexed to Mr. Anderson’s letter made similar statements to the grand jury, the rejection of the bill can be explained only on the supposition that the grand jury considered such proceedings consonant with the law of the colony.” In the case in which the bills were ignored the flogging was in the workhouse, in the other case it was in the field, and in that the bill was found. It was assumed that they might have taken a different view of the evidence, but it appeared to the Secretary of State that a sufficient doubt was thrown on the construction placed on the law to render it necessary to have it cleared up by legislative enactment.

5558. Mr. Buxton.] Have you received a report from Lord Sligo of the case of an apprentice of the name of Priscilla, ordered to be chained to a man and the two worked together?—I have no recollection of such a circumstance, and I think I could not have heard of it or I should recollect it.

5559. Have you any recollection as to the case of an apprentice named Morley, chained to a man named Thomas?—No, I have no recollection of the case. Those are the only instances of the corporal punishment of females which I can trace as having been reported by Lord Sligo.

5560. Have you any information as to the cases of 40 or 50 men in chains, from one plantation, working together?—No; but the fact is, they work in chains in the penal gangs; but as to the numbers in the penal gangs, it must depend upon the number of offences committed in the district to which the penal gang is attached.

5561. Chairman.] Are you desirous of making any statement to the Committee on the subject of valuation?—Yes. A great deal has been said on the defective state of the law in Jamaica as respects the compulsory manumission of apprentices. The objection is not new, and much correspondence has taken place between Lord Sligo and the Government upon that subject. It was first brought under Lord Aberdeen’s notice when he was Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, and there has been a considerable correspondence with respect to it from that time to the present.

5562. Does it appear to you that impediments are thrown in the way of the negro obtaining his freedom by the manner in which the valuations are made?—In some cases I believe impediments have been thrown in the way, but I think

I think that those are not wholly attributable to the state of the law in Jamaica; Sir G. Grey, Bart. I think they are attributable partially perhaps to the state of the law, but M.P. partly to other causes.

5563. To what besides would you attribute them?—In Jamaica as well as elsewhere, the valuations must be founded on some evidence adduced as to the value of the apprentices' services. The magistrates must to a certain degree be guided by the evidence, which is given on oath, and in many cases there must be a natural tendency in the witnesses rather to raise the real value of the services of the apprentices. I mention this, because in British Guiana, where a different law prevails, free from the objection taken to the Jamaica law, complaints have been made of excessive valuations.

29 July 1836.

5564. Do not some of the instances which have been adduced to the Committee of the amount at which negroes have been valued appear to you unreasonable?—In some cases they appear unreasonable, and several instances have been selected by Lord Sligo as proving that undue obstacles have been opposed to the operation of that part of the law which was intended to give the apprentices a right to their freedom, on payment of a fair price; but those are stated as exceptions to the general rule. They have been frequent, but not numerous in comparison of the whole number. In looking at the actual amount at which the apprentices have been valued, as appears by the returns transmitted from Lord Sligo, and presented to Parliament, I am quite unable to state generally whether they are unduly high or not; it is very difficult without knowing the circumstances of the negro, his character, and his value to the estate, to form a correct opinion as to whether the valuation is unduly high or not. I asked Mr. Oldham whether he had had any experience in the transfer of the services of any apprentices from one owner to another, because I think if we could get at the average price at which one party is now willing to purchase from another the services of an able-bodied apprentice, and if we find that that does not differ widely from the average value at which the appraisers estimate the services of similar apprentices claiming their freedom, we should be able safely to conclude that the latter was not unduly high. Mr. Oldham stated that such a thing was scarcely known as the transfer of the services of a single able-bodied negro from one to another; he must have taken his family with him. He stated a purchase which he had made of 26, I think at an average of 50*l.* each, but half these were women and children; and he added that there were individuals among them, who, if they could have been transferred separately, might have fetched as much as 200*l.*; it is difficult, therefore, to say that any particular appraisal is unduly high, with the exception of one which appears in the return, and it is so much beyond all the others, that I cannot help thinking there is an error in the figures; one prædial apprentice is stated to be valued at 352*l.*; I find no other valuation in the return exceeding 130*l.*, and there is such a disparity that I think there must be some mistake.

5565. Do you apprehend that a large number of manumissions actually take place in Jamaica?—As far as these returns go, that can be seen by adding up the numbers; but I should add that this is merely an account of manumissions which have taken place under the compulsory manumission clauses of the Jamaica Act. I apprehend there have been in Jamaica numerous instances of manumission by private agreement between the owner and the apprentice, therefore the lists do not give the number of apprentices set free since the apprenticeship came into operation, but merely those affected under the compulsory manumission clauses.

5566. Mr. Buxton.] Are you aware that the average valuations are not decreased as the time of apprenticeship draws towards its conclusion?—No, I am not aware whether that is the case or not from any calculation which I have made. The last account from Lord Sligo states that the valuations are going on very fast, in spite of the obstacles referred to. On the 25th May he says, "38 were manumitted last week, at an average of 36*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, 1,400*l.* in all, paid by themselves to their masters. At a rough calculation, about 500 have been valued, at an average of about 30*l.* each." And on the 17th of April he stated much to the same effect: "The number of valuations and manumissions which are daily taking place is very great, in spite of the obstacles thrown in the way in too many instances. I observe the non-prædials, however, are for the most part freeing themselves." The second Act in Aid which was passed in Jamaica, and which was disallowed, owing to other defects not connected with that subject, placed the law in this respect on a better footing on this point; it provided provided that one-third should, in all cases, be deducted for contingencies from the gross amount fixed as the actual value of the apprentice. That law having been disallowed, the magistrates are no longer compelled to adhere to the practice it enforced; in the majority of instances they do adhere to it; the special magistrates, I believe, universally insist upon, it; but there are some local magistrates who have distinctly avowed their objection to that principle, and have refused to deduct the one-third for contingencies; and in order to meet the objection of the special magistrates who will not consent to concur in the appraisement without a deduction of the one-third, they have added the one-third to their own valuation, and they have placed a higher value upon the apprentice than it was sworn to by the witness for the estate, in order to meet the deduction of one-third for contingencies. In looking at the cases reported by Lord Sligo, it does not appear to me to be proved that the local magistrates have, in a majority even of those cases, combined to fix a high value as against the special magistrates. In many cases the two local magistrates have disagreed widely from each other. In some cases the special magistrate and one of the local magistrates come near together, and the common practice has been to strike an average; therefore the high valuation put by one local magistrate has never been adopted as the appraisement, neither, on the other hand, in these disputed cases has the low value agreed to be put upon the services of the apprentice by the special magistrate been the value at which they have been set free, for each has yielded something, and the valuation has taken place at a higher rate than if the special magistrate alone had fixed the value, but not at so high a rate as if a local magistrate alone had been the valuer.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.
M.P.

29 July 1836.

5567. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you know practically whether the court always consists of one special and two local magistrates, or whether the practice has not in some cases been inverted?—I think it has consisted of one special magistrate and one local magistrate, where they could agree, without calling in a third; but that where there are three, two are always local magistrates.

5568. Mr. Buxton.] Are not there these three objections to the present system: first, that there are two local magistrates to one special in the generality of cases; secondly, that those two are proprietors of negroes; and thirdly, that lest the special magistrate should be disposed to put only a sufficient value, those magistrates have added one-third to the valuation made by the master himself?—With regard to the first question, I have stated that there are generally two local magistrates to one special, and that there is, most probably, a bias on the minds of colonial magistrates which would not exist in the minds of disinterested persons. They ought to be guided, to a certain extent, by the evidence submitted to them; that may be partial, and they may be guided by that to an undue extent. I have no doubt that the law is objectionable in theory, and this has been admitted in the correspondence which has taken place. There might be a less partial tribunal, and a different one has, in fact, been constituted in the Crown colonies; but I am not satisfied that the constitution of an improved tribunal would altogether remove the evil, for the reason which I have stated. They are not, however, bound to decide on the evidence from the estate; on the contrary, in the instructions issued by Lord Sligo to the special magistrates on this subject, they are directed in all cases to inquire whether the negro has any witness to produce, and it is upon the whole of the evidence that the magistrates must decide.

5569. Would you leave the law in that state, that one of the valuers could be permitted to add one-third to the estimate the witnesses had given?—I think it would be exceedingly wrong to sanction such a practice, but it is very difficult to prevent it by law. A remedy has been pointed out for habitual injustice in such cases by Lord Aberdeen, in his despatch of 30 December 1834, namely, the dismissal of the magistrate, and in some cases prosecution for a misdemeanor. The withdrawal of the commission is again adverted to by Lord Glenelg, in his despatch of the 17th August 1835, and in reference to a case now pending, Lord Sligo has been instructed that unless a satisfactory explanation could be given, the Secretary of State conceived he would be justified in withdrawing the commission of the local magistrates, who appeared to have put a much higher value on apprentices than had been sworn to by the witness for the estate. As these cases have rather multiplied lately, owing probably to the number of applications for valuation having increased, and as Lord Sligo was of opinion that some alteration of the law was required, it has been been thought expedient to suggest that the law on this subject in Jamaica should be placed on the same footing on which it stands in the Crown colonies, and he has been instructed to propose such an alteration to the Legislature. I ought to state, that in reference to a magistrate who had placed an apparently undue value upon the services of an apprentice, Lord Sligo has since transmitted an explanation from him, in which he alleges that it was in his opinion a fair valuation, and that he should be willing to give for the apprentice the sum at which he had valued him; and Lord Sligo states, that with the exception of undue valuation, he had no complaint against him, and that in the general treatment of his people he was not open to any censure whatever.

5570. Chairman.] Do you wish to say anything to the Committee upon the subject of the classification of the apprentices?—It has been stated that no provision was made in the law for classification of the prædial and non-prædial apprentices, with reference to the liberation of the non-prædial, which will take place in 1838. No such provision has yet been made in Jamaica by law. Lord Sligo on the 5th of December 1835, stated his views as to the classification which ought to be made. That was answered on the 22d of January last, approving of the view which he had expressed, but pointing out the necessity of some legislative enactment upon the subject, in order to prevent any doubt arising in August 1838. On the 18th of March, Lord Sligo stated his intention of immediately taking such steps as were within his power, in order to ascertain the class to which each individual belonged. In his despatch of the 24th of May last he enclosed the instructions he had addressed to the special magistrates upon the subject, and a circular letter to the custodes, which I will hand in—See Appendix. He adds, that it would be necessary in the course of the next session of the Jamaica legislature, that some enactment should be passed to set the matter effectually at rest.

5571. Mr. Buxton.] To what class are the domestics and tradesmen considered to belong?—Lord Sligo in his letter of the 5th of December says, “All domestics, whether in town or country, whether they have grounds and time allowed them, or money allowance, or food given them, are non-prædials; all tradesmen on estates and pens are prædials; all tradesmen in gangs and towns are non-prædials; they work every day in the week for the appointed number of hours, and receive an allowance;” and in that opinion the Secretary of State has concurred. I should say, that owing to the endeavours which Lord Sligo has made, in the absence of any specific enactment to ascertain correctly the class of each individual, and looking forward to the probability, I may almost say the certainty, of an Act being passed upon this subject, no practical difficulty will arise as to the apprentices entitled to their freedom as non-prædials in 1838.

5572. Chairman.] Do you wish to make any statement to the Committee upon the subject of the marriage law?—Yes. With reference to Mr. Beecham's evidence, I would state that a representation was received by the Secretary of State from Mr. Beecham, as secretary to the Wesleyan Missionary Society, dated the 24th of February last, in which he pointed out two evils arising, not in Jamaica only, but in the West Indies generally, with the exception of British Guiana and the Bahamas, from the present state of the law of marriage; one related to past marriages, the other to future marriages. With reference to marriages formerly performed by the missionaries of that society, he says, “So long as the state of slavery continued, those marriages, although not formally recognised by law, were notwithstanding regarded as morally good and binding, and were productive of very salutary effects. The negro mind showed itself susceptible of the sacredness of the union which religion had cemented; true conjugal affection was created, parental and filial affection was strengthened, the domestic virtues were elicited, and the negro marriages generally were so many benefits conferred upon society at large. The abolition of slavery has placed the question of negro marriages in another light, and has incidentally introduced a new and painful state of things. Those marriages among the negroes which were performed by the missionaries of the society while the negroes were regarded by the law as ‘goods and chattels,’ as ‘things’ rather than ‘persons,’ were sufficient to answer the purpose of marriage, so long as such continued to be the legal condition of the negro population, but no sooner were the negroes elevated to the state of persons and freemen than doubts were raised respecting the validity of their former marriages." That was with reference to past years. The other evil arose from the missionaries not being empowered by law to celebrate marriages, and the society suggested the expediency of applying the principle of the Marriage Bill now before Parliament to the West Indies, and of legalizing the past marriages to which reference had been made. That communication was enclosed in a circular despatch addressed by Lord Glenelg, on the 15th March last, to the governors of the West India colonies, which is among the papers now printing for Parliament, in which he strongly urged the adoption of a law by the local legislatures to meet both the points suggested by Mr. Beecham. To that we have not yet received any answer.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

5573. Chairman.] HAVE you anything further to state to the Committee upon the subject of valuation?—I omitted to state yesterday that upon the receipt by Lord Glenelg of the return which had been presented to Parliament of the number of valuations under the compulsory Manumission Clause, from which it appeared that in many instances the sums at which apprentices had been appraised had not been paid, Lord Glenelg addressed a despatch to Lord Sligo, of the 17th of August 1835, in which he requested to know whether the nonpayment of money in the case of those apprentices, or of any large portion of them who had not paid the money, had arisen from an undue and excessive valuation, or merely from the apprentices not having at the time the means of paying the amount, although fairly and equitably assessed. Lord Glenelg also inquired with reference to the previous communication, which had been addressed by Lord Sligo to Lord Aberdeen, whether the conduct which he had previously complained of on the part of certain magistrates still continued, reminding him that in case of any combination or habitual practice tending to defeat the compulsory Manumission Clauses, it would be necessary to remove the magistrate proved to have been guilty of it from the commission. That despatch also enclosed an extract from a letter addressed by the secretary of the Church Missionary Society to Lord Glenelg upon the subject of the valuations. Lord Sligo, in his answer of the 13th of October 1835, observed that it did not follow that those had been overvalued who had been unable to pay the money; that he had reason to think that "vast numbers had sought to be valued either from curiosity, a desire to see if they could make satisfactory arrangements to transfer their services from one master to another they fancy they would prefer, or from some vague idea of some advantage which it might confer upon them." Many cases had however been referred to him by the special magistrates, in which the local magistrates "had combined to defeat their attempts to place a fair value on the services of an apprentice;" and, though in many cases the specials had succeeded in reducing the amount, still "there were various instances in which the intention of the law had been evidently defeated." As to the remedy, he expressed himself in great doubt. The statement made by the local magistrates was that their experience enabled them to judge of the value of a negro's services better than the specials, and that they placed such a value upon them as they conscientiously believed to be a fair one. He did not see how he could interfere; he had a great aversion to any arbitrary exercise of even legitimate authority, unless the culpability of the individual to be degraded was clearly proved, not only in his own opinion, but in that of others. In one instance he had had an opportunity of removing an overseer, who had not only thrown obstacles in the way of the liberation of a female apprentice, but had announced before the magistrates that he would do so. Latterly, however, the evil had diminished, and very few now come forward, ward, he adds, with a complaint of that sort. Then, in confirmation of the opinion which I expressed yesterday, he states that the principal difficulty which now lay in the way arose not from the misconduct of the local magistrates, but from the evidence given by the overseers and book-keepers; and he gives us an instance that one had recently sworn that a lad of 19, a common-field labourer, was worth 40*l.* a year to the estate; though it was known that gangs had lately been sold for 20*l.* each, and might now be had at that price, or 25*l.* each. In this case the magistrates, including the local magistrates, were sensible of the injustice, and rated his value at 14*l.* a year, which was 26*l.* a year lower than the value which had been placed upon it by the overseer. He adds, at the conclusion of the despatch, that though there are some cases of this sort, yet "in the majority of cases he thinks there is not much to complain of." Subsequent cases of a similar nature have been reported, and I think I have already stated that, although in my own opinion an alteration in the law will not secure a complete remedy for the existing evil, an alteration in the law has been suggested as a means of at least lessening the chance of undue valuations, although that alteration will not secure fair and unbiassed evidence.

5574. What is the alteration you refer to?—The recommendation that the law of Jamaica should be placed upon the same footing as that in the Crown Colonies, which is in evidence before the Committee.

5575. Mr. Burton.] Then are the Committee to understand that the law has in some cases evaded, that of that point there is no doubt; but the doubt is whether the remedy will be sufficient?—When I say that the law has been evaded, I mean to state that in some instances, not I think in the majority certainly, but in many instances the intention of the Legislature has been defeated, the intention being clearly that the negroes should by virtue of the compulsory manumission clauses be entitled to have a fair value put upon their services, and to purchase their freedom at that value. I have no reason to doubt that the intention of the legislature of Jamaica was the same as the intention of the British Legislature in the enactment of those compulsory manumission clauses; but owing to the working of the system of compulsory manumission in many instances a higher value has been placed on the services of the negro than I think a fair and unbiassed tribunal, judging from fair evidence, would have placed upon them, and strong representations to that effect have been made from time to time by Lord Sligo, supported by instances which he has transmitted to the home Government. Still I think upon this, as upon other points connected with the whole subject, it is important to bear in mind that the cases transmitted are transmitted not as examples of the general system, but as exceptions to the general rule.

5576. Would there be any objection to the magistrates deciding as appraisers upon their own view of the subject, and examining witnesses only as to any peculiar qualifications of the persons appraised?—There certainly would be no objection on the part of the Government to sanction a law passed by the legislature of Jamaica, which would constitute the special justices the sole appraisers, subject to any proper check that might be placed upon their appraisement; but there is no power in the executive government to require such a tribunal to be constituted, and, in fact, I do not think such a requisition could be made consistently with what the government who had the power of establishing the tribunal in certain cases have required in such cases, and it probably would create great dissatisfaction in the colony. It has been suggested, in addition to what I have mentioned, that the Chief Justice should have the power of nominating appraisers. These suggestions have been thrown out, but it has been left to the Legislature, the evil having been pointed out to them, to remedy it in the way which they think most effective.

5577. Has any report been made to the Government of a considerable mortality having taken place among the young children?—Certainly not, in Jamaica. The special magistrates in their reports have adverted to the condition of the young children; they very much confirm the account given by Mr. Jones as to their being brought up in a state of ignorance and of idleness, which they conceive hereafter will have a very prejudicial effect upon their character, but not precisely in the way which Mr. Jones anticipates. The great object of the special magistrates, is to point out the necessity of some system of education which will enable the parent to send those children to school. Those reports were made at a period when the Parliamentary grant had not become become available to the purpose of education to the extent to which it since has, and therefore the evil has been to a certain degree diminished. There have been instances mentioned in which children have not received the care and attention which they ought to have received. I have already stated that I am not aware of a single instance in which the free children under six years old have been apprenticed by virtue of the clause which provided for their apprenticeship in the event of the parent not maintaining them. The parents, in fact, have maintained them with the assistance which they have derived, and which has been very general from the proprietors and attorneys in Jamaica continuing to the children in ordinary cases the indulgences which they received when their parents were in slavery. There are two or three cases connected with this subject which I will state to the Committee. In one case, in the district of Mr. Hawkins, a special magistrate, the mothers made an agreement, in January 1835, to work for the estate four days in the year, in their own time, on condition that the estate should provide medical attendance for their young children as before. It appears, however, that they did not fulfil their part of the agreement, thinking that if the children did not turn out to be sick they were not bound to do so; but upon the magistrate explaining to them their mistake, they gave four days labour. At a subsequent period a fresh agreement was proposed to be made to the same effect; but, when the time came, the overseers refused to accede to it. In the district of another magistrate a similar agreement was proposed, but the mothers refused; and the want of such an arrangement has been felt in both those cases. In Mr. Hawkins's district (this is with reference to the question of mortality among these children), a woman brought her child to the hospital, sick; the agreement not having been then in force, the overseer refused to take in the free child, and it consequently received no medical attendance, and it shortly after died. In this case the attorney-general intended to prosecute the overseer for neglect of his apprentice, apparently conceiving that it was a case in which, irrespective of any agreement, the overseer was bound to have made provision for the medical care of the child. The result of the prosecution I am not aware of. In the other district the measles broke out, and the mothers did not call in the doctors soon enough, the consequence was that they were detained longer from their ordinary work than they otherwise would have been by the attendance on their sick children. A dispute arose in consequence, and the manager expressed an intention of bringing the mothers before a magistrate, but Lord Sligo directed the magistrates not to entertain such a complaint, in conformity with the general instructions on this subject, which I stated yesterday.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

5578. Chairman.] Is not it compulsory upon the manager of an estate to provide medical attendance for the children of the apprentices in case of sickness?—The attorney-general seems to be of that opinion, by directing a prosecution in the case where, in consequence of the want of medical attendance, the child died.

5579. Then why could it have been necessary for the negro mothers to agree to give their time for medical assistance to their children, in case they were sick, if they are legally entitled to such attendance?—I presume there was some doubt as to the legal obligation with respect to free children, who are to be apprenticed by the special justice, in the event of their parents not maintaining them. Whether that maintenance includes medical attendance or not, may be a doubtful point; and that doubt existing, it was probably thought desirable to remove it by an arrangement of that kind: but I have no doubt that the ordinary practice is to give them medical attendance, irrespective of any agreement.

5580. Are effectual means now in operation in Jamaica, by the proprietors, for the education of the young free negroes?—Means have been taken for the extension of schools in Jamaica: those means have, within the last year, been rendered available to a considerable extent through the agency of various societies in this country, who have agents in Jamaica, under whose care schools are now in operation. In addition to this, there have been some funds expended in Jamaica for the purpose of establishing normal schools. A considerable sum has been expended, irrespective of societies in this country, for the establishment of normal schools in the West Indies. There is a great desire for instruction, and there appears to be a general disposition, on the part of all parties, to promote it. The Committee, perhaps, are aware of some funds, which are vested, under the direction of the Court of Chancery, in trustees, trustees, called the Trustees of the Mico Charity, who, under the direction of the Court, are bound to expend these funds in the advancement of negro education in the late slave colonies. A considerable sum has been expended by them, during the last year, in Jamaica. I have a report, from the trustees of the Mico Charity to the Secretary of State, of the measures which they have adopted during the past year in the application of their own funds, and of the funds advanced to them out of the Parliamentary grant in Jamaica, which I will put in.

5581. Have any steps been taken by the legislature of Jamaica to promote education among the young free negroes?—No Act has been passed for that purpose as yet. The subject has been brought under their consideration; and I think a committee was appointed upon the subject in the course of the last session. The Committee, of course, remember the resolution of The House of Commons in 1833, pledging The House to aid the local legislatures in providing, upon liberal and comprehensive principles, for the religious and moral education of the negro population to be emancipated. Considerable delay took place in redeeming that pledge, owing to various circumstances; and I think it may fairly be assumed that this delay operated on the proceedings of the legislature of Jamaica, in common with the legislatures of the other colonies. They waited to see what course would be taken, in pursuance of that resolution, by the Government at home. Last year 25,000 l. was voted by Parliament for that purpose; and it was not till the latter part of last year that the plan on which that money was proposed to be appropriated by the Government was communicated to the legislature of Jamaica; since which they have scarcely had an opportunity of passing any measure which would meet the wishes and representations of the Government. The governors of the respective colonies were directed to bring the subject before the legislatures, and to press upon them the importance of performing their share of this duty.

5582. What was the system on which this money was proposed to be applied?—The system on which this money was proposed to be applied was, as to 20,000 l. of it, that it should be applied through the medium of societies in this country, which had already an agency in the West Indies. The first year's grant was appropriated expressly to the building of schools; because, upon correspondence with the societies, it appeared that such an appropriation would give the greatest stimulus to the increase of education in the colonies; and it was therefore considered as the best means of effecting the object in view. The societies were required, with respect to each school, to send in the particulars of its situation, the number of scholars it would hold, its dimensions, and an estimate of the cost; and they were bound to provide one-third, the Government making up the remaining two-thirds of the expense. £. 5,000 l. was intended for normal schools, and was applied directly to that object, irrespective of any existing societies. £. 25,000 l. has been placed again upon the estimate for this year: it has not yet been voted. I can entertain no doubt that it will be voted, and that it will become applicable to the same general object: but I think it may be undesirable, in the course of the present year, to confine the appropriation of that sum to building schools, and that a portion of it may be usefully applied in the maintenance of schools already existing.

5583. Are the Committee to understand that this grant on the part of the mother country was not conditional upon anything to be done by the legislature of Jamaica?—The resolution of the House of Commons certainly contemplated that the grant would be in aid of the local legislatures. The grant was proposed to Parliament upon that understanding; but it has not been conditional on any thing done by the local legislatures. It has, in fact, been paid and applied. I should say with reference to the delay, that it was not a delay arising from any oversight or inattention to the subject, but occasioned by the necessity of collecting information from the colonies as well as from various quarters in this country. Circulars were addressed by Mr. Spring Rice, when Secretary of State, to the Governors of the West India colonies, calling upon them for returns, which were very voluminous, and required a good deal of examination in order to ascertain what would be the best system of appropriating the money.

5584. Has any bill been introduced into the House of Assembly for promoting education?—No, I think not; though some proceedings on the subject have taken place.

5585. Do you think it would be possible for the legislature of Jamaica materially rially to assist in promoting education among the negroes?—I have no doubt that by voting a sum of money for the purpose, and placing the appropriation of it in proper hands, they might most effectually promote the object in view. It has been suggested to them to pass a law rendering education compulsory, in order to meet the many difficulties which might exist in the way of securing the attendance of the children at school. In the course of the next session this subject will, I presume, come under consideration.

5586. Are there persons connected with the societies in England, which have taken an interest in the education of the negroes, who would be able to manage properly and usefully those funds?—The societies through whom those funds have been administered all have agents as clergymen or missionaries in the West Indies. Those missionaries have already been engaged to a certain extent in the superintendence of schools connected with their missions, and they act under the direction of committees in this country in whom confidence may be fully placed, and who have already made great exertions without the assistance which is now afforded them.

5587. Is there any committee or any agency of that kind who are under the special protection of the government in Jamaica?—There are none; but it is contemplated as part of the plan that there should be an inspection of these schools on the part of the government, unconnected with any societies, in order to see that the money has been bonâ fide appropriated for the purpose for which it was granted, and that the schools are maintained upon the principles upon which it was intended that they should be maintained. Of the societies in this country to which I have referred, the society for the Propagation of the Gospel is one which in fact represents the bishops and the great part of the clergy. That society, and the Church Missionary Society represent the whole body of the clergy in the colony. With reference to that part of the resolution of the House of Commons which required the appropriation of this money to be upon liberal and comprehensive principles, there were two courses there to be taken: one was to establish general schools, with the money placed by Parliament at the disposal of the government, independently of any existing system, in which case probably there would have been no funds added from private sources to the Parliamentary grant applicable to the object; the other was to increase the efficiency of the various systems of education which were in operation in most of these colonies, through the medium of existing societies, by extending their means, calling upon them at the same time to contribute in proportion to the grant they received from Government. One effect anticipated by the Government, and which has been produced, was that increased funds would be placed at the disposal of the societies by the members of the respective communions with which they are connected. Most of them have made appeals to their supporters in this country, and, in addition to the funds of which they were formerly possessed, they have for this specific object received a considerable accession of funds, and the Parliamentary grant has thus been increased.

5588. Are there any Dissenting societies connected with the education of the negroes in Jamaica?—Yes, there are several; the Wesleyans, the Baptists, the Moravians, and the London Missionary Society.

5589. The plan of Government is to assist all those societies, taking care at the same time that there shall be an inspector appointed to see that the money is properly and usefully applied?—Yes, those inspectors have not been yet appointed, because the schools are not yet completed; but out of the grant which will, I hope, be very shortly made, it will be necessary to provide for the payment of some inspectors. This money has been applied to education exclusively, as distinct from religious instruction conveyed by clergymen or ministers of any denomination. But independently of this a large sum has been raised in this country. This, however, is quite irrespective of the money voted by Parliament for education.

5589*. You do not mean to imply that in those schools that receive money from the Government it is not allowed that sectarian principles of any kind should be taught?—No; the principle which has governed the appropriation of this fund has been, that as these societies were all societies of a religious nature, and embraced the leading denominations of Christians in this country, there was a security in the appropriation of the money, through the medium of these societies, that the instruction received would be fundamentally religious religious instruction, irrespective altogether of the different shades of opinion which are entertained by different religious denominations. In the appropriation of the money generally (I do not speak of Jamaica in particular). 10,000*l.*, out of the 20,000 l., was given to the Church, through the medium of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and 10,000 l. has been given either to general education or through the medium of Dissenting societies.

5590. Mr. Gladstone.] Is not the number of children under education in connection with the Church considerably greater than the number of children under education in connection with Dissenting societies?—I think it is; but I should say that nearly all the societies with which we were in communication upon the subject sent in applications to Government for aid out of the Parliamentary grant, far exceeding the amount which the Government had the means of affording them out of the money at their disposal; and I think in most cases the sum granted bore about an equal proportion to the demand which each society had made. That was one principle which we endeavoured to keep in view.

5591. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel offered to expend 10,000 l. for the purpose of schools, if the Government would give a proportionate sum. But although, according to the rule which the Government had laid down, it was asking a greater proportion, yet the means of the Government did not enable them to go to the whole extent of the offer which the society made. Is that correct?—That was the case with every society with which we were in communication. All the societies would have been willing to expend a larger sum than they have actually undertaken to expend, if we could have given them a larger sum also. I have no doubt that we might have appropriated upon this principle 35,000 l. as easily as 25,000 l.

5592. Chairman.] Do not you think it very desirable that the grant should be increased this year?—I consider it very desirable that the grant should be a liberal one; but I think a great stimulus has been given to education in the West Indies. Looking at all the circumstances, 25,000 l. appears to be a fair amount to be given by this country for this object. There is a Parliamentary paper, No. 211, of this Session, which states the appropriation of the last grant.

5593. Mr. Gladstone.] As the sum distributed last year was not in the nature of an annual charge but a charge for a single occasion, for the building of schools, do you suppose that the Government will be enabled this year to empower the societies to do that which they proposed to do last year?—I have been in communication with various societies in anticipation of this grant, with a view to ascertain what claims they would be prepared to send in this year, and, although it is quite clear that the 25,000 l. will more than cover the balance of the applications remaining uncomplished with last year, those applications have since considerably increased, and I doubt whether 25,000 l. will enable us now to meet fully the applications which the societies are prepared to make this year, in addition to those which remained over from last year.

5594. Chairman.] Is it probable that the Assembly of Jamaica will be ready to assist in contributing funds to this object?—I have reason to think that the Assembly of Jamaica will be ready to assist in contributing towards the general object of education. I am not aware of any expression on their part as to the mode of appropriation adopted here, and consequently I cannot anticipate whether they will adopt this plan or not; but I think we may confidently anticipate the appropriation of some funds by the legislature of Jamaica to the support of schools in Jamaica.

5595. Mr. Lushington.] Are the Committee to understand that each society receiving a portion of the grant is at liberty to conduct its education according to its own religious views?—Certainly.

5596. Is it your opinion that, under these circumstances, the general principle of conducting education upon a liberal and comprehensive plan will be adequately carried out?—I think it will be adequately carried out, provided adequate funds are supplied for the maintenance of those schools.

5597. You do not think that any particular society will have any advantage over any other?—I think certainly not; except in so far as the members of the communion with which any society is connected may place at the disposal of that society a larger amount of funds than can be collected from the members of any other communion; because in proportion to the funds which any society have have at their disposal, will be their claim upon the general fund placed at the disposal of the Government for this purpose.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

5598. For instance, a large proportion of the negroes who, in fact, are not instructed at all, would be nominally under the instruction of the Established Church, consequently the Established Church would probably put in their claim for a larger proportion of the grant; would they not?—No; the Established Church would not put in a claim for a larger proportion of the grant, owing to the nominal members of the Established Church being more numerous; in fact, in sending in their application, the society said nothing about the number of members of their communion in the colony; but they said, “We are prepared, out of the funds at our disposal, to build so many schools, if you will give us such assistance towards that object. We have a sum of 7,000 l., or 8,000 l., or 10,000 l., applicable to this purpose; can you give us, out of the fund at your disposal, a sum bearing a fair proportion to that amount?”

5599. It would not appear then that those negroes, who are not immediately under the influence of the instruction of other societies, would, as a matter of course, be considered as belonging to the Established Church?—We do not consider to what church or communion the negroes belong; but we assume that if a society is prepared to expend a large sum of money in the erection of schools, they have in fact ascertained the probability of those schools being available in the colony, and of there being children likely to come to them.

5600. You do not anticipate any superior claim on the part of the Established Church in consequence of the position which it holds as an established church?—I think the Established Church in the colony has an advantage over a mere voluntary body establishing itself in the colony, just in the same way in which the Established Church has an advantage here over mere voluntary bodies, but to no greater degree.

5601. It would not have any direct advantage with respect to the allotment of the grant?—Certainly not.

5602. Mr. Gladstone.] Can you state the particulars of the proposal which the society for the Propagation of the Gospel made to the Government?—I do not recollect the precise sum that they proposed to expend, but they offered to do what no other society were prepared to do, which was to expend half the amount required, if the Government would give the other half. In the case of every other society, they stated they could not give more than one-third, and under those circumstances the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was only required to provide one-third.

5603. If a larger proportion of the sum had been given to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, would not the result have been that a larger aggregate of money would have been expended upon education in the West Indies than has now been the case?—I think not.

5604. Supposing the question was about a sum of 5,000 l., and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel offered, upon receiving that 5,000 l., to expend 5,000 l.; but that on the contrary an allocation was adopted, according to which, while 5,000 l. was expended by the Government, only 2,500 l. was expended in addition, is not the result what was stated in the last question?—No; the society asked for 5,000 l., stating that they were ready to expend 5,000 l., and we told them. We only require you to expend 2,500 l. by your engagement with the Government: but I presumed that the other 2,500 l. would be spent by the society; they actually received 7,500 l. out of the grant of 20,000 l. I should also state that almost all the societies with which we corresponded, made applications for aid on behalf of the schools in Jamaica, which if granted, would have given Jamaica a most undue proportion of the whole fund. We felt ourselves bound to make a sort of inter-colonial apportionment of the whole sum, and to give each colony a fair proportion of the amount. Most of the societies preferred Jamaica as containing a very large population in one island, and affording a more ample field for their exertions than they could secure by dispersing their agents through the different islands in other parts of the West Indies.

5605. Chairman.] How much of the 20,000 l. went to Jamaica?—£. 7,275 out of the 5,000 l. for normal schools; 2,500 l. has been expended in Jamaica.

5606. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was the only society that offered to spend a proportion equal to that which the Governemnt produced. May you not add to that the Mico Charity?

charity?—I did not speak of Mico Charity Trustees as one of those societies. Looking at the principles to which the Court of Chancery requires the Mico Charity Trustees to adhere, we felt ourselves perfectly at liberty to apply a portion of the fund through their agency, the principles being those of the British and Foreign School Society.

5607. Mr. Gladstone.] If, however, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel only expended the sum to which it was bound by the terms of the Government grant, then it would appear that the result of the arrangement which was determined upon was, that not quite so great an amount of expenditure for the purpose of education was secured, as would have been secured if the proposal of that society had been adopted, as they made it?—Certainly; but I contemplated that the same amount would be expended by the society, but that the schools built with the 2,500 l., which they were not compellable to expend, would be altogether subject to their own control, free from any inspection on the part of the Government.

5608. With reference to the inspection on the part of the Government, have arrangements been made for carrying that into effect?—No; I have stated that the schools not having yet come generally into operation, the last grant being appropriated to building schools, no inspection has been appointed, but that it is proposed to set apart a certain portion of the grant, which, I hope, will be soon made for the purpose of providing such an inspection.

5609. Is it intended to grant any assistance to schools already in being?—The question has been recently addressed to the representatives of the different societies, whether a portion of this grant could, in their opinion, during the ensuing year, be more beneficially applied in the maintenance of existing schools, than by limiting it exclusively to building, and I think the answers we have received have been universally in favour of the application of at least a portion of the grant to the maintenance of schools; and a portion of it will probably be so applied.

5610. Chairman.] Do you believe the existing schools to be extremely inadequate to the wants of the young negro population?—Irrespective of the schools now in course of erection, I believe the schools were extremely inadequate, and even including those now in the course of erection, I have no doubt a large increase might be most beneficially made.

5612. Are you aware that the Bible Society offered to give a Bible to all those that could read, and that the West India colonies supplied nearly 100,000 applicants for this gift; but that in the Mauritius there could be found only 10 of the negro population who could read the Testament?—I was aware of the fact of the Bible Society having offered a Bible or Testament to those who could read; but I was not aware that the number in the Mauritius who were able to avail themselves of it was so small. But I think the offer, on the part of the Bible Society, was not a present offer at the time it was made, but an offer to those who could read at a future date, several months subsequently to the offer; and the consequence, as I have been informed, in Jamaica, was, that a great many negroes who could not read, were most industriously learning to read, in order to qualify themselves for the gift.

5613. Are you aware that, in the first instance, the Bible Society offered to give it to those alone that could read?—No; I have not any precise information on the subject.

5614. Are you aware of another letter, from the same quarter, stating that there was in the Mauritius one district, comprehending 30,000 negroes, in which there was no school, and no place of worship whatever?—No: the statement I have seen was placed in my hand by a lady connected with the Mauritius, which she had received from Mr. Lebrun, who is the agent of the London Missionary Society in that colony. I have read the statement; but I have not got it by me now; but I know the general impression it left upon my mind is, that the means of instruction were extremely inadequate to the wants

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

wants of the population in the Mauritius; and that the negro population there was in a state of great ignorance.

5615. Do you not consider, especially with reference to the extreme want of education in the Mauritius, and also the want which exists throughout the other apprenticed colonies, that it is a matter of very first-rate importance at this time to provide means of education for the people?—I certainly think it is; I do not know anything of greater importance with reference to the future condition of the negro population throughout our colonies. I think that great facilities exist for the promotion of education, from the disposition which is generally shown, on the part of the negroes, to avail themselves of opportunities of education, when offered them.

5616. Are you aware that very great doubts are entertained by those Dissenting societies, who have devoted themselves in Jamaica to the instruction of the negroes, as to the propriety of having any compulsory system of education?—I have seen a letter from one of the Baptist missionaries in Jamaica, expressing considerable doubts upon that subject; but I do not remember to have seen any other communication in reference to it.

5617. You have stated, that throughout the West Indies, it is probable that the proportion of the negro children instructed by the Church is greater than that instructed by the Dissenting societies; in Jamaica is not the reverse of that the fact?—I could, by referring to some returns upon that subject, state the proportions more accurately than I can now: I am not able to answer that question from memory.

5618. There appears in the speech of the governor of Jamaica to the House of Assembly, on its prorogation on the 3d of February 1836, this passage: “I sent you down no less than four messages on the subject of an extended system of negro education. I recommended to you the establishment of a plan, even without a vote in support of it, in order that the British Government might have some grounds to go upon. As no measure on the subject has emanated from the house, can I do otherwise than conclude that you are indifferent to it?” It is presumed, therefore, from what you have stated to-day, that you have received some intelligence, since that time, of a better disposition on the part of the House of Assembly?—I cannot state accurately from recollection what has taken place in the House of Assembly on this subject; but I could do so on referring to the proceedings of the house.

5619. It is understood that the fact was, that a committee was appointed on the subject of negro education, and that that committee never came to any conclusion; is that the fact?—I would rather refer to the documents in the Colonial Office before I answer a question as to the proceedings of the legislature.

5620. As to the free persons imported into Jamaica, are you aware of the number of persons that have thus been sent to Jamaica?—No: there was a considerable number of German emigrants in the course of last year, who were brought into Jamaica; and there may have been some from other quarters; but I have no return of the number. Nothing has been done through the medium of the government upon this subject.

5621. Are you aware that a very extraordinary mortality took place among those persons?—A very considerable mortality took place among the German emigrants.

5622. Are you aware that there were some Irish emigrants, and that a very considerable mortality took place among them?—I do not remember that any information has been received with reference to any Irish emigrants in Jamaica. There have been some English or Irish emigrants introduced by individual proprietors in other parts of the West Indies, and I think, generally speaking, the mortality has been great among them.

5623. Are you aware of any body of emigrants that have been introduced into Trinidad, and that there also a similar great mortality has taken place?—No, I am not aware of that. My own opinion is, that any extensive system of emigration from this country to the West Indies is not likely to succeed. The experience we have had of the effect of the climate upon the constitution of persons going from this country, particularly of the labouring class, who would be

be much exposed to the sun, leads me to the conclusion that an extensive system of emigration of this nature could not be looked forward to as a means of carrying on sugar cultivation in the West Indies.

5624. Mr. Buxton.] Do you consider that measures are taken adequate to afford protection to the magistracy in the discharge of their duties in the West Indies?—I think that the magistrates are exposed to vexatious prosecutions, and that the law as it stands does not adequately protect them from such prosecutions; when I say they are exposed to them, I mean that they are liable to them, because in two instances only out of the numerous magistrates that are exercising their functions in Jamaica, have such prosecutions been instituted—the cases are those of Captain Oldree and of Mr. Bourne, which have both recently occurred, and in both of which a verdict was given against the magistrate, but a new trial had been applied for, and was expected to take place, and consequently the final result is not yet known.

5625. Was not the conviction of those two magistrates a sufficient warning to the magistrates at large, that they might be liable to great persecution if they offended the planters?—I do not think I should draw such a large inference from it as that; nor do I think, from the experience we have had even since those prosecutions, that there has been any relaxation of zeal or diligence on the part of the special magistrates. Certainly, if they find that these two magistrates were ultimately obliged, out of their own pockets, to pay the damages and costs incurred by those trials, it would have a prejudicial effect upon the magistrates, and for that reason I think the government are bound to indemnify any magistrate, who may appear to have acted bonâ fide in the discharge of his duty, against any personal loss in consequence of such a verdict, and if the government adopts that course, it would, I think, neutralize the effect alluded to in the question put to me.

5626. Is it enough to indemnify the magistrate, inasmuch as the person who prosecutes him receives the amount of the fine?—It is quite enough to indemnify the magistrate, in order to prevent the effect being produced upon the mind of the magistrates, which the question referred to. It may be an inducement to the prosecutor if he is to put the money into his pocket, but if the defendant is not to pay any damages or costs, it is not likely to affect him in the discharge of his duty.

5627. Does the fact that those two magistrates were convicted and fined in such large sums, seem to you to warrant the inference, that, in questions affecting persons of different colours, fair and equal justice will be obtained in the courts in the West Indies?—I think the administration of the law in the West Indies at present is not generally in that state in which it ought to be. I think that it is desirable everywhere that the administrators of the law should be placed in the hands of persons free from local bias, and from any prepossession which may affect their decisions; and looking at Jamaica in common with many other parts of the West Indies, the constitution of the bench does not appear to me to be such as to afford full confidence in the decisions which emanate from the bench. But in the case of the two magistrates whose trials I have referred to, it is rather the jury than the bench who have decided. They were not criminal prosecutions in which the magistrates were fined, but a civil action brought for damages, in which a jury has given a verdict, and assessed the amount of damages. In one case the chief justice presided; in the other case, owing to the illness of the chief justice, a colonial judge presided: my opinion is, looking at the report of the trial, that the verdict, at least so far as relates to the amount of damages in the case in which the chief justice presided, was contrary to his opinion; and as the motion for a new trial would probably come before the chief justice himself, I have very little doubt that both cases will undergo revision.

5628. Then the Committee are to understand that you have some distrust as to justice being obtained in the courts of the West Indies, on account of the modes in which the bench is formed, and a still greater distrust in questions affecting persons of different colours, as far as the jury is concerned?—If the question applies to the West Indies generally, I would rather refer to what has been stated in the course of the present Session in both Houses of Parliament, with reference to the Bill "For the better Administration of Justice in the West Indies." That Bill does not apply to Jamaica, but the objections which are very forcibly stated in the Report of the Commissioners of Legal Inquiry, and on which that Bill was founded, apply to Jamaica, though I think less strongly to Jamaica than they do to some of the other colonies, because there is a chief justice and an attorney-general in Jamaica, taken from the bar in this country. But looking at the state of colonial society generally, as affected by the long continuance of slavery in the West Indies, there is much reason to distrust the impartiality of juries as at present constituted; not that I mean to imply that they are guilty of a deliberate violation of their oath as jurymen, but it is the case in this country and everywhere else that persons are liable insensibly to be affected by influences which ought not to find their way into a jury box; and the greater the division of one class of society from another, the greater distrust I should entertain of the decisions of juries constituted from one class of society only.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.
 30 July 1836.

5629. Have you received any report as to the places of confinement upon the estates in Jamaica?—No specific report upon that subject. The condition of the hospitals on the estates, which are to a certain extent places of confinement, have formed a subject of communication in common with other topics from the governor of Jamaica, and a correspondence has taken place with reference to them.

5630. Has the report generally been that those places of confinement are in a very unsuitable condition?—In some instances they are. I think abuses have existed in connexion with the hospitals to which I am now referring; they have been used as places of confinement, not for the express purpose of punishment. But the question has arisen whether it was right in all cases to lock up and confine at the hospital persons who are unwell to a degree which prevents their performing their daily work. A practice seems to have existed in some cases of confining all persons indiscriminately to the hospital who were unable to work. That practice I do not believe to have been general, and it has been expressly discountenanced by instructions from the government. A question has been recently submitted to the Secretary of State with reference to a particular case which occurred in an estate hospital in Jamaica, and instructions have in consequence been given, which I hope will prevent a recurrence of any abuse in that respect.

5631. Has the Jamaica Workhouse Act been allowed or disallowed?—I believe this Act is in force, subject of course to any qualification of it which has been introduced by the law for carrying into effect the abolition of slavery: this Act passed before the alteration of the system. The jurisdiction of the special magistrates has been subsequently created, and the power of inspection of hospitals and workhouses is, as I conceive, indisputably vested in the special magistrates, which I think imposes a most salutary check upon any abuses which might exist, irrespective of any such inspection. I should also state the qualification, which I referred to yesterday, as to the corporal punishment of female apprentices.

5632. Although the Act is in force, is it open to disallowance in those passages which seem to militate against the views of Government with regard to the negro population?—If it has not been expressly allowed, it is open to disallowance; but I am not aware at this moment whether it has been expressly allowed, or whether it has been merely allowed to take its course.

5633. Has it been reported to you that gaols have been erected on some estates for the confinement of negroes, and that very offensive means have been employed in order to increase the severity of the punishment, and the special justices have been refused by planters permission to inspect such gaols?—I do not recollect any such report. If the question means that gaols have been erected in which the proprietors or managers of estates may confine apprenticed labourers, and that from those places of confinement the special justices are excluded, I think I may certainly state that no such information has been received. There have been complaints among the reports from special magistrates, with respect to the confinement of apprentices, without the order of a special justice; but that the special justices are excluded from inspecting any place of confinement in Jamaica, by law, or practically, I should be prepared to deny.

5634. Are you aware that two persons in the parish of Saint Thomas-in-the-Vale, named Lowndes and Giles, refused permission to a special magistrate named named Harris to visit the gaols upon the estates about the beginning of this year?—I am not aware of the fact; it may be so. If you can furnish me with the date of the occurrence, I have no doubt that I shall be able to ascertain whether any report of that kind is comprised among the reports of the special magistrates of that period. It is possible that such a refusal may have been given; but I should not infer from the refusal that they were legally authorized to refuse it, or that there were not means of compelling it. I have no doubt that if such a case has occurred effectual means are vested in the governor of Jamaica, of which he would avail himself for remedying it.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

5635. Supposing the fact were to be proved, could a greater penalty than that of 5*l.* be imposed upon the delinquents?—Not by the authority of a special justice, but by a prosecution at the suit of the attorney-general, which has been frequently resorted to in cases of misconduct. If the refusal was a single refusal, not persevered in, the penalty liable to be inflicted by the magistrate would be only 5*l.*; but if it was persevered in, the penalty which the special magistrate might impose could of course be repeated upon every occasion of refusal, and therefore the special magistrate might multiply penalties to any extent he pleased by merely multiplying his applications, unless the evil was remedied.

5636. Are you aware that it appears by a paper which has been presented to Government, as to the number of punishments inflicted, that the punishments seemed to be not upon the decrease, but upon the advance?—If the question refers to punishments generally, and not to corporal punishment, I believe it does appear from the returns that the punishments of the first year, or a portion of the first year, were not equal in amount to the punishments of the corresponding period of the second year; but, so far as corporal punishment is concerned, it was very considerably diminished; and, from returns subsequently received, it appears that that diminution is going on progressively; and it also appears, from recent returns, that the whole number of punishments inflicted is much upon the decrease. I should account for the former increase in the aggregate number of punishments, to a certain degree, by the fact that the number of special magistrates in Jamaica was very inadequate indeed when first the system came into operation, and that consequently a great number of complaints were not brought before them. It was found necessary to double the number of special magistrates for Jamaica; consequently, the number of punishments probably increased from there being more cases brought before them for adjudication.

5637. Have you any return of the amount of time forfeited by the judgments of the special magistrates?—No return, except that which appears in the regular returns of punishments. As to corporal punishments, it appears there has been a considerable diminution: the average of corporal punishments during the first year was 64·2 monthly, out of the whole negro population of about 250,000 apprentices. The number of corporal punishments in March last was 259; and I referred to statements yesterday, in the evidence which Lord Sligo had sent home, with regard to corporal punishments, in the month of April, which showed that a great decrease had taken place in April as compared with March; and his instructions to the magistrates have urged strongly upon them the abolition, if possible, of that punishment. Many of the punishments are extremely slight; and therefore, although the number of punishments may appear to have increased in the earlier part of the second year, as compared with the earlier part of the first, it does not at all follow that the aggregate amount of punishment was increased. In many instances whole gangs have been punished by extra work for loss of time; and the individuals composing them appear upon the return as so many instances of punishment.

5638. Are you quite convinced that in such cases they appear not as one punishment, but as separate punishments?—I am quite convinced of it in some cases, because I know that in other colonies notes have been added to the return, calling the attention of the Government to the apparent increase arising from that circumstance; and I have no doubt that the same is the case in Jamaica.

5639. Have you received any instruction from Lord Sligo to the magistrates, upon the subject of mulcting the negroes in point of time?—The instructions of

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

Lord Sligo, which I put in yesterday, comprise, I think, some directions upon that subject. They are dated the 1st of January 1836, and they are a consolidation of all the other instructions under which the special magistrates are now acting. The introductory passage of these instructions is as follows: "The instructions which have been sent to the special justices at various times, as circumstances have arisen calling for observation, being now, in some instances, inapplicable in consequence of altered laws, and for other reasons, and being also inadequate in some points, I have determined on having others printed in a compendious form, so that they can be carried about with you wherever you go, as a guide for your conduct." So that these instructions appear now to comprise the whole of the instructions addressed to the special magistrates. As to punishment, he states, "Prefer always to take sufficient time to decide carefully any case which may come before you, rather than hurry from place to place to have a greater number of miles on your list; and in your adjudications of punishments, take this as your grand end and object—the total abolition of the lash. The great diminution of the number of punishments of this description, which I notice in the returns of the special justices, induces me to hope that ere long, as the apprentices understand the law better, and feel that it must be obeyed, the use of this degrading and cruel mode of punishment may be entirely abandoned."

5640. Is the following 8th Instruction, dated the 18th of February 1835, still continued: "In the adjudication of punishment it is recommended that, wherever the offence will allow it, you should allot the punishment in such a way as to give the estate as much labour as you can. There are many cases where it will be necessary to adjudge immediate personal chastisement, but where it can be done without injury to justice, the interest of the proprietors are to be considered in the punishment you award. In all cases of insufficient labour or loss of time from any cause, I recommend double the quantity should be decreed, such as if one day is proved to have been lost, to adjudicate that two should be given. When the apprentice has made 30 cane holes too few, to order him to make 60 more. The effect of this will be to prevent such constant references to the magistrates, and establish a system of continuous and steady work." The rule upon that subject at present in force is No. 15, in the Instructions, to which I have referred: "In the adjudication of punishment you will observe the following rules: No corporal punishment to be inflicted without your own presence, or that of some officer or non-commissioned officer of police, who is to report the same to you, and see that the amount of your sentence is not exceeded. You will write down on paper, for that purpose, the amount of punishment; you will also write it down in the estate's book, so that when any fresh magistrate comes, and finds any person in confinement, or suffering any punishment, he will know whether it be legal or the reverse. As corporal punishment has much diminished in this island, so much so as indeed to render it probable that ere long it will be possible without injury to dispense with it entirely, as has been done in other islands, you will substitute for it in every possible case other description of punishments. You will in all cases give the estates, when possible, the advantage of it, inasmuch as the offence is in general to its detriment. Should a certain time of labour be equivalent, in your idea, for the offence committed, and that it is necessary that the culprit should be sent to the penal gang you will so apportion the punishment, that half the time shall be in the penal gang, and the other half in extra time, to repay the estate the loss. You will recollect that the increased work cannot exceed 15 hours a week, and that it is very advisable that they should have every other Saturday for their grounds. In case it shall so happen that it is not convenient to give every other Saturday, you must take care that the estate shall feed the apprentice while he has not time allowed him to work his grounds. It would be expedient that any repayment of time lost should be made rather greater than what has been illegally taken, as otherwise it would be a simple exchange of time, at the apprentice's pleasure, to his master's detriment. I therefore would suggest, for example, that if a man were 40 holes short, he should be condemned to repay the 40 lost and 20 holes as a punishment; and so on in other matters. But in case you shall find that any complaint is made by any manager, which has the appearance of being frivolous, or if such is the general character of the complaints on that estate, you will, instead of making the negro pay time to the estate, assign him such other punishment, either in the workhouse or otherwise, as you shall think proper." This is the substitute apparently for the regulation to which the question referred. With reference to this regulation, I think it throws light upon one point, with respect to which doubt has been suggested, namely, the power of the special magistrate to apportion the extra time. He is reminded that in imposing extra time, it is desirable that the negro under punishment, should have every other Saturday for his ground, clearly implying that the special magistrate is to apportion the extra time, and that it is not left to the discretion of the manager, as has been inferred from the strict letter of the law.

5641. Are you of opinion that an adequate check is now placed upon the special magistrates, to secure the fidelity of their returns of punishments, either as to their nature or their extent?—I think as efficient a check as can be devised, is placed upon the accuracy of those returns. Looking at the facilities which there are in Jamaica of communication with the governor, and at the existence of many persons who would be willing to give information in any cases of abuse that came under their cognizance, I do not see that any more efficient check could be devised than that which at present exists. And I must say, looking at the character of the special magistrates generally, I place very great reliance upon the accuracy of their returns. I should also state that publicity has been given to those returns recently, by Lord Sligo, in Jamaica, which affords an additional check to that which would exist if they were merely transmitted to him, and no other person had an opportunity of looking at them.

5642. In this 15th instruction it is said, "In case you shall find that any complaint is made by a manager, which has the appearance of being frivolous, you will assign to the negro some other punishment than that of working upon the estate." Is it to be understood by that that the magistrate is to punish the negro in consequence of a frivolous complaint made by the overseer or planter?—I think certainly not; I think that is intended as a qualification upon the former part of the instruction, which directed the magistrate, in the case of a substantial offence, to give the estate which had been a loser by the misconduct of the apprentice the benefit of the punishment, by compelling him to repay the time. But if the manager was in the habit of making complaints, not wholly unfounded, but which were of a trifling nature, and which had the appearance of being frivolous, I think it meant that although the magistrate was bound to take cognizance of them, in administering the law, and could not say this is no offence, he was not to let the manager have the benefit of the punishment, but to sentence the apprentice to such other punishment as he thought adequate to the offence. It does not imply that he is to impose a punishment inadequate to the offence, but that he is not to hold out an inducement to managers to make unnecessary complaints, with a hope that the estate will get the benefit of additional labour by that means.

5643. Do you know whether any notice has been taken, in any part of the communication with Lord Sligo, of the two constructions which this may bear; the one, that he is to be punished for a complaint, though frivolous, and the other that he is to be punished for a complaint, which is perhaps frivolous in the way you have mentioned, though an offence against the law?—I do not think, taking it in connexion with the whole of the instructions, that it is capable of two constructions. I do not think a magistrate could punish a negro for an alleged offence, which was not an offence by law. A manager may make complaints of certain infractions of the letter of the law, and if the magistrate was to state this is no infraction of the law, he would then be stating what would probably encourage offences of the same kind. But he may consider it as an offence which, though an infraction of the law, ought not to have been brought before him; and therefore instead of sentencing the negro to give extra time to the estate, he is required by this instruction to impose a punishment that gives no benefit to the party that made the complaint. But it is impossible fairly to put a construction upon the clause, implying that the magistrates were to deal with unfounded complaints as if they were real and substantial complaints.

5644. Has any case occurred in which the magistrates have condemned the apprentices to the payment of more time than 15 hours a week?—No; they have condemned them to repay more than 15 hours; but in the apportionment of the time I do not think it is possible for a magistrate to have condemned a negro to more than 15 hours in one week, he would be acting contrary to the Act of Parliament, and to his instructions; and I am not aware of any instance of it.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

5645. Might it not be possible that there should be such an accumulation of fines of time as should absorb the whole time of the negro till the extinction of the apprenticeship?—It is possible that by repeated offences committed by the negro, he might be liable to a succession of punishments, which would absorb the whole of his time till the extinction of the apprenticeship; but I do not think that any such case, or any case approaching to it, has occurred; and I think that if it did occur the attention of the governor would be immediately directed to it.

5646. Mr. Buxton.] Does Lord Sligo receive returns of the hours of time forfeited in the same manner as he receives returns of the number of lashes inflicted?—He does. In No. 6 of the Instructions, he states, “Make a weekly return, as in Form (B.), stating the whole distance you travel each day, including back journies. Add up in complainant’s column at the bottom, in red ink, the number of estates visited in that week; and in the complainant’s column, at the bottom, also in red ink, the number of properties at which, during that week, no complaints on either side have been made. In this return you must mark all the occurrences of each day, noting Sunday, or any other day of rest as such, so that each day may be accounted for. Place under plaintiff’s name his denomination, such as overseer, attorney, or apprentice, and under defendant’s the same. Specify crime in complaint column. If the crime be negligence, specify what sort of negligence, and similarly of insolence, insubordination, neglect of duty, or any of those indefinite sort of charges, if made. In case of gangs being sentenced to repay time, the names need not be specified;” but the number of the gang would be specified. “But every individual who receives any punishment, excepting as aforesaid, where a whole gang are condemned indiscriminately to repayment of time, must be inserted. You will keep an accurate note of all the occurrences which take place on each estate in a book.” In these returns, which they are required to make, they specify in each case the nature and amount of the punishment inflicted.

5647. Would there be any objection to place before this Committee an abstract or a summary of the amount of time forfeited by punishments in the same way as the number of corporal punishments?—None whatever, if we have the means of providing it. The returns before the Committee give the maximum punishment of all descriptions. In the returns which were required to be sent home, and which are transmitted monthly from all the colonies, the maximum amount of punishment of all descriptions is inserted.

5648. With reference to Vagrant Acts; have Vagrant Acts, imposing any restrictions upon the liberty of the negro, except during the times that they are employed in the service of their master, been allowed to pass?—I am only aware of one Vagrant Act that has been passed in Jamaica, and that Act has been disallowed.

5649. Has the Trespass Act in Jamaica been disallowed; the Act respecting gunpowder and fire-arms?—I do not think it has.

5650. Do you think that measures ought to be adopted in order to secure reciprocity of punishment as to offences committed by planters, as well as offences committed by negroes?—If the question means whether it would have been better that such a reciprocity had originally been included in the Act, I think it would have been desirable that such should have been the case; but if I am asked whether I think that measures ought now to be taken for altering the Act in that respect, I must answer that I do not think any case of necessity has been proved, which would render it expedient to require an alteration of the Act in that respect. I consider that such alterations ought to be required now as are proved to be necessary, and those only, and that those ought to be effected, if possible, through the Jamaica legislature; and that it is only in those cases in which the Jamaica legislature deliberately refuse to make such enactments as are considered by the government indispensable to the due performance of the compact which exists, that the interference of the British Parliament ought to be invoked. I think that having recourse to the British Parliament without such necessity would tend very much to interrupt the course of improvement which I have no doubt whatever is going on at present in Jamaica. I do not mean to imply that the interference of the British Parliament is not to be invoked where a case of necessity exists; on the contrary, I think it ought to be, but the necessity of the case ought to be undoubted.
present

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

5651. Do you think that it is desirable that we should sanction as few laws as possible which shall affect the condition of the negroes after the expiration of the apprenticeship, and in those cases in which it is necessary to legislate, that the greatest care should be taken that nothing repugnant or in any way opposed to the liberty which is enjoyed by the labourer in Great Britain, should be affixed to the negro?—I certainly think, generally speaking, that it is desirable that no laws should be passed now which are not to take effect till after the expiration of the apprenticeship: I do not think we are sufficiently informed at present of what the state of society will be then, to render it desirable that laws should now be passed with reference to that period. Some laws of course must be passed of a permanent character; but if they have reference chiefly to the state of society which may exist after 1840, I think it will be better to wait till the time arrives.

5652. Chairman.] You mean Bills of importance passed in the Assembly of Jamaica?—I mean Bills passed in the Assembly of Jamaica; because, looking at the change of feeling that has taken place in the last two years in Jamaica, and at the probability that a great change of circumstances and of feeling may take place before the apprenticeship expires, I think a very different law would probably be passed in 1839 from what would be passed in 1836; and there can be no necessity for passing in the year 1836 laws which are not to take effect till 1840. I think there is in progress a great amalgamation of conflicting feelings and opinions in Jamaica, and which, if it goes on, as I trust it will, will produce an increasingly improved spirit, a spirit more adapted to fair and equal legislation.

5653. Mr. Buxton.] You do not think that persons who have taken a deep interest with regard to the abolition of slavery have any reason for the alarm which they have felt, that restrictions will be imposed upon the negroes after the expiration of the apprenticeship different from those which exist with reference to labourers in England?—I cannot say that the same restrictions that exist with regard to labourers in England, will be applicable to labourers in Jamaica. A law which exists in one country may be inapplicable to another; but I think the same principle ought to govern the legislation in both cases.

5654. That the same degree of liberty ought to be secured to the negro as is enjoyed by the labourer in England?—I think the same principle ought to govern both; and that there ought to be no more restriction placed upon the liberty of the labouring class than the circumstances of the country require. I cannot say that the laws of England ought to be transferred to Jamaica, but the same principle ought to govern legislation in both cases.

5655. Is not the liberty of the British labourer to be transferred to the Jamaica negro?—Certainly in substance; but I do not see that it necessarily follows that the same precise rules would be applicable to the English labourer and to the Jamaica negro. I think the circumstances of difference that exist in the two countries may justify an alteration in the details of any measure; but I clearly think that no distinction ought to be made in the principle of legislation, and that no enactment ought to be introduced into a Jamaica Act which has reference to the past state of society in Jamaica, or has a tendency to perpetuate that. Supposing there are large tracts of unoccupied land in Jamaica, upon which the negro population might settle without any title to those lands, and merely maintain themselves in idleness, and become useless members of society; that is a circumstance which does not exist in England, and therefore a law might be necessary in Jamaica, though not in England, in order to prevent a result which would be very prejudicial to the negro himself, and to the interests of the community at large. I mention that only as one of the circumstances of difference which may render the legislation different.

5656. Do you think that any law should be allowed to pass which shall interfere with the freedom of labour in the West Indies, or which shall prevent the negro, who does not offend against the laws of society, from employing himself as he may consider most for his own advantage?—Clearly not.

5657. Chairman.] You think that the sole object of any laws and regulations of

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

of that description should be to keep the peace and good order of society?—Precisely; it should affect all classes of the community equally.

5658. Mr. Burton.] Have you received from the governors generally of each of the West India colonies a report that the negroes have been found willing to work for wages?—The general result of the information received from the governors of the different West India colonies, is that the negroes are willing to work for wages in their own time. In Jamaica no doubt can be entertained of the fact that they have proved themselves willing, in almost all cases, to work for wages in their own time; and the extracts I read yesterday from the report of one of the special magistrates, show that they do not object to any kind of labour, but that they prefer that which will produce the largest amount of remuneration. There have been numerous instances of their refusing to work for wages; but those occurred rather in the early period of the system, when they did not understand it so well as they do now; and the indisposition is fast wearing away.

5659. In those instances which did occur, was not it found by Lord Sligo that the fault was often more with the master than with the apprentice?—In many of the instances of a refusal to work for wages on the part of the apprentice, Lord Sligo's opinion was, that it was either owing to sufficient wages not having been offered, or to the want of conciliatory treatment on the part of the managers: and that circumstance has imposed an indirect check upon any misconduct on the part of the overseers and managers; because it is clearly their interest to obtain extra labour from their apprentices at fair wages; and the apprentices have it in their power to refuse to work for their employer, if they are not treated well in other respects; and they have exercised that power.

5660. Do not you think that the negro should be encouraged, rather than be deterred from becoming a proprietor, if he becomes a proprietor by honest means?—I would not deter him, to any extent, from becoming a proprietor, if he became a proprietor by honest means: on the contrary, I would encourage him. All I meant to express was, that I thought it might become necessary to impose some check, (I do not say by a vagrant law), to prevent what is called squatting, where no title is acquired to the land, but where, from the mere circumstance of its being unoccupied, a negro might settle himself and his family.

5661. Mr. Gladstone.] It still remains an independent question, whether it is desirable that the land should be cut up into extremely small portions, and held by proprietors of quarter acres, and half acres, and single acres?—The details of any measure for selling these lands are at present incomplete; and no law has been passed upon the subject as yet. Suppose a person as the proprietor of a number of acres in Jamaica, chooses to underlet it for a fair rent, I do not think it would be desirable to restrict by law the practice of making allotments to labourers, which they might cultivate for their own advantage, and which is a great assistance to them in maintaining themselves and their families, in addition to their daily labour. I think it would be extremely desirable that such should be the case.

5662. Do not you draw a considerable distinction between those allotments which are given as subsidiary to daily labour for wages, and those allotments which are held for the purpose of supporting the tenant; for example, in the case of the cottier system in Ireland?—I think a great distinction is to be drawn between those two cases, and that Ireland itself is a sufficient exemplification of the injury likely to arise even to the occupiers of land from that system. The great object ought to be to encourage free labour and industrious habits on the part of the negro population, and not to let them suppose that they cannot be free unless they are actually proprietors of the soil, maintaining themselves upon the small portion of land which would be sufficient for their subsistence without labouring for wages, and without improving their condition.

5663. Mr. Burton.] Is not the Irish cottier a tenant rather than a proprietor?—The tenant is the proprietor to a certain extent; he has a limited interest in the land, instead of an absolute interest.

5664. You have stated that there were some instances in which the negroes had not been willing, in the earlier stages of the apprenticeship, to work for wages. Do you consider that those instances are more frequent than those which would have occurred in an equal number of the population of this country?—I have no means of instituting that comparison. A great change had very recently taken place, and I do not think the system of working for wages was generally understood on either side. It was not understood by the managers in many instances; I think from the evidence of Mr. Shirley the other day, it is quite clear that by proper means being taken to explain to the negroes the condition and the terms upon which it was proposed to hire their labour, a great deal might have been done which was not done during the early period of the apprenticeship. There was a very desponding feeling on the part of many of the managers as to the success of the system; and they did not think it worth while to exert themselves as Mr. Shirley and many of the proprietors did. I have no doubt that where proper means are taken, the extra time of the negro may now be obtained universally for fair and adequate wages.

5665. Do you go so far as to think that the disposition of the negroes to work for wages has surpassed not only the low expectations of the planters, but the most sanguine expectations of the warmest friends of the negroes in this country?—I think it certainly has equalled the expectations of their sanguine friends. At the same time I believe that many persons entertained the opinion that they were susceptible of the same stimulus to labour as other people. I felt so myself from the little attention I had given to the subject. That opinion has been confirmed by experience. In fact, the motive which has been applied as the stimulus to free labour since the apprenticeship system came into operation, had not been tried before in those colonies. There was no good reason to apprehend that when fairly tried it would not succeed, and I think it has succeeded. Judging of the negro character by examples in the army and in the navy, and wherever the negro has been brought into contact with white men in places where slavery did not exist, I am not aware of any inferiority either in willingness to labour or in general efficiency.

5666. A Member of the House of Commons is reported to have used these words in a speech to the House, "You were led to expect that there would be a great diminution of sugar, and a mighty defalcation of revenue; no such consequence has followed. You were led to expect that the planters would be reduced to beggary; they are in a state of unrivalled prosperity. You were led to expect that the negro would not work for wages, but for wages he works day and night, and in an hour does double the work of former times. You were led to apprehend that servile war would ravage the land when the chains dropped off from the negro; we have had two years of profound and unprecedented tranquillity." Do you concur in, or do you dispute those propositions?—I concur in the main with them, after making allowance for a certain degree of hyperbole. I do not think, with reference to the present condition of the planters, that it is one of unrivalled prosperity. On the contrary, I have no doubt that their property was much more valuable 20 or 30 years ago than at present, but I believe that it is now improving, and that it has benefited by the stability which now belongs to West India property, as contrasted with the instability and insecurity that existed shortly before the emancipation. I have no doubt of that at all.

5667. Are you aware that the West India planters have almost annually, for the last 60 years, been representing to Parliament that they were in a state of the deepest and most ruinous distress?—I have no other means of information upon this point than any other Member of the Committee.

5668. Slavery will have expired on Monday next, for two years. Do you happen to know of any instance in which there has been an insurrection of the negroes during that time?—No instance of insurrection has occurred within that period. There were some instances of insubordination and of resistance to lawful authority just at the commencement of the apprenticeship in some of the colonies. Those arose I think from misapprehension of their condition, but nothing which could be termed insurrection, or anything like it, has since occurred.

5669. Do you think that the planters were ever in a state of such personal security in the West Indies during the same length of time as they have been during the period in which the apprenticeship has existed?—I am not sufficiently conversant with the state of the West Indies previously to the abolition of slavery to give a very explicit answer to that question. I have of course had my attention closely directed to the working of the present system, and I believe that there is a feeling of perfect personal security existing throughout the West Indies. There are apprehensions no doubt entertained by many people that after the apprenticeship expires the sugar cultivation will not be carried on to the same extent to which it is now; but if the question refers to personal security, I do not believe there is the slightest apprehension entertained by anybody of any danger.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

5670. In the two years which have elapsed since slavery has been abolished, how many instances have been reported to the Government of assaults made by negroes upon white persons?—I do not remember any instance which has been specifically reported to the Government. There may have been cases of trifling assaults; but I do not remember any assault of a sufficiently aggravated nature to have been made the subject of a report to the Government at home.

5671. Are you aware that one of the governors of a West India colony says, "I deem it my duty to remark to your Lordship that since the 1st of August there has not been an instance of a white man upon an estate being struck or ill-treated by a negro, nor has a single building or cane-field been maliciously set fire to?"—That passage occurs in a despatch from Sir Carmichael Smyth, the governor of British Guiana, of the 4th of March 1835. It will be found at page 173 of the second part of the Papers relative to the abolition of slavery, presented to the House of Commons in the course of last session.

5672. Is it your opinion that a plan somewhat similar to that adopted in the Australian colonies, with reference to the allocation of lands, should be established in the West Indies?—The best answer I can give to that question is by putting in a copy of a despatch upon this subject, recently addressed to the governors of the West India colonies. It is among the Parliamentary Papers.

5673. Sir Stratford Canning.] Do you attribute any part of the favourable circumstances which you have described as resulting from the emancipation to the present intermediate state of apprenticeship, or do you consider them as likely, from present circumstances, to be equally available under complete emancipation?—I think the intermediate state of apprenticeship, taking all circumstances into consideration, has conduced to the present favourable state of things in Jamaica; but I do not mean to imply by that that when the apprenticeship has expired things may not go on as favourably as at present. On the contrary, I think if the apprenticeship term is suffered to expire without interruption, if the negro mind is not influenced by the hope that the British Parliament will interfere to shorten the term of apprenticeship; and if, on the other hand, apprehensions are not excited in the minds of the planters that Parliament will interfere for that purpose, I think that there will be that general approximation to a state of freedom during the remainder of the apprenticeship, which will produce an almost insensible transition from the one state to the other. I do not mean to say that if the local legislature should be convinced of the expediency of shortening the term, there would be any objection to that; but I should think nothing so calculated to endanger the successful working of the system in the West Indies, as an interference at present on the part of the British Parliament, with a view to shorten the term of apprenticeship.

5674. Mr. Buxton.] What means have been taken in order to secure to the negroes those allowances which planters, for example Mr. Shand, have declared before Committees of the House of Commons, were invariably given to the negroes?—I have never read Mr. Shand's evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons, which sat several years ago, but I am aware that there are allowances which the negroes enjoyed during slavery, and which they were entitled to by law; and that there are what are called indulgences, which were generally given them, but which there was no legal obligation on the part of the proprietors to confer upon them. The Imperial Act for the Abolition of Slavery, according to my construction of it, required, in the 11th section, that the legal allowances should be continued. No express provision was made with respect to indulgences; but I believe the general practice has been, under the apprenticeship, that they have been given in addition to the allowances required by law. This has been subject, however, to certain exceptions, the exceptions

exceptions taking place, as might be expected, for the most part on the smaller properties, where the owners have less means of expending money upon their estates, and have been induced from economical motives to withhold the indulgences, or to obtain labour from the negroes in return for them. In the great majority of instances, I believe the indulgences to have been given just as they were, previously to the alteration of the system; but upon this subject my information is derived from the reports of the special magistrates, which reports either have been or will be laid before Parliament; and I have no means of information except what are derived from those reports, and from the evidence which has been given before this Committee.

5675. Chairman.] Are you aware whether the practice which was described by Mr. Shirley as having been adopted upon his estate, of withholding those indulgences, but of giving compensation to the negro for the withdrawal of them, by increasing the rate of wages beyond that which is usually given, has been adopted at all generally in the island of Jamaica?—I am not able to answer that question. It is possible that on referring to all the reports which have been received from the special magistrates, which are very voluminous, instances may be stated by them of that practice; but I do not recollect them at the present moment.

5676. Does that practice appear to you to have been a harsh or injudicious one?—On the contrary, I think it appears to have been a very judicious one; and the negroes in that instance seem, from Mr. Shirley's evidence, to have fully concurred in it, and to have continued satisfied with the arrangement into which they originally entered.

5677. Does not it appear to you to have been an unfortunate thing, with reference to the contentment of the negro population, that the indulgences which had been usually given during the existence of slavery, should in any cases have been withdrawn, except upon the misconduct of the negroes themselves, or without some compensation being given to them for such withdrawal, by an increased rate of wages?—I think it very injudicious, and in the instances in which it has occurred, which appear from all the information I possess to be exceptions to the general practice, the inconvenience arising from the dissatisfaction evinced by the negroes, will probably be considerable. In fact I think that any system which would tend to produce just dissatisfaction in the minds of the negroes at present, would very materially affect the interests of the proprietors.

5678. Do you think that this practice has only been resorted to in the case of distressed proprietors?—My present impression, as derived from what I recollect of the reports of the special magistrates, is that the indulgences have been withheld on small properties only; and I should rather infer that it has been from the comparative inability of the proprietors to incur the same expenditure that the large proprietors can incur.

5679. Do you believe that in point of fact there are many negro apprentices at this moment that are deprived of their indulgences from the cause you have mentioned?—I have no means of forming any correct estimate of that; but I should think that the general practice is to give them their indulgences as they received them while they were slaves; and I think it will be found almost universal upon the larger properties.

5680. Mr. Buxton.] Supposing that all the planters who were examined formerly concurred in declaring that those allowances were invariably given, is it not a fair inference that those were within the contemplation of Parliament when they determined that the negroes were to retain the same allowances as before slavery expired?—I do not think I should admit that inference, unless the evidence to which the question refers had been specifically under the consideration of Parliament at the time when the clause in the Act relating to allowances was passed. My own impression is that the term "law," used in the clause of the Act to which I have referred, means a written statute, and not usage.

5681. Supposing the Committee that sat immediately preceding the abolition of slavery had this subject clearly brought before them, and that that Committee were told repeatedly by planters and witnesses from the West Indies that those allowances were invariably given, do not you think it might then be considered fairly within the contemplation of Parliament that all the allowances given before were to be retained?—I think it is very difficult to state what was within the contemplation of Parliament with reference to that particular clause, except from the terms of the clause itself. The only other mode would be to ascertain what was the intention of the framer of the Bill as explained by him to Parliament in introducing the measure. I do not recollect at this moment any discussion during the progress of the Bill through Parliament on this point; such discussion may have taken place, but I do not remember it. Looking merely at the terms of the Act of Parliament, my own construction, irrespective of the circumstances to which the question adverts, would be that indulgences, resting only on usage as distinguished from allowances required by statute, were not included in the term “law,” used in the clause of the Act.

Copies of two letters from the Rev. Mr. Trew have been placed in my hands; he has recently gone to Jamaica for the purpose of superintending the system of instruction which the trustees of the Mico Charity propose to carry into effect in that colony. He was well conversant with the state of the West Indies before, having resided in Jamaica for a considerable period during the existence of slavery, and is therefore competent to form a fair comparison between the present system and the system of slavery as it then existed. These letters are addressed to a Member of the Committee, who is one of the trustees of the Mico Charity, and I have his permission to lay them before the Committee. One is dated “Kingston, Jamaica, 31st December 1835;” and it runs in these words: “My dear Sir; Knowing that you will be anxious to have a few lines, I beg to trespass on your attention for a little, after having finished my despatch to the trustees. It is quite impossible for me to convey to you an idea of the improvement I witness in the altered circumstances of this country since I was here, scarcely eight years ago. The first pleasing change which attracted my attention was the breaking down of caste. In the same pew I have seen persons of every grade, and at the same Sacramental table persons of all colour. On visiting Spanish Town I was introduced to three members of assembly, Messrs. Jordan, Osborn and Taylor, all of colour, one of them exceedingly dark indeed; and I think I may say that the Sabbath in Kingston is as well, if not more strictly observed than in many parts of England. Then again, instead of the whip in the hands of the driver, to witness in some places the negro constable, with his blue jacket and red facings, superintending the labourers, and the cheerful ‘How d’ye, massa,’ of the people, now unmingled with the painful association of former days, is to my ears the sweetest music I ever heard. In talking with some of the planters also, how changed is the tone. I have heard of several properties where the services of the stipendiary magistrate have never been known; and of others who have taken off larger crops than under the old system. Altogether you, my dear Sir, and those who were associated with you, have reason to bless God to the end of your existence; for had I a thousand hearts to feel, and a thousand pens to indite, it were impossible to convey an idea of the mighty benefits which, under God, have been effected for this poor people. I am thankful to say, ‘the Mico men,’ as the editor of the Dispatch calls them, are giving me much satisfaction; and I trust ere long you will hear pleasing results from their labours.

“J. M. Trew.”

The other is dated, “Jamaica, 16 May 1836.

“My dear Sir,—Your kind letter of the 14th March did not reach me with that of the Trustees of a similar date, but it had all the effect you desired it should have, that of encouraging me in a work which is confessedly against wind and tide; a work, however, which God has blessed, and I trust will bless to many a weary soul. You will learn from my despatch to the Trustees, in reply to theirs just alluded to, that I instantly abandoned the plan of Schools of Industry. I am now going forward in the work of imparting Scriptural knowledge and right principles as deduced therefrom, looking for the blessing of our Heavenly Father.

“When I considered it my duty to state my fears as to the unwillingness of the free children to labour, it was not with the view of throwing a stigma upon the negro population. I trust I have felt for them too deeply, even by way of inference, to aim at establishing this point. I have no fears for the industry of of the great bulk of the population, they will work, and work cleverly; but my fears were, and pardon me if I say they are even yet in a small degree, that in the pride of his heart, the adult negro will not readily subject his liberty-born son to handle the hoe as he was wont to do. Where Christianity has triumphed, my fears are groundless I admit, to the fullest extent; but where the darkness of Heathenism still broods over the mind, there will be jealousies and suspicions in the anticipation of evils that do not exist; and the long night of slavery will be remembered by the parent, when its last link shall have been severed for ever, and to the last hour of his existence. Unless the rays of Gospel light have penetrated his soul he will stand in doubt of every change, and watch every movement of the white man, with the eye of one whose mental vision had been all but obscured by contact with it. I have already said that the negro will work. To prove it, I may add, that this very morning I heard the sound of the woodman's axe falling in measured time to a native air, sung by a numerous body of them, who were hired by their master to clear a patch of woodland in their own time. On inquiring as to the terms of the contract, I was informed that they were to receive at the rate of seven dollars per acre (a dollar is 4s. sterling), and that they very generally were able, and did clear at the rate of about one acre per diem to every five labourers, thus earning each individual about 9s. 4d. currency or 5s. 6d. sterling daily. Yet this rate of wages, exorbitant as it may appear, the planter finds it his interest in giving to the negro, rather than allow him to do the same work in the planter's own time; although the average rate of such labourer would not exceed from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 4d. currency, or from 1s. 6d. to 2s. sterling per day. Of this there can be no doubt that when the negro has a motive to labour he does better work, and more of it. Hence it often happens that when task-work is given them they are able to accomplish their portion a short time after noon; and you may, in passing along the road, at once form a pretty correct estimate as to whether the people are working by task-work or otherwise. On this head I might write largely, but it may be resolved amongst other reasons, into the love of money, which all must acknowledge the negro, in common with other men, is not indifferent to. If, however, the adult negro loves money, let it not be concealed that he loves also to procure with it wherewithall to satisfy the cravings of an immortal soul—the Word of life. This fact I learned during my late visit to Montego Bay, and on the spot, that the Rev. Mr. Blyth's congregation have within a few months subscribed 70l. currency for copies of the Word of God. These subscriptions are almost exclusively from apprentices. In Mr. Stainsby's church at Lucea, I saw the father and son standing side-by-side in the same class and reading out of the same blessed book. In our Mico Institution for Middlesex, there are women who came night after night, with their infants on their backs, in all kinds of weather, to receive religious instruction; and there, also, there are little children who one month ago knew not a letter, and are now in the first class book.

“ You ask my opinion as to whether the system is liable to any particular abuse; I am not in possession of any facts on this head. But there is one thing which appears hard; I mean the manner in which apprentices who may wish to purchase their freedom are valued. Some weeks ago I wished to redeem a very fine young man as a teacher for the charity. I carefully instructed the young man to proceed in the matter as though it were his own act, desiring him not to intimate who were to be the purchasers, fearing that too great a price might be affixed to him; I am not aware that he was asked any questions; however, he was valued at the amazing price of 130l. currency. He was a carpenter, but not efficient by any means. The sum was so great that the poor fellow went back to his work, saying he would not allow me to pay so much. I did not interfere, for it could not have served the lad. The stipendiary magistrate is a mere boy; not by any means so advanced in life, to appearance, as your son. I believe he is a well disposed person, but not qualified for such a work as this. The apprentice, in purchasing his freedom, should find in the magistrate a protector. He has no option of selecting one valuator; I believe the magistrate calls in the aid of another magistrate, and so the matter is settled. I have not met with many of the stipendiary magistrates, but I certainly am not prepared to pronounce the selection a good one. I believe there are some valuable men, as Mr. Daughtrey; but if I am to judge of them by their returns to Lord Sligo of the number of lashes inflicted in their several districts for the month of March, I would not be prepared to form a favourable estimate. If you are not in possession of this document, it might be an interesting one to have, namely, the return of punishments awarded by the several stipendiary magistrates of Jamaica from — to —, detailing the number of estates visited, complaints, stripes, and other punishments, &c. I should greatly like to see more authority, if more could be procured for him, in Mr. Daughtrey's hands. In the list to which I have referred, whilst some magistrates had administered 400 and 500, and more lashes, during the month, he had not one in his large district. Indeed he told me himself that for three months he had not had occasion to punish but by a little forfeiture of time, or some such remedy.

“With respect to the final freedom of 1840, and what measures may be desirable to guard against its abuse, &c., I will endeavour well to consider this point, as it is very important; strange to say that our Assembly have yet taken no measures as to its permanent well-doing.

“Before, however, I part with the subject of the stipendiary magistrates, there is one appalling fact which I would wish to mention, namely, that very many of them are Irishmen (no reproach I hope from a countryman), but Irish Roman Catholics.

“Now, my dear Sir, knowing what your political sentiments in these matters are, yet I cannot help honestly saying that many better friends to the liberty and to the best interests of the negro might be found than in such men. I would not object to individuals being selected from the body; but when our Governor, as the papers say, subscribes 100 l. to a Roman Catholic Chapel; when his son lays the foundation-stone of that chapel; when amongst the executive of the land there is an increasing leaven of this intolerant Church; I do say that the dissemination of Divine truth amongst the negroes, must be more or less marred by introducing amongst them a body of men whose principles are opposed to, and whose spirit is opposed to the mild and generous, and social dispensation of the Gospel. Greatly would I desire you should lend your valuable aid to the selection of a better class of magistrates, which I think might in a great measure be effected by your friends in power, who really desire effectually to serve the best interests of the negro, recommending such individuals to the Government at home, and thus preventing the government here from marring this part of their benevolent arrangement. But on this point I need not enlarge at present.

“The detail of our proceedings you will learn by my public despatch to the Trustees. In testimony, however, of the rising promise of the negro, a fact has come to my knowledge, so deeply interesting that I cannot avoid, even though I trespass somewhat on your time, mentioning it to you.

“Previously to the rebellion in this country, a slave on a certain property had suffered, for conscience sake, the most bitter persecution from his master. He was almost the only negro who in those days, on that particular estate, had sufficient moral courage to hold fast his integrity under the most trying circumstances. He was a tradesman, yet turned into the fields to dig cane-holes. He was flogged, imprisoned, and, as the day-star of freedom arose, he was (in order to his being effectually crushed and destroyed,) sent to labour in the pestilential atmosphere of a swamp, where disease soon overtook him, and threatened him with a speedy release from all his sorrows. There was in the neighbourhood of this poor man, however, a Christian family, to whom the sufferer's case was well known. To this house he had often gone for counsel and for comfort, and many a time the heart which came bursting in agony, went on its homeward way rejoicing. After a time the sufferer was missed in his usual visits, and then it was discovered that, in addition to his other persecutions, he had been sent from the estate to labour in the swamp, where he was then suffering under heavy disease. There he had none to sympathize with him; no medicine, no nourishment was afforded him; the design of his cruel master seemed almost consummated. But God was with him. The good Samaritans followed him to his exile, and there, secretly and unknown to his master, poured in oil and wine, and enjoyed in due time the happiness of finding the object of their compassion completely restored.

“Shortly after this the rebellion broke out, and in that part of the island it assumed a very awful aspect; many of the estates were fired, the families had fled, and the utmost consternation prevailed. It became necessary that this Christian

Christian family also should look for a place of safety, and it was resolved that on the following morning they should remove to the sea-coast. On the night before their intended departure they had assembled to family prayer as usual; very many of the negroes, and several strangers who had been accustomed to avail themselves of this privilege were present. The head of the family addressed them at length; spoke of the darkness of the times, and of the heavy clouds which at that moment appeared to be suspended over them. He gave them much Christian counsel; and, not knowing whether they should ever meet again, he encouraged them to a steady trust in the Lord. The meeting was deeply affecting; all seemed to feel as though they should never meet again; but just as they were ready to separate, a voice from the assembly gave out the following lines, and immediately raising an appropriate tune, was joined by the whole assembly in singing them:

Sir G. Grey, Bart.

30 July 1836.

‘ Warrior on thy station stand,
Faithful to thy Saviour’s call,
With the shield of faith in hand,
Fearless, let what may befall.
Nothing fill thee with dismay,
Hunger, toil, or length of way;
In the strength of Jesus boast,
Never, never quit thy post.’

It was the persecuted negro; the succoured by this Christian family, who seemed, as it were, at this crisis of his deliverer’s fears, sent as a ‘ministering spirit’ amongst them. The effect was magical. The family resolved with such betokening assurances of deliverance never to quit their post; they remained; their property was safe; and their influence gained for others that protection which they had otherwise lost. But mark the sequel. Emancipation took place; our persecuted friend, by the assistance of his patron, purchased his freedom; he is now his overseer, and has the entire charge of a sugar estate, goes on consistently and satisfactorily; has purchased for himself a house and 70 acres of land; and in the house of this once persecuted individual I had the privilege of meeting him with others of his neighbours, who liberally contributed towards the establishment of a Mico School.

“I have now, I fear, wearied your patience; I could not, however, resist giving you the above sketch of a story which has left an indelible impression on my mind, as I know all the parties, and cannot express to you the delight with which I pressed the hand of this once persecuted Christian, nor the feelings with which I took from him a glass of new sugar and water, the sugar of which was manufactured under his entire management and direction.

“I beg to express my best thanks for your good wishes as it regards my health; I mentioned to the Trustees my fears on this subject; I certainly do not feel equal to undergoing in future what I have done, and were I to consult my feelings, I would not wish to remain here over the fall; I shall therefore feel thankful to be recalled as soon as they can. I shall feel happy in forwarding their views to the utmost of my power under any circumstances, but having a very numerous family, you will readily conceive the anxiety of Mrs. Trew, as well as my own, to use all legitimate means of preserving what to them is of importance.

“With an assurance of gratitude for all your kindness, believe me, &c. &c.

(signed) “J. M. Trew.”

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

Charles Brown, Esq., called in; and Examined.C. Brown, Esq.

2 August 1836.

5682. Mr. Buxton.] WHEN did you first go to Jamaica?—I was appointed a special magistrate on the 4th of September 1833, by Lord Stanley, and I sailed on the 6th of October following. I was among the first that arrived in the island.

5683. Mr. Thornely.] When did you undertake your duties as stipendiary magistrate?—I was upon pay from the time of my arrival, and I was located in the parish of Vere and of Clarendon in the early part of May 1834, to the best of my recollection.

5684. Mr. Buxton.] In what district were you placed?—In the parish of Vere, and for some time I officiated for Lower Clarendon, where there are about 3,000 or 4,000 additional apprentices. The duties I then discharged occupy now two or three magistrates in fulfilling them.

5685. When did you resign your situation?—On the 31st of December 1834.

5686. Mr. Thornely.] Did you leave the island soon after resigning your situation?—No; I remained in the city of Kingston till April 1835; I was attending the dying bed of a son. I acted in the capacity of magistrate for one year, one month and thirteen days.

5687. Mr. Buxton.] During that time did you observe whether there was a disposition upon the part of the negroes to work for wages?—In all my district I was not aware of any estate but one where the negroes refused to work for wages. Upon one estate they refused in my presence; but I can give sufficient reasons how they did refuse. It was the negroes' planting time, and they were planting their own provision-grounds, and their time was valuable to them; and although they refused in my presence, I understood that they agreed afterwards to work for wages. I am not aware of any refusing to work for hire but upon that one estate.

5688. Then they refused to work because they found they could employ their time more profitably?—At that time; but afterwards they agreed to work for wages, and part of them did work for wages, to my knowledge.

5689. Did the negroes receive the same allowances upon the estates under your jurisdiction which they had been in the habit of receiving before slavery was abolished?—No, they did not; they cut off the "indulgences," as they call them. The only things they received were their grounds and their clothing; the herrings, and shads, and corn, and all those things, were withheld.

5690. Was medical attendance amongst the allowances?—Medical attendance was continued.

5691. Do you mean to say that the indulgences were stopped upon some one or two estates, or that they were generally stopped throughout the whole of your district?—They were generally stopped. There were some few proprietors did allow them, but they allowed them as "indulgences," and, as they said, for good conduct; but in general they stopped them.

5692. Mr. Gladstone.] Did those that withheld them allege that they withheld them on account of what they considered not good conduct?—They alleged that in part; but they said they were "indulgences," not "allowances," but the people all declared them to be their usual comforts and allowances.

5693. Did they profess to be willing to give them in case the people were willing to work for hire?—The people were willing to work for hire, and on some few estates they were giving them those few "indulgences," as they termed them, in the room of hire.

5694. Did they profess generally to be willing to give the indulgences if they could get the negroes to work for them during their own time?—I believe they did, if the negroes would work for the allowances out of their own time; but I considered, according to law, that the apprentice had a right to those allowances, or indulgences as they were called.

5695. Did

5695. Did they express an apprehension that with the reduced time of labour under the apprenticeship they would not be able to afford the indulgences?—They often spoke of their not being able to afford those “indulgences.”

5696. Were you of opinion that the indulgences were legally exigible from the managers and planters as well as the allowances?—As the law states that all the usual allowances are to be given, I was of that opinion.

5697. In what sense did you administer that portion of the law?—The law was considered rather defective and ambiguous; and therefore I endeavoured to get them, if possible, to allow them; but if they would not allow them, I had no express law by which I could compel them to do it.

5698. Sir George Grey.] How long did you act as a magistrate?—I resigned on the 31st of December 1834.

5699. When was your resignation sent in?—My resignation was sent in December.

5700. Mr. Thornely.] Then you were five months a magistrate during the apprenticeship system?—I was.

5701. Sir George Grey.] Were you acting during the whole of that period?—I was.

5702. Mr. Buxton.] Was fish or salt considered as an allowance or an indulgence; that is, was it continued or withdrawn?—I considered them a regular allowance that the people were usually in the habit of getting; and the people made many complaints when they were taken away from them.

5703. Sir George Grey.] Did you consider those articles which have been mentioned to be allowances or indulgences?—I considered them to be allowances, as I knew for many years previous to that time they were always allowed. Herrings, shads or salt fish were sent to every estate as allowances.

5704. Mr. Buxton.] You have stated that, on the part of the negroes, there was every inclination to work for wages. Was there a disposition upon the part of the planters, and upon the part of the agents of the planters, to meet the wishes of the British Government, and to render all the aid they could to make the system work well?—No, they were hostile to the system during all the time that I was there.

5705. Did you observe any particular proofs of an inclination upon the part of the planters to resist the new system?—In many cases they could not exactly resist the law; but they were quite hostile to the law.

5706. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean to apply that to the community generally?—Generally.

5707. Did you perceive any symptoms of mitigation in that hostility before you left the island?—No, I did not perceive any.

5708. When did you leave Jamaica?—On the 8th of April 1835.

5709. From the 31st of December to the 8th of April where did you reside?—In Kingston.

5710. Then you were not conversant with the practice on the sugar estates during that period?—No; I left the sugar estates on the 31st of December.

5712. Do you know what were the wages given for the labour of jobbing slaves per day in former times?—In former times they used to give four bets a day which was then equal to 2s. sterling.

5713. What is the price now given for the labour of jobbing apprentices?—I am not aware of that, not having any jobbers in the district I resided in.

5714. Were the punishments inflicted in your district very numerous during your stay?—They were not very numerous. I think the punishments during my time inflicted by me would not be upwards of 100 at the most; that is considering all kinds of punishment; but there were very many complaints that I reconciled and got the negroes to return peaceably to their duty without the necessity of inflicting punishment.

5715. Did it come to your knowledge that there were any cases in which females were flogged?—There were none flogged in my district.

5716. Do you happen to know whether any were flogged in the workhouses in your district?—In the workhouse of my district no female was flogged, to my knowledge.

C. Brown, Esq.

2 August 1836.

5717. Had you ready access to the workhouse?—Yes; I was a local magistrate as well as a stipendiary; I visited the workhouse frequently.

5718. Were females worked in the penal gangs in chains?—Yes. In the time of slavery we did not work free people in chains, and I did not feel myself justified in allowing it till I found it was permitted by the governor; and in the workhouses now all the apprentices are worked in chains, both in the workhouses and in the penal gangs upon the estates.

5719. Sir George Grey.] Were free people put into the workhouses at all?—Yes, they were, under the Vagrant Act, sailors, free black people, and people of colour.

5720. Mr. Buxton.] You did not feel justified in allowing negroes to be worked in chains?—No; till I received instructions from his excellency, and till I found that they were doing so in Spanish Town, where the governor resides; the chief magistrate of my own district satisfied me that that was the case before I allowed it.

5721. Were any indulgences in point of time allowed to pregnant females?—That was a cause of much trouble to me, having no particular law upon the subject. In the time of slavery they were indulged, but they wanted to take away that indulgence from them. In several cases in which I interfered on behalf of pregnant women, their owners went and complained to his excellency that I had done so: in several cases I was threatened with actions for damages.

5722. Sir George Grey.] Were any such actions brought against you?—Not brought, but I was threatened with them.

5723. By whom?—By the planters.

5724. Mr. Buxton.] Were the mothers of six or more children exempted from labour upon the estates?—In former times; but they would not grant it during my time; they wanted to do it away.

5725. Mr. Gladstone.] Was that universally the case?—In my district they took away all the cooks, they took away all the midwives, and they took away all the water-carriers, till some of them relented, and appointed them back again; but they made them understand that that was an indulgence that they had no right to.

5726. Was that reappointment general?—The midwives were sent to the field, but the water-carriers they could not do without.

5727. Was it generally the case before you gave up your situation of stipendiary magistrate that those persons who had been accustomed to do offices for the comfort of the slaves were reappointed to those offices?—They were not generally reappointed.

5728. Sir George Grey.] How many estates were under your care?—About 36 estates in Vere, and in Clarendon, where I acted for some considerable time (about three months or three months and a half), I think there are about 18 estates.

5729. How long did you act in Vere after the 1st of August?—Five months after the 1st of August.

5730. And three of the months in Clarendon also?—To the best of my recollection, for about three months.

5731. Had you any means of personal observation in other parts of the island and upon other estates during that time?—No, I think not.

5732. Then your observation is founded upon your own experience during those five months in your own district?—Yes.

5733. When you speak of a thing occurring generally, you mean generally throughout your own district?—I cannot speak positively beyond my own district, except what I might hear by report or seeing the public prints; I speak of what occurred in my own district under my own observation.

5734. What was the whole number of special magistrates in the island at that time?—There were not above 30 at first; but the number was gradually increased to nearly 60. I performed the duty alone, where I believe there are two or three employed now.

5735. Mr. Buxton.] Do you know any instance of oppressive treatment of females in the field?—There were a number of complaints made, but they were generally redressed and settled.

5736. Upon the estates generally over which you had control, what was the distance of the provision-grounds from the estates?—They were very various; some of them might be from half a mile to three or four miles; there were very few of them further, in my opinion. In that district the negro grounds are close adjoining generally upon the estate; it is a low-lying parish.

5737. What is the distance of the estates from the markets in general?—The nearest nearest market from the centre of the parish is Cross Pass, which I believe is from nine to twelve miles distant, and Old Harbour, from fifteen to twenty miles.

5738. Was the eight-hour system or the nine-hour system in operation in general?—Both were in operation during my time.

5739. Did you as a special magistrate find yourself sufficiently protected from the enmity of the planters?—I regret to say that I was not sufficiently protected.

5740. Sir George Grey.] In what instances did you experience want of protection, and what was the nature of the protection which you think the law ought to have given?—In the first place, my summonses were not paid respect to in the place. The law says that the summonses shall be all served by the parochial constable; the parochial constable, though ordered by the chief magistrate to attend my court, was very negligent in doing so. In some cases, after making out summonses to summon people, I had considerable difficulty in getting them served.

5741. Do you give that as an instance of want of protection against the enmity of the planters, the indisposition of the constable to serve the summonses?—I cannot say what it was owing to. I should think if they had orders they would attend and serve the summonses.

5742. When you speak of enmity, do you mean enmity against yourself individually, or enmity against the system?—I think the enmity was against the system; as to myself personally, I must say, I received a great deal of kindness from the planters; but their enmity to the system interfered with my official capacity.

5743. Was not there a paid police?—Yes; they attended my court, but the law says, "That the summonses shall be served by the parochial constables."

5744. Is there any other instance of want of sufficient protection?—On visiting one estate I was accosted by a gentleman connected with another estate, which I had occasion to visit in my official capacity, who came up to me very abruptly, and said, "I understand you sent home from the field three apprentice women on account of their being pregnant, belonging to a certain estate, and I am the medical man of that estate, and you ought to have consulted me." I replied, that I was not aware that he was the medical man of the estate, and I did not think it was my duty to consult a medical man. I saw the women upon the estate, who had every appearance of being near their time of confinement, one within one month, another within two months. But this gentleman did everything but assault me; he did everything he could to provoke a breach of the peace. I called upon two of the constables upon the estate to protect me from his violence; and after that I remained like a prisoner in the house for some time, with the constables at the door. The overseer of the estate came in and ordered the constables to their work; he refused me any protection, asserting that nobody had sent for me there; he went away, taking with him two white men whom I had called to witness the attack which I expected to be made by the person in the room; and I believe when he was left in the room with me, it was on purpose that he might assault me; but I got up in a corner of the room, and told him I would represent the case to the governor, so he had better take care what he was about. I did represent the case to the governor. The governor desired another magistrate to come to the Alley to investigate the case. At the time that I was going to issue summonses to have the case investigated, the other magistrate was removed to another part of the island; so that I was unable to hold the court, and the business passed off. I received many other annoyances in the discharge of my duty in my official capacity from a number of gentlemen; but the principal trouble that I got was in attending the House of Assembly. I was summoned first of all to attend a committee of the House of Assembly in Jamaica, as to the working of the new system. I got that summons, and accordingly went to the chairman of the committee in Spanish Town, and he told me I had been summoned to the committee, but that I had been handed over to another sub-committee, which was appointed to investigate into my conduct, and into the conduct of some of the other stipendiary magistrates. Myself and three or four other stipendiary magistrates attended that committee. I applied to the attorney-general to know whether I was legally obliged to attend that committee, for a number of gentlemen upon that committee were the very gentlemen with respect to whom I had had complaints from their apprentices about severity and maltreatment; and he told me that I had better go to the governor. I applied to his excellency; I asked whether I would be obliged to attend that committee; he at once said, that we should not only attend, but bring our books with us; that the more our conduct was investigated into, he thought it would appear the more straightforward and honourable; and he would recommend us to attend. I accordingly attended, and waited in Spanish Town 14 days, during which time I was put off from day to day, and I demanded a copy of the charges against me, or what the investigation was to depend upon, but which I did not get, and I was dismissed without a single question being asked; after keeping myself and my horses and servants in Spanish Town about 14 days I was dismissed without a single question being asked.

C. Brown, Esq.

2 August 1836.

5745. This was, in fact, an examination conducted by a committee of the House of Assembly in Jamaica into the working of the new system?—No; that was the first summons, but then they handed us over to a sub-committee appointed to inquire into the conduct of the magistrates. When I went to his excellency he appeared not to be aware that there was such a committee.

5746. But you, in obedience to the committee, did attend, and were not examined beyond two or three questions?—I had a number of questions in writing handed me by the chairman, on my insisting, by advice of the attorney-general, on having them, in order that I might have the legal time to prepare my answers. These questions I showed to his excellency, who threw them down as unworthy of notice. I told the chairman I would summon the whole parish if they had any charge against me. At last, after debating in the committee, the chairman told me that I might depart. It cost me upwards of 50*l.* I applied to the governor to see if I would be allowed any remuneration; the governor told me they would pay me. Another magistrate had petitioned the House before me. I said I would wait to see the result of his petition. I understand there is a standing order in the House, that if any money petition comes in a member may object to its being read.

5747. Did you apply to the committee for your expenses?—I did.

5748. Did you apply in writing?—I did.

5749. Did you apply to the chairman of the committee personally for your expenses for attending that committee as a witness?—Personally.

5750. What answer did you receive?—That I should be allowed none.

5751. Do you know whether there is any general rule in Jamaica as to the expenses of witnesses that attend committees of the House?—I cannot say that I am well acquainted with the rules of committees; I have understood, that it was the rule, if witnesses were put to expense, they would be reimbursed. The governor thought it would be allowed. He said, they will pay you.

5752. Mr. Buxton.] Are there any other instances in which you found that you had not adequate protection in the discharge of your duty?—I had a number of complaints made to me, or rather warnings given to me, by several of the apprentices, that I would not be long in that district; and the white people were hostile to me, only owing to my official capacity, for they could have had no personal hostility; quite the reverse. Indeed they told me that they were hostile to the measure, and that they considered the measure would ruin them, and that it was their interest to be hostile to it.

5753. Sir George Grey.] Who told you this?—A number of the planters. I may also state, for the information of the committee, that in the district in which I resided there is scarcely a single proprietor residing. They are all agents and overseers and attorneys. There are not above two or three proprietors of any extent in the whole district.

5754. Mr. Buxton.] Have the overseers and attorneys an interest distinct from that of the proprietor of the estate with reference to the working of the system?—They are afraid that the system will be the ruin of their situations.

5755. Sir George Grey.] You judged that they took that view of it during your experience of the first five months of the apprenticeship?—Yes.

5756. Have you any means of knowing the view they take of it now in the month of June 1836?—I have no further means than the public prints, from which I judge that they continue to go on in the same way against the system.

5757. Do you infer, from the means of information you possess, that no change has taken place in the feeling of the managers and proprietors in Jamaica, and that the same feeling exists in the same degree against the new system which did exist during the first months of the apprenticeship?—I believe it exists still. I could not exactly say as to the same degree; but from all I can hear, I believe there is not much difference.

5758. Have you any means of information but the public press?—And correspondence.

5759. And the inference you draw is, that things are not at all better than during during the first five months of the apprenticeship?—That is my view; that the people are still hostile to it.

5760. Do you think that any improvement has taken place in the working of the apprenticeship system since the first five months of the apprenticeship?—From all that I can learn and hear, I think the same feeling exists.

5761. The same feeling of hostility to the new system?—Yes.

5762. Mr. Burton.] Did any other of the magistrates in the neighbourhood of the place where you were located go on upon more amicable terms with the planters?—There were some of the magistrates, respecting whom several of the planters mentioned to me that they were getting on very well; and several of the magistrates have been complimented with services of plate and gold boxes, and things of that kind.

5763. Sir George Grey.] Will you mention the names of the magistrates who during the period you were in Jamaica were complimented with services of plate, and gold snuff-boxes?—I believe it appears in the public prints; I take this all from the public papers.

5764. There were but about 30 magistrates in the island at that time. Out of the 30 magistrates who were there in your time, can you state the names of those who were complimented with services of plate and gold snuff-boxes?—They were notorious in the papers.

5765. Can you state the names of any of them?—It was in the Kingston public papers, and committees were appointed to wait upon the gentlemen, and a service of plate was delivered lately to Colonel Colebrook in the Bahamas.

5766. Do you know what Colonel Colebrook is in the Bahamas?—He is the governor there, but he got it in consequence of his connexion by marriage. The cup was for Lieutenant Colebrook, and he died, and when the cup came out it was sent to the Bahamas to his brother-in-law.

5767. Do you give this instance as a proof of the truth of your assertion, that several of the magistrates while you were in Jamaica were complimented with services of plate and gold snuff-boxes?—They were in all the public papers.

5768. Your only information is from the public papers?—It was notorious.

5769. Has this information in the public papers met your eye since you left Jamaica or before?—Since I came home about the plate; but there was a gold snuff-box subscribed to for a magistrate while I was there.

5770. Can you mention any other instance while you were there?—I am not aware of any but those two.

5771. Mr. Burton.] Have you any objection to state the names of the persons to whom a gold snuff-box was given while you were there?—I think it was to Capt. Dillon, a special magistrate, and there was a service of plate presented also to Lieut. White, in London here.

5772. Chairman.] Was Lieut. White a special magistrate at the time when the service of plate was presented to him in London?—He was dismissed at the time.

5773. Mr. Burton.] Do you believe that service of plate was given to Lieut. White in consequence of the way in which he had performed his duty as a special magistrate?—I have no doubt of that, judging from what I read in the public prints.

5774. Upon the whole, then, are the Committee to understand that you did not consider yourself, while you were a special magistrate there, sufficiently protected in the discharge of your duty?—No, I did not.

5775. Sir George Grey.] Are those which you have mentioned the only instances of want of protection which you can give the Committee?—There are a number of minor instances that it would be troublesome to take up the time of the Committee with; but I attribute them all to the prejudice they have against the system, for to myself personally the gentlemen generally were extremely kind and hospitable.

5776. Have you stated the leading instances of the want of protection?—There are many others that I might state which I considered equally militating against my security while I was there.

5777. Mr. Burton.] What is your opinion as to the nature of the prospects of the colony when slavery shall expire?—I have been always of opinion, and I am still so, that the colony will flourish, that the whole of the West Indies will flourish and prosper.

5778. Do you mean to say that it will flourish if the negroes obtain entire and complete liberty, or do you mean to say that if there should be a system in which there should be considerable restrictions upon their freedom of labour, it would equally flourish?—I consider that it will flourish equally well when they give them entire freedom, and I conceive that even if they had got entire freedom on the 1st of August 1834, the country would have flourished.

5779. Did you observe any disposition on the part of the negroes with regard to labour which would induce you to think that other restrictions ought to be imposed upon them which are not imposed upon the labourers of Great Britain?—No; I conceive that they act just as the labourers of Great Britain, and that they are acted upon by the same stimulus.

5780. Sir George Grey.] Are you acquainted with the restrictions imposed by law upon labourers and other persons in Great Britain?—The labourers in Great Britain are free to work when they please, or not to work, and to get a reasonable hire.

5781. Are you aware of the nature of the vagrant law in Great Britain?—Yes; and we had a vagrant law in Jamaica too. In the part of Great Britain that I come from we have very little of the vagrant laws put in force; we hear very little of them in Scotland.

5782. Mr. Buxton.] Do you believe that the negroes are as likely to work well for wages as the inhabitants of Scotland?—I think they are.

5783. Had you any opportunity of observing what was the condition of the free children?—Their condition was very bad, because they have no provision made for them by law, under six years of age, and their parents would not consent to apprentice any of them; they would rather have them die than apprentice them.

5784. Sir George Grey.] You mean that there was no provision made by law?—No provision by law, except they are apprenticed, and the parents said frequently they would rather see them dead than have them apprenticed.

5785. Mr. Buxton.] Do you consider that the universal reluctance of the parents to apprenticing their children shows the detestation in which they had previously held slavery?—I do think so.

5786. You are not a convert to the doctrine that the negroes like slavery better than freedom?—No; they would hail liberty I believe with great joy.

5787. Have you had an opportunity of looking into the gaols upon the estates where the negroes are occasionally imprisoned?—I had an opportunity in one instance casually to go to what is called the stocks-room, and on going into the stocks-room I found there was a hole in the floor, where I believe they confined people below; I inquired where the stocks were, but there were no stocks there; but against the wall I saw a large instrument put up, with a bolt of iron across and shackles on it, where the prisoners should be in a standing position, without being able to sit down. I considered it an instrument contrary to law, and I ordered that it should be immediately removed. I considered it my duty to send a model of the instrument and a report of it to his excellency the governor, and I heard no more of it. I had no complaint of anybody being put into that instrument.

5788. Did you find any difficulty in getting access to the gaols in your district?—Orders were given to build new cells, but none were built; offenders were confined in the old stocks-room.

5789. Did you find any difficulty in getting at the stocks-room?—No.

5790. Sir George Grey.] Did you entertain the slightest doubt as to your right to go there?—I considered it my right and my duty to go there.

5791. Did you, in fact, exercise that right without difficulty?—I did.

5792. Mr. Buxton.] Did you find that those cells were places suited for the confinement of human beings?—They were very unsuitable, especially in that climate.

5793. Did the negroes make any complaint to you, that, wishing to purchase the term of their apprenticeship, the appraisement was placed so high as to disable them from doing it?—A number of people applied to me to purchase their freedom; several people managed to get purchased; others again preferred remaining as they were. I had along with myself two other magistrates in making the appraisements, and they certainly made them higher than I would agree to.

5794. Supposing that two local magistrates and yourself met together for the purpose of forming an appraisement, was it decided by the majority of votes, or how was it decided?—We estimated according to our individual opinion of the value of the hire during the term of the apprenticeship, then, adding the amounts of each estimate, divided it by three, to give the average; and from the result made a deduction for casualties.

5795. What extent of deduction?—The amended Act spoke of that more clearly, but it is now disallowed; we used to allow 20 per cent. deduction for casualties.

5796. Sir George Grey.] Did not the Act require one-third?—The amended Act did so, which came into operation a little before I came away.

5797. Mr. Gladstone.] Did it appear to you that the negroes ever came for the mere purpose of being valued for curiosity, or that they had always in view the practical object of obtaining their freedom?—They had always in view the practical object of obtaining their freedom.

5798. Sir George Grey.] Can you state the number of valuations in your district during the five months you were acting as magistrate?—Very few in my district; not more than six altogether were emancipated.

5799. Can you state the number that were valued, but who have remained apprentices?—When they got a notion of what the prices would be, they remained at their labour; they only inquired of me if I could give them an idea of what the money would come to, and when it came to a certain sum they would return back again; and I often advised them that, if they were with comfortable masters, they had better remain as they were, and they would have money at the end of the apprenticeship to buy a little property with.

5800. Then in many of those cases no actual valuation took place, but they merely requested you to give them your opinion as to the price?—There was no actual valuation.

5801. You mean there were no cases of actual valuations made by three magistrates in which the apprentices did not pay the money?—I think there was one woman that would not pay the money; she said it was too high, and more than she possessed.

5802. Then only seven valuations actually took place in your district?—Yes.

5803. Mr. Buxton.] But the applications were numerous?—The applications were numerous as to the price they would be charged.

5804. Chairman.] Do you think it is a common case for the negroes who possess some money to prefer keeping that money to lay out at the expiration of the apprenticeship rather than employ it in purchasing their own immediate freedom?—Where they are well used they would prefer remaining as they are, and to keep the money to the end of the apprenticeship. In general where the freedom was purchased it was where the employers were not upon a good understanding with the negroes.

5805. Mr. Buxton.] Have you any knowledge of the administration of justice in the courts in Jamaica?—I have not much knowledge of the courts. There were a number of people tried.

5806. Did you attend those trials?—I did, casually.

5807. Can you speak as to the feeling of the House of Assembly with regard to the system of apprenticeship?—They appeared very hostile to it.

5808. Mr. Gladstone.] You have said you did not see any symptoms of improvement during your stay in Jamaica as regards the working of the apprenticeship system; did you infer or consider from what you saw that no improvement was likely to take place?—I cannot say for the future; but while I was there, there appeared to be no improvement.

5809. Mr. Buxton.] Did you consider that the medical treatment of the negroes upon the estates was such as it ought to have been?—No; the medical treatment was not so good as it ought to be; but it is not the medical treatment alone, but the nourishment and the different things necessary along with medicine, that I had often my fears about.

5810. Did the females in the field work the same number of hours and perform the same quantity of labour with the males?—They did; they used formerly to allow them some time, but since the time of apprenticeship they appear to take that away from them, and they call their names over in the list along with the others. Several of the apprentices made complaints upon that subject; but not having any law upon the subject, I could not do anything further than to advise the people to get on with the work and to give satisfaction.

Mr. Melmoth Hall, called in; and Examined.

5811. Chairman.] WHEN did you leave Jamaica?—On the 27th of March last. Mr. Melmoth Hall.

5812. How long have you lived there?—All my life.

5813. Were you a planter there?—No; I possess a small place in St. Andrew's, but I am not a planter. I have been clerk to my uncle, who is a sugar refiner in Kingston.

0.58.

5814. Have

Mr. Melmoth Hall.

2 August 1836.

5814. Have you been in the habit of residing upon plantations and of acquiring any practical knowledge of the manner in which they are conducted?—I have visited them occasionally from time to time; I visited the parish of Vere just before I left.

5815. Are you a magistrate?—No.

5816. Mr. Burton.] During the time that you had an opportunity of observing the working of the system of apprenticeship, did you see that the negroes were employed to do the same quantity of work, and were employed during the same number of hours that they had been during the time that they were slaves?—Yes, I had, on three estates in Vere, Greenwich, Hillside and Basilletta.

5817. What was the number of negroes on those?—On Hillside about 4,000, on Basilletta about 200, and on Greenwich I am not aware.

5818. Chairman.] What opportunities had you of observing what went on upon the estates?—By stopping there for a few days.

5819. Are you able to say that they did the same quantity of labour that they had done without remuneration?—They received remuneration.

5820. Mr. Burton.] Will you state to the Committee the number of hours that the negro was employed, beginning with Monday morning?—They were employed from six o'clock in the morning till six the next, by spells.

5821. How many hours a piece did they work?—About six hours in each spell.

5822. How many spells had they?—I think they had a spell every six hours.

5823. Then, in fact, in the 24 hours they work 12?—They did.

5824. Had they the same upon the Tuesday?—Yes; they are going on with the old system. I expressed my astonishment at it, and the overseer said, "We pay them for this 1 s. 6 d. a week;" and I saw them receive it on the Monday morning.

5825. Did they do this upon the Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday?—Yes.

5826. On the Friday was the same system continued?—The same system until Saturday evening.

5827. So that they worked 12 hours a day during the whole time?—Yes.

5828. What was the remuneration they received?—They received 1 s. 6 d. sterling, or 2 s. 6 d. currency.

5829. Do you consider that that 1 s. 6 d. was all the remuneration which they received for the time which belonged to themselves?—I was told so by the overseers.

5830. Were they at liberty to take it or to refuse the 1 s. 6 d., and so to reserve to themselves the extra time?—Quite so; the law allowed them to do so. I expressed my surprise at seeing them work during the night, and I was told they were doing so; it was during crop-time.

5831. Mr. Gladstone.] Do you mean the Committee to understand that each of those negroes worked 72 hours during the week?—Yes.

5832. Sir George Grey.] How long were you upon the estate?—I was in the parish three weeks.

5833. How long were you upon those estates?—Four or five days upon Hillside.

5834. What you have stated was the result of information given to you by the overseer?—Yes, and of what I saw myself. I saw that there was work during the night, and then, in the course of conversation, the overseer told me that, and on Sunday morning I saw them come and receive the money.

5835. Chairman.] Do you know whether it was the habit of the negroes to work for wages for their master in their own time at other periods of the year besides crop-time?—I am not aware of it.

5836. Sir George Grey.] Who was the special magistrate in that district?—Mr. Nolan.

5837. Did you ask whether he had sanctioned the agreement under which the negroes were working for hire?—No, I did not; they did not seem to wish to have much to say about the stipendiary magistrate.

5838. Did you ask for the particulars of the agreement under which they were working?—No, I made no particular inquiries about it.

5839. Chairman.] Did the negroes seem satisfied?—Quite.

5840. Mr. Gladstone.] You say that the negroes did not seem to wish to have much to say about the stipendiary magistrate?—They seemed to express a dislike to having anything to do with the stipendiary magistrate.

5840*. Does the statement you have made refer to one of the estates or to the three?—To the three.

5841. Does

5841. Does the amount of 2s. 6d. currency for wages refer to negroes of the best class or to the whole?—I should imagine it must refer to the best class; they appeared to be respectable, decent people.

5842. Mr. Baines.] That remuneration is in addition to the food and other allowances that they receive?—Quite so; it was for the extra time.

5843. Sir George Grey.] Will you listen to this. Under the head of "Conduct and Industry," the account given of the negroes is this: "Working cheerfully and willingly for wages; giving up all their extra time for 2s. 6d. a week, and the usual allowances. Some pay at the rate of 4s. 2d., as then the apprentices work night and day as formerly, for five days in the week, and often till one o'clock on Saturdays. They are so eager to earn wages that where their extra work is not wanted on their own estate they will hire themselves from sunset till 12 to a neighbouring property for 10d. currency. The carpenter and tradesmen work regularly on Saturdays for 3s. 4d. a day, wherever they can get employment." Do you think that description would be applicable to the estates you have described under Mr. Nolan's care?—To a certain extent it would.

5844. Are you certain that 2s. 6d. currency, which you have stated they received, included Saturday's labour?—Positively so, from this conversation.

5845. From this statement it appears that it only included five days, but your opinion is that it included six?—Yes; because I saw them at work upon the Saturday evening, and come for the money on the Sunday morning.

5846. Did you see the whole of them at work?—I saw the estate at work; the negroes generally were at work.

5847. Can you state positively that none of them received at the rate of 4s. 2d.?—None.

5848. Did you so closely inspect the payment of the wages as to be able to state that no one negro upon that estate received 4s. 2d. per week?—I got up in the morning with the overseer; the negroes came up, and to each he gave 2s. 6d., taking off their names as they came up. I cannot say that they did not receive more; but I only state what I saw.

5849. Chairman.] Were you ever yourself personally concerned in the management of a plantation in Jamaica?—No.

5850. Mr. Buxton.] Do you know an estate called Happy Grove, in the parish of St. Andrew's?—I have heard of it; but I do not know anything as to the management of it.

5851. Sir George Grey.] Mr. Nolan in his report states, "The hiring system answers so well, that besides keeping the mills continually about, they can in many cases appropriate four afternoons each week to the cultivation of the estates." Are you able to state that that account is incorrect?—I do not think it is incorrect.

5852. He states that in many instances the negroes can appropriate four afternoons each week to the cultivation of the estates. Surely that would be inconsistent with their working night and day?—It is only crop-time that I am speaking of.

5853. But this is under crop?—I do not suppose that two estates are managed in the same way.

5854. Have you any reason to suppose that the system upon those estates was one that the negroes objected to?—No.

5855. Did you hear any complaints upon their part?—Not the least; indeed, they said that the negroes seemed to have a desire upon those estates that no stipendiary magistrate should be sent for.

5856. Did you hear that sentiment expressed by the negroes themselves?—I did; I heard it expressed in a particular instance. One of the negroes being tipsy, the owner of them was a good deal annoyed, and upon his threatening to send for the stipendiary magistrate, I heard them say, "Oh, do not send for him; we do not want any magistrate here."

5857. Mr. Baines.] That was the tipsy negro?—No; the other negroes.

5858. Sir George Grey.] Did you observe whether the plough was used upon that estate?—There were no ploughs used upon those estates.

5859. Is it an estate in the parish of Vere that you were speaking of?—Yes, the parish of Vere.

5860. Mr. Nolan states in his report that the plough was used with great success. Did you observe the mode of cultivation sufficiently to state whether that was the case?—I was there during crop-time, and they were not then planting canes.

5861. Mr. Gladstone.] Are you aware of any case in which it was ever attempted

Mr. Melmoth Hall. attempted to exact more than nine hours' labour during the day from the negroes without wages?—I do not think the negroes would do it.

2 August 1836. 5862. Are you aware of the attempt ever having been made?—No.

Sir George Grey, Bart., a Member of the Committee, Examined.

Sir G. Grey, Bart.
M.P.

5863. Chairman.] DO you wish to add anything to your evidence upon the former day?—Since I was examined upon Saturday I have had an extract made from the votes of the House of Assembly of Jamaica, for the session 1835–36, of all the proceedings which have taken place with respect to education. [The same was delivered in.] I should also add, that by the mail which has arrived this morning from the West Indies, the proceedings of the last session have arrived. I have only had time to look at them very hastily; but I observe that education has formed the subject of a message from the governor, and an address from the Assembly during that session. With regard also to female punishment, a despatch has been received by this mail from Lord Sligo, of the 13th of June 1836, by which it appears that that subject has been under the consideration of the House of Assembly during the late session. Lord Sligo states, “In consequence of the debates of the House of Assembly respecting the whipping of females, being conscious that it had been carried on to a greater extent than I have been able to ascertain, I determined that close inquiries should be made on the subject; I therefore prepared a circular to the special magistrates in whose districts the workhouses were, but before they were sent off a message from the House, requesting a return of them, was sent over to me; and afforded me a means of making a more accurate and successful inquiry, as when stated to be by orders of the House, less opposition could be made by the supervisors.” The address of the House of Assembly is dated the 3d of June 1836, and is in these terms: “We are ordered by the House to wait on your Excellency, and to request that you would be pleased to send down to the House the particulars of all cases of whipping females which have come within your Excellency’s knowledge since the Abolition Act came into operation; specifying the names of the persons by whom committed, and the punishment, if any, inflicted on the offenders.” Lord Sligo goes on to state that he inclosed in his answer to this address the particulars of 24 cases which had been reported to him since the passing of the Abolition Act. A subsequent message was afterwards sent by Lord Sligo to the Assembly, relative to some further particulars of the same nature in the St. Catherine’s house of correction, and which had subsequently come to his knowledge. I am not aware yet what proceedings were taken by the House of Assembly in consequence of this information being communicated to them, in answer to their address. With regard to the workhouses, I find that, in consequence of a circular despatch of the 18th of November 1835, from Lord Glenelg, a return was sent of all the gaols and houses of correction existing in Jamaica, and the rules and regulations under which they are carried on, which if the Committee wish to have, I will deliver in. [The same was delivered in.] With reference to the general state of the island, Lord Sligo states in a despatch, also received this morning, dated the 23d June 1836, “In making to you my usual report on the general state of the island, I have nothing to add to my recent representations that tranquillity and good conduct prevail generally among the negroes. The unusually heavy rains which have prevailed since the departure of the last packet have much retarded the progress of the crop; I fear that it will not be entirely finished till the end of August. The great floods which have ensued have destroyed whole fields of canes.” With regard to classification he states, with reference to the steps which he had taken on this subject, “It has been proceeding rapidly, but as I have in no manner forced the thing, many who refused at first have now intimated their approbation of it. Far from unsettling the minds of the negroes, I am told that it has had precisely the contrary effect, as the negroes now feel that their overseers cannot impose upon them. I have a vast many refusals, and several assents from those who at first refused. There are not a dozen cases undetermined in all that has been done, and not one difference of opinion between the manager and the magistrate; but several will, I dare say, be found on the estates of those who have refused. Those who have acceded, fearing nothing, have had it done, and they will reap the fruits of it. I wish that the proprietors would write out from home to have it done on all their estates.” He afterwards adverts again to the system of undue valuation, and mentions some cases in which he had written for explanations, which he had not then received. As an enclosure to this despatch Lord Sligo has sent several documents; one is a return which which had been sent to the House of Assembly of the number of apprentices who had been valued for the remainder of their apprenticeship, between the 1st August 1834 and the 31st May 1836. It appears that the number valued, and whose manumission had been effected, was 998, at an aggregate amount of 33,988*l.* 5*s.* 4½*d.*, which had been paid, averaging 34*l.* each; 624 had been valued at the aggregate sum of 29,455*l.* 1*s.* 1½*d.*, which had not been paid, averaging 47*l.* a piece. So that it appears that those which are not paid average considerably higher than those which had been paid. He also encloses another document, as containing a most satisfactory instance of industry among the negroes. He appears to have received a written statement of the wages earned by the negroes upon a particular estate. He sent this to the special magistrate of the district, Mr. Hulme, to ascertain whether it was correct. I will deliver in a copy of the statement of Mr. Hulme's letter.

Sir G. Grey, bart.
M.P.

2 August 1836.

[The same was delivered in and read, as follows:]

17th May 1836.

1st Fact. Kew estate, Saturday 14.—The overseer had called over his list in the field, when an apprentice not connected with the property came and asked to dig cane-holes; the reply was, "We give 3*s.* 4*d.* per hundred; go if you choose;" and the man went. In the evening the man returned and was paid by daylight, long before dark, so that he could not have worked more than 10 hours, (even though he had not taken any time for meals,) yet he received 8*s.* 4*d.*, having dug 250 holes.

2d. Same estate and day.—An apprentice not connected with the property, having worked on his own estate his four and half hours, came to dig cane-holes. He could not have commenced before 12 o'clock, and being paid with the former apprentice, he could not have worked so late as six p. m., yet he received 4*s.* 2*d.*, having dug 126 holes.

3d. Same estate and day.—An apprentice belonging to the estate finished his full day's task, (20 feet of trench, 2 feet broad and 2 feet deep,) and then desired to dig cane-holes for himself. He was also paid with the others, and received 3*s.* 4*d.*, having dug 100 cane-holes.

My Lord,

Chelsea, Lucea, 31 May 1836.

I beg to return the enclosed paper, and have to state, for your Excellency's information, that with regard to the 1st Fact, the occurrence alluded to took place on Friday the 13th, and not Saturday. Fact 2d, quite correct. Fact 3d. The apprentice does not belong to the estate, but he performed the work exactly as it is stated. It may not, perhaps, be deemed superfluous for me to add, that several of the estate people and jobbers employed on the estate have dug from 150 to 200 cane-holes in their meal-times alone during the last week, and without devoting any part of their half Friday or Saturday to them.

I have, &c.

(signed) J. R. Hulme, Special Justice.

5864. Mr. Burton.] Have you received any further accounts of the punishments inflicted upon the negroes?—We receive every month a summary of punishments inflicted upon the apprentices. They are comprised in what are called Tables A. and B.; Table B., in the last column, ought to state the maximum of any mode of punishment besides that of whipping and of confinement, for which there are two separate columns. It is however stated that in Jamaica it is very difficult to insert in Table B. the maximum of any one mode of punishment inflicted by any special magistrate throughout the island, because it would not, in fact, afford any means of judging as to the severity; and a reference is therefore made to Table A., which contains the number and nature of the punishments inflicted by each special magistrate. The maximum, which would be inserted in Table B., is the extension of the apprenticeship; a punishment imposed under a clause in our own Act in the case of runaways, and distinct from ordinary punishments. If a negro had been a runaway from the 1st of August to the present time, he would be liable by our own Act to an extension of the apprenticeship for a similar period. With regard to the subtraction of time, the last column in Table A. for the month of May contains the following list of punishments of this nature: "To repay 30½ days, to repay 59 days, 10 days, eight days, 14 days, 20 days, four days, 14 days, 310 days, two months' labour, 10 days, eight days, 84 days, four days, 17 days, four days, four months, 18 days, 14 days, six days." Those which I have now stated comprise the maximum punishments of this nature inflicted by any special magistrate during that month. Now, in these cases, with the exception of one which is two months' labour, I observe they are all repayments; and I infer that they have been imposed to make up the time which has been lost to the estate by the absence of the apprentice, or by his neglecting to perform the required amount of labour during the period of the legal hours of work. There are other cases of extension of the apprenticeship, apprenticeship, which expressly apply to runaways who have been absent from the estate the whole of the time, and which come under a distinct head.

5865. Do you know how many instances there are of negroes whose apprenticeship has been extended beyond the year 1840?—No; but it could be ascertained in Jamaica. I find in the report of Mr. Baynes, a special magistrate, some observations which appear to me important, with reference to this description of punishment. Lord Sligo has discountenanced as much as possible, and I think very rightly, corporal punishment. Mr. Baynes seems to have felt the difficulty of finding any punishment really effective and free from objection. He states, with regard to repayment of time, “I have long since discovered that the amercing in time of the ill-disposed and refractory, either generally or individually, is almost useless. When they are determined and obstinate, as on some estates, sentences of this description are totally inefficient, and entirely disregarded by them. For instance a man runs away, is absent for four months, and thus has to repay 85 working days; or a whole gang, as is often the case, have been found, on various occasions, deficient in work to the amount of 20 days: some additional punishment, besides restitution, becomes necessary; these can only be exacted in alternate weeks, for they must have some time to cultivate their grounds, in order to procure subsistence.” This again throws light upon the practice in administering this punishment. Lord Sligo’s instructions stated that it would be generally necessary to give them alternate Saturdays for their provision-grounds when under sentences of this nature; and Mr. Baynes here states such to be the practice, and that it is only exacted in alternate weeks. Mr. Baynes proceeds to state: “In the first case, then, the offender remains nearly three years under sentence, and in the latter 60 weeks. Now this appears to the negroes, and really is, so long a prospective of punishment, that they almost despair of its termination; hence they become indifferent and callous; and knowing that every other Saturday and every Sunday, under any circumstances, must still be given to them, they will neither perform proper work in the ordinary or the forfeited hours, but content themselves, from a spirit of retaliation and revenge, even at the risk of doubling or trebling their punishments, with throwing back the work and prejudicing still further the interests of their masters.” The remedy Mr. Baynes proposes is this: “This manifest evil may be remedied, as well as corporal punishment be avoided, by the establishing of continuous penal labour for six days in the week, with close confinement on Sundays; food being provided for them, and their provision-grounds kept in order by their employer during the course of their sentence.”

5866. Is it not possible that in some cases the three kinds of punishment, flogging, the penal gangs, and the amercement of time, may be inflicted upon the same negro for the same offence?—I think by the Jamaica law it is possible to inflict more than one punishment for the same offence; in fact a punishment may be a compound punishment, as it is in some cases in England, where imprisonment with hard labour is combined with corporal punishment; but I should say that a case of excessive punishment cannot occur without its coming under the governor’s notice; because full returns are sent to him, which show the nature of the offence committed by each individual and the punishment inflicted upon him for that offence.

5867. Have you in this paper the maximum amount of time of which the negroes in Jamaica have been deprived since the apprenticeship?—Certainly not; because this paper is only the last monthly return, received this morning. No return which we have in England would enable us to give that information. With respect to the Acts of the Jamaica legislature, as to which a question was put to me yesterday, I find that the Trespass Act was passed in Jamaica on the 10th of December 1833, and is now in operation, but has not been expressly allowed, and is open to disallowance; the Fire-arms Act was passed on the 4th of July 1834; it is a limited Act, to expire in 1838, and that Act was left to its operation by an order of His Majesty in Council, dated 7th February 1835, and therefore is not open to disallowance. The Highway Act was passed on the 20th of December 1834, and this Act is still open to disallowance.

5868. Have you seen the special justices’ report contained in the Jamaica Courant of June the 4th, 1836, purporting to be an abstract of the special justices’ reports of the 28th of May, for one month, from which it appears that 4,000 lashes were inflicted in the space of a month by order of the special justices?—I have not seen that return in the newspaper, which I suppose has only just reached this country; but I have no doubt that among the arrivals which have come to-day from Jamaica there is a return of the corporal punishments inflicted by the special magistrates. The last return we have shows a great diminution, and I have every reason to suppose, from the information received from Lord Sligo, that the present return will show a still further diminution of punishments of every kind in Jamaica; the per centage upon the apprenticed population for the last month is rather below one per cent., which is less, I think, with the exception of one instance, than it has ever been since the commencement of the apprenticeship.

By the last mail a despatch was received from Lord Sligo, in answer to one addressed to him by Lord Glenelg, respecting the prosecution of Captain Oldrey. These two despatches I will deliver in.

[The same were delivered in; vide Appendix.]

MR. LABOUCHERE, IN THE CHAIR.

William Burge, Esq., called in; and further Examined.

5869. Chairman.] DO you wish to add anything to the evidence you have already given?—I do. In consequence of its appearing upon your Minutes as part of the evidence of an honourable member (Mr. Ballou), that a statement was made by Lord Sligo in his speech to the House of Assembly, on the 3d of February, in proroguing the Assembly, which represents him as having sent four messages to the House on the subject of negro education, which alleges that no measure had emanated from the House, which imputes to the House indifference on the subject, and that the House had taken no steps to make the grant of 25,000 £ available, I beg to lay before the Committee the following facts in contradiction of that statement. The House of Assembly met on the 10th of November. On the 12th of November, two days after they had met, a committee was appointed, as appears by the votes of the House, “to ascertain the best mode of instilling into the minds of the juvenile population of the peasantry religious instruction, and for the prevention of vicious habits.” A committee of nine members was appointed; and I beg leave to state that it was so constituted as to represent all the interests and views of the different classes of the community. On the 13th the House, according to its usual practice, adjourned from the Friday till the Tuesday following, the 17th. On that day a message was sent by the House to the governor, which is in the following words: “We are ordered by the House to wait on your excellency, and to request that your excellency will be pleased to put the House into possession of all such information as your excellency may have received of the measures intended to be pursued by His Majesty’s Government to provide for the moral and religious instruction of the labouring population. The House, in soliciting this information, beg to state, that the resolutions with which the Imperial Parliament introduced the Bill by which slavery in the British colonies was declared to be abolished, included a pledge to provide for the instruction of the emancipated population of the colonies, on liberal and comprehensive principles. The House, alive to the importance of early adopting measures by which the moral and religious wants of the people may be adequately provided for by some legislative enactment, is anxious to learn how far His Majesty’s Government may be prepared to make the necessary endowments for the establishment of district schools, that the inquiries to be instituted by the House into the wants of the community, and into the best measures to be adopted for meeting those wants, may be directed by the views which His Majesty’s Government may have taken of the subject, and the nature of the provision they may be prepared with to meet it.” On the 16th of December, the committee appointed, as I have previously stated, made a report to this effect, “That for the purpose of providing district schools, under the sanction of His Majesty’s Government, it will be necessary that the parishes of this island should be divided into districts of a smaller extent, and that a school should be established in each district, to be conducted upon liberal and comprehensive principles. Your committee are aware that this measure must be attended with a heavy expense, and therefore feel that it will be premature to bring in a Bill this session, but earnestly recommend to the House that an Act for this purpose be introduced early next session, when the House will be in possession of information as to the extent of the pecuniary support they are likely to receive from the British Government. To meet present exigencies, and to provide immediately for the wants of a population at present under little instruction or control, your committee recommend to the House that a Bill be brought in to enable proprietors to establish schools on their respective properties under proper regulations. Resolved, that the House do agree to the Report. Ordered, that Mr. Manderson, Mr. Cox, Mr. Davis, Mr. Jordan, Mr. Hilton, Mr. Panton, Mr. Farquharson, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Osborn, be a committee to prepare and bring in a Bill to enable proprietors to establish schools on their respective properties under proper regulations, agreeably to the said Report. A Bill was accordingly brought in and read the first time. From the circumstances which I have mentioned in a former part of my evidence, connected with the meeting of the House, it was impossible for the business of the session to be finished at the usual period, namely, before the Christmas holidays. It was necessary the members of the House should be on their estates during that season, and the House was under the necessity of adjourning. On the 17th of December the House, with the permission of the governor, adjourned itself until the 26th of January. On the 26th of January the House re-assembled. On that day the governor for the first time communicated to the House of Assembly the vote of 25,000*l.* made by Parliament, together with three documents, namely, Sir George Grey's letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 21st July 1835, his circular letter to the secretaries of religious societies, dated 10th Sept. 1835, and Lord Glenelg's circular despatch of the 16th Nov. 1835. The House adjourned on Friday the 29th of January to Monday the 1st of February. On that 1st of February the breach of privilege was committed by the governor, which led to the prorogation, and put an end, of course, to the business of this session. On the 24th of May the House again met. A resolution was adopted by the House on that day to revive all standing and special committees of the last session, and to proceed on the business which was before them at the time of the late prorogation. I perceive, on a reference to the Votes of the House, that on the 27th of May another member was added to the committee, to prepare and bring in a Bill to enable proprietors to establish schools on their respective properties under certain regulations. On the 1st day of June a message was sent to the governor, which is in these words, "We are ordered by the House to wait on your excellency, and to request that your excellency will be pleased to inform the House what portion of the 25,000*l.* voted by Parliament for negro education has been allotted to this island, if the money has been received, and to whom the application of it has been or is to be entrusted." That message was communicated to the governor on the 1st of June. The House, without waiting for the governor's answer, proceeded with the bill on the 7th. Mr. Manderson, from the committee, presented to the House a bill to establish schools "for affording the means of moral and religious instruction to the juvenile population of this island, and for promoting industrious habits," which was received and read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on the Thursday following. It was not until the 9th of June that the governor sent an answer to it. That answer consisted of replies to inquiries he had caused to be addressed to the secretaries of different religious societies: "I am commanded by his Excellency the governor to lay before the House the replies which had been furnished to his excellency's inquiries as to what portion of the 25,000*l.* voted by Parliament for negro education has been allotted to this island, if the money has been received, and to whom the application of it has been entrusted, pursuant to the second message of the Assembly of the 1st instant. His excellency begs to add, that it has been recently communicated to him by Lord Glenelg, that the whole of that money had been allotted, but an expectation was held out that another grant would be made during the present sitting of Parliament, in furtherance of the object for which the original sum was voted." One of the letters accompanying the message is a letter from Mr. Thorborn, who, I suppose, belongs to some society, in which he says, "In answer to yours of the 2d, I have to state, that I have not received any portion of the 25,000*l.* voted by the Parliament for negro education, and that I have no expectation of deriving any benefit from that fund." Another letter is from Mr. Tinson, in which he states, "I am not aware that our society in England have availed themselves of the sum of money voted by Government for educational purposes; they had not at the date of my last communication, but I then learnt that grants had had been made by Government on behalf of schools in this island, under the superintendence of some of our missionaries, to the amount of 1,000*l.* sterling. Whether or not these grants had been made on the recommendation of your Lordship I cannot say; but I should think, from the date of the letter, they must have been made prior to those applications." There is also a letter from Mr. Reed, the secretary to the bishop, which is as follows: "I am directed by the bishop to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, and in reply to acquaint you, for the information of his excellency the governor, that out of the 25,000*l.* voted by Parliament, 2,000*l.* was obtained by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, on the conditions contained in Sir George Grey's circular to the various religious societies in England, and apportioned to this diocese; that the above-mentioned sum (2,000*l.*) has been long since received by the bishop, and allotted by his Lordship to several parishes, to be applied to the sole purpose of building school-houses; but that no parish can avail itself of the grant without first complying with the terms required by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel." The next is from the Wesleyan Missionaries, in which they state, "In this island our commencement has been but recent, we are authorized however to draw upon our treasurer immediately to the amount of 2,300*l.* sterling for eight schools, and I have reason to think that our treasurer has received, or will receive upon application, two-thirds of that amount, viz. 1,533*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* for our school-rooms in Jamaica." The other letter is from Mr. Blyth, who represents the Presbyterian church in Jamaica; he says, "I regret my inability to give a satisfactory reply to your communication, No. 3472. About two months since I received information that the committee of the Scottish Missionary Society proposed to secure 2,000*l.* of the sum voted by Parliament by raising another 1,000*l.*, and that, should this arrangement be carried into effect, the 3,000*l.* would be divided among their agents for building school-houses. I have, however, received no further information on the subject, and fear that the committee have either not made the above proposal to Government, or that the 25,000*l.* had previously been expended; I may therefore safely state that none of us have as yet got any portion of the grant, and that we have very little hope of obtaining any. As our society does not assist us in supporting schools, we have only been able to establish one at each station, instead of three or four, which are required." From this answer of the governor on the 9th, it is not easy to collect what sum had been allotted to Jamaica. But it is quite clear what had been allotted had been already appropriated; that the appropriation had been made without any reference to the Assembly. It was no longer possible that the Bill could operate on the allotment, because it had been already made, and it had been made too without any previous communication whatever with the Assembly, and of course without affording them the means of concurring in that arrangement. But to show the perfectly bonâ fide disposition on the part of the Legislature to contribute to the great measure of education amongst all classes in the colony, the House, on the 9th of June, before they received the governor's message, read the Bill a second time, and it was ordered to be committed. But it is right the Committee should know, that although it was evident, after the governor's message, this Bill could have no influence in rendering available any part of the 25,000*l.*, and which it was made, by Lord Sligo in his speech of the 3d February, a matter of reproach the House had taken no step to make available, and that therefore, upon the prorogation which took place a few days after this message, no Act had been passed, yet without any Act the Assembly voted a considerable sum of money in aid of religious and moral instruction. I will take the liberty of reading the several grants made by the House for this purpose before its prorogation on the 15th of June. I believe it will be found they are quite equal to any aid which the colony has received from England for this purpose. The Committee should be informed that the rectors and curates of Jamaica are paid by the colony. The amount of the stipends which the colony pays to them is more than 19,000*l.*; and in addition to this sum at least 10,000*l.* more is provided by the different parishes.

5870. Sir George Grey.] Do you know by whom the bishop of Jamaica is paid?
—By this country.

5871. Do you know by whom the archdeacon is paid?—The archdeacon is paid by this country.

5872. Have you any stipendiary clergymen except curates paid by the island?
—The rectors and stipendiary curates are paid by the island. I have before me the votes by which those salaries and stipends are directed to be paid.

Wm. Burge, Esq.

5 August 1836.

5873. Are you aware of the contents of the Act of Parliament for the appointment of the bishop?—Perfectly.

5874. Do you know what proportion of the sum charged on the consolidated fund by that Act is raised in Jamaica?—That will appear on reference to the Act; the Act specifies the sum, on a comparison with the sums I have stated to be annually paid by Jamaica to the clergy. The salary of 4,000*l.* a year is paid to the bishop, and that to the archdeacon is provided for under that Act; and I know there is a provision made in that Act for defraying the stipends of a class of curates who may be sent from hence, but they are perfectly independent of the curates of the island.

5875. You are aware that there are stipendiary curates in the island who, in addition to the bishop and the archdeacon, receive their salaries from this country?—There are some few; but my statement of the expense does not refer to them, but to the great body of the clergy of the island; when I state the sum exceeding 19,000*l.* paid, I refer to those only of the clergy who are provided for by the colony.

5876. You did not intend to state that the whole clerical establishment of the island was defrayed by the island?—Certainly not; I know there are some curates who are provided and paid from hence. I was about to call the attention of the Committee to the votes to different parishes in aid of chapels and schools: “Magistrates and vestry, Portland Chapel, Ferry Hill, 300*l.*; Magistrates, &c., St. Mary Chapel, at New Town, Middlesex, 500*l.*; Chapel, near Ginger and Ugly rivers, 350*l.*; Chapel near Yallah’s river, 350*l.*; Custos, &c., St. Katherine, for chapel, Caymana’s district, 500*l.*; ditto Westmoreland, for two chapels and school-rooms, 500*l.*; ditto, St. James, for chapel of ease, Montego Bay, 500*l.*; members of Kingston, in support of Union School, 300*l.*; ditto, for chapel and school-room, East End, 1,000*l.*; members, Kingston and St. Andrew, and Scotch minister in aid, 700*l.*; ditto, Trelawny and Scotch minister in aid, 400*l.*; Presbyterian Institution, Kingston, 300*l.*; Roman-catholic chapel, 300*l.*”

5877. Mr. Gladstone.] Are those contributions by the Assembly in aid of local subscriptions?—In aid of parochial contributions, and very probably private contributions also. There are large contributions by individuals in Jamaica.

5878. Do you mean parochial contributions by way of assessment upon the parishes?—Yes.

5879. Can you give the Committee the amount voted?—Clergy’s stipends, 11,718*l.*; curates’ stipends, 9,000*l.*, and the various grants which I have read from the Votes amount to 6,400*l.* more.

5880. Sir George Grey.] Were those sums voted in the session just concluded?—Yes.

5881. Were there any of those voted for education in connexion with schools belonging to dissenting societies or bodies in Jamaica?—My impression is, those are establishments which are exclusively connected with the Church of England and the Church of Scotland, and there is a contribution to a Roman-catholic chapel, I see.

5882. At the date of the message of the 1st of June, to which you have referred, are you aware whether the Assembly had received a copy of the communications addressed by Lord Glenelg to Lord Sligo, containing information of the plan upon which it had been determined to appropriate the 25,000*l.*, voted by Parliament last year for negro education?—There are only two communications which I am able to find in the Votes, namely, the one I mentioned as having been made by the governor on the 26th of January, and the communication made by the governor in answer to the application made to him by the House, to know what proportion of the 25,000*l.* was allotted to the island of Jamaica.

5883. Previously to that period had the governor communicated to the Assembly a despatch from Lord Glenelg, informing him of the system on which it had been determined to appropriate the 25,000*l.* voted last year for negro education?—I have looked through these Votes for all the information I could find upon the subject of the communications of Government. It is possible that if there was any other despatch which accompanied the first message, and which I have not referred to in my preceding answer, it is in the Appendix, but I have not got the Appendix to the Votes; it has not been sent home.

5884. Have you the means of knowing whether the Assembly at the present moment are aware of the system on which the Government determined to appropriate the 25,000*l.* voted last year?—I have not any means of knowing, or grounds for for supposing, that the House is in possession of any other information than that which the governor communicated in the messages to which I have referred. I was not aware till I came into this committee-room the other day of the specific allotment to Jamaica.

5885. Are you in the habit of sending to Jamaica, in your capacity of agent to the island, Parliamentary papers relating to the West India colonies?—Yes, I am; and I sent the paper respecting the appropriation as soon as I obtained it from the printer; but it is subsequent to the meeting or the prorogation of the House that the paper would arrive.

5886. Are you aware that, with the Estimates of last year, printed in July 1835, the correspondence between the Colonial Department and the Treasury was inserted as explanatory of the system on which it had been determined to appropriate that money?—I was not aware of those Estimates containing it; the moment I was aware of the vote of Parliament I communicated it.

5887. You were aware that 25,000 l. was voted last year, but you were not aware, till you saw the paper printed in the present session, of the appropriation of it?—No; I was not aware of the sum appropriated to Jamaica.

5888. Mr. Buxton.] How much money has been voted exclusively for the promotion of negro education since the 1st of August 1834?—I am not aware that in the session of 1834 any specific grant was made for this purpose. In the only complete session which has since been held, the sum was granted which I have stated. But although the island may not have granted out of the public purse in 1834 any sums for this purpose, yet large contributions by individuals have been and continue to be made to promote education amongst all classes. I know that the desire to promote this object is entertained by the legislature of Jamaica as well as by individuals. I wish to add, on the subject of religious education, so long ago as the year 1834 a memorial of the House of Assembly to His Majesty contained the following application: “We pray that Your Majesty will be pleased to grant your royal letters patent directing briefs to be issued throughout all England and Wales in aid of the church establishment, and for building additional chapels in this island.” I wish that when the King’s letter, read in the churches, whilst it contained that it had been granted on the application of His Majesty’s subjects in England, had also added that of His Majesty’s subjects in the colony. This letter was asked for by the Assembly of Jamaica, and I brought this subject under the consideration of the Bishop of London at one of the meetings of the Society for the Conversion of the Negroes.

5889. Chairman.] Is there any other subject to which you wish to advert?—As the number of witnesses whom I can produce must necessarily be very limited, for it has not been in the power of persons to come purposely from Jamaica to give evidence, and those who have been brought forward have been persons accidentally here resident in different parts of the island, I am desirous of putting upon the Minutes a statement of those proceedings of the House which completely rebut the inference which has been drawn by some witnesses, and which they desire should be drawn by the Committee, that there was a desire on the part of the Assembly to evade, or defeat, or obstruct, the measure of emancipation, the Abolition Act. It appears by the proceedings of the last session which met on the 24th of May, that on the succeeding day, the 25th, a Bill was introduced for the purpose of reviving the Act in Aid; that it was read a second time on the 26th, and committed; on the 27th, the day following, passed and sent to the council; that on the 30th, the day to which the House was adjourned, the Bill was assented to by the Governor. Upon a former occasion, when I stated a disclaimer on the part of the Assembly of any such intention as that which had been unjustly imputed to that body, I was reminded that that disclaimer proceeded not from the Assembly as a legislative body, but from the committee of correspondence, although there were the same persons composing both bodies. I am now enabled to put before the Committee the most authoritative disclaimer by the Assembly of any such intention, by delivering in, as I now do, a copy of the Memorial to His Majesty, agreed to without a dissentient voice by the legislature of Jamaica, which, in obedience to the directions of the House, I presented to His Majesty on Wednesday. I will read the following passages: “The House next met on the 4th of August 1835, when feeling themselves compelled by what they saw passing before their eyes, to express a decidedly opposite opinion to that put forward in the governor’s opening speech, of the flourishing condition and flattering prospects of the colony, his excellency was pleased immediately to dissolve the House on the 10th of the same month. Up to this period, therefore, therefore, we humbly contend, that the proceedings of the Assembly had shown no desire to impede or retard the great measure of emancipation, nor had Your Majesty's representative then intimated to us that any such aim was imputed; but while we anticipated that, in the words of Lord Mulgrave, 'the great objects to the colonial interests of compensation being once secured, through a compliance of the legislature with the terms annexed, His Majesty's Government would be disposed to place the most candid and liberal construction upon any supplemental Acts which might be passed, provided that they bore upon the face of them a real and sincere desire to act up to the spirit and intention of the British Parliament and people;' nor did His Majesty's Government (as that noble Lord assured us) wish to fetter in any respect that discretion as to the execution of the details of all these measures which had been wisely vested in the colonial legislature, and for which their local knowledge and practical experience gave them peculiar advantages. We are grieved to find that, even previous to our meeting in November 1835, the minds of Your Majesty's advisers had been induced to expect an intentional abandonment of the compact on our part, that a presumed case of guilt had been anticipated, and punishment invoked; for we find in Lord Glenelg's despatch of date 23d of October 1835, laid on the table of the House of Commons, that Your Majesty's Ministers had been made to understand, that the general scope of our policy was to defeat or retard the progress of the great measure of emancipation; and that this aim was still attributed to us, whether our supposed design was to refuse the revival of the expiring Act in Aid, or to embarrass the magistracy, or to refuse the necessary funds for supporting the principal officers of the local government, or to withhold a proper police bill, or to exclude Your Majesty's representative from the correspondence of the Colonial-agent. We ask your attention, Sire, to the fact, that at the time this aim was attributed to us, no necessity existed for renewing the provisions of the Act in Aid, as that Act would not expire till December 1835. That such an aim ever actuated our minds, we unequivocally, and in the most solemn manner, collectively and individually deny; and we therefore are at a loss to conceive what could have induced Your Majesty's representative to say advisedly that the remedy must come from home. The new Assembly met on the 10th November 1835, and on the very next day, amongst the other expiring laws taken up to be renewed, a committee was appointed by the House to bring in a Bill to renew the Act in Aid of the Abolition Act." In another part they say, "The House are deeply sensible how extremely difficult it will be even for them, with the fullest knowledge of the state of society, to provide laws and regulations which, under Providence, may be the means of guiding the colony safely through the great approaching change; but if in addition to the many other almost insurmountable difficulties which present themselves, the two classes which divide society, are to continue to be viewed and treated as the oppressors and the oppressed; if the one class is to be distrusted, and the other specially favoured, and if the laws passed by the legislature of the colony are to be viewed through this medium, and sanctioned or rejected as they shall suit those views, then indeed is there little hope for the colony. But the House have more confidence in Your Majesty's Government than to suppose that it will pursue a course so ruinous to the island, and so injurious to the mother country itself. The Assembly of Jamaica beg leave, with all humility and truth, to assure your most gracious Majesty, that it will be their most anxious desire, as it is their duty and their interest, to promote by every means in their power the prosperity of this important colony; and to guide to a successful termination, if it be possible, that great national measure of humanity for which so large a sacrifice has been made, and in which they and their constituents are so deeply interested."

Wm. Burge, Esq.

5 August 1836.

5890. Sir George Grey.] What is the date of that memorial?—The 14th of June.

5891. Was a copy of that memorial communicated to the Governor of Jamaica before it was transmitted to you for presentation to His Majesty?—No, nor is that usual. The governor has a copy of these votes sent to him every day, in which he would see this memorial set forth.

5892. Are you aware whether that memorial was printed in the Votes before it was transmitted to you for presentation to His Majesty?—Necessarily so, as part of the proceedings of the day on which the memorial was agreed to by the House. I hold in my hands the Votes as they were daily printed. This memorial is sent as part of the proceedings of the 14th of June. The House of Assembly was prorogued on the 15th of June. This vote would be delivered to the governor by 10 o'clock on that day, the 15th of June.

5893. When

5893. When did it leave Jamaica?—By the first packet which sailed after it had been voted.

5894. Do you know when that packet left Jamaica?—On or subsequently to the 25th of June, for she brought me letters of the 24th and 25th of that month.

5895. Had the governor any opportunity of making any observations on those parts of the memorial which directly affect his character and conduct previous to its being sent home?—Yes, the interval of ten days between the voting of the memorial and the sailing of the packet.

5896. With reference to the Act in Aid, does this memorial admit or deny the right of the Imperial Parliament to legislate in the mode in which they did legislate by renewing that Act in the course of the present session?—I beg leave to refer to the memorial; the House of Assembly complains of that interference by the Imperial Parliament.

5897. Does it deny the right of the Imperial Parliament to pass that Bill?—The statement is this: "We complain of the unconstitutional outrage committed upon our rights by the recent introduction of a Bill into the House of Commons to revive an Act of our legislature, entitled, 'An Act in Aid of the Abolition Act,' which had expired. We humbly submit, that no proceedings of ours have justified this invasion. We assert that all laws for internal regulation should be propounded and framed in our own House. This principle we have, from the earliest periods of our history, maintained as one of our inherent rights as British subjects, neither altered or abridged by our situation of colonists."

5898. It has been stated by a witness who was a special magistrate in Jamaica, that, having been summoned to attend a committee of the House of Assembly, and detained in attendance upon that committee, which lasted for a considerable period, at an expense to himself of 50*l.*, he applied for payment of that expense, and payment was refused?—I understood the witness to state himself to have applied to the chairman of the committee: the chairmain of a committee of the House of Assembly has no more power to order the expense of witnesses to be paid than any private individual would have. The only mode by which he could obtain the reimbursement of his expenses would be by a vote of the House of Assembly.

5899. Are you aware that special magistrates have been, in more than one instance, examined before committees of the House of Assembly, and yet to this day are unable to obtain payment of their expenses?—I am not aware whether they have been paid.

5900. Are you aware that the governor, in the course of the last session, sent a message to the Assembly upon the subject?—In reading over these Votes I see that there was a message sent to the House of Assembly respecting Mr. Lyon, a special magistrate.

5901. What was the purport of that message?—It is in these words: "I am commanded by his excellency the governor to bring down to the House the copy of a despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 23d March last, accompanied by the memorial of Mr. Lyon, to which that communication has reference;" then there is a petition of Mr. Lyon to the governor, stating his having been summoned to give evidence; and the message and the documents are ordered to lie on the table.

5902. Are you aware whether Mr. Lyon's expenses have, in point of fact, been paid?—My impression on reading the Votes is, that they have not been paid. I do not see any order made for the payment of them.

5903. Are you aware whether any proceeding took place in consequence of the message just referred to?—I do not recollect at this moment what course was taken by the House upon this message, whether it was referred to a committee, or if referred, whether there was any report; nor could I give an answer without going through those votes; but the Committee should understand that it is not the practice of the House of Assembly of Jamaica to order the payment of expenses of any witnesses who may be summoned before committees. I have known applications frequently made on the part of officers of the customs and others, who have had to come from a considerable distance, but which have been refused. It is not according to the practice of the House of Assembly to order the expenses of witnesses to be paid.

5904. Is it your opinion that, according to the practice of the House of Assembly, committees of that House would have a right to summon special justices from a distance, to detain them a considerable period, and that the magistrates should should have to look for payment of their expenses to the government of the country?—I say nothing about the place to which the magistrates should look for their indemnification on account of their expenses. If the House of Assembly and its committees possess any powers which are at all calculated to answer one of the objects for which the House of Assembly exists, they must have the right of summoning witnesses, they must exercise their discretion in the selection of the witnesses whom they summon. I know not of any ground for imputing to them an abuse of that discretion; nor for establishing an indemnity to a special magistrate in respect of his expenses as a witness, which is not afforded to any other officer who is summoned as a witness.

5 August 1836.

5905. Mr. Buxton.] Do you happen to know whether the missionaries were summoned before the committee of the House of Assembly to attend the committee on the working of the apprenticeship, and refused their expenses?—I am not aware who were the witnesses summoned by the Assembly. I can see by the report the witnesses examined, but I cannot know anything of the persons summoned as witnesses and not examined.

5906. Have you before you the address of the House of Assembly to the governor immediately before the dissolution in August last?—I have.

5907. Are you aware that, in one of the addresses of the House of Assembly to the governor, immediately previous to the last dissolution of the House of Assembly, they declare in substance, that so far from owing any obligations to this country for its grant of 20,000,000*l.* for the extinction of slavery, it was an unparalleled act of atrocity?—I do not find any such passage.

5908. Chairman.] Is there any other subject on which you are desirous of making any other statement?—On the subject of immigration. It appears to have been assumed that there has been a very great mortality among the persons who were sent to Jamaica. I believe that the mortality which did exist has been exceedingly exaggerated, and I will refer to a statement in the address of the House of Assembly in which they state the causes of that mortality. I will venture to state that which I believe to have been the cause which did produce a great mortality. It prevailed principally amongst the Germans; they had not been selected as they ought to have been, and as it was promised they should be, and as it was understood they were, from the country, and from agriculturists; but there were selected from the towns, and from mechanics, a number of persons whose occupations were wholly unsuited to the country, such as watchmakers, clockmakers, and shoemakers. They were not at all the class of persons to be sent to Jamaica. Unfortunately, I impute no motive to the Act, there was an inducement held out to those immigrants to enlist in the police, the police establishment paying them 5*s.* a day, whereas that exceeded the rate of wages per day stipulated to be paid on the part of the persons to whom they were indentured. Attracted by the larger amount of pay, they wandered about the country to seek employment in the police. The mortality took place principally in the towns. With respect to the immigrants who were sent out by individuals to different properties, those, for instance, to the Duke of Buckingham's property, and by numerous other persons within my knowledge, I have no reason to believe that any mortality took place amongst them, or in other cases where precautions had been taken to secure grounds and houses for them on their arrival; but unfortunately, in the desire to supply immigrants, some persons took them upon their estates without having made all the necessary preparations suited for them. I beg leave on this subject to read a passage from an address of the House of Assembly to the Governor, dated the 7th of August 1835, in which they say, "It gives us much concern that your excellency should have been induced to characterize the mortality amongst the immigrants as frightful; in this we apprehend your excellency must have been misinformed. The mortality which has taken place has principally occurred in the towns, where it never was intended the immigrants should be located. Your excellency may rely that provision will not only be made for the 'reception, protection,' and the due enforcement, on both sides, of the arrangements made between the immigrants and their employers, but likewise for the punishment of those who wickedly inveigle them from such employers, after they have been once located; and to which evil practice alone do we attribute the mortality and partial failure of the attempt hitherto made on immigration."

5909. Mr. Buxton.] Do you happen to know whether Mr. Barrett made appropriate accommodation for his immigrants?—I believe so.

5910. Do you happen to know anything relative to the circumstance of one of the the immigrants being found in the stocks by a special magistrate on Mr. Barrett's property?—I am not aware of such a fact. From my knowledge of Mr. Barrett I am not disposed to believe any representation of this description.

5911. Chairman.] Is there any other subject on which you wish to make any statement to the Committee?—The only remaining subject is that of the whipping of females. The Assembly, quite alive to this subject, did not suffer the statement of Lord Sligo to remain unnoticed. On the 3d of June the House sent a message to the governor, requesting that he would be pleased to send down to the House the particulars of all cases of whipping females which had come within his knowledge since the Abolition Act came into operation, specifying the names of the parties by whom committed, and the punishment, if any, inflicted upon the offenders. Six days after, that is, on the 9th of June, an answer to this message was sent by the governor, communicating “the particulars of 24 cases of female apprentices who had been reported to his excellency to have been subjected to corporal punishment since the passing of the Abolition Act.” The House immediately appointed a committee to investigate those cases and report. On the 13th of June another message was sent by the governor, communicating the particulars of other cases which had come to his knowledge subsequently to the message on the 9th; those were immediately referred to the same committee to whom the previous answer of the 9th of June had been referred, and on the following day, the 14th, the committee made the following report, which I beg leave to read. I lay before the Committee the examinations referred to in that Report. On the following day the House was prorogued.

MEMORIAL OF THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

Jamaica, ss.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty. The Humble Memorial of the Assembly.

WE, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Assembly of Jamaica, with unabated attachment to Your Majesty's person and family, and to the constitution of our country, are compelled to approach your most gracious Majesty with a representation of our complaints and grievances.

We complain of the unconstitutional outrage committed upon our rights by the recent introduction of a Bill into the House of Commons to revive an Act of our Legislature, intitled, “An Act in Aid of the Abolition Act,” which had expired. We humbly submit that no proceedings of ours have justified this invasion.

We assert “that all laws for internal regulations should be propounded and framed in our own House;” this principle we have, from the earliest periods of our history, “maintained as one of our inherent rights as British subjects, neither altered or abridged by our situation of colonists.” We contended for it in periods most inimical to freedom. We asserted it to our Sovereign's Representative, when we consented to pass the Act in 1726, for granting a perpetual revenue to Your Majesty's Predecessors, declaring “that in so doing we only adhere to the maxims of Government of the Mother Country, who could endure no laws but those of their own choosing;” it has been conceded to us by repeated declarations. This House did, in the year 1774, address an humble petition and memorial to Your Majesty's Royal Father, declaring “that your petitioners and the colonists are not, nor ought to be, bound by any other laws than such as they have themselves assented to, and not disallowed by Your Majesty,” in which sentiment this House fully coincides; and the Colonial Minister, in his despatch of 31st March 1836, while he recognizes the principle, justified the departure from it, on the ground that the right of Parliamentary interference, “usually dormant, has been unavoidably called into activity, because, in the abolition of slavery, the Assembly of Jamaica has failed to give complete execution to the design of the Supreme Legislature,” and also, “that Parliament being both the author and guarantee of the national compact, which imposed on the Assemblies the obligation of reconciling, by proper laws, the duties of the negro population with their rights as freemen, was bound to enforce by its power the performance of any part of the duty of the Assembly of Jamaica, which that body themselves may have failed to fulfil.” We passed the Abolition Act in December 1833, and when called together in July 1834, were informed by Your Majesty's Representative that “he felt great satisfaction in submitting to the House a document which so unequivocally expressed the approbation of His Majesty's Government at the measures adopted by the Legislature on the momentous question of the abolition of slavery; and, in calling the attention of the House to those parts of the Act which were mentioned in the despatch as requiring explanation rather than amendment, his Excellency cordially joined in acknowledging the merits of the framers of the Bill, and in the feeling entertained by His Majesty's Government, that its imperfections were less numerous than might reasonably have been expected, in legislating on a subject altogether new, and involving such vast interests.” With this declaration announced by Your Majesty's Representative, we imagined that the Assembly could not be deemed “to have failed in giving execution to the

the design of the Imperial Legislature, in abolishing slavery itself." In June 1834, we passed a Bill to remove the objections raised by Your Majesty's then advisers, in the sincere spirit "of reconciling, by proper laws, the duties of the negro population with their rights as freemen;" and this Bill also received the assent of the Governor.

On the next meeting of the House in November 1834, a few months after the Abolition Act had come into operation, many difficulties having been found in the working of the system, and considerable alarm pervading the colony, the House again took up the subject, and passed another Bill, containing various regulations, which were deemed necessary to the continued culture of the plantations, and which were, at the same time, in the opinion of the House, within the meaning and spirit of the British Abolition Act. The House were not singular in their opinion, for to this third Act, after the Bill had been long before the House, printed and well considered, the Governor gave his assent in December 1834. This Act was disallowed by Your Majesty, upon a Report of the Lords of the Committee of Council for Trade, dated 23d June 1835.

The House next met on the 4th August 1835, when, feeling themselves compelled, by what they saw passing before their eyes, to express a decidedly opposite opinion to that put forward in the Governor's opening speech, of the flourishing condition and flattering prospects of the colony, his Excellency was pleased immediately to dissolve the House on the 10th of the same month. Up to this period, therefore, we humbly contend, that the proceedings of the Assembly had shown no desire to impede or retard the great measure of emancipation, nor had Your Majesty's Representative then intimated to us that any such aim was imputed; but while we anticipated that, in the words of Lord Mulgrave, "the great object to the colonial interests of compensation being once secured, through a compliance of the Legislature with the terms annexed, His Majesty's Government would be disposed to place the most candid and liberal construction upon any supplemental Acts which might be passed, provided that they bore upon the face of them a real and sincere desire to act up to the spirit and intention of the British Parliament and people, nor did His Majesty's Government (as that noble Lord assured us) wish to fetter in any respect that discretion as to the execution of the details of all these measures which had been wisely vested in the colonial legislature, and for which their local knowledge and practical experience gave them peculiar advantages." We are grieved to find, that even previous to our meeting in November 1835, the minds of Your Majesty's advisers had been induced to expect an intentional abandonment of the compact on our part; that a presumed case of guilt had been anticipated, and punishment invoked; for we find, in Lord Glenelg's despatch, of date 23d October 1835, laid on the table of the House of Commons, that Your Majesty's Ministers had been made to understand "that the general scope of our policy was to defeat or retard the progress of the great measure of emancipation, and that this aim was still attributed to us, whether our supposed design was to refuse the revival of the expiring Act in Aid, or to embarrass the magistracy, or to refuse the necessary funds for supporting the principal officers of the local government, or to withhold a proper police bill, or to exclude Your Majesty's Representative from the correspondence of the colonial agent."

We ask your attention, Sire, to the fact, that, at the time this aim was attributed to us, no necessity existed for renewing the provisions of the Act in Aid, as that Act would not expire until December 1835. That such an aim ever actuated our minds, we unequivocally and in the most solemn manner, collectively and individually, deny, and we therefore are at a loss to conceive what could have induced Your Majesty's Representative "to say, advisedly, that the remedy must come from home."

The New Assembly met on the 10th November 1835, and on the very next day, amongst the other expiring laws taken up to be renewed, a committee was appointed by the House to bring in a Bill to renew the Act in Aid of the Abolition Act. On the 13th the attention of the House was directed to this subject, by a message from the governor, in which his excellency recommended that the Act in Aid, about to expire (already taken up by the House), should be re-enacted in its original form, without intermixing any new matter, or any which had been contained in the Act lately disallowed, and further recommending that, if the House deemed any other regulations necessary, they should be made the subject of a separate enactment. This course his excellency urged in consequence, as he informed the House, of his having been instructed not to give his assent to any measure affecting the apprentices, unless it had a suspending clause, or unless the time at which it should be made to take effect, was so remote as to afford Your Majesty ample time previously to signify your pleasure therein.

The House went into the consideration of this most important but difficult subject, with the strongest desire to do whatever, according to the best of their judgment, and to the extent of their power, would promote the safe working of the emancipation measure.

The Act of the former session, drawn up with much care and attention, had been disallowed, and the House, being informed that no new legislation would be sanctioned unless under a suspending clause, decided to renew the Act in Aid, and incorporate with it such clauses of the disallowed Act as appeared likely to be beneficial, and had not been objected to by Your Majesty's Government. The House are at a loss to conceive what course they could have pursued less likely to give offence, or less calculated to subject them to a charge of wishing "to retard and defeat the emancipation measure."

The minutes of the House are matter of record, and confirm this statement, and a reference to the Bill, as it was passed by the House, will show how carefully the several clauses objected to in the disallowed Act had been expunged, or amended in accordance with the suggestions contained in the despatch of the Colonial Secretary.

There is still further evidence to refer to, arising from the amendments to the Bill proposed by the Council, with the sanction, it may be presumed, of the Governor himself. It is clear that, if a Bill had passed the House of so objectionable a character, as to show a design to defeat the Abolition Act; such a Bill must have been at once rejected by the Council, or, if not, the magnitude of the amendments must have shown the magnitude of objections to such Bill. Only four amendments, exclusive of the suspending clause, were proposed by that board. The first was to add a proviso to a clause giving the right of appeal to the higher courts; this right already existing, the clause and the proviso were supererogatory, although, in strict accordance of the 20th section of the Abolition Act, which declares "that nothing in that Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to abrogate or take away, the powers by law vested in the supreme courts of record, or in the supreme courts of civil or criminal justice in this island."

The second amendment was to strike out a clause relative to classification. This clause was to the effect, that every master is entitled, under the Abolition Act, to four full years, or six three-fourth years, services of his apprentices; consequently that no apprentice having, as a prædial, applied one-fourth of his time to his own use for four years of the apprenticeship, can also claim an exoneration from the two remaining years, as a non-prædial, whereby only three years' services would be given to the master. The assertion of this principle was all that the House contemplated, and which the House submit to be clearly and explicitly within the spirit of the Abolition Act.

The third amendment proposed, was merely a verbal alteration, substituting the word "children" for "juvenile."

The fourth was to expunge a clause, giving an authority to confine violent and outrageous offenders in the bilboes, in the absence of other means of security.

On many of the smaller description of plantations, the houses, entirely constructed of wattle and plaster, with open jealousies, are too slight to confine even a child that wished to break through them. The House, while it gave the power of placing a violent and outrageous offender in the bilboes, required however "that immediate notice should be sent to the special magistrate." In this there was nothing repugnant to the Abolition Act, as that Act gives the power "of placing in confinement any person who may commit offences for the space of 24 hours." The clause was applicable only in the absence of other means of security. These amendments, not very important, the House might have adopted, but the introduction of a suspending clause was an insuperable obstacle. To such a clause the House have ever objected as an infringement of their rights, and as an exercise of power, which, under circumstances easily to be imagined, would often be most injurious to the welfare, and dangerous to the safety of the colony. In the present instance, the House considered it to be in an especial degree unreasonable and unnecessary, when, notwithstanding the many further regulations required for the maintenance of order, and the enforcement of industry, the House had limited themselves to the renewal of the Act about to expire, and the adoption of the clauses of the disallowed Act which had not been objected to.

On the re-assembling of the House on the 26th January, and when the Act in Aid lay upon the table, and the amendments proposed by the council were under consideration, his Excellency sent a message to the council, intimating that in consequence of communications received from the Colonial-office during the recess, his Excellency would assume the responsibility of dispensing with the suspending clause. This notice was viewed by the House, before whom the Bill then was, as an indirect intimation that the council's amendments would be withdrawn.

On which account, adhering to their Bill, they returned it to that board, instead of asking a conference, as otherwise, in all likelihood, would have been the course pursued. On the following day his Excellency sent a message to the House, which was considered by them, and has since been admitted by Your Majesty's Advisers, to have been a breach of their privileges, and his Excellency terminated the proceedings by a prorogation. The House have every reason to believe, that but for the interruption caused by this second message, if the council had invited a conference with the House, and had in that conference conceded the suspending clause proposed by them to the bill, the other trifling differences would have been easily adjusted, and the bill passed into a law.

The House deeply regret the necessity which has impelled them to obtrude upon Your Majesty so tedious a detail of their proceedings in this matter; but condemned as they have been at the bar of Parliament, and threatened as they are by a measure fatal to their rights and liberties, they owe it no less to their constituents than to themselves to show by a reference to facts which defy contradiction, that the charges brought against them are unfounded. Opinions may differ, and widely differ, between persons resident in this island and in England, as to the probable success of the emancipation experiment, and also as to the extent of restrictive or coercive laws required now, or likely to be required hereafter, to maintain order and enforce industry among the manumitted slaves; but whatever difference of opinion may exist on these points, no one person entertains the belief that emancipation, whatever may be its result, can now be either retarded or defeated. That the success of this measure will depend mainly upon the equity and wisdom of the laws which shall be provided to guide an ignorant population through so sudden and so mighty a change, the House presume is not to be denied, and that to provide such laws an intimate and thorough knowledge of the people is altogether indispensable.

Wm. Burge, Esq.
 5 August 1836.

The House are deeply sensible how extremely difficult it will be even for them, with the fullest knowledge of the state of society, to provide laws and regulations which, under Providence, may be the means of guiding the colony safely through the great approaching change; but if in addition to the many other almost insurmountable difficulties which present themselves, the two classes which divide society are to continue to be viewed and treated as the oppressors and the oppressed, if the one class is to be distrusted and the other specially favoured, and if the laws passed by the legislature of the colony are to be viewed through this medium, and sanctioned or rejected as they shall suit those views, then indeed is there little hope for the colony. But the House have more confidence in Your Majesty's Government than to suppose that it will pursue a course so ruinous to the island, and so injurious to the mother country itself.

The Assembly of Jamaica beg leave with all humility and truth to assure Your most gracious Majesty, that it will be their most anxious desire, as it is their duty and their interest, to promote by every means in their power the prosperity of this important colony, and to guide to a successful termination, if it be possible, that great national measure of humanity, for which so large a sacrifice has been made, and in which they and their constituents are so deeply interested.

Passed the Assembly this 14th day of June 1836.

REPORT of the Committee of the House of Assembly, Tuesday, 14th June 1836.

Mr. Speaker,

YOUR Committee, to whom was referred his Excellency the Governor's second message of the 9th instant, and the document therein mentioned, report that they have inquired into such cases mentioned in that message, as the shortness of the time would permit, and taken evidence on them respectively, which evidence is hereunto annexed.

In the case of Eliza Martin, it appears from the evidence of Mr. Hodgson, a member of this House, that she was, at the time of the stated flogging, at work under the sentence of a special magistrate in the penal gang, when from her extreme idleness and insolence the driver of that gang gave her some stripes on the shoulders or back with the cat; that the driver was indicted, and on his own admission of having inflicted such stripes, he was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of 40s.; that in consequence of this sentence the driver stated there was no use in his remaining as driver without authority, and immediately resigned his appointment.

In the case of Jane Reid, it appears from the evidence of Mr. Edwards, a barrister, and a member of this House, and of William Holder, Esq., the acting clerk of the Crown for Cornwall, that Sloly, the supervisor of the house of correction, was indicted and found guilty of the charge alleged against him; but as it appeared in his defence that he acted under the general orders given by the special magistrate for the regulation of the institution, the chief justice considered that the ends of justice were fully answered by requiring Sloly to enter into recognizance to receive the judgment of the court when called upon, which recognizance was given, and shortly after Sloly died. Your Committee think it proper here to observe that they were desirous of procuring the evidence of the chief justice, but that officer declined to be examined; notwithstanding your Committee are of opinion the foregoing evidence fully explains the case of Jane Reid.

In the case of Janet Williams, it appears from the evidence of Mr. Dallas, a member of this House, that this woman was in the house of correction, under sentence of the Surrey court of assize, for stealing 170 l. 1 s. 8 d. in money from her master; that she was ordered by that sentence to be worked on the tread-mill, to which she refused to submit, and that after strict inquiry into the circumstances made by a committee of the corporate body of Kingston, the flogging stated to have been inflicted upon her was only such as was permitted by the rules and regulations of the institution, for the purpose of enforcing submission to her sentence, and which from her extreme violence and obstinacy she received more frequently than the other women sentenced to the wheel.

With regard to the assertion made respecting the case of Janet Williams, and that of Aglae, "that the grand jury of Surrey threw out the bills against the supervisor and his assistants at the Surrey court of assize," your committee are under the impression, from the evidence of Mr. Hyslop, the chairman of your committee, that his excellency the governor has been imposed upon in these respects, as no such indictments were ever sent before the grand jury, the magistrates of Kingston being satisfied with the report made by the committee of the corporate body.

As respects the other cases, your committee have not been able, owing to the great distance at which they are stated to have taken place, to institute any inquiry, but have no doubt, had sufficient time been allowed, they would with equal facility have been able to refute the calumny contemplated by them.

Your committee would only further remark, that it is the province of the officers of the Crown to enforce the due administration of the law, and that as the law is amply sufficient, the occurrence of any abuses, such as are alleged to have taken place in some of the houses of correction the blame must rest solely with those officers of the Crown whose peculiar duty it is to see that the laws are carried into effect.

Your

Your committee have not at this late hour of the session taken up the message of yesterday, also referred to it; the evidence is entirely ex parte, and if believed to be true, the cases should have been sent into the Crown-office.

Wm. Burge, Esq.

5 August 1836.

Ordered, that it be an instruction to the commissioners of correspondence to send to the island agent a copy of the above report and evidence annexed, and copies of his Excellency's second message of 9th June instant, and his Excellency's second message of yesterday; also the passage from his Excellency's proroguing speech, on the 3d February last, containing his Excellency's charge of the whipping of females being in practice in this island.

(By the House.)

John G. Vidal,
Clerk to the Assembly.

EXAMINATIONS taken before the Committee to whom was referred His Excellency the Governor's Second Message of the 9th June instant.

The Case of Eliza Martin.

St. Mary's, April 1835: "Eliza Martin, held down on the field and flogged with the cat on the back; John Gordon, tried at Quarter Sessions, at Port Maria, and sentenced to pay 40 s. for the offence."

The Evidence of Mr. Hodgson, a Member of Assembly, and Custos of Saint Mary.

THAT Eliza Martin was in the penal gang, out at work, I believe on Albion estate, sent in by a special magistrate; she was extremely idle and insolent. John Gordon, the driver of the gang, punished her by some stripes on the shoulder or back with the cat. The said John Gordon was indicted for the offence, and tried at the court of quarter sessions for St. Mary, at which I presided, as the custos of the parish, when he admitted what is before stated with respect to this woman was true; he was sentenced to pay a fine of 40 s. for his offence. John Gordon stated that unless he was permitted to use some authority there would be no use of his remaining a driver, and consequently resigned that appointment.

(signed) Abraham Hodgson.

The Case of Jane Reid.

25th and 26th June: "Jane Reid was flogged on both these days, by order of Mr. Sloly, the supervisor, for which he was indicted, but has died before sentence was pronounced."

The Evidence of Mr. Edwards, Member for Portland, and a Barrister-at-law.

That Mr. Sloly was put upon his trial for the above offence, at the last Montego Bay assizes, in March, the bill having been found in November previous; the fact was proved against Sloly, and in his defence he showed that the special magistrates had repeatedly given him orders to compel the women to work on the mill by corporal coercion if necessary. I think Sloly was present at the trial, but I do not think any sentence was pronounced.

(signed) B. Edwards.

The Evidence of Sir Molyneux Hyde Nepean, Clerk of the Crown.

State how many indictments were sent in to the grand jury of Surrey, in 1835, against the supervisor of the house of correction of Kingston?—As far as my recollection serves me a bill was sent in against George Aitcheson, William Young and William Coffey, for ill-treatment of Eliza Carr, but the bill was ignored.

Were bills sent in against the supervisor of that institution for flogging Janet Williams, Aglæ or Sarah Young?—There were none sent in to my recollection; there appears none on the records.

Witness put in the names of the judges and grand jury, at the August Surrey assize court, and which are as follows:—

Grand jury for August, Surrey assize court, 1835. Judges, the Chief, John Mais and Hector Mitchell.—

Wellwood Hyslop, of Kingston, merchant; George Atkinson, of Kingston, merchant; William Christie, of Kingston, merchant; Hinton East, of St. Andrew, esq.; John Barclay, of St. David, esq.; David Cohen, of Kingston, merchant; Charles Anderson, of St. Thomas in the East, esq.; William Francis Espent, of St. George, esq.; Robert Chisholm, of St. Andrew, esq.; Andrew Simpson, of St. Andrew, esq.; William Cramsie, of Kingston, merchant; John Bradfield, of Kingston, merchant; Daniel Morrison, of Kingston, merchant; George Helps, of St. George, esq.; Edwin Sainsbury, of Kingston, merchant; Thomas Blacas, of Kingston, retailer; Lewis Lewis, of Kingston, fancy store-keeper keeper; George Goolen, of St. David, esq.; Robert W. Bryan, of St. Andrew, esq.; Alexander Brymer, of Portland, merchant; Phineas Bravo, of Kingston, sugar-refiner; Benjamin Banks, of Kingston, merchant.

(signed) Molyneux Hyde Nepean,
 Clerk of the Crown.

Did you attend the Cornwall assize court, in March 1835, when the case of Rex v. Sloly was tried?—I did not; Mr. Holder, my deputy, attended in my stead.

(signed) Molyneux Hyde Nepean,
 Clerk of the Crown.

The Evidence of William Holder, Clerk of the Crown for Cornwall.

Did you attend as Clerk of the Crown at the March Cornwall Assizes, 1835?—I did.

Did any observation fall from the Court during the trial of Rex v. Sloly; if yea, state them?—The court observed during the trial of Rex v. Sloly, that the indictment was a very proper one, in order to try the legality or illegality of the species of coercion therein complained of, for the purpose of carrying any sentence into effect; the Court also observed, that they considered that the ends of justice would be fully answered by requiring Mr. Sloly to enter into recognizances to receive the judgment of the Court when called upon, which was subsequently done.

(signed) W. Holder, Dy. Cl. Cr. for the City of Cornwall.

The Case of Janet Williams.

The Evidence of Mr. Dallas, Member of Assembly, and Custos of Port Royal.

That Janet Williams was tried 23 January 1835, at the assizes held in Kingston, with William Young, for stealing from their master 170 l. 1 s. 8 d. in money, and found guilty; the chief justice pronounced the sentence of the court upon them, which was, that they should be committed to gaol for six months, to be worked on the tread-mill each alternate week a fortnight previous to the expiration of the six months. Janet Williams was to be placed in solitary confinement, and William Young to receive forty lashes. Young underwent his sentence, Janet Williams positively refused to go on the treadmill, and Coffee the boatswain, in compliance with the rules and regulations of the institution, used the cat to compel her to go upon the wheel; this was complained of to the corporate body of Kingston, and a committee was appointed to inquire into the complaint, of which I was a chairman, and, after strict inquiry, the committee reported that the cat had only been used to Janet Williams to enforce her submission to the sentence of the assize court. I am not aware, nor do I believe, that any prosecution was instituted against the supervisor, the magistrates considering the report of the committee quite satisfactory.

(signed) S. J. Dallas.

The Case of Janet Williams, Aglae, and Eliza Carr.

Kingston House of Correction, } "Janet Williams.—The boatswain of the House of 26 February 1835. } Correction swore that she had more flogging than the other women on the tread-mill because she was more obstinate; his shoulder was sprained, and so he could not use his strength, but he licked her and others at the same time."

Aglae.—"Reported on the committee of the house of correction at the same time to have been flogged; no allusion whether females had or had not been flogged; it was however admitted that such were the general orders. Though these facts were admitted, the grand jury of Kingston threw out the bills against the supervisor and his assistants at the Surrey court of assize."

It appearing that Mr. Hyslop, the chairman of the committee, was the foreman of the grand jury at August assize court 1835, he was desired to give the committee any information consistent with his recollection, which he did in the following words: "I am confident his excellency has confounded these names with the case of Eliza Carr. The three cases occurred in 1835, but those of Janet Williams and Aglae, after a thorough investigation, were not, I believe, made the subject of further judicial inquiry: that of Eliza Carr went into the Crown-office, and a bill of indictment against Mr. Aitcheson, the supervisor of the Kingston house of correction, and others, was sent to the grand jury of the August assize court.

"I was the foreman of the grand jury, and my associates were those gentlemen whose names are in the list delivered to the committee by the clerk of the Crown, and a more anxious, patient and deliberate investigation never was bestowed by 23 gentlemen.

"The grand jury were occupied in the inquiry the greater part of two consecutive days; we even applied to the Court for further evidence, and the mayor of Kingston was sworn and sent before us. We returned the indictment 'not found,' and on our oaths we said so.

" I do not pretend to divine how his Excellency acquired his authority to speak so confidently of the evidence given before the grand jury; but I beg to relate an occurrence which took place during the investigation I refer to:

" After the examination of Eliza Carr and Mr. Special Justice Connor, the third witness called (whose name I do not remember) was not to be found, although he was seen by me in the passage with the other witnesses in support of the indictment.

" On the following morning that witness came before us, and being asked why he absented himself on the previous day, it came out that he had, since the adjournment, been compelled to attend Mr. Connor at his residence, where he was sworn and interrogated, and, as the witness stated, for the purpose of obtaining his evidence for the Governor, so flagrant an interference with a witness already sworn in open court, and in possession of the grand jury, determined us to present Mr. Special Justice Connor; but before doing so, we resolved to recall Mr. Connor: he at once admitted the fact, and seemed to think himself justified in what he had done. The simplicity of the avowal, and the submission made when he was told of the illegality and the consequence of the act, induced the grand jury to overlook the matter.

" Since the message came down I have seen Mr. Atkinson and Mr. Sainsbury, who have perfect recollection of the fact of Mr. Connor's tampering with the witness as above stated.

Sir,

Lincoln's Inn, 5th August.

I believe I have already stated, but I am anxious to repeat to the Committee, that from the period which has elapsed since the Committee first assembled, it has been impossible for me to bring from Jamaica such persons as might have refuted any statements affecting them personally, or any statements of a particular and personal character, from which inferences to the prejudice of the whole community may be attempted to be drawn. It must therefore be recollected, that if there are any parts of the evidence which might have assumed a different character by the examination of those witnesses, the inquiry is incomplete, not because there might not be witnesses who would render it complete, but because it was impossible that those witnesses could have arrived here in time to be examined before the Committee closed their proceedings.

The witnesses connected with Jamaica who have been brought forward by me were accidentally in England. They had arrived here before the Committee had been appointed.

May I beg you to let this appear to the Committee.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your's very faithfully,

The Right Hon. Henry Labouchere,
Chairman of Committee.

William Burge.

Appendix, No. 1.

OBSERVATIONS on JAMAICA ACTS, by Mr. Jeremie.

No. 1.
Mr. Jeremie's
Observations on
Abolition Acts.

THE first Jamaica Act assumes to adopt not only the spirit but the very words of the Imperial Act, and in many points there is no doubt that the Act has been literally copied; but in many practical respects, in most of those points, in short, where colonial experience was required to give effect to the important principles embodied in the Imperial Act, it will be found to fall far short of the spirit in which the latter was framed.

The oversight as to the date in the first and fourth clauses has been already noticed by Lord Stanley, and corrected in the Amending Act.

By the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th clauses of the Jamaica Act, provision is made for the discharge by purchase of the remaining term of the apprenticeship, whether voluntary or in opposition to the will of the manager; and by the Amending Act provision is also made for the discharge of apprentices where the manager is unable to effect this discharge; and it is a proviso of the same Act, that aged and infirm labourers shall, before they obtain their discharge, be examined by the vestry of the parish.

These important clauses are in many respects insufficient for the fulfilment of the purposes contemplated.

1st. As regards voluntary manumissions, nothing has been said; as to fees, are any and what fees leviable on manumissions?

Next as regards the power placed in the vestry in respect to aged and infirm apprentices; the vestry are to determine as to the liability of the employer to provide, in case of the apprentice becoming hereafter destitute, for his support and maintenance.

Now the vestry of the parish are in all probability composed of planters, certainly of persons deeply interested in the questions left to their decision; nor is it too much to suppose such a concert among them as might throw every aged and infirm apprentice upon the public, or on his own resources, for support.

This power should have been entrusted to the special magistrates only.

But a most material deviation, not only from the Imperial Act, but from those principles which had been already adopted, and practically enforced by Government after much controversy, and on the fullest deliberation, is to be found in the clauses relating to compulsory manumission.

The right of appraisement is placed by the Jamaica Act in the hands of one special and two ordinary magistrates, so that, in truth, the labourer is to be appraised by persons having a direct interest in enhancing his value.

It is needless to do more than refer here to the celebrated case of Pamela Munro, to show how completely the adoption of such a provision neutralizes the principle of manumission, invito domino; no case is better known, none caused a greater sensation at the time; regulations were enacted in consequence by the Crown, which it were easy to have referred to, and embodied in this Act, which indeed were specified in the draft of an Order in Council transmitted as a model to Jamaica by the Secretary of State, yet are they all omitted, and yet has this retrograde step been passed unnoticed by His Majesty's Government. Now many of those who advocated most warmly the apprenticeship system, did so under the impression, that the principle of compulsory manumission would not only operate as a great practical amelioration of that system, but render the transition from forced to free labour gradual and almost imperceptible, by causing voluntary arrangements to be frequently entered into, especially as the period of apprenticeship approached its end; all which objects are most completely defeated by these enactments; and it cannot be said that the conditions imposed on the colonial legislatures by the Imperial Parliament have been satisfactorily fulfilled, so long as these provisions in the Jamaica Bills remain unaltered.

This point is dwelt on the more strenuously, because what might have been foreseen, has actually occurred, as may be seen in reference to Dr. Madden's recently-published work, where it is shown, that in the valuation of the unexpired term of the apprenticeship, "an ideal value is added to the intrinsic value of the services appraised, such ideal value being estimated by the injuries inflicted on slavery by the Act of Emancipation itself;" and yet are these injuries already compensated, in the very preamble of these Acts, by a grant of 20 millions sterling.

Clause 14th does not provide a remedy for the parent, child, or other relation, who, by any mistake or omission of the special magistrates, shall have been separated from his family; an omission of great practical importance, which is believed to have caused much litigation elsewhere.

The same objection extends to the 15th clause with regard to sales.

The 16th clause contains an important deviation from the 11th section of the Imperial Abolition Act. The latter directed the same food and such other maintenance and allowances to be granted to the apprentice as the slave-owner was required to supply by any law in force in the colony. This by the Jamaica Act has been narrowed to one single local Act, 0.58. intituled intituled "An Act for the Government of Slaves," 1 Will. 4, c. 25, and a construction has been put upon this Act, by which every allowance established by usage has been converted into a mere voluntary indulgence, and in innumerable cases withdrawn.

These indulgencies or allowances are, however, of great importance to the negro; they are stated in a case drawn up by the planters of the parish of Trelawney to be as follows: "a weekly allowance of herrings and salt cod-fish, also oatmeal, flour, sugar, rum, &c. and sundry articles of clothing at Crop-over and Christmas as rewards for good conduct, and, to women with six children a weekly or daily allowance (according to their respective cases) of rice, sugar, &c." And this "&c." is understood to comprise the time hitherto allowed to mothers nursing, and the employment of a certain number of the negroes in cooking and preparing the labourers' meals; in short, most of those conveniences which experience had proved indispensable to render the lot of the negro tolerable.

From this defective legislation much mischief has already arisen, and it may be feared that such omissions may hereafter endanger the tranquillity of the West Indies. It is true the Attorney-general of Jamaica has declared the ancient customary allowances to be obligatory under the new system, and it is probable the Government at home cordially concur in the Attorney-general's opinion; but whilst the question remains open, the negro is daily and hourly suffering privations, which might easily have been prevented by a more careful examination of the local enactment previous to its being approved.

The discretionary power confided to a single special magistrate by the 18th clause, sanctioned though it be to a considerable extent by the Imperial Act, is far too great; no less than that of dooming to uncompensated servitude until the age of 21 years every child born of slave parents, not of the age of six years at the commencement of the period of apprenticeship, or born of apprenticed parents at any time within it, if adjudged by such magistrate to be "unprovided with an adequate maintenance." Surely the oppressive character of such a provision could never have been fully considered by the framers of the Imperial Act. It required, at all events, the utmost care in its application.

In all cases more than one justice should have been made necessary. The parents should have acknowledged their incapacity; the nearest relatives, such as a brother or sister, where there are no surviving parents, should first have refused to maintain the child. All these precautions should have been actually taken, and proved to have been taken, before any discretion whatever was allowed to the magistrate; and even then the clause had been open to serious objections, as was pointed out on the occasion of passing the Imperial Act. The manner in which this clause operates, practically, is not fully known, but as publicity is the best preventive of abuse, ample returns should be required by the local governments from every special magistrate of the number of children so apprenticed, inserting their names, the names of their parents, the owner of the estate, the name of the magistrate, and the cause which induced him to bind the child; and these returns should be laid annually, if not oftener, before Parliament.

The next clause is the 22d, and as the same provision, in a great measure, extends to the enactment in the 23d, they shall be noticed together. Here the apprentice may be compelled to work for the benefit of his employer for a longer period than is requisite to indemnify him for the loss of time incurred by the apprentice's absence; for instance, a negro absent for more than half a day forfeits three days' labour; for less than half a day he forfeits a whole day's labour. Both these enactments are directly opposed to the principle that the employer shall not derive any benefit from the delinquency of his servant, that he shall have no inducement to connive at delinquency, and still less to promote it.

The negro should be punished by imprisonment or by flogging, and indemnity given to the manager for actual loss, but nothing more.

These clauses may be also made to apply most harshly in practice. A mother claiming the usual indulgence of half an hour, or even five minutes, to nurse her child, may be deprived of a whole day's labour, or, in other words, of nearly the whole time allowed her by law for her own benefit during a week.

Then again, the punishment should be inflicted as soon as possible after the commission of the offence; but as the enactment now stands this punishment may be made to hang over the negro in terrorem for a considerable time, and a few of these trifling offences (if such they should really happen to be) may be punished so as to deprive the negro for a very long period of the time allowed him by law for his own benefit.

Then, though the apprentice is compelled to indemnify the employer for any wrong committed by him, the employer, on the contrary, is in no case compelled to indemnify the apprentice for loss arising from any act of his.

If the general principles of penal laws are to be adopted, the penalty for the offence should in all cases accrue to the public; if an exception be made for domestic offences, that exception should be reciprocal; here it is unilateral, and established exclusively to the prejudice of the apprentice.

This objection extends to the whole of these clauses.

Another general objection is, that throughout the Act there is no provision with regard to the hours of consecutive rest, which are in all cases essential to the negro; no arrangement or contract entered into, no penalties incurred, should be permitted to deprive a labourer of a certain number of hours' daily rest; whilst here, the 15 hours of extra labour awarded as a penalty, may be so apportioned as to force the labourer to continue at work for 32 hours in succession.

The 27th clause seems to have been framed on the draft of an Order in Council, which was transmitted as a model; but it has been altered greatly to the prejudice of the apprentice.

The draft subjected to punishment a labourer found wandering beyond the limits of the "district;" the word "plantation" has been substituted for "district."

Again, the employer or special justice might grant the "pass;" this is limited by the Act to the "employer" alone; practically a most unnecessary and vexatious alteration.

Sect. 28. A forfeiture to the employer of four days' labour for a single act of drunkenness appears not only incorrect in principle, but too severe: by means of this enactment a labourer for a fault of this kind committed at night, at a festival among his friends, from which the employer has not suffered the slightest prejudice, may forfeit to his employer the whole of the time allowed him by law during several weeks.

Sect. 29. Infliction of 39 stripes for "insolence" is dreadfully severe; the more so, as there is no penalty against the employer for any language or provocation he may use towards the labourer.

Sect. 30, is defective from the want of classification: the careless use of fire, the "barely endangering," without actually injuring property; or the cutting off a cane head for the purpose of sucking the juice, which is probably done every day during crop, by every negro on every plantation in the colonies, may be punished by hard labour for three months, or 50 stripes.

Sect. 31. By this section a single justice may condemn a labourer summarily to six months' hard labour, for any riot on the part of any three or more apprentices. This, again, is too great an extension of the powers of a single justice, and when compared with the powers of the same justice over managers or employers, will be found unwarrantably severe.

By sect. 33, 34 and 35, a slave carrying a knife in his pocket (for that may be deemed an offensive weapon), unless with the knowledge and consent of his manager, might be condemned to 39 lashes, and imprisonment, with hard labour, for one month; besides which, the "offensive weapon" is to be forfeited to the employer: this appears to be a most objectionable enactment.

By sect. 36, an apprenticed labourer attempting to quit the island without permission is liable to six months' hard labour, or 50 stripes, on an order from any "special justice;" a power which appears too extensive.

The 39th section is open to great abuse; one of its provisoes is as follows: "Provided always, that if the attendance of a special justice cannot be procured within 24 hours, it shall and may be lawful for the proprietor or manager aforesaid, to order the release of such apprentice so confined as aforesaid, after the expiration of 24 hours;" so that, instead of providing that the labourer arrested by the estate constable should be either set at liberty or taken before a justice within 24 hours, this clause directs (if it have any meaning) that the labourer shall not be liberated within the 24 hours; and the construction will even allow (notwithstanding the governor's opinion against it) of his being detained with impunity by the sole authority of the manager, for any length of time, until the special magistrate arrives on the estate.

Sect. 40. On occasion of frivolous or groundless complaints, the complainant is to forfeit double the length of time lost, for the benefit of his employer; this again, for the reasons above alleged, is objectionable.

The 42d section is also objectionable, inasmuch as the period of solitary confinement which may be substituted for hard labour, should in no case exceed the period of hard labour awarded by the original judgment.

The 44th section is highly objectionable in principle; the summary jurisdiction of the special magistrate should have been confined to offences committed by apprentices against each other, or against persons entitled to their services; but with regard to all other persons the apprentices should have been considered free, to all intents and purposes whatever. Another provision of this clause is absolutely monstrous: by this regulation a single special justice has the right to sentence any apprenticed labourer convicted of indolence, neglect or improper performance of work, "in addition to punishment by flogging, hard labour or solitary imprisonment," to continue at work for any such number of hours or days, in his or her own time, for the benefit of the person entitled to his or her services, "as the justice of the case may seem to require," not exceeding 15 hours in any one week; so that for one offence of indolence or neglect, or improper performance of work, a single special justice has the power, subject only to some extraordinary interference on the part of the Government, of depriving a whole gang of labourers of 15 hours of their own time in each week, during the whole period of their apprenticeship, or even beyond that period. Such an unlimited discretion can surely never have been contemplated, though it is understood, in point of fact, that under this or similar clauses, punishments have been recommended by high authority, if not awarded, within the last year, which are to take effect in 1841.

Sect. 45. The words "no longer" have been modified by the Act to three months' notice; this still is defective; the labourer whose apprenticeship ceases, should be allowed time to carry off his whole crop. The words "ground adequate both in quantity and quality," as well as the words at a "reasonable distance," are by far too vague; the minimum quantity of ground, and the maximum distance, should both have been set forth, and here at least the penalty should have accrued to the labourer.

The 46th Section is even still more objectionable. It should have been made the duty of the special justice, ex officio, to satisfy himself of the adequacy in quantity and quality of the ground allotted. An allotment made by the manager at a time when the labourer was in slavery, should have been rendered subject to revision, and a proviso should have been introduced to secure to the apprentice that portion of land at least which he enjoyed during his former state of servitude.

By the 47th section, taken in conjunction with a section of the Amended Act, it is perfectly clear that the eight hours' system, sanctioned as is understood by a proclamation of the Governor of Jamaica, and which has been the subject of universal complaint, is illegal; this proclamation, therefore, should be rescinded, were it on this ground alone. And it is the more desirable, as there is reason to believe this new arrangement, which is directly opposed to Lord Sligo's first proclamation, has produced general disgust, hatred and ill-will; the time allowed the negro for the cultivation of his provision-ground being thus frittered away in half hours per day, and rendered valueless. The penalty of 40 s. incurred by the employer who shall refuse to allow the time settled by that section, should also have accrued to the labourer.

Sect. 48. Provides that where the grounds hitherto appropriated to the negro are "un-productive," the master may withdraw them, provided he consents to make good and ample provision by some other way and means. Ought the bountiful rewards of Providence on the negro's private toil, with all the civil advantages derivable from the acquired habits arising out of fairly-compensated labour, to be thus arbitrarily withdrawn? And if so, by whom, under the wording of this Act, is the adequacy of this substituted provision to be decided? by the special magistrate, or by the master? Then follows a proviso, "that in such case no diminution of the 45 hours as hereinbefore mentioned, shall take place." This enactment, therefore, leaves the negro in such cases, with regard to the four hours and a half said to have been secured to him, entirely at the manager's discretion.

Sect. 49. Establishes the jurisdiction of the special magistrate over the manager; his authority over the labourer extends to six months' imprisonment, to 50 stripes, to the right of depriving him of 15 hours' labour in any week during the whole period of the apprenticeship, and even of indefinitely prolonging that apprenticeship; but his authority over the manager extends only to a penalty of 5 l. or five days' imprisonment, which he is not required, but merely empowered, to inflict. Is there anything like even-handed justice in this? But the labourer, it is said, has his remedy by an action at common law; where is the negro to find the means? And even if these are found, would the violence of colonial prejudice allow him anything like a fair chance of success? Reparation, therefore, for any act of cruelty, however gross or wanton, seems almost out of the question, and the only check provided by this Act is a fine of 5 l., payable into the public chest, which fine being inflicted, the labourer returns again into the hands of the same manager. Here assuredly might have been introduced the well-known provision of the Foreign Slave Code, that managers convicted of cruelty should be declared unfit to exercise authority over any labourer within the precincts of the colony. And here also, if there were danger in extending the authority of a single special magistrate over free persons, it might have been enacted, that courts of quarter sessions, composed of two or more special magistrates, should be holden occasionally when offences of a graver nature, and entailing heavier penalties, might have been finally heard and determined. Unfortunately nothing of this kind has been done, and the influence hitherto exercised by the colonists over the special magistracy, a very large proportion of whom have been persons interested in slave property, leaves but little hope of justice or mercy being shown to the negro.

Sect. 50. The powers even of a special magistrate should have been restricted in imposing task-work. An intermission of a certain number of hours of consecutive rest in each day should, as already observed, have been invariably required.

Sect. 51. As regards this and the preceding enactment, the agreement and the sanction should have been in writing, and copies of each attached invariably to the magistrate's returns.

Sect. 55. The manager, instead of merely "being at liberty to carry" an offending apprentice before a special magistrate, should be "bound forthwith" to do so, which would operate as a check upon the unwarrantable power of imprisonment now too frequently exercised by the estate constables: a power which appears to be not only indefinite as to time, but unrestricted as regards the places of confinement; for in no part of this Act, or any of the others, is it required that the cells on estates should be approved by a medical practitioner or a special justice, and there is no doubt that cruelty has been practised in this shape to a very great extent.

Sect. 57. This clause, which authorizes the indefinite extension of the term of apprenticeship in certain cases, should have been most carefully worded; particularly as a deliberate design appears throughout this Act of curtailing the apprentice of as much of his own time as possible. Here, therefore, the words "make satisfaction" are much too vague. The assessment of damages in any case is, perhaps, the most difficult duty allotted to jurors; that in which they oftenest differ; a duty, which even the bench in England has a great reluctance to undertake; and yet is this power of "making satisfaction," in innumerable cases, where the assessment is to fall on the labourer, conferred by this Act on a single justice, whilst, on the contrary, it is never confided to these magistrates, when the manager ought to have been made the debtor to the apprentice.

Sect. 58. Is defective in many respects; "works of necessity" should have been defined, especially when the object is to deprive the apprentice of his Sabbath, and it should also have been provided that the allowances and the wages should not be paid on Saturdays or on Sundays, for now the labourer may be regularly deprived of his market days, and of attending for religious worship on Sundays, owing to his provisions, allowances or wages being paid on these days, which is too often practised.

Sect. 59. The same objection regarding the non-enumeration of "works of necessity" applies to this clause respecting the Saturday, and this omission is the more remarkable, because in the next clause, the 60th, a distinction is drawn between works of "necessity" and works of "urgent necessity," works of "urgent necessity" being defined in the Amended Act to be the prevention of loss arising from "fire, hurricanes, or other unforeseen emergencies;" what then are works of necessity? why are they not defined also? Is sugar-boiling boiling a work of necessity? if so, the negro may be deprived, without remuneration, of a portion of his Saturday or Sunday for the manager's benefit throughout crop, and it is understood that in some of the islands this construction has been actually put on similar enactments.

68. Had any doubt existed of the manner in which the fine and penalties were to be disposed of, this is settled by the 68th section, which directs that they shall be applied for the "use of the public," and therefore not in any case for that of the labourer injured.

69. Provided that no duty by stamps should be levied on documents required by this Act; this proviso should have extended to fees.

Such are the numerous defects and omissions appearing on the face of an Act that has been pronounced sufficient to warrant the declaration, by an Order in Council, that the rights of Jamaica to the indemnity provided by Parliament had been rendered "indefeasible."

An examination of the 2d Jamaica Act, commonly called the Amending Act, might be gone into at some length; but section 7 of this Act, enabling vestries to decide in cases of the discharge of aged and infirm apprentices having been already attended to, as well as the violent expulsion of the apprentices from the provision-grounds at the expiration of the term of apprenticeship, without having the power of removing their growing crops, a pretended amendment of which regulation, but one that is perfectly useless, occurs in section 12 of this Act; it is scarcely necessary to do more than to call attention to the last section, and especially to the three last words of that section, namely, "And be it enacted, that this Act shall be in force from the 1st day of August next, and until the 31st of December 1835, and no longer."

As therefore every amendment and improvement, however defective, contained therein, must shortly fall to the ground, unless it be especially renewed, it seems imperatively necessary to provide for this event by a new Act, of a character certainly not less liberal than that which preceded it.

One clause, s. 13, is however too remarkable to be overlooked. It enacts that it shall and may be lawful for any special justice to substitute any given number of hours of work on the tread-mill for any of the punishments imposed by this or any other Act on apprenticed labourers, as he in his discretion shall consider necessary and proper. Surely a clause like this will not be permitted to form part of the Act when revived.

The third Act, which was passed 22d December 1834, has been disallowed by His Majesty's Ministers, but it is not unimportant to refer to its general character for the purpose of exhibiting the real animus of the Jamaica legislature, notwithstanding all their pretences to liberal legislation.

The main objects of this Act appear to be to render the plan of compulsory manumission already in a great degree neutralised by the former Act, absolutely nugatory and void. Vide ss. 1, 2. To deprive the negro of the scanty provisions and protection allowed him by the two preceding Acts, ss. 3, 4. To re-introduce the system of irresponsible punishments, by means of a quarter sessions jurisdiction; of appeals to the supreme courts, and by the establishment of penal gangs, and other modes of discretionary punishments in estates, ss. 5, 7, 12, 15, 19, 21.

Still further to vex, irritate and oppress the negroes by unwarrantable punishments, by interference with conjugal, parental and filial intercourse; by the suspension of friendly meetings and amusements, and by a wanton destruction of the negroes' property, ss. 8, 10, 11, 14, 17.

Last of all, to re-introduce the outrageous and disgusting practice of flogging females under the age of 10 years.

Such are some of the enactments of this singular statute, which, not content with drawing a distinction in spirit, proceeded likewise to draw the same distinction in words, between "free persons" and the new species of bondage which it so undisguisedly re-enacted; and be it observed, that though the second Act, which is to a certain extent remedial, was temporary, this Act was made permanent, and was duly sanctioned by the Governor, which gives it at least a practical operation until its disallowal shall have reached Jamaica.

Now this is matter of most serious concern; a lengthened argument is scarcely requisite to prove that nearly every one of its enactments is directly opposed to the spirit and letter of the British Act, and therefore that they are legally null and void ab initio; but having been duly sanctioned by the Governor, of what avail is this total and absolute illegality to those who for months will have suffered under it?

Yet a remedy they must have, and such a remedy as will avail them, or the solemn provisions of their charter may be set at nought at the pleasure of the colonial legislatures.

THE object of this Analysis is to compare the provisions of the Imperial Act of Abolition with the various Orders in Council, Ordinances, Acts, Provisions, Rules and Regulations which have been made and passed for the purpose of carrying it into practical operation in the Colonies, and to suggest such amendments in the Colonial provisions as may produce a closer correspondence between them and the Imperial measure.

IMPERIAL ACT for the Abolition of Slavery, &c. Passed 28 August 1833.

Notes and References.

1. Under this clause, no slave not duly registered in conformity with the laws in force on the 28th August 1833, can become an apprentice; and as by clause 12 all slaves are declared free, subject only to the obligations of apprenticeship, it follows that all slaves, not duly registered as aforesaid, were entitled at once to absolute freedom.—Vide Remarks on ss. 46. 58, of this Act.

3. It has been decided by Lord Stanley, that this clause excepts the case of slaves brought into the United Kingdom between the 28th August 1833 and the 1st August 1834. There is, however, great reason to doubt the correctness of this opinion.—Vide the case stated in comments on the Honduras Analysis.

4. Vide Jam. Act, No. 1, s. 4.

Sections.

1. Declares the justice and expediency of emancipation; the expediency of a provision for promoting the industry and securing the good conduct of the negroes, and enacts, that from 1st August 1834, all slaves duly registered as therein mentioned, actually within the Colonies, and of the age of six years, shall become apprenticed labourers.

2. Entitles the owner of the slave to the service of the apprentice.

3. Confers absolute freedom on slaves brought into the United Kingdom with consent of possessors, at any time before, and on apprentices after, the 28th August 1833.

4. Divides apprentices into three classes. 1st, Prædial attached; 2d, Prædial not attached; 3d, Non-Prædial; and provides that no person of the age of 12 years, not habitually employed for 12 calendar months before the passing of this Act in agriculture or manufacture of colonial produce, or otherwise upon lands, shall be included in either of the two first classes.

5. Determines the apprenticeship of prædial apprentices of both classes on 1st of August 1840, and restricts their labour in the mean time to 45 hours per week.

6. Determines the apprenticeship of non-prædial apprentices on 1st August 1838.

7. Enables the master voluntarily to discharge his apprentice, but provides that if the apprentice be of the age of 50, or incapacitated by disease, or mental or bodily infirmity, from maintaining himself, that the master shall be liable during the remainder of the original term of apprenticeship.

8. Entitles the apprentice to purchase his discharge against the consent of the person entitled to his services, but leaves the method of appraisement, and the formalities and conditions of discharge, to be settled by colonial regulations as thereafter mentioned.

9. Vide Jam. Act, No. 1, ss. 14, 15.
9. Prohibits the removal of apprentices from the colony, and of attached prædials from their accustomed plantations; but permits the removal of the latter to another estate in the same colony, belonging to the same master, with the written consent of two special justices, provided that families be not separated, and such removals be not injurious to health.
10. Ibidem.
10. Enables the employer to sell or otherwise dispose of the services of the apprentice, but prohibits the separation of families by such transfer.
11. Vide Jam. Act, No. 1, s. 16.
11. Entitles the apprentice, according to age and sex, to such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance and other maintenance and "allowances," as by "any law" in force in the colony belonged to the same description of slaves. And where provision-grounds are furnished in lieu of food, it requires that such grounds should be adequate in quantity and quality, and be within a reasonable distance, and that sufficient time be allowed out of the 45 hours of weekly labour for their cultivation, but leaves the particulars to be settled by colonial regulations, as thereinafter mentioned.
12. Vide Jam. Act, No. 1, s. 17.
12. Enacts that, subject to the obligations imposed by this Act, or to be imposed by any such Act of general assembly, Ordinance, or Order in Council as thereinafter mentioned, all slaves in certain British Colonies as aforesaid, shall, on the 1st August 1834, "become and be to all intents and purposes free, and discharged of and from all manner of slavery, and shall be absolutely and for ever manumitted; and that the children thereafter to be born to any such persons, and the offspring of such children, shall in the like manner be free from their birth; and that from and after the 1st day of August 1834, slavery shall be and is hereby utterly and for ever abolished, and declared unlawful throughout the British colonies, plantations and possessions abroad."
13. The preamble of this clause recites, "Whereas such children may not be properly supported by their parents, and that no other person may be disposed voluntarily," &c. which evidently requires that sufficient publicity should be given in cases of this description, to enable third persons to come forward and undertake this responsibility.—Vide Jam. Act, No. 1, s. 18, and notes.—Vide also, as to indenture, Jam. Act, No. 1, s. 52, and notes.
13. Enacts that children under six years of age on 1st August 1834, or born of any female apprentice after that time, being brought before a special justice, and such justice being satisfied that such child is unprovided with an adequate maintenance, and has not completed the age of 12 years, such justice shall bind such child apprentice until the age of 21 years, and this apprenticeship is to be the same in all respects as in other cases provided; that the indenture of apprenticeship shall contain sufficient words of obligation upon the employer to allow reasonable time for the education and religious instruction of such child.
14. In framing this clause the Imperial Legislature must have borne in mind an established rule, excluding persons interested in slave property from holding high official appointments in slave colonies.—Vide Jamaica Act, No. 1, ss. 19, 20, and notes.
14. Enables His Majesty to create or to authorize the governors of colonies to create special justices, and gives full powers to such persons to act as justices of the peace within the limits of their commission, for the special purpose of giving effect to this Act, or to any laws which might in manner thereinafter mentioned be made for giving more complete effect to the same, "but for no other purposes," provided that all such justices may likewise hold a general commission of the peace.
15. The number here mentioned could not be considered as final, and a much larger number proves to be requisite.
15. Authorizes the grant of salaries not exceeding 300 l. per annum, to 100 justices, provided that annual lists of such justices shall be laid before Parliament.

No. 2.
Analysis of
Abolition Acts.

From the concluding part of this clause it is obvious that no order in council can give validity to a repugnant or contradictory enactment, but the same is ipso facto void, and may at any time be declared to be so, notwithstanding its temporary allowance by an inadvertent order in council.

And makes it lawful for the colonial governments to establish and execute all such regulations as aforesaid; provided the same be not "in anywise repugnant or contradictory to this present Act or any part thereof," or otherwise the same shall be and are declared to be "absolutely null and of no effect."

17. Vide Act No 1, s. 44, and Notes.

17. Makes absolutely null and void all colonial regulations authorizing the person entitled to the services of the apprentices, or any other person than the special justice, to punish apprentices for any offence by whipping, beating, imprisonment, or otherwise howsoever, or by any addition to the limited hours of labour, or authorizing any court, judge or justice to punish any female apprentice by whipping or beating her person, excepting any law or police regulation in force against "all other persons of free condition."

18. Vide Act No. 1, s. 44, and Notes.

18. Makes absolutely null and void all colonial regulations authorizing any magistrate or justice, except a special justice, to take cognizance of any offence, breach, violation or neglect of obligation, question, matter or thing incident to or arising out of the relations subsisting between apprentices and the persons entitled to their services.

19. Vide Act No. 1, s. 44, and Notes.

19. Gives exclusive jurisdiction over the last-mentioned matters to the special justice, but reserves the powers of the supreme courts of record and the superior courts of civil and criminal justice.

20. Vide Act No. 1, ss. 22, 26, &c.

20. Makes absolutely null and void all colonial regulations (excepting as thereafter mentioned) for prolonging the term of apprenticeship, or enforcing additional labour for the benefit of the person entitled to service for more than 15 extra hours in the whole in any one week; provided that in case of wilful absence the apprentice may be compelled to serve the absent time, or otherwise make satisfaction for such absence, within seven years after the expiration of the apprenticeship, except so far as he may have already served during the apprenticeship, or otherwise made satisfaction.

21. Vide Act No. 1, s. 59.

21. Exempts from all apprenticeship labour on Sundays, except in works of necessity or in domestic services, or in the protection of property, or in tending of cattle, and secures the free religious worship of the apprentice on that day, without let, denial or interruption whatsoever.

22. Vide Act No. 1, s. 61.

22. Enables colonial regulations to exempt apprentices from certain civil and military services, and from arrest and imprisonment for debt, and to disqualify them from enjoying certain civil and military offices and political franchises.

23. The design of this clause was to admit only of such colonial regulations as might appear to be real improvements in the original Act, with a view to the benevolent objects contemplated by it. Until such modifications should be allowed, and subject to them when properly allowed, the Imperial Act was to assume a permanent control over the colonies, and to become the test by which all future colonial regulations should be tried. From the language of this clause, as connected with clauses

23. Enacts, that in case the governor, council and assembly of any colony aforesaid, shall by any act of general assembly, substitute for the several enactments thereinbefore contained, or any of them, any enactment accomplishing the several objects contemplated by the hereinbefore enactment, "as fully and to the like effect, but in a manner and form better adapted to the local circumstances of any such colonies or colony, and in case His Majesty shall by any Order or Orders

clauses 16, 17, 18, 20, it is plain that the enactments of the Imperial Act were intended to be substantially final, and to overrule any contradictory, repugnant or defective enactment which might be inadvertently allowed by an order in council. It is to be particularly observed, that no colonial substitutions whatever are possessed of even a temporary validity until allowed and proclaimed according to the forms prescribed in this clause, until which time such enactments are incomplete, and their practical recognition as laws by any governor, or other official person, would seem to amount to a high breach of official duty

44. This clause indicates the general intentions of the Imperial Parliament to exercise the right of final revision over the whole question.

46. This clause seems to indicate the propriety of reconsidering some of the subsisting rules on this subject.

58. This clause has reference only to the conflicting claims of compensation, and cannot conclude the personal right of the negro at any time to establish his claims to freedom.

Orders to be by him made, by the advice of his Privy Council, confirm and allow any such Act or Acts of Assembly, and shall in and by such Order or Orders in Council, recite and set forth at length the several provisions and enactments of this present Act, for which such other enactments as aforesaid shall have been substituted by any such Act or Acts of General Assembly, then and in such case so much and such parts of this present Act as shall be so recited and set forth at length in any such Order or Orders of His Majesty in Council shall be suspended and cease to be of any force or effect in any such colony from and after the arrival and proclamation therein of any such Order or Orders of His Majesty in Council, and shall continue to be suspended so long as such substituted enactments shall continue in force and unrepealed, and no longer."

44. Enacts, that no part of the compensation shall be paid until an Order in Council shall declare that adequate and satisfactory provision hath been made by law in the colony for giving effect to this Act; the Order to be duly certified and transmitted to the Treasury, published three times in the London Gazette, and laid before Parliament.

46. Enacts, that no compensation shall be paid for persons illegally registered and held in slavery; and that this question shall be decided according to such rules of legal presumption and evidence as are or shall be established by any law in force, or which shall be in force in the colony.

58. Enacts, that the adjudication of the Commissioners, unless appealed against, shall be final.

61. Enacts, that special justices shall have the same powers in the colonies as justices and general sessions in England, under the 52 Geo. 3, c. 155.

66. Enacts, that dependent islands and territories shall be taken to be parts of the colonies to which they respectively belong.

DRAFT GENERAL ORDER IN COUNCIL for carrying the Apprenticeship System into operation in the Colonies. Enclosed in a Circular Despatch of the 19 October 1833.

A GENERAL Order for such a purpose requires to be considered with a full recollection of the difficulties to be encountered, the novelty of the experiment, and the limited information possessed on some important points of practical application. Such a document of course admitted a greater generality of expression than would be suited to actual legislation; and might be expected to exhibit some omissions and defects which further consideration would correct and supply.

It would furnish, however, no apology for a departure from the spirit and intention of the Imperial measure; no justification of unsound or dangerous principles, nor, where positive enactments are recommended, any excuse for such as are unjust, arbitrary or inefficient.

This general order has, without doubt, undergone much careful consideration, but it still seems open to various objections and amendments, which will form the subject of the following comments:

Cap. I. Appears to require no remark.

Cap. II. The right to complain is the safety-valve of society; the right of redress is the foundation of allegiance. Some of the enactments of this chapter appear to endanger both; the power hereby given to a single justice to dismiss complaints, to sanction compromises, and to punish frivolous, vexatious or malicious complaints, should be restricted to the authority given under similar circumstances to magistrates in Great Britain; the discretion of a special justice should be limited to questions of law and of fact. Where these are decided, the right right to proceed with a legal charge ought not to depend on the will of the justice; a legal charge once proved ought never to be punished nor dismissed with cost as frivolous; a legal charge ought never to be deemed vexatious where probable cause existed; nor punished as malicious, except in the absence of probable cause, and in the case of actual damage legally proved. The power given by s. 17 to inflict unlimited extra labour, is not only dangerous, but repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act.

Sec. 27, 28, 29. An impartial magistracy is essential to the success of the apprenticeship system. Its efficiency is endangered equally by impunity and intimidation. These clauses afford no sufficient protection to upright magistrates, who, in the performance of invidious duties, require the official assistance of the law officers of the crown; which they should enjoy in all cases except prosecutions or suits brought against them by apprentices.

Cap. III. The clauses under this head appear to be defective in the following particulars: No notice required to be given to apprentices; a merely contingent right of appeal, depending on the doubts of the registrar; no sufficient facilities nor securities for appealing with success; a limitation of the time for appealing, which ought to be commensurate with the existence of the apprenticeship; no sufficient penalties for neglect to register, nor for falsification, and no compensation to the injured apprentice in such cases. A general Order in Council might with propriety have suggested specific and adequate provisions on each of these topics.

Cap. IV. Considering the absolute necessity of adequately providing for the maintenance of apprentices, and the probable apathy of the colonists on this vital subject, it appears to have been treated in this chapter with incautious brevity. The Imperial Act, ss. 11, 16, requires, that where existing laws are inadequate, they must be supplied by fresh enactments. This is not even alluded to. Great laxity in such cases has consequently been exhibited by most of the colonial legislatures; while penalties are neither overlooked nor spared in cases of misconduct on the part of apprentices; it is somewhat singular that this chapter merely suggests the propriety of penalties in cases of misconduct on the part of the employers; the result has been, that penalties much less severe, and securities much less valid than those provided under the Jamaica Slave Code, have been generally adopted and allowed. The specific penalties introduced into subsequent Orders in Council for the Crown colonies, amounting to twice the value of the articles withheld, considered in connexion with the difficulties in the way of redress, and the chances of escape, afford nothing like adequate protection.

Cap. V. Provides for the duties to be performed by apprentices, and the penalties on their misconduct. It might have been intimated, that in all possible cases compensation should be made by the apprentice during the original apprenticeship; and that in cases justifying the imposition of extra labour of necessity, the apprentice would be entitled to remuneration.

Sec. 8. This clause, considered as the model of a positive enactment, exhibits most of the defects of penal legislation, viz.

1. An unlimited power of inflicting extra labour given to the justice.
2. A generality of expression which extends the maximum punishment to the minutest possible offences.
3. An undue severity arising out of this generality of expression, united to the power of inflicting aggregate punishments.
4. The appropriation of penal labour to the benefit of the master, a principle condemned even in convict colonies, and giving to the master a direct interest in the misconduct of the apprentice.

The proviso is likewise objectionable in giving to the ordinary magistrates a right of interference with matters incident to the apprenticeship condition; and thereby bestowing on the master the unfair advantage of a choice between two tribunals.

The same powers of inflicting unlimited penal labour, and of appropriating it to the benefit of the master (powers fully appreciated, as will afterwards be seen, by the colonial legislatures), appear in several other clauses of this chapter. And the generality of the language employed in s. 12 extends it to cases which require the modification of circumstances to bring them within the scope of penal legislation.

The power given by s. 14 to a single magistrate to refer any apprenticeship case to a superior court, though intended doubtless to secure more complete justice, seems calculated, under the present system of administering justice in the colonies, to defeat the object altogether, and to enable any special magistrate to deprive an apprentice of the prompt and certain redress provided by the Imperial Act.

Cap. VI. Sect. 3 to 12. These clauses providing for contracts appear to be very defective; as apprentices entering into voluntary contracts are, in all cases, liable to the pains and penalties of compulsory labour, they ought to enjoy the protection in all cases (and at any expense of convenience) of previously written agreements, containing the particulars set forth in ss. 5, 6, 7. The present provisions may be easily evaded by making fortnightly agreements, which will not require the inspection or sanction of the justice. Section 12 is ambiguous; if it be intended to compel apprenticed children under the age therein mentioned, without their consent, to perform contract work entered into by a majority of the other apprentices, it is clearly repugnant to the Imperial Act, since s. 16 of that Act requires in all such cases the voluntary consent of an absolute majority of the whole gang, children of course included.

Sec. 13, 14. The danger of investing a single justice with such a power as mentioned in s. 14, has been already adverted to. The inadequacy of the protection herein provided against cruelty forms a striking contrast to the far more stringent, yet still ineffective provisions, of the Jamaica Slave Code, ss. 30 to 33, in similar cases.

Cap. VII. Provides for offences committed by apprentices against the State.

Sec. 4. Was found to be too restrictive, and was accordingly relaxed, as appears in the Mauritius Order in Council, cap. 7, s. 4.

SS. 6, 8. Powers so formidable as the putting down of whole communities appear fit to be exercised by the governor only, on an enlarged view of the necessity of the case.

Sec. 7. Appears to be retrospective, and the penalty is too great to be inflicted summarily by a single magistrate.

SS. 9 to 13. Provide specially for cases which ought to be regulated by a general law. Parental affection is not wanting among the negroes, and no peculiarity distinguishes them, except what arises out of the misfortune of their present condition. A misfortune ought in no case to be the subject of harsh legislation. The British Acts in similar cases require, not only that the parent should be able to "work," but able to "provide," for his children, and in case of neglect, compel him to do so; in the first instance by an order, which only when disobeyed occasions a more peremptory procedure. The negro's ability to provide for his children must depend mainly on the conduct of the master towards him; on the fulfilment of the general duties of an employer towards an apprentice; on a sufficient allowance of food or provision ground, of time, and of the opportunities of profitably employing "extra labour" on his exemption; in short, from those various modes of oppression which, by reducing his means to the bare personal subsistence provided by law, leave nothing for the support of his helpless offspring. The general language of clause 9 makes it repugnant to the Imperial Act, as it includes a class of apprentice children for whom the master himself is bound to provide. The clause can only properly apply to children who were under the age of six years on the 1st of August 1834, or born since that period.

Sec. 14. Should at least except cases of bonâ fide claim or supposition of right to possession.

Cap. VIII. Provides for compulsory manumission, and, in favorem libertatis, should have expressly fixed as the basis of future calculations, the fee simple value of the negro as ascertained before the 1st of August 1834. It could never have been intended that the Act of Abolition, by enhancing the value of the services of the apprentice, should interpose new obstacles to his compulsory manumission.

The remaining chapters of this Order appear to require no particular comments.

JAMAICA.—No. 1. Passed 12th December 1833.

THIS Act was allowed, and adequate provision declared to have been made in this colony, by an Order in Council of the 19th March 1834.

Notes and References.

Sections.

2. The Jamaica Slave Code exempted from hard labour every female having six children, and secured her a comfortable maintenance. This indulgence ought not to be discontinued; and in the case of the aged, infirm, diseased children and pregnant women, not absolutely unfit for work, the Justice should possess the power of regulating their services, and of suspending them at his discretion.

4. This clause has been amended by Act No. 2, ss. 1, 2. Nothing, however, appears respecting the mode of registration and classification, on which subjects vide Barb. Ab. Act, ss. 4 to 10, and other parts of the general analysis.

9 to 13. These clauses are at variance with the spirit of the Imperial Abolition Act. As two out of the three arbitrators are to be ordinary justices, they in effect give the power of fixing the value of the slave to a class of persons who are most interested in enhancing it. The valuation ought to be made by special justices alone, and the fee simple value of the slave, as ascertained by the colonists themselves previously to the 1st August 1834, ought to form the basis of calculation for the few years that remain.

2. Adopts the second section of the Imperial Act, except that it employs the words "if THIS Act had not been made."

4. Adopts the Imperial Act, sec. 4, except as to time, which is made to run from the passing of the Colonial Act.

9 to 13 inclusive. Enact, that in case the person entitled to the services of the apprentice shall refuse or be unwilling to discharge him, the apprentice may apply to the nearest special justice. The master shall then appoint a justice, and these two shall associate with themselves another justice, but in case they cannot agree in the choice of a third, the custos or senior magistrate, or if he be interested, the next magistrate in seniority, shall appoint a third. These arbitrators are to fix the value of the apprentice, on payment of which he shall be discharged. But in case the person entitled to the services of the apprentice shall refuse or neglect to appoint a justice, the choice of such justice shall be left to the special magistrate.—Vide Imp. Act sec. 8.

14, 15. These clauses should contain a specific provision for re-uniting families, and giving other redress in case of illegal separation, or of loss of property consequent upon sudden removal.

16. This clause is an obvious limitation of the Imperial Act, s. 11, which included all laws existing in the colonies, and therein comprised those settled and reasonable customs which in all countries have the force and operation of laws. The practical effect of this limitation has been in many instances to exclude "customary allowances and indulgences" not expressly included in this single statute. They were thus enumerated some time since by the planters of the parish of Trelawney, viz.:

A weekly allowance of herrings and salt cod; fish; also oatmeal, flour, sugar, rum, &c., and sundry articles of clothing at crop over, and Christmas, as rewards for good conduct; and to women with six children, a weekly or daily allowance, according to their respective cases, of rice, sugar, &c., and this " &c." has been practically understood to comprise the time allowed to mother's nursing, and the employment of a certain number of negroes in cooking and preparing the labourers' meals, and in short, most of those other conveniences which experience had proved to be indispensable.

If any doubt existed respecting the meaning of the Imperial Act, or the legal nature of customary allowances, the spirit and intention of the Imperial Act, and its character as a remedial statute, should decide the question. An Order in Council now seems requisite to settle the law and practice in this matter.

In addition to the withholding of "customary allowances," it appears that salt, an essential article of food, is now withdrawn, and the duty of providing clothes once a year is occasionally evaded for want of a date in each year, or the use of the words "in each twelve-month." It appears likewise that medical attendance has hitherto been very inadequately provided in Jamaica, where the practice frequently obtains for the master himself to dispense medicines. The extreme importance of this branch of duty has been noticed in subsequent comments on the Barb. Ab. Act, s. 34. No specific mention is made of lodging in this clause; and it is matter of regret that in a legislative provision for so numerous a population, the quantities and qualities of the articles to be supplied were not specifically mentioned in the Act which entitles the owner to compensation. The insufficiency of the penalties for non-performance of these duties will be noticed in remarks on subsequent clauses.

18. This clause accords with the letter, but it is at variance with the spirit, of the Imp. Act. The preamble of the 13th section of that Act supposes an absolute destitution, which is the only case that could justify a provision of this kind, but even then the death or absence of the parents, or their actual inability to maintain the child, and next the refusal of near relatives, or their inability, ought to be preliminaries to the magistrate's adjudication, and which ought never to be made until such reasonable notice has been given to the relatives and to the public, as may enable any third person to come forward and guarantee the child's future maintenance. Ample returns of the names of all children so bound, of their ages, of the names of their parents and of the owners of the estates, with the causes inducing the Justice to bind the child, should be made to the local government, and annually laid before Parliament.

19. Subsequent clauses of this Act having invested the special justices with powers and a discretion at variance with the spirit of the Imp. Act, the present clause will, at a future time, require reconsideration.

22. 26. These clauses commence a series of enactments, which adopt a principle opposed to sound policy, and at variance with the spirit of the Imperial Act; viz. the appropriation of extra labour, by way of punishment, to the benefit of the master, giving him a direct interest in the delinquency of the apprentice, and removing the main check on vindictive feelings. It is true that sec. 20 of the Imperial Act authorizes compensation for wilful absence to be made by extra labour, either during the original apprenticeship or within seven days afterwards, but extra labour in that case is limited to the amount of actual absence; and although by a prior part of the clause extra labour for more than 15 hours per week is prohibited for any offence, it by no means necessarily follows from this phraseology that any other species of offence than wilful absence, or any greater amount than simple compensation, were intended, especially as the clause is of a protective character; the principle in question is confessedly unsound, and other modes of punishment for other offences were of easy application. The objection is taken to these clauses as belonging to a class, but the principle is more palpably mischievous when applied, as in subsequent clauses, to offences occasioning no loss of service to the master. The severity of these clauses need not be insisted upon, as the principle on which they are founded appears radically objectionable. So long, however, as they continue in force, the infliction of extra labour, so as to interfere with necessary repose, ought to be prevented. The clauses now permit an apprentice to be kept to labour for 33 hours in succession.

It may be remarked in respect to flogging, that the Jamaica Slave Code, s. 34, prohibited a second infliction until the former wounds were healed, under a penalty of 20 l., or imprisonment for 10 days, besides prosecution as for an offence against that code.

27. This clause is not only inconsistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act, but also with the Draft Circular Order in Council. The draft Order subjected to punishment apprentices found wandering beyond the "district;" here the word "plantation" is substituted. The Order permitted a special justice to grant a pass. The Act confines the permission to the "employer." The clause, as it now stands, operates as an imprisonment on the plantation, and interferes with proper intercourse between husband and wife, parent and child, and other relations residing on different plantations. The Third Jam. Act, s. 6, (disallowed) added fresh restrictions to this clause.

28. This clause, like many others, is extremely defective in classification, a fault of the highest kind in enactments where a maximum punishment is necessarily fixed, and much is left to the discretion of the magistrate. Positive refusal to labour ought not to be classed with simple neglect, nor simple neglect with wilful negligence, producing actual injury to property; still less ought drunkenness, occurring in the negro's own time,

22. 26. Declare the necessity of regulations for the purposes mentioned in the Imperial Act, s. 16 (No. 2), and enact that wilful absence of the apprentice for half a day, or any shorter period, shall incur a forfeiture to the employer of not more than one whole day of the apprentice's own time; more than half a day, a forfeiture of not more than three whole days, to be so divided as not to impose more than 15 hours of extra labour in any one week; two successive days' absence, or two distinct days within the same fortnight, make the offender a deserter, with punishment by hard labour in the penal gang of the parish, or in the house of correction, for not more than one week, or by flogging not exceeding 20 stripes; three or more successive days' absence within the same fortnight make the offender a vagabond, with punishment by hard labour in the house of correction, or the penal gang, for not more than 14 days, or by flogging not exceeding 30 stripes; one entire week's absence or more incurs, in addition to hard labour as aforesaid, the punishment of flogging, not exceeding 39 stripes.

Vide Imp. Act, s. 16; also

Ditto - s. 20.

27. Enacts that an apprentice found wandering beyond the limits of the plantation, without a written permission from his employer, and unable satisfactorily to account for himself, may be punished as a vagabond, provided the apprentice be not on his way to or from a place of worship, or a market, or at either of such places, and provided that this clause do not abridge or interfere with the apprentice's own time.

28. Enacts that an apprentice refusing or neglecting any labour required under this Act, or by wilful negligence damaging property, or being guilty of drunkenness, shall forfeit to his employer not more than four days' labour, or receive not more than 20 stripes; but for a second offence within one month the punishment is double; proviso for the infliction of not more than 15 hours of extra labour in any one week.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16 (No. 2).

time, and occasioning no injury to the master, to belong to a class which enables the justice to inflict a punishment too severe perhaps in the worst cases.

The appropriation of penal labour to the benefit of the master, in a case where not only no loss of service occurs, but where no injury whatever may have been sustained, shows the mischief of the principle more plainly than in the preceding clauses.

29. The same inequality exists among the offences mentioned in this clause. The severity of the punishment of mere insolence may be contrasted with the absence of all checks on the vexations that may provoke it.

30. The same want of classification, tending to undue severity, appears in this clause. If simple carelessness, merely endangering property, be punishable, it should belong to a minor class of offences, and be visited with corresponding leniency when injury has been actually done to property of a trivial value, and without a decidedly criminal motive, such as the occasional plucking of cane heads, &c., the payment of the damage would be sufficient. In no case should a single justice be permitted to inflict the maximum punishment. But this clause is open to a more serious objection, viz. that of being directly repugnant to a very important principle of the Imperial Act.

The Imp. Act, s. 16, certainly does allow the punishment of conduct tending to injure the property of the employer, but this clause extends the provision to the property of any other person, thus completely altering the character of the provision, and counteracting a main design of the Imperial Act, which, while leaving to colonial regulations all matters arising out of the relations subsisting between master and apprentice, expressly confers on the apprentice, in regard to third persons, the character and rights of a freeman, and subjects him as such to the sole coercion of ordinary laws.—Vide remarks under clause 44 of this Act.

31. Cases of riot ought not to be summarily tried and punished by a single justice, both on account of the serious character of the offence and the severe punishment which a conviction necessarily involves.

32. Mere disputes among the apprentices, not seriously endangering the public peace, ought not to be interfered with by the common justice.

33, 34, 35. The first of these clauses is too vague; some such words as these ought to be added, "Provided always, that no knife, bill, axe, scythe, sickle, field-cutlass or other article commonly used for domestic, agricultural or manufacturing purposes, shall be included in the term 'offensive weapon.'" The propriety of investing a private individual (to the exclusion of the magistracy) with the power to licence the carrying of arms, seems very questionable. The second clause may occasion much unnecessary severity. The last clause is open to the common objection of giving to the master an interest in the punishment of the apprentice, making the same individual the granter of the licence, the executioner of justice, and the beneficial receiver of the penalty.

Vide Imp. Act, s. 16 (No. 2).

Enacts that endangering the property of the employer, or any other person, by the careless use of fire, ill-using cattle or other stock, wantonly destroying or injuring property entrusted to the apprentice, shall be punished with hard labour in the house of correction, or in the penal gang, for a period not exceeding three months, or by stripes not exceeding 50.

Vide Imp. Act, s. 16 (No. 2).

31. Enacts that in cases of riot, or combined resistance to the laws, by three or more apprentices, the police shall act as they shall be directed by a special justice; and the offender shall be punished by hard labour as aforesaid, for any term not exceeding six months, or by stripes not exceeding 50.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16, (No. 2).

32. Inflicts the same punishment on apprentices not dispersing at an appointed signal, and provides that in the absence of a special justice, any justice may interfere to quell riots or disturbances among apprentices.—Vide Ibid.

33, 34, 35. Prohibit apprentices from keeping gunpowder, guns, &c., "or any other offensive weapon," without the consent of the employer, and inflict the punishment of 39 lashes, and imprisonment not exceeding one month in the penal gang, or in the house of correction, or any two or more of these punishments for this offence; and authorize the master, manager or lawful employer to seize such articles, and retain them to his own use.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16, (No. 2) and s. 22.

36. Inflicts

36. So severe a preventive punishment ought not to be inflicted summarily by a single justice.—Vide 2 Jam. Act, s. 14, in connexion with this subject.

37. This clause differs from clause 22, &c. in being conformable to s. 20 of the Imperial Act.

38. As this clause may easily be abused, to the prejudice of the apprentice, the required sanction of the magistrate should never be granted, except on personal inspection; and the equivalent labour should be ascertained and fixed by him on sufficient legal evidence.

39. This clause is utterly repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act. Estate constables, as such, ought to be independent of all authority except that of their official superiors; especially of the authority of their masters; and be personally responsible for their conduct, precisely as ordinary constables. Their duties and powers, in short, should be the same, and all abuses of their authority should be visited by specific penalties, and compensation to the injured party. Imprisonment by way of detention authorized by this clause, in the first instance for a limited number of hours, but capable of being indefinitely prolonged, at the slight risk of a small fine for flagrant abuse, seems, in connexion with the enactments in clauses 53, 54, 55, to be a virtual restoration to the master of the power of punishment for minor offences.

The right to arrest and detain should be limited to the cases in which freemen amenable to the laws are so liable, and offenders should be conveyed "forthwith" before the nearest special justice, under severe penalties, and compensation as aforesaid.

40. The appropriation of penal labour to the benefit of the master has been already objected to. The infliction of any punishment for a mere error of judgment, or excess of sensibility, seems unreasonable, and is obviously calculated, by making complaints dangerous, to give impunity to much oppression and injustice. The clause should be reduced to a compensation for the loss of time when the complaint amounts to no legal charge, or proves to be unfounded, to which cases alone the power of a magistrate to dismiss a complaint should be confined.

42. This period should in no case exceed that of hard labour awarded by the original judgment.

44. A reference to section 16 of the Imperial Act will show that the officers intended to be subjected to colonial regulation were such only as were incident to the new condition of apprenticeship; but this clause, as explained by the Second Jamaica Act, s. 26, includes all offences whatever determinable before a single magistrate, even if committed against

36. Inflicts the punishment of hard labour in the house of correction or the penal gang, not exceeding six months, or stripes not exceeding 50, for quitting, or attempting to quit, the island, without a written permission from the employer.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16, (No. 2.)

37. Enacts that wilful absence for more than one day at a time, or during 14 days, shall be made up to the employer by extra labour, yet so as not to impose more than 15 hours of extra labour in any one week, and so as that compensation be made within seven years after the apprenticeship.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 20.

38. Authorizes the employer, with the written sanction of a special justice, to put the apprentice's house and provision-grounds in order, and to deduct an equivalent out of the apprentice's own time, not exceeding 15 hours in any one week.

39. Enacts and requires the appointment on every plantation of apprentices as special constables, who shall be empowered to maintain peace and order, under the direction of the proprietor or manager, and to secure in confinement all offending apprentices who belong to the plantation, or other apprentices found loitering thereon, until the attendance of a special justice can be procured; provided that the proprietor or manager may, if he please, release such apprentices after the expiration of 24 hours, if the attendance of the special justice cannot be previously procured, and provided in such case that the complaint be preferred at the justice's next visit.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16, (No. 2.)

40. Punishes frivolous or groundless complaints with double the loss of time, not exceeding 15 hours in any one week, or with stripes not exceeding 20.

42. Substitutes solitary confinement in any case for flogging or hard labour, at the discretion of the special justice, but limits it to 10 days.

44. Enacts that all other inferior misdemeanors and other crimes committed by apprentices against each other, or against the lawful employer, or against any other person, shall be decided by a special justice, and punished by stripes not exceeding 50, by imprisonment with hard labour not exceeding three months, or by solitary confinement not against any other person than the master or a fellow apprentice.

No. 2.
An analysis of

This objection has been already taken under clause 30 of this Act; in addition to which, this clause reserves the right of all persons whatever to proceed for such wrongs or injuries before the court of quarter sessions, thereby giving to masters, in direct violation of the Imperial Act, s. 18, a right to carry certain offences already provided for by clause 30 of this Act, and incident to the condition of apprenticeship, before the general magistrates, and at the same time enabling other persons, not themselves either masters or apprentices, to proceed against apprentices before a special justice for offences arising out of the apprenticeship condition, or incident to it. To both descriptions of prosecutors the clause gives the choice of a second tribunal, and new punishments more prompt and more severe, it may be presumed, than those of the ordinary tribunals.

The last provision of this clause gives to the special justice an unlimited discretion to inflict extra labour, which, being decidedly opposed to the spirit of the Imperial Act, and inconsistent with the provisions of clause 28 of this Act, is ipso facto null and void, and ought to be forthwith rescinded.

None of the maximum punishments under this clause ought to be inflicted summarily by a special justice.

45, 46. These enactments belong to a clause, vide Imperial Act, s. 16, (No. 3), very inadequately considered by the colonial legislatures generally. The words "adequate in quantity and quality, and at a reasonable distance," are not sufficient for the purpose, and the penalty on refusal or neglect is extremely inadequate. It should be the ex-officio duty of the special justice to inquire into each of these particulars, and on all estates to fix the minimum quantity and the maximum distance. The penalty ought likewise to afford a compensation to the injured apprentice, and no neglect of cultivation should operate as a bar to redress where the inadequacy of the ground is otherwise apparent. Time ought likewise to be allowed to the apprentice at the expiration of his apprenticeship to remove his stock and crop, without which the cultivation of the last year will be neglected. Clause 21 of the 2d Jamaica Act increases the rigour of this clause, without removing the objections here stated.

It is worthy of remark, that the Slave Code, ss. 11, 13, compelled the master to make oath, once a year, that he had supplied ample provision-grounds, or made ample provision in some other way, under a penalty, for either refusing the oath or neglecting the duty, of 20 l.

47. The discretion hereby given to the employer as to the allowance of time, is inconsistent with the security of the apprentice, and tends to neutralize the provision made by s. 16 of the Imperial Act (No. 3); under this clause, the time may be divided into such small portions, or allowed at such unfavourable seasons, as to be useless for the purpose of cultivation. The whole of the time allowed by law ought to be enjoyed in each week, unless deferred with the consent of the apprentice, or with the written sanction of the special justice, on sufficient cause shown by the employer. In all cases the time requisite for going to and returning from the provision-ground should be allowed to the apprentice. Compensation should be given to the injured apprentice in addition to the penalty; and mutual contracts under this clause, as in other cases, should only be for a limited period, and under the written sanction of the special justice. Any contracts tending to discourage the private industry of the apprentices seem indeed at variance with the policy of the Imperial Act. The Slave Code, s. 8, inflicted a penalty of 20 l., instead of 40 s., for the offence of withholding time from the slave.

not exceeding 20 days. Proviso to except females from flogging or beating. And proviso not to deprive any of His Majesty's subjects of the right to proceed against apprentices in any of the superior courts, or any court of quarter sessions, or common pleas, for any wrong or injury done against the person or property of such subject. And proviso also, that in cases of indolence or neglect, or improper performance of work, the special justice may sentence the offender either alone, or in addition to flogging and hard labour as aforesaid, to extra labour for the benefit of the employer, for any such number of hours or days as the justice of the case may seem to require, not exceeding 15 hours in any one week.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16, No. 2.

45, 46. Enact that prædial apprentices so to be maintained shall be supplied with provision grounds, adequate both in quantity and quality, and at a reasonable distance, under a penalty of 5 l. for each offence, but this provision is limited to the term of apprenticeship, and the grounds heretofore allotted to the apprentices being slaves, are to be deemed adequate, unless sufficient cause be shown to the contrary, and on complaint, the apprentice must show that his grounds have been properly cultivated.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16, (No. 2.)

47. Fixes the time allowed for the working of provision-grounds at four hours and a half per week, to be allowed on any day or days in any one week, or by any number of days consecutively, at such period of the year as may best suit the employers, under a penalty of 40 s. for each offence; such allowance of time not to exceed three days in succession, and the employer may agree in writing to pay money in lieu of time, which money may be summarily recovered by distress and sale.

48. This

48. Enacts

48. This clause affords no sufficient protection to the apprentice against the unjust privation of his provision-ground, and no compensation where it occurs.

The absolute necessity of such a privation should be previously established before two special justices, who alone should possess the power of deciding on the sufficiency of the substituted maintenance. A compensation ought likewise to be awarded to the apprentice for the loss of the profits of private industry, over and above the subsistence it procures; or an adequate portion of the time allotted for cultivation should still be allowed him to dispose of for his own private benefit as before.

The insufficiency of the penalty in this clause, appears from a comparison with the Slave Code, ss. 13, 14, which inflict a penalty of 20 l. under similar circumstances.

49. This clause, in compliance with s. 16 (No. 3), of the Imperial Act, establishes the general jurisdiction of the special justices over the persons entitled to the services of the apprentices; but for most of the purposes of that section it is extremely defective. In more flagrant cases of cruelty and injustice the decision of a special justice is not sufficiently solemn, and, compared with the severe punishment inflicted on the apprentice, the maximum penalty of this clause (the infliction of which is not even rendered imperative on the justice) appears wholly inadequate, especially as it affords no compensation to the injured apprentice; and his right of proceeding before the superior tribunals in civil cases (extended by s. 27 of the Second Jamaica Act, to proceedings by indictment) must be regarded in most instances as a mere nullity. Cases of omission or neglect (by far the most likely to occur) are, though expressly mentioned in the 16th section of the Imperial Act, wholly unnoticed in this clause. In order to place the coercive and the protective provisions of the Imperial Act on an equal footing, it seems necessary to increase the penalty of this clause, to make its infliction imperative, and to give the special justice the power of awarding compensation to the injured apprentice, in addition to the penalty. It seems highly desirable, likewise, to empower and require the special justices of each district to meet periodically in sessions, for the decision of graver offences and the establishment of general rules. And in certain cases of complaint, made either by the master or the apprentice, to require the justice to whom such complaint shall be made to associate with himself another special justice, in order to its determination; and where an employer or manager is charged with an offence cognizable likewise before the ordinary tribunals, and it shall appear to the justices, so associated together or assembled in general sessions, that such supposed offence demands a heavier penalty or punishment than they are authorized to inflict, that it shall be competent to them to refer the same to the superior tribunals, where all expenses of prosecution, and an adequate portion of the fine, should be allowed to the apprentice. Offences of omission or neglect ought likewise to be specifically mentioned in this clause, the continuation whereof, after due notice from a special justice, should, under all the clauses of these Acts, be deemed to amount to a refusal, and constitute a separate offence from time to time, until remedied. Peculiar cases of oppression or cruelty ought likewise to be specifically set forth in this clause; especially such as relate to the overworking or improper treatment of the aged and infirm, of pregnant women and children, and of non-prædial apprentices, a description of persons whose condition exposes them to the greatest probability of ill-usage. And a conviction for "excessive cruelty," either before two special justices or the ordinary tribunals, should, in addition to the punishment of the offender and compensation to the injured apprentice, confer on the latter, ipso facto, the right to absolute freedom.

48. Enacts, that where there is no land fit for provision grounds, or the same are unproductive, the person entitled to the services of the apprentice shall supply other and ample maintenance, under the penalty of 40 s. for each offence; and in case of such other provisions, the time allowed for cultivation shall cease.

49. Enacts, that all frauds, refusals to furnish sufficient provision grounds or other maintenance, withholding time for cultivation of same, illegally imposing task-work, breach of contract, cruelty, injustice, or other wrong or injury, done or inflicted by the person entitled to the services of the apprentices, shall be decided by one (or more) special justice, and may be summarily punished by a fine not exceeding 5 l., and in default of goods and chattels, by imprisonment not exceeding five days; proviso saving the right of the apprentice to proceed before the ordinary tribunals.

Notes and References.Sections.

No. 2.
Analysis of
Abolition Acts.

A comparison of the provisions of this clause with the Slave Code, will show the inferiority of the present law in respect to penalties and securities. The Slave Code, s. 12 awarded a certain penalty of 5 l. for neglect of clothing; s. 13 compelled the master to make oath once a year that he had supplied sufficient clothing, provision-grounds and time, or ample provision in lieu thereof, under a penalty of 20 l. for refusing the oath or neglecting the duty; ss. 14, 15, gave a summary remedy to the extent of 25 l., for abstraction by the master of the slave's property; s. 30 inflicted a fine of 100 l., or 12 months' imprisonment, for cruelly whipping, imprisoning, or maltreating a slave, in addition to damages at law; and in atrocious cases the slave was to be liberated, and 10 l. per annum for life allowed him by the parish; and ss. 31, 33, enacted, that prosecutions and actions in such cases should be at the expense of the parish, and in the meantime the slave was to be removed from the custody of the master.

If such punishments as these, when the master had a more permanent interest in the services of the negroes, proved insufficient, it cannot be imagined that the slight and uncertain penalty of this clause will be of much avail.

50. This clause contains a direct, and as it regards the minor and most defenceless class of apprentices, a dangerous violation of the Imperial Act, s. 16, which requires in such cases the consent of a majority of the whole body of apprentices so to be employed. In any case, the discretion of the special justice should be so far limited, as to render the intermission of a certain number of hours of consecutive rest in each day imperative; vide the remarks on this subject in the analysis of the Barb. Ab. Act, ss. 79, 85, and vide the following section.

51. These contracts, with their sanction, ought always to be in writing, and memoranda of the same retained by the special justices. It is difficult to reconcile this clause with that which immediately precedes it, except by supposing that this clause relates to cases not of necessity, and the former clause to cases in which the whole body of apprentices on the estate are not so employed.

52. This clause provides no "sufficient words of obligation" to allow time for the "education and religious instruction of the child," as required by sec. 13 of the Imp. Act. Indentures of the description referred to appear to be insufficient for the objects above-mentioned.

53, 54. These clauses recognise the importance of the objects set forth in the Imp. Act, sec. 16 (No. 5.), but are extremely defective in the means employed for their accomplishment, and they violate the spirit of the Imp. Act by sanctioning imprisonment under circumstances which must necessarily lead to much irresponsible punishment. On plantations, containing upwards of 40 apprentices, 14 days may elapse without a judicial visit; during all which time no power is expressly given to the employer to take an apprentice charged with an offence before the nearest special justice; but in lieu thereof he possesses an indefinite power of imprisonment on the estate, according to the terms of clause 39. On plantations containing less than 40 apprentices, the power of taking the offenders before a special justice is expressly given, but it is not rendered imperative, nor are the visits of the special justices to such estates fixed to any certain periods, so that on all estates not only may gross abuses of

50. Enacts, that task-work, in cases of necessity, may be imposed with the sanction of the special justice and the consent of a majority of the apprentices, or of the adults among them.

51. Authorizes private contracts for one year, either for day or task work, provided the sanction of a special justice be obtained, and provided that no task-work be imposed upon any body of apprentices, except by consent of a majority thereof.

52. Enacts that indentures of apprenticeship of children, under section 16 of Imperial Act (No. 4.), shall correspond as nearly as possible with parochial and municipal indentures in England, and shall be recorded in the secretary's office.—Vide Imp. Act, sec. 16 (No. 4.), and sec. 13.

53, 54. Declare the necessity of regulations for the purposes set forth in the Imperial Act, section 16 (No. 5.) Authorize the governor to divide the islands into districts. Require that special justices be appointed for each district; that the justices should visit each plantation, containing upwards of 40 apprentices, one day at least in every 14 days, and oftener if required. Give necessary powers to the special magistrates to hear and determine accordingly; and authorize the imprisonment of apprentices on the plantations.

the power of imprisonment take place, but a virtual impunity is secured to the perpetrator by the prolonged or indefinite absence of the special justice, by whom alone they can be redressed.—Vide clause 39, and remarks thereon.

55. To obviate these abuses the visits of the special justices to the plantations, or to the police stations, should in all cases be fixed at the shortest possible intervals. The apprentices on all estates should possess the right of immediately preferring their complaints before the nearest special justice, wherever he may be sitting, which seems now to be confined to estates containing under 40 apprentices, and the duty of forthwith conveying an apprentice in custody before the nearest special justice, should, as before observed, be in all cases rendered imperative on the employer or manager. And so long as the power of imprisonment on estates, either for safe custody or otherwise, is permitted, no place of confinement should be used until it has been declared wholesome and suitable by the certificate of a medical practitioner, and approved by a special justice, in default of which detention in such places should be deemed a false imprisonment, and be punished by fine, with compensation to the injured party.

59. This provision seems too vague, another day may be no compensation for the loss of a general market-day. It seems but just that in such cases the apprentices should have the choice of compensation, either in money or time, to be determined in case of dispute by the special justice. Some regulations seem necessary likewise, in conformity with section 21 of the Imperial Act, to prevent the distribution of provisions and payment of wages at such times on Sunday as may hinder the apprentice from attending at places of worship. The same observation applies to market-days, the full enjoyment of which seems incompatible with the existence of the eight hours per day system, and works of necessity should, at least to a certain extent, be defined.

60. Cases of "urgent necessity" are defined by the 2d Jamaica Act, clause 10, but in such cases remuneration should be given if demanded.

61. Although this clause appears to be necessary, and is not inconsistent with the Imp. Act, sec. 22, it lessens the value of the right reserved to the apprentice of appeal to the ordinary tribunals.

68. This clause leaves the apprentice in cases of injury without any summary method of obtaining compensation, none being provided by the Jamaica legislature.

69. This exemption, so far as apprentices are concerned, should be extended to all official fees.

71. The allowance of this Act did not of course authorize the enactments of subsequent Acts, until approved and allowed by a fresh order in Court.

55. Enacts that persons entitled to the services of apprentices on plantations containing less than 40 apprentices, shall be at liberty to take an offender before a special justice at the nearest place where he may happen to be sitting, and such apprentices may in like manner prefer their complaints, provided that after the appointment of police stations such offences and complaints from such plantations may be heard at such stations.

59. Abolishes Sunday markets, and gives the Saturday in each week to the prædial labourer in lieu thereof, and provides that persons engaged in works of necessity, tending of cattle, domestic services, or in protecting property, shall have some other day in lieu of Saturday.

60. Enacts that in all cases of "urgent necessity," the continuous labour of the apprentice may be compelled during the emergency.

61. Exempts from arrest or imprisonment for debt, and from service in the militia, and deprives the apprentice of the right to serve as a juror.—Vide Imp. Act, sec. 22.

68. Applies all fines and penalties to the use of the public.

69. Provides that no stamp duties shall be paid on documents required by this Act.

71. Enacts that this Act may be altered or explained by any other Act during the session.

JAMAICA, (No. 2.)

Allowed in a Despatch, dated 15th January 1835.

Passed 4th July 1834; expired 31st December 1835.

No. 2.
Analysis of
Abolition Acts.

Notes and References.Sections.

3, 4. No provision appears to be made in this or the preceding Act for cases in which the owners are unknown, or absent from the colony.

5, 6. The penalty on violating this clause appears from the preceding Act, s. 49, to be 5 l.; by the Slave Code, s. 23, offences of a similar kind were punishable by a fine of 50 l.

7. As the vestry is composed for the most part of planters, or certainly of persons liable to the parochial burdens, they cannot be considered impartial judges in this matter. It is not too much to suppose such a concert between them as may either put an end to voluntary manumissions, or encourage them, so as to throw a considerable number of helpless individuals, protected by the 7th section of the Imperial Act, on their own resources. This duty should devolve on special magistrates, whose decisions should in each case be reported to the governor. The Slave Code, s. 20, compels the former owner of manumitted slaves, unable to work, to provide for their maintenance, at the rate of 10 l. per annum, subject to a penalty of 100 l.

8. This clause appears to be an infringement of the Imperial Act, section 11, which secures to the apprentice, in all cases, at least the same medical assistance as he formerly enjoyed; cases of pretended illness require the oath of the medical attendant.

9. This clause is unnecessarily severe, especially for injuries short of destruction; and vide the objections to such enactments more fully stated in the Jamaica Petty Trespass Act, s. 1.

10. Vide Jam. Act, (No. 1.) ss. 60 and 49, for the punishment of illegally imposing task-work. Remuneration, where demanded, ought to be given to apprentices so employed.

11, 12, 13. Experience has already shown that these enactments are not sufficient for the protection of the magistrates; civil and criminal proceedings against special magistrates should be tried before a judge and jury totally unconnected with apprenticeship property; and, as public servants placed in an invidious position, their defence, except where proceedings are brought against them by apprentices, should be officially conducted by the Crown officers, subject nevertheless to the ordinary costs, damages and penalties on conviction or verdict against them; vide the recent case of Maclean v. Bourne, reported in the "Jamaica Watchman" of 23d January 1836.

0. 58.

1, 2. Rectify the date in s. 4, Jamaica Act, (No. 1.)

3, 4. Enable trustees and others possessed of limited interests in apprentices voluntarily to discharge them, and direct that appraisement shall be made in such cases by two justices, one of whom shall be a special, and the other a common, justice.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 7.

5, 6. Fix the hours of prædial labour, subject however to private contracts, to commence at sun-rise and end at sun-set, allowing such repose as shall leave nine hours per day for labour, which hours of labour are to be indicated by an appointed signal.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 16.

7. Enacts that an apprentice about to be voluntarily discharged by his master, and not being above 50 years of age, shall be brought by him before the vestry, to be approved and recorded as capable of maintaining himself, in default of which the employer shall be still liable, in case of need, for support and maintenance.—Vide Imp. Act, s. 7.

8. Enacts that medical assistance shall be administered in the hospital of the plantations, and that absence from labour under pretence of illness shall be made up to the employer; provided that where there is no hospital, the apprentice shall receive such medical assistance as is now customary.

9. Punishes the wanton destruction or injury of fruit and other trees, houses or out-houses, by hard labour in the house of correction or penal gang, for a term not exceeding three months, or by stripes not exceeding 39; or, if a female, by hard labour, not exceeding 20 days.

10. Defines the words "urgent necessity" to be cases of hurricane, tempest, earthquake, flood, fire, or other misfortune, the act of God, and which could not have been prevented by the employer; and makes any other construction an offence against the Act.

11, 12, 13. Protect the special magistrates by enactments similar to those enjoyed by justices in England.

14. 16. Punish

14. 16. The remarks on clause 36 Jam. Act, (No. 1), apply to these two clauses.

17. This clause is open to the objections urged against the enactments of the Jamaica Act in aid of the Gaol Act, in similar cases.

18, 19. If this power be necessary, it should belong to the governor alone, and be exercised by him on his own official responsibility; nothing, however, seems to justify the destruction of the property of the offenders. The punishment of an apprentice merely on proof of his having inhabited such a settlement (an offence which appears to be retrospective) seems altogether unreasonable. No single justice should have the power of summarily inflicting the heavy punishment hereby proposed.

20. The arbitrary character of this clause, so far as it applies to apprentices, is inconsistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act. If penalties are necessary in such cases, they ought to be inflicted only on sufficient evidence of guilty knowledge, or on refusal or neglect to produce the apprentice after a regular summons from the special justice; and the penalty should be proportioned to the circumstances of the offender, and to the actual loss sustained by the master.

Under the clause as it now stands, the entire property of a husband or wife, a parent or child, may be swept away, and additional imprisonment be imposed, for the venial offence of harbouring each other under some supposed or real ill treatment of the master. By the law of England, the wife at all events would be protected in such cases.

21. This clause defeats the object of the Imperial Act, by depriving the apprentice of the full benefit of the cultivation of his provision-grounds during the last year of his apprenticeship. It cannot be justified as a regulation authorized by the Imperial Act of Abolition, since it does not come into operation until after the expiration of the apprenticeship, and as a part of the general law of the colony, it is obviously partial and unjust; vide also remarks on s. 45, 46, Jamaica Act (No. 1) as to time for removal of stock and crop.

14. 16. Punish apprentices aiding others in clandestinely quitting the island, by imprisonment, with hard labour not exceeding three months, and, if a male, by whipping not exceeding 50 stripes or three months' imprisonment with hard labour. And require apprentices whose ordinary occupation is on the sea, to be registered as such, under pain, if without consent of employer, of imprisonment with hard labour, for not less than six weeks, nor more than three months, or whipping not exceeding 39 stripes.

17. Enacts that an apprentice absent without consent for one week, shall be reported a deserter, and a reward of 20 s. being paid for his apprehension, shall be repaid out of the deserter's own time.

18, 19. Enact that if it be made to appear, to the satisfaction of any two special justices, that any apprentices have, without lawful authority, established themselves in any part of the island as a distinct community, habitually abandoning and neglecting to perform the duties imposed on them by law, such justices shall cause any such communities to be dislodged by the police of the district, and, if necessary, shall also cause their settlements to be taken down and destroyed, and any apprentice convicted of having been a member of such community, shall be imprisoned with hard labour for any term not exceeding six months, and, if a male, be so imprisoned, or receive 30 lashes in lieu thereof.

20. Enacts that persons harbouring, concealing, or clandestinely or fraudulently employing any apprentice absent without leave, shall upon conviction pay a fine of 10 l. currency to the person entitled to his services, and the further sum of 10 s. currency for every day of his detention, and the party accused may be examined on oath touching the matter of complaint, and after a 10 days' summons and non-appearance shall suffer judgment by default, and on failure of payment of the penalties, be imprisoned in the common gaol for a period not exceeding six months; and, if necessary, the special justice may issue either a search-warrant for the apprehension of the apprentice, or a summons to the party accused, requiring him to deliver up such apprentice; and the apprentice, on apprehension, shall be liable to a whipping not exceeding 39 stripes, or, if a female, to solitary confinement not exceeding 10 days, or to hard labour not exceeding three months; or, if a non-prædial apprentice, to make any other satisfaction to the employer. Proviso excepting Saturdays and other days belonging to prædial apprentices from the operation of this clause, unless due notice be given by the employer.

21. Enacts that apprentices refusing to quit any land, dwelling or building held by them as apprentices, at the expiration of their apprenticeship, three months' notice having been previously given to quit, may be ejected by any two justices as trespassers, and be punished by a fine not exceeding 10 l., or by imprisonment not exceeding 30 days.

Notes and References.

22. This clause, which gives the power of unlimited punishment to special justices, is manifestly repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act, and to general justice: its practical effect on the flogging of females renders it peculiarly objectionable.

23. Such contracts as these should be regarded with jealousy: like all others between masters and apprentices, they should be reduced to writing, sanctioned by a special justice, and attached to his official returns.

24. It seems unreasonable to enforce all the provisions of the apprenticeship system during such a state of things as would justify the proclamation of Martial Law.

26. Vide remarks on Jamaica Act, No. 1, s. 44.

27. Vide remarks on Jamaica Act, No. 1, s. 49.

28. As the Jamaica Act, No. 1, will be reinstated on the expiration of this Act, subject to the allowance of a new Order in Council, a convenient opportunity will then be afforded of introducing such amendments as will make it more consonant with the spirit and intention of the Imperial Act.

Subsequently to the making of the above comment this Act has expired, and in the absence of another amended Act the original Act revives; subject, however, to the provisions of the Imperial Abolition Act.

Sections.

22. Enables any special justice to substitute any given number of hours of work on the tread-mill, in any house of correction or otherwise, for any of the punishments imposed by this or any other Act on apprenticed labourers, as he in his discretion shall consider necessary and proper.

23. Enables the employer and the apprentice, with the sanction of the special justice, to contract for money to be paid in lieu of clothing, and other maintenance and allowances.

24. Enacts that this Act shall continue in operation during Martial Law.

26. Defines "crimes and misdemeanors," mentioned in Jamaica Act, No. 1, s. 44, to be such as are cognisable by one magistrate when committed by any other subject.

27. Reserves the right of apprentices to proceed by indictment or otherwise, under Jamaica Act, No. 1, s. 49.

28. Enacts that this Act shall expire on December 31st, 1835.

JAMAICA (No. 3), Disallowed.—Passed 22 November 1834.

Notes and References.Sections.

2, 3. This clause, being calculated to put an end to compulsory manumission, was a manifest violation of the Imperial Act, s. 3.

4. This clause would have deprived the negro of the advantage of regular hours of labour and repose, in direct violation of the Imp. Act, s. 16 (No. 3), and Jamaica Act, (No. 2), ss. 5, 6.

5. This clause would have deprived the negro of the maintenance enjoined by the Imperial Act, s. 16 (No. 3), and provided by various clauses of the two preceding Colonial Acts.

1. Repeals ss. 27. 39. 44. 68, Jamaica Act, No. 1.

2. Enacts that an apprentice convicted of robbery or theft during his apprenticeship, shall not be discharged by appraisement until three years after his conviction; and in case of any like charge against an apprentice, all proceedings in the appraisement shall be stayed until the matter is determined.

3. Enacts that in all cases the ratio of valuation shall be two-thirds of the annual value of the apprentice, multiplied into the residue of the term.

4. Enacts that the employer may so regulate the hours of labour as to enable him to carry on the manufacture of sugar during 18 hours out of the 24: provided that no apprentice shall be compelled to work for more than 9 hours out of the 24, nor to labour in his own time.

5. Enacts, that a proprietor, after six months' notice to the apprentices, and to the nearest special justice, of his intention to abandon the cultivation of an estate, shall, at the expiration of that time, be relieved from the further maintenance of such apprentices; and in such case the special justices shall remove such apprentices from the estate, leaving to them the choice of other masters: provided that agricultural labourers shall not remove to towns, nor relinquish agricultural labour

6. This clause would have given jurisdiction to the general magistrates, in direct violation of the Imperial Act, ss. 17, 18, 19.

7. This clause would have still further restricted the apprentice's enjoyment of his own time and right of locomotion, in violation of the spirit of the Imperial Act, and of the Draft Order in Council.

8, 9. This clause would have appropriated a larger portion of the benefit of penal labour to the master, in direct violation of the policy of the Imperial Act.

10. The extreme severity of this clause rendered it wholly inadmissible, especially as provisions had been previously made for the same species of offence in the preceding Acts.

11. The unreasonableness and severity of this clause renders it inadmissible, especially as riot or combined resistance to the laws had been amply provided for by preceding Acts.

12. The wanton destruction of property, authorized by this clause, was altogether at variance with the spirit of the Imperial Act.

13. This clause would have been open to stronger objections than those urged against s. 39 Jamaica Act (No. 2), and s. 5 of this Act, and was inconsistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act.

16. This clause appears to have included all descriptions of public meetings (those for religious worship only excepted), and was quite inconsistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act.

17. This clause would have neutralized all the "protective" provisions of the Imperial Act, and was a direct violation of its spirit.

18. This clause appears to be at variance with the policy of the Imperial Act, and might have endangered the welfare of the negro.

19. This labour, unless the special justices shall be satisfied of their ability to maintain themselves there; and on their refusal to remove from the estate, they are to be deemed vagabonds, and punished accordingly.

6. Gives to the court of quarter sessions the same jurisdiction over apprentices offending as in the case of free persons.

7. Re-enacts s. 27 Imperial Act, No. 1, but with material alterations; viz. an apprentice wandering "as a vagabond" may be apprehended by "an estate or other constable," and brought before "the nearest justice." The exceptions as to Divine worship are limited to the "the Sabbath-day;" as to markets to the "Saturday" market, and to or from "provision-grounds" during the time allotted to them as their own.

8, 9. Enacts that with the permission of the owner or manager, penal gangs shall be established on the plantations, and apprentices offending be made to work in them; and that the same may be abolished by the authority of the special justice.

10. Enacts that watchmen wilfully absent from their posts, or guilty of negligence, shall make good by their labour any loss arising therefrom, or receive any number of stripes not exceeding 50; but the mulct is limited to 30 days' labour for neglect of duty.

11. Enacts five or more apprentices going in a body to complain, without a written authority from their employer, shall be committed to gaol; and if it appear to the special justice that they quitted home without justifiable cause, the males shall be publicly whipped, with not exceeding 39 stripes; the females committed to solitary confinement for not exceeding 10 days, or to work in the penal gang for not exceeding one month.

12. Authorizes the proprietor or manager to destroy hogs or goats straying over the cultivated portions of the plantation.

13. Re-enacts s. 39 Jamaica Act (No. 1) with material alterations; viz. it excepts only from among loiterers "the wives of apprentices legally married." It directs that immediate notice shall be given to the special justice, but expressly authorizes the employer to detain the offender after the expiration of 24 hours, in case the special justice shall not attend, and take such offender before the nearest justice, who may either authorize a further detention or commit the offender to gaol or the house of correction, to be dealt with according to law.

14. Re-enacts s. 44 Jamaica Act (No. 1), but makes it optional and not imperative upon the special justice so to proceed.

16. Prohibits apprentices from attending or voting at any public meeting.

17. Gives a right of appeal from the decision of the special justice to the supreme or assize courts.

18. Enables the employer and the apprentice, in case of doubt, to agree between themselves as to the class to which the apprentice shall belong.

19. Prohibits

Abolition Acts.

19. This clause would have occasioned an arbitrary interference with the time and amusements of the apprentice, and is quite inconsistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act.

21. This clause would have given a most unwarrantable discretion to the special justice, and was altogether inconsistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act.

22. This clause was a direct infraction of one of the most important provisions of the Imperial Act.—Vide s. 17.

23. This clause would have restored an objectionable part of the old system of punishment, and was inconsistent with the Imperial Act.

25. This clause was bad in principle, and would have authorized the infliction of punishment at variance with the spirit of the Imperial Act, and the letter of Jamaica Act (No. 2), s. 20.

19. Prohibits, under penalties of insubordination, all meetings or revels, and the use of drums, gamboys or other noisy instruments, without the consent of the employer, between nine o'clock in the evening and four o'clock in the morning.

20. Enacts the mode of levying of fines under s. 20 Jamaica Act (No. 1), and in default of payment authorizes imprisonment not exceeding six months.

21. Authorizes special justices to punish minor offences by keeping apprentices to regular labour during the day, with confinement at night, for such period as they may think fit.

22. Authorizes the correction of females under the age of 10 years with a strap or switch.

23. Authorizes securing offenders in the bilboes according to former custom.

24. Fixes the 25th and 26th December and Good Friday as holidays.

25. For refusing to assist, or wilfully withholding assistance, in case of fire, inflicts the punishment of whipping not exceeding 50 stripes, and hard labour in the penal gang for any period not exceeding three months, or, if a female offender, solitary confinement for any period not exceeding 14 days, in addition to hard labour as aforesaid.

26. Enforces by further provision the payment of fines for offences under the several Abolition Acts, or Acts passed in aid thereof.

By a Despatch, dated the 20th of February 1834, Mr. Stanley, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, after announcing that His Majesty's Government, on the fullest consideration of the principles and details of the Jamaica Act (No. 1), had arrived at the conviction that the legislature of Jamaica had faithfully and effectually enacted the abolition of slavery, and had also framed the supplementary enactments requisite during the immediate state of apprenticeship, proceeded, with some apparent inconsistency, to point out various serious defects in the Act which he was thus prepared to sanction. His suggestions, however, assuming the tone of amicable compromise, rather than that of solemn compact between the parties, and arguing the propriety, instead of insisting on the necessity, of the proposed modifications, met with the fate which might have been easily anticipated from legislators whose right to compensation had been already rendered indefeasible.

THE AMENDMENTS proposed were as follow:

1. The rectification of an error as to the date of classification.
2. The completion of the machinery of manumission.
3. The making estate constables independent of the authority of their masters, and limiting the power of imprisonment on estates.
4. The limitation of the magistrate's power in cases of "minor misdemeanors and offences." (Vide Jam. Slave Act, s. 129.)
5. The specific application to employers of the clause punishing frivolous complaints; and the insertion of a clause as to the residence of apprentices, analogous to the British Guiana Ordinance, c. 6, s. 2.
6. The limitation of the terms "urgent necessity" to certain specific emergencies.
7. The protection of special justices.
8. The appropriation of some portion of the fine on employers as a compensation for the wrongs done by them to apprentices.
9. The reservation to apprentices of the right of proceeding criminally in the ordinary courts for injuries inflicted by employers.

To which, accompanied by a slight notice of the loose manner in which provision was made for the maintenance of the apprentices generally, was added a suggestion of the propriety of providing specifically for cases of sickness.

Of the proposed Amendments several were embodied in the Amendment No. 2; but that which relates to manumission is still left imperfect. The unconstitutional power of estate constables, virtually involving the irresponsible power of punishment for minor offences, is still retained. Unnecessary restraints on residence, and consequently on locomotion, are left as before. Compensation to the injured apprentice out of the fines is not granted. Maintenance, as to quantities, qualities, and specific regulations, remain as loosely secured as before; and even the customary medical assistance appears to have undergone some restriction.

Nor is this all: the opportunity afforded by the passing of a new Act was embraced to introduce fresh objectionable matter, the repugnances of which have been already exposed in the preceding analysis of the Act No. 2. The unconstitutional power given to the justice by s. 20, of examining the party accused on oath, touching the matter of accusation; but especially the virtual infraction in s. 22 of the prohibition to flog females, requires a moment's further notice. That such an infraction of the Imperial Act, s. 17, is really authorized by this section, may be shown as follows: The Imperial Act prohibits the whipping or beating of females for any offence whatever, except under some law or police regulation in force against and applicable to all other persons of free condition. It appears that the whipping of free females is allowed in houses of correction and workhouses; but this disgraceful discipline is, of course, restricted to unfortunate persons confined in those places by virtue of some general law. Now the offence which occasions the incarceration of the apprenticed female is committed against no general law, but is a simple violation of some apprenticeship enactment, not applicable to free females, and for the infraction of which they would never incur the risk of this coercive treatment. The attempt to distinguish between the original sentence of imprisonment and the discipline that may and most probably will follow upon it, (the offence committed being no offence against a general law of the colony,) is a mere evasion, though hitherto a successful one, of one of the most peremptory and stringent provisions of the Imperial Legislature.

Notwithstanding the incompleteness of this Act as an Act in aid, its fresh objectionable enactments, and its limited duration, it appears, from a despatch of Lord Aberdeen of the 15th January 1835, to have been accepted as a satisfactory compliance with the suggestions previously conveyed; with an instruction, however, that until the enactments of this second Act were made commensurate with the duration of the first Act, the Legislature of Jamaica could not be considered as having fully acquitted themselves of their duty.

The passing of the Act No. 3, above analyzed, and the subsequent conduct of the Jamaica House of Assembly on the question of the revival of the Act No. 2, which, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Home Government and of the colonial governor, had been suffered to expire, removed all further motives for delicacy in treating with this refractory colony, as it plainly demonstrates the want of good faith, so long and so loudly complained of by the friends of the enfranchised negroes. It now remains to be decided by a competent tribunal, whether laws of the character already exhibited in the preceding analysis are to be accepted as an adequate and satisfactory fulfilment of the conditions upon which 20,000,000 l. sterling have been paid by the mother country.

That this solemn inquiry should have been relieved by its own peculiar circumstances from the difficulties incident to ordinary cases of colonial interposition, involving no solemn compact between the parties, and the defence of no great constitutional rights, must be considered a favourable omen of its successful issue. The public will, in the meantime, be pleased to remember, that the analysis now presented to them is but a small specimen of colonial legislation; a part only, and perhaps not even the most important part, of the legislation of a single colony.

The laws of 19 colonies, in many respects equally objectionable with those already commented upon, must undergo the same inquiry; and the practice arising out of all these laws requires to be strictly examined. Beyond all this, but yet forming the most important field of investigation, lie those permanent laws which are to fix the future condition of the negroes, and to determine the future fate of our colonies; to decide, in short, whether, in return for the enormous price that has been paid, the negroes shall henceforth be treated as free members of a great empire, and be put into substantial possession of the common rights and privileges of British subjects.

VAGRANCY.

THE importance of this subject to the future welfare of the negroes may justify a few general remarks as an accompaniment to the analysis of the Jamaica Vagrant Act. Vagrant laws are legitimately intended for the maintenance of order among the lower classes, for the increase of productive labour, and for the protection of particular localities liable to the support of the indigent. The first of these objects is in all communities of the greatest consequence; the two latter depend for their importance on the peculiar circumstances of each particular community. A community, for instance, comprising a superabundant peasantry, encumbered with local burdens liable to be indefinitely increased by vagrancy, possessing few unreclaimed lands, and no means of subsistence except regular labour, where public opinion, at the same time, is sufficient to restrain extraordinary abuses of discretionary power, presents a very different case for the application of a vagrant law, and justifies a very different system of control, from a community whose circumstances are either wholly diverse from these or in which the same circumstances exist only in a minor degree. A like observation applies to different historical periods of the same community, and hence the changes which from time to time have been made by our own Legislature on this subject. Thus the 3d Geo. 4, c. 40 amends, and the 5th Geo. 4, c. 83 repeals, all preceding Vagrant Acts, and the latter statute entirely remodels the English vagrant law. The condition and policy of this country differ in all the particulars above mentioned from those of Jamaica, just as the present circumstances of that colony differ likewise from those of any preceding period. A vagrant law, therefore, suited to the actual condition of England, or to the past condition of Jamaica, offers no correct model of present legislation for that colony. Now the Jamaica legislators appear to have overlooked this principle altogether, or by mistaking the peculiarities of their own condition, to have given it a very mischievous application. The Jamaica Act consists chiefly of a selection, ingeniously prepared, of the most stringent provisions of past and present British Vagrant Acts, the protective character of which is, however, completely destroyed by the omission of many of the most important qualifications and exceptions, and by the introduction of new provisions greatly enlarging the power of the magistrate, and proportionably diminishing the personal freedom of the negro. The circumstances under which this Act was passed and the character of the legislators, explain but do not justify such enactments. The Jamaica Vagrant Act immediately succeeds a system of slavery, and is the production of minds long enured to the vices of that system. It proposes to establish a legal and permanent system of restraint for one which was lawless in its nature and uncertain in its duration. It might be expected, therefore, to exhibit, as it undoubtedly does, an utter distrust of the negro race, and an inveterate clinging to inordinate power; but it should have been remembered that distrust was mutual, and that undue authority established by law is doubly injurious. Under pretext of a general law, the negroes are still manifestly the objects of peculiar coercion; for the number of European labourers in the colony was much too inconsiderable to be contemplated in such provisions, and the magistrates possess besides an express power of remitting the punishment in favour of whomsoever they please.

It is impossible not to perceive, on the most cursory perusal, that the necessary consequence, if not the intended effect of this statute, is at variance with the legitimate objects of the vagrant law. It is neither calculated to secure social order, nor to promote free labour, nor even to relieve local burdens; but under colour of all those, it is manifestly calculated to establish an oppression closely resembling that for which it has been substituted. It may be considered virtually to amount to an imprisonment of the negroes in their respective parishes, with the perpetual privation of arms, and even of such necessary implements as may be drawn within the meaning of "offensive weapons," the use of which, and even of the freeman's right of locomotion, are made to depend wholly on the arbitrary construction of a magistrate. By the restrictions put upon migration, the time, industry and talents of the negroes are virtually placed at the disposal of the territorial proprietor, upon whom the negroes are thus rendered absolutely dependent for their very subsistence. And by the erection of an inquisitorial surveillance over the minutest movements, circumstances and conduct of the negroes, accompanied with the power of examining upon oath the party accused as to the matter of accusation, and of inflicting loss of property and of personal liberty with corporal punishment at discretion, a magisterial despotism is established, which, if permitted to continue, may leave the friends of slavery little to regret at its extinction. That such a law should have been permitted to pass by the late Governor of Jamaica can only be explained by its colourable resemblance to the English statutes, and by the absence of that precaution which should have maturely weighed its various details. It will not, indeed, be questioned that great difficulties exist in framing laws adapted to a state of transition from slavery to freedom, nor, perhaps, that some unusual restraints upon the liberty of the new-made freemen, if intrusted to proper hands, might be temporarily advisable, but no disinterested person can pretend to justify the investment of those individuals, whose abuse of lawless power made its abolition imperative, with a legal and a permanent authority over their former bondsmen, differing little except in name from the system for which it is substituted. The friends of emancipation, after having consented to pay so costly a price for the absolute freedom of the slaves, will not consider the compact completed by their being converted into mere "serfs," and left dependent as before on the discretion of their task-masters for all that can make life or liberty valuable. From such a specimen of colonial legislation as this Act exhibits, they will naturally conclude that the abolition of an avowed system of slavery is but the commencement of their work, and that the more important part remains to be accomplished, in securing to the negroes, by wise and just enactments, permanently administered by impartial and responsible functionaries, the substance of that liberty which has been so dearly purchased.

VAGRANT ACT:—Passed 12th December 1833; disallowed.

Notes and References.

1. THE nature of these former Vagrant Acts ought to be fully ascertained; one of them, 31 Car. 2, c. 11, very properly limits its operation to persons not having the means of subsistence, a condition which (with whatever else is valuable in them) ought to be adopted into the present Act, and the remainder be repealed. It will be seen, by subsequent clauses, that the justices under this Act have a discretion to send offenders either to the house of correction or the common gaol.

2. "Threatening" to run away, &c. is an ambiguous term, and has been erased from the English statutes. The 5th Geo. 4, c. 83, requires that the wife, and children, &c. should be actually chargeable.

Being without visible means of employment is a singular expression; it may happen without any default or neglect of the the party. "Prostitutes and night-walkers" must be behaving in a "riotous or indecent manner" to incur punishment under 5th Geo. 4, c. 83. Inability to "show any visible means of employment" applies not only to blameless causes of inability to procure or to perform it, but to cases of sufficient wealth to do without it, none of which cases ought to be involved in such a punishment. Under no impartial system, indeed, can this single fact

Section.

1. DECLARES the expediency of amending the laws now in force relating to idle and disorderly persons, rogues and vagabonds, incorrigible rogues and other vagrants, and authorises the justices and vestry of each parish to build or otherwise provide houses of correction with treadmills and such like necessary implements in every district.

2. Enacts that all persons "threatening" to run away and leave wife or children chargeable without visible means of support, all persons able to work and thereby or by other means to maintain themselves and families, who wilfully refuse or neglect so to do. All persons not having any visible means of "employment," and thereby becoming chargeable; all persons returning, after legal removal, without a certificate, and becoming chargeable; all common "prostitutes or night-walkers" wandering in public streets or highways, not giving a satisfactory account of themselves, and all persons who cannot show any visible means of "employment," shall be deemed idle and disorderly, and may be committed to the house of correction, by a single justice, to hard labour for fact amount to more than a presumption of culpability, which must be accompanied by other facts to justify punishment. But the apparent object of such a provision is to compel all negroes without distinction to labour at the discretion of the magistrate.

3. Merely "wandering" abroad without a home is nowhere punished by the 5th Geo. 4, c. 83. "Playing or betting" under that statute, s. 4, must be in some open or public place, with some table or other instrument, at some game or pretended game of chance. Running away and leaving wife, &c. must, under that statute, be attended or followed by actual chargeability. "Wandering pedlars and petty chapmen" are punished by the same statute, s. 3, only when unlicensed, and then only as idle and disorderly; this is a mere "revenue protection." Wandering abroad and lodging in inhabited houses and buildings is nowhere punished in that statute, and lodging about in other descriptions of places is only punished, s. 4, in connection with another most important circumstance of suspicion, viz. the offender "not having any visible means of subsistence." The object of the Jamaica clauses in making these alterations is obviously to place all negroes, without exception, who happen to travel, at the disposal of the magistrate. "Obscene exposure of the person," under that statute, s. 4, must be "with intent to insult a female." West Indians surely need not be more fastidious. "Wandering abroad to beg," unaccompanied with exposure of wounds, &c. under that statute, s. 3, is only considered as "idle and disorderly;" and by s. 4 of the same statute, a person must be "armed with" an offensive weapon, or have upon him an instrument "with intent to commit a felonious act," to constitute him an offender. The alteration in the Jamaica clause is plainly to prevent all negroes from possessing arms. Being found in a house, &c. must, under the same s. 4, be for an unlawful purpose. The object of this variation is plainly, among others, to prevent intercourse between the negroes of different plantations "frequenting places of public resort," &c. with intent, &c. is confined by the same s. 4 of the English statute, to suspected persons or reputed thieves, a most important condition for the protection of humble but well-disposed persons who, throughout the whole of the Jamaica Act, are placed at the mercy of informers and magistrates. As a lie is a "false representation," and is seldom employed but for some supposed "advantage;" every falsehood subjects the offender to be dealt with as "a rogue and vagabond." The language of this provision, to say the least, is extremely careless.

4. To constitute this offence, the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 5, requires that the offender should "break and escape from a place of legal confinement," being apprehended as, &c. &c.; or that he should violently resist "a constable or other peace-officer," and be afterwards convicted of the original charge. Under the Jamaica Act, on the contrary, a person apprehended by any private individual, and not even informed of the cause of his apprehension, if he escape from his apprehender, or refuse to submit to an examination which no justice has a right to require, or misrepresent any fact on that examination, or do not appear after being bound over for that purpose, may, without conviction of the original charge, whatever that charge may be, at once be adjudged an "incorrigible rogue," and punished accordingly. The design of this despotic clause is obviously to compel the appearance at all times of the object of magisterial suspicion for one week, or if by three justices, for one calendar month. Provided that no person shall be removed from a parish after a continued residence of above six months.

3. Enacts (inter alia) that all persons "wandering" in the woods without a home, or on the public roads or places, or settling on lands, or lurking on estates or settlements without permission, or playing or betting at any unlawful game, or running away and leaving wife and children chargeable or without any visible means of support; all petty chapmen and pedlars wandering abroad; "all persons wandering abroad, and lodging in taverns and negro-houses or huts," not giving a good account of themselves; all persons openly and indecently exposing their persons, and all persons wandering abroad, or placing themselves in public places to beg alms, or encouraging children so to do, or exposing wounds or deformities for the same purpose; or having in possession any cutlass, bludgeon or other "offensive weapon," with intent "to assault or commit any other illegal act;" or who shall be found in any dwelling-house, out-house, negro-house or enclosed place, and not able to give a good account of themselves; all persons who shall frequent any place of public resort with intent to commit felony; and all persons imposing or endeavouring to impose upon any private individual, by any false representation, verbal or in writing, with a view to obtain some advantage or benefit, shall be deemed "rogues and vagabonds."

4. Enacts (inter alia) that all persons apprehended as rogues and vagabonds, and escaping from the persons apprehending them, or refusing to go before a justice to be examined by him, or knowingly giving a false account of themselves on such examination, or being accused of any offence against this Act, and bound in recognizance to appear at the next general or quarter sessions, who shall neglect to appear accordingly, and all convicted rogues and vagabonds again committing any offence under this Act, shall be deemed "incorrigible rogues."

or displeasure, and to extort either a statement of circumstances or a confession of guilt. The same section 4 of the English statute requires that in case of a double conviction, each offence should be of being "a rogue and a vagabond" to constitute the offender an "incorrigible rogue."

5. The loose wording of this clause (like section 6 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 83,) enables any person to apprehend another on mere report, and even rewards the apprehender for his voluntary interference. The 17 Geo. 2, c. 5, in like manner gave a reward, which was very properly repealed by 3 Geo. 4, c. 40. To prevent vexatious detention the "nearest" justice should have been applied to, and as he is authorised to reward the apprehender, he ought in like manner to be required to award damages where the apprehension turns out to be without reasonable cause. An action or indictment for such a purpose would be both expensive and uncertain.

6. A clause so unconstitutional and inquisitorial as this cannot be suffered to remain. It seems to have been suggested by a clause in the 17 Geo. 2, c. 5, enabling the magistrate to examine the offender touching his condition and circumstances, and the place of his settlement, with a view to making out the necessary pass which is here perverted to the purpose of self-crimination. It may be doubted whether such a discretion as that contained in this proviso ought ever to be intrusted to the magistrate, especially as it may be applied to the purpose of making invidious distinctions between European and African labourers.

7. This clause ought to have required, as in 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 8, for the security and satisfaction of the offender, that all searches should be made in his presence, and that the money found should be first applied before proceeding to the sale of his effects; and where a sale takes place it should be by public auction, or at least by appraisement.

9. The punishment by 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 10, is limited to one year's imprisonment to hard labour and one whipping. But by this clause the justices have the power of whipping as often and as much as they please; and a second offence of this class receives a double punishment.

5. Enacts (inter alia) that if any person shall be found offending against this Act, it shall be lawful for any person whomsoever, without warrant, to apprehend and convey the offender, with horse and cart, before any justice; and authorises the justices to reward the person so apprehending with a premium of 10 s. for each person so apprehended.

6. Enacts that on the bringing of any rogue and vagabond, or incorrigible rogue, before any three justices, it shall be lawful for such justices, and he or they are hereby required to inform himself or themselves by examination of the person or persons so apprehended, or of any other person, upon oath, of the matter alleged and charged against the person or persons so apprehended, and in proof thereof to commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction to hard labour, until the next general or quarter sessions, or for not exceeding three months nor less than one month; provided that the justices may discharge at their discretion any rogue and vagabond, or idle disorderly persons, although an act of vagrancy be proved against them; provided also, that in such case the justices may at their discretion bind over persons so discharged to appear and answer at the next general or quarter sessions.

7. Enacts that any three justices adjudging any person to be a rogue and vagabond, or incorrigible rogue, shall cause him to be searched, and his trunks, boxes, bundles, parcels and packages, to be inspected in the presence of such justices, and his person to be searched, together with any vehicle found in his possession or use; and order any money found to be paid, or so much of his effects to be sold as shall defray all expenses of sale, apprehension and punishment, returning the overplus, if any, to the offender.

9. Enacts that where an offender has been committed as aforesaid until the next general or quarter sessions, and is convicted by the justices thereof as a rogue and vagabond, or as an incorrigible rogue, they may further detain such rogue and vagabond to hard labour for not exceeding six calendar months, and such incorrigible rogue for not exceeding one year nor less than six calendar months, together with whipping (not being a female) at such times and places within their jurisdiction as they in their discretion may think fit, and if such offender shall have been before adjudged an "incorrigible rogue," then for not exceeding two years with hard labour and whipping as aforesaid.

Notes and References.Sections.

11. Although warrants of this general nature may be sometimes used in England, they seem very unfit to be employed in a colony where so much antipathy exists towards the negro population. But, however this may be, it certainly is wholly opposed to law and justice that the suspected persons should be examined in the manner authorised by this Act, and that a mere presumption of being idle and disorderly, solely arising out of the doubts or dissatisfaction of the justices, and uncorroborated by other circumstances of suspicion, should subject the most harmless and even respectable individuals to the severest penalties of the vagrant law, and this injustice is rendered still greater by the almost entire impunity afforded to errors and abuses committed in the execution of this Act by a subsequent clause, vide sec. 16. It may be here repeated that the whole Act is defective in not making the "want of visible means" as in the English statute more generally requisite to the magistrate's interference.

14. The object of providing a form of conviction is not only to instruct the officer who executed it, but to furnish direct evidence of the magistrates decision as well for the protection of the offender as for other purposes; the form here provided, contrary to all the precedents, omits the part most essential for the purposes intended. It contains no adjudication of punishment; and, even if that were added, a copy only of the conviction, which might be easily falsified and not the conviction itself (as in the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 17), is all that is required at the sessions.

15. A clause similar to this sec. 27, is inserted into the first Jamaica Abolition Act; it would be difficult to assign a precise meaning to it, or to ascertain in what degree it protects the negro.

16. The 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 18, limits this protection to civil actions, and to a judgment in favour of the defendant. It is certainly contrary to common right to extend such a protection to criminal proceedings, the meaning of the accused party being exculpated (not acquitted), and the accuser having his application in any manner whatever "dismissed or ended" is extremely ambiguous. As the clause now stands, it seems calculated to give impunity to all sorts of oppression.

It may be remarked that no protection is afforded to the accused party against the abuse of justice (as in sec. 14 of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83) by appeal to the quarter sessions. It is true that the English Act only empowers the justice on sufficient surety found to set the convicted party at liberty, but in the Jamaica Act this ought to be rendered imperative.

11. Enables any justice on information on oath, that any idle disorderly persons, rogues and vagabonds, or incorrigible rogues, or are reasonably suspected to be harboured or concealed in any house or houses kept or purporting to be kept for the reception and lodging of any poor traveller or travellers, by warrant to authorise any constable or other person or persons to enter such house or houses at any time, and to bring before any three justices all persons found therein and suspected as aforesaid, and if, on examining the persons so apprehended, it shall appear to such justices that they or any or either of them cannot give a satisfactory account of themselves, to commit her or them to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be dealt with as rogues and vagabonds, or as incorrigible rogues.

14. After enacting that no proceeding shall be quashed for want of form, sets out a form of conviction for "rogues and vagabonds" and "incorrigible rogues," but none for "idle and disorderly" persons, and the form inserted contains no adjudication of punishment. It requires also that a fair transcript of this conviction shall be transmitted by the convicting justice or justices to the next general or quarter sessions, and filed and kept on record; a copy of which transcript duly certified by the clerk of the peace is made legal evidence.

15. Enacts that nothing herein shall interfere with the apprentices' own time, as settled by first Jamaica Act of Abolition, or be deemed to interfere with or abridge the powers and jurisdiction given to the special justices by the said Act.

16. In all cases of proceeding, whether civil or criminal, against any persons on account of anything done, commanded or expressed in execution of their duty or office, such persons, if they recover or be exculpated, shall have treble costs against the party proceeding, whether he discontinues or become nonsuitor, have a verdict against him, or have his application in any manner dismissed or ended, unless the judge or court certify reasonable cause.

The disallowance of this Act has been recently announced. The comments, however, are retained, as they have been made a text of reference for other colonial enactments on similar subjects.

JAMAICA:—AN ACT for the making further Provision for the Building, Repairing, and Regulating of Gaols, Houses of Correction, Hospitals and Asylums:—Passed 4th July 1834.

PREVIOUSLY to an examination of some specific clauses of this Act, it may be remarked that it exhibits one pervading defect, alike opposed to the spirit of the Imperial Abolition Act and to the principle of recent English enactments on the same subject; viz. the uncontrolled and exclusive jurisdiction of the ordinary magistrates over the whole of this important branch of municipal government, a defect rendered more objectionable in this case by the strength of colonial prejudices, and by the insertion into Acts of this description of a clause protective of those who execute it, necessary perhaps, but under such circumstances capable of giving impunity to penal abuses. The extreme inconvenience of intrusting so arbitrary an authority to local magistrates, even in England, had long been felt, but has only recently been remedied by the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 38, which virtually transfers the future exercise of this discretion to one of the Secretaries of State. And it is not too much to expect that reasons equally cogent will be discovered in the social condition of Jamaica to induce His Majesty's Government to recommend the introduction of the same principle of general improvement and personal protection into the prison discipline of that colony. The welfare of the emancipated negroes, and the impartial character of penal justice, seem equally to require that rules and regulations, so materially affecting both, should not be established in the first instance without the deliberate consent of the Governor, and the final approval of the privy council; and that to the Governor should belong officially the general inspection of all such establishments, accompanied with the power, under certain limitations, of introducing from time to time such further rules, regulations and arrangements, as he may deem necessary to the safe custody, health and moral improvement of the prisoners and inmates.

CERTAIN RULES and REGULATIONS established by the Jamaica Act, compared with those of the English Statutes.

THESE rules contain no provision for the moral instruction of prisoners and inmates, except a religious service on Sundays; nor for the admission of other ministers of religion than the chaplain at the request of a prisoner or inmate; vide rule 9, as compared with 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 31, and Poor Law Amendment Act, sec. 19.

Rule 10 authorises the keepers of prisons, hospitals or asylums, when "under the necessity" to put prisoners and inmates in irons, and to report forthwith to a visiting justice, but the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, ss. 10, 12, limits this power to the keepers of prisons, and to cases of "urgent and absolute necessity," and then only for four days without a written order from the visiting justice, specifying the causes thereof. And although, in consequence of defective classification, other persons than the usual inmates of "hospitals and asylums," may occasionally be found in such places in Jamaica, such a power certainly ought never to be exercised by the keepers thereof, without the previous consent of the medical attendant, and the earliest possible written order of the visiting justice, both of which should be presented and filed at the sessions.

Rule 20 requires that on the death of a prisoner or inmate, notice shall be given to the visiting justice and to the coroner, but 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 10, 11, very properly adds, "and to the nearest relative," and prohibits any prisoner from sitting on the inquest as a juror.

Rule 24 enables any ordinary justice of the parish to inflict personal correction on any criminal prisoner or inmate offending against the rules of the prison, hospital or asylum, in manner therein mentioned, or in the case of prisoners convicted of felony or sentenced to hard labour.

The Jamaica Act enables the common council of Kingston and elsewhere, five justices in sessions to make additional rules, and the same are to be reported to the Governor "as soon as may be convenient," but the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, ss. 15, 24, 25, required that a general report of such new rules and regulations, comprising all other reports as to the actual condition of such places, should be annually transmitted to one of the Secretaries of State within a specified period, and now by 5 & 6 Will. 4, s. 2, no new rules and regulations shall be valid until actually approved by the certificate of one of the Secretaries of State, and by ss. 7, 8 of the same Act, "inspectors" of all places for the confinement of prisoners in Great Britain are to be appointed, and their reports are to be annually presented to a Secretary of State and laid before Parliament. Surely the safe custody, health and moral improvement of negro subjects require equal protection, especially as the inmates of hospitals and asylums are for many purposes placed on the same footing with prisoners.

Certain justices to be appointed by the sessions as visitors, are empowered in matters of pressing necessity "to take cognizance thereof and regulate and redress the same," and other justices are empowered to visit and to report abuses. As special justices, if eligible, are not likely to be so appointed, they ought to possess ex-officio a co-ordinate power in like urgent cases, to afford immediate redress to negro apprentices confined or resident in such places.

Prisoners in execution, not sentenced to hard labour, if unable to maintain themselves, may be set to work by two visiting justices; this is conformable with 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 38, but that statute gives the surplus wages to the prisoner at his liberation, a regulation which ought to be adopted into the Jamaica Act.

Keepers of prisons, hospitals and asylums, may for certain minor offences keep the offenders in a solitary cell for six days on bread and water, subject to the approval of the visiting justice. But the 4 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 41, fastens this power only on keepers of prisons, and limits the punishment to three days; and in "hospitals and asylums," if ever necessary, it certainly ought not to be exercised without the previous consent of the medical attendant, and the written order of a visiting justice, both of which should be presented and filed at the sessions. And in the case of the Kingston hospital, no inmates should be transferred to the house of correction on the report of the physician and surgeon of their being "well and able to work," unless they entered the hospital or remained in it under the pretext of ill health.

It appears that persons "disabled from labour by sickness, age or otherwise," have been hitherto sent to a "compartment in the house of correction," and it is deemed expedient by this Act "to continue the same accommodation." A different classification and accommodation will probably, however, appear expedient to His Majesty's Government under the new system, for the present race at least, of such unfortunate persons; nor ought they without any appeal, to depend wholly on such "humane and salutary regulations as to the magistrates and vestrymen shall seem necessary or expedient." Strict inquiry into the legal claims of negro paupers of this description, the victims of former oppression, seem indeed to be both just and necessary.

This Act expires 31st December 1840.

JAMAICA:—AN ACT in Aid of an Act 5 Will. 4, entitled "An Act for making further Provision for the Building, Repairing and Regulating of Gaols, Houses of Correction, Hospitals and Asylums:—Passed 20th December 1834; expires 1st August 1840.

THIS Act purports to be passed in aid of the immediately preceding Act, but really makes some very objectionable additions to the penal enactments of the former Jamaica Abolition Act. These Acts punish apprentices under certain circumstances for absence. The present Act enables any person whatever, who "knows" an apprentice to be a runaway, to apprehend him without any warrant for that purpose; gives the apprehender a reward for so doing, and authorises him to convey the apprentice to the nearest workhouse or house of correction. The Slave Code, sec. 113, gave a similar power in case of slaves under sentence of transportation. The superintendent of the workhouse is required, once a week, for four successive weeks, to advertise such committal in the papers, with the name of the master, manager or employer, if known.

It must be obvious, that connecting the reward for apprehension with the inability of the apprentice to obtain redress for vexatious interference, impunity and encouragement are held out to vexatious intermeddling with apprentices beyond the limits of their own plantations, and that as the most effective steps in case of actual vagrancy are not taken to send the apprentice immediately home, his punishment, which depends for its severity upon the length of his absence, may be, and in the generality of cases most probably will be, greatly increased by the negligence or intentional delay of others. It may be remarked, that under the Slave Code, much greater care was taken to compel the workhouse-keeper to perform his duty both as to advertising, maintaining the person in custody, and charging moderate fees; and heavy penalties were inflicted for breach of any of these duties.

In case of actual culpability, it should be the imperative duty of the apprehender, the special justice, and the superintendent respectively, to ascertain the name of the master, manager or employer, and to convey the offender home, at the earliest possible period; and if the power of apprehending without warrant be permitted, it certainly should be without reward, and summary redress should be provided for the apprentice who has been wrongfully apprehended or unnecessarily detained.

JAMAICA:—AN ACT to colonize the Interior Lands of this Island, and form a Permanent Police:—Passed 9 December 1833; consented to 12th December 1833.

A LEGISLATIVE Act for the colonization of unreclaimed lands, the promotion of industry, and the establishment of a well ordered police, which may ultimately become the substitute for a more expensive military establishment, seems desirable at the commencement of an era of freedom. The danger consists in its provisions being perverted to other and less worthy purposes. Should such establishments become mere convict settlements, settlements, or a species of military colonies, established for the purpose of overawing the negro population, or of trying the experiment of modified slavery in reclaiming lands for the benefit of proprietors, or even for the purpose of cherishing a party spirit between different portions of the labouring community, the effect will be mischievous. The powers of the Governor, in forming these settlements, do not sufficiently appear: he may inlist or indent a police with peculiar privileges, sec. 10. All free persons and Maroons may be employed or enrolled, but whether compulsory or not is not stated. Emigrants are to be invited, sec. 11; and paupers may be sent from the several parishes, sec. 14. Lands are to be cultivated and manufactories set on foot, and public works performed, more or less, for the benefit of the labourers, sec. 9. 14.

On the other hand, all males between the ages of 16 and 45 in such establishments, are subjected to police duties, discipline and laws, sec. 4; and rules and regulations, not including corporal punishment, nor sentence of death, may be established at the discretion of the Governor, sec. 4; penal or convict gangs, apparently an important part of the system, are likewise to be formed (most probably by drafts from the different parishes) and employed in public works, and to be subjected to rules and regulations afterwards to be established, and which ought to be known in this country. And all persons resident in such colonies, not excepting women and children, may be compelled to labour in the cultivation of land, or in manufactory duties, at some fixed rate of remuneration, sec. 18.

In the absence of information respecting the working of this plan, which has been in force ever since the month of December 1833, it seems superfluous to do more than to advert to the more suspicious clauses.

N.B.—On reference to papers published by the House of Commons, Part 2, “relative to abolition of slavery,” it appears that in consequence of the above Act proving insufficient, an Act was passed in aid thereof, on the 27th June 1834, enabling the Governor to raise and officer a police force of 1,000 men, but the Act in Aid expires 31st December 1835. And for the present unsettled and unsatisfactory state of the police law, vide “Parliamentary papers in explanation of the proceedings of the legislature of Jamaica,” p. 31.

JAMAICA:—AN ACT to increase the Power of the Magistracy of this Island in the Appointment of Special Constables:—Passed 5th December 1833; consented to 12th December 1833.

So far as negroes and persons engaged in their religious and civil instruction are concerned, there seems no particular objection to this statute. It differs, however, from the English statute, 1 Geo. 4, c. 37, on the same subject, in giving to the Jamaica authorities a general discretionary power of appointing special constables, which is limited to particular periods or circumstances by the English statute, sec. 1. The English statute likewise makes special exception of persons “legally exempted,” who are not excepted in the operative clauses of the Jamaica Act, but are left among other persons “aggrieved” to their remedy by appeal to the Governor; and reasonable allowances are made by the English statute for trouble and expense, which are not compensated by the Jamaica Act. As an appeal to the Governor is however given to persons aggrieved, and penalties are recoverable only by attachment, after hearing affidavits on both sides in the supreme or assize courts, sufficient protection is probably given to missionaries and other persons against the vexatious abuse of this statute.

JAMAICA:—AN ACT for the Summary Punishment in certain cases of Persons wilfully and maliciously endangering or committing Trespasses on Public or Private Property:—Passed 10th December 1833; consented to 12th December 1833.

Notes and References.

1. It is easy to conceive how this statute, like the provisions in first Jamaica Abolition Act, ss. 30, 44, may be applied to oppressive purposes, vide those sections and note thereto. The English statute, 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, on the same subject, makes certain provisions against such abuses, which cannot be less needed in a colonial community. For instance, s. 20, for injuries to trees, shrubs, &c., growing at large, requires the injury to amount to 1s. at the least, a minimum which ought to be fixed in all other cases where no malice can be fairly imputed. In s. 20, for injuries to vegetable productions, productions growing at large, the penalty is not

Sections.

1. Enacts that any persons wilfully and maliciously committing any damage, injury, or spoil to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, stile, guide-post, milestone, or post, tree, orchard, garden, cane or corn-field, coffee-walk, pimento-walk, or any provision or other land in cultivation, or any thing growing or being thereon, or to or upon real or personal property of any nature or kind soever, on conviction thereof before a justice within four calendar months, shall forfeit to the person aggrieved such a sum of money as shall appear to the justice to be a reasonable “satisfaction” and compensation for the damage or injury or spoil, not exceeding 5*l.* in not to exceed 20 s. or one month's imprisonment for the first offence; s. 24, which applies to most other injuries of this description orders reasonable "compensation" not "satisfaction" (which may be made to include something more); and compensation is not to exceed 5*l.* or otherwise imprisonment not exceeding two months; and these enactments are not to include cases where the offender acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of.

in any case, and in default of payment with costs, he may be committed to hard labour for three months, unless sooner paid.

3. The English stat., s. 28, authorises an apprehension without warrant only where the party is "found committing" the offence; and s. 29 limits this summary conviction to three months after the commission of the offence. Two most important protections against abuse, which ought to be introduced into this statute.

2. The imprisonment is reduced to six weeks in case of male offenders under 16 years of age.

3. Authorises any peace-officer or injured party, or his servants, or other person whom he may call to his assistance, without warrant, to apprehend the person who shall have actually committed or be in the act of committing any such offence, and to take him before the nearest justice as aforesaid.

4. Instead of a double imprisonment on non-payment of costs, as here, the English stat., s. 33, punishes the offender only according to the original conviction, except with additional costs of appeal; and s. 34 of the English stat. enables the justice on any case of a first offence to discharge the offender on payment of the simple damage and costs; and s. 41 requires that all convictions should be filed at the quarter sessions. Two very important regulations, which ought to be adopted here.

4. On appeal against such conviction to the quarter sessions, and failure, and subsequent default to pay the penalty and costs, the offender may be committed for six months, unless they be sooner paid.

JAMAICA:—AN ACT for preventing Tumults and Riotous Assemblies, and for the more speedily and effectually punishing such Rioters:—Passed 11th December 1833; consented to 31st December 1833; expires 31st December 1836.

CORRESPONDS with the English Statutes in pari casu.

AN ACT to consolidate and amend the several Laws relating to the Clergy of this Island, and to invest the Bishop of Jamaica with Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction:—Passed 12 December 1833.

By this Act, rectors and curates are, with the consent of the justices and vestry, weekly to visit workhouses, gaols, and hospitals, placed under their care by the bishop, for the purpose of affording instruction and religious consolation to prisoners and patients confined in such places, and also to visit and attend estates and plantations in their respective parishes and precincts, as the bishop shall order and direct, for the purpose of affording the same advantage to the slaves resident thereon; provided the consent and approbation of the persons in possession of such estates or plantations shall be first had and obtained.

The visits of the clergy generally, but especially at the request of an inmate of such places of confinement, ought not to depend on the consent of the justices and vestry, nor even on the appointment of the bishop; vide remarks on Houses of Correction Act already analysed.

What effect the Abolition Act may produce on the power of the clergy to visit estates seems doubtful; but as apprentices are to be treated as free men in all matters not incident to their servile condition, the absolute right to receive instruction and religious consolation in their own huts seems in all cases reasonable; in cases of sickness and infirmity it is essential; and in no case ought it to depend on the consent of the owners of estates on which apprentices are compulsorily resident.

JAMAICA:—AN ACT to enlarge the Powers of Justices in determining Complaints between Masters and Servants, and between Masters, Apprentices, Artificers, and others:—Passed July 4th, 1834; expires 31st December 1840.

THE date of this Act, as well as the period of its duration, discovers an intimate connexion with the apprenticeship system. As it regards "apprentices," indeed, eo nomine the the first section certainly, and probably the second and third also, except those who became such under the Abolition Act; but the fourth section expressly includes "any servant in husbandry, mechanic, artificer, handicraftsman, labourer, person employed in droggers, body or house servant, or other person, without exception, who shall contract to serve with any person or persons whomsoever, and may be presumed to comprise apprentices under the Abolition Act undertaking to perform task work, extra labour, or any other species of contract service for their employers." This Act gives a jurisdiction therefore to the ordinary justice over all such persons in cases of misbehaviour or misconduct; and, independently of its partial and defective character, seems in other respects clearly repugnant to the Imperial Act, section 18. It is moreover rendered unnecessary by various clauses in the Jamaica Abolition Act providing for the same offences.

AN ACT to register Fire-arms, and to enforce the several Laws relating to Arms and Gunpowder, and to the protection of Property and Person:—Passed 4 July 1834; expires 31 December 1838.

THE constitutional objections that might be urged against so much of this Act as refers to the carrying and keeping of arms, do not come properly within the scope of the analysis, since this part of the Act, though probably aimed at free negroes and persons of colour chiefly, is applicable to all persons whomsoever, without distinction, and it occasions no necessary interference with matters incident to the relation between master and apprentice. Perhaps the same remarks might in strictness apply to the remaining clauses of the Act; but their oppressive tendency is so obvious and direct upon the social intercourse, comfort and personal security of apprentices, as well as of missionaries, teachers and other persons visiting plantations, even at reasonable hours and "in pursuit of lawful objects," that they cannot be passed over without some notice.

It appears from section 13, that "any person" whoever entering upon any estate "in search or pursuit of anything whatsoever," without leave of the owner, may, without any previous notice, be convicted of a trespass, and be fined to any extent not exceeding 10 l., or imprisoned for any time not exceeding one month. By sec. 14, the occupier of the estate or his servant, or any person authorised by them for that purpose, may, without producing any written authority, order any such trespasser to quit the premises, and to tell his christian and surname and place of abode, and if he refuses altogether, or state his abode too "generally," or wilfully continue on or return to the premises, the person so requiring the address, or any person by his order, may apprehend such trespasser, and convey him before a justice of the peace (not the nearest); and on conviction before two justices, such trespasser is liable to a fine not exceeding 20 l., or to imprisonment not exceeding three months: And by sec. 15, a trespasser, if he assault or obstruct the apprehender, though without any evidence of his authority, is on conviction liable, over and above the original penalty of trespass, to a further penalty not exceeding 100 l., or to imprisonment not exceeding three months. Not to dwell upon the unwarrantable severity of such penalties as these, even in cases of actual guilt, it cannot surely be intended that persons visiting estates "on errands of friendship or mercy, or on lawful business, and at reasonable times or under reasonable supposition of having a right to be there," should be exposed to such arbitrary proceedings; and yet no exception is made in their favour. The right to seize and convey before a justice, if permitted at all without warrant, ought at least to be confined to estate constables, and, as in the English statute, applied only to "suspected persons and reputed thieves," or to cases accompanied with some reasonable suspicion of an unlawful object, and the ruinous penalty upon resistance ought to be limited to the cases included in the English statute, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, and noticed in remarks upon the Jamaica Vagrant Act, sec. 4; and as a protection to well-disposed persons in such cases, menial servants and others thus acting without warrant ought to be summarily punished by the justice for all abuses of so dangerous an authority.

AN ACT to amend the Elective Franchise:—Passed 20 December 1834.

---

AN ACT to consolidate the Highway Laws of this Island:—Passed 20 December 1834.

By the Elective Franchise Act, payment of 5 l. per annum in public or parochial taxes, or renting a tenement of the annual value of 50 l. with due registration, qualifies to vote for a member of assembly, a vestryman, a coroner, and in the city of Kingston, for a mayor, alderman and common-councilman.

By the Highway Act, the justices and vestry of the several parishes in the island are required annually, under a penalty of 100 l., to lay a tax on all apprentice labourers, horses, horses, geldings, mares, mules, asses and neat cattle within their respective parishes, in like manner as they assess the parish tax, to such amount as in their discretion they shall think sufficient and proper, for making, mending and keeping in repair the highways and public roads of each parish; which tax shall be paid in money or discount by labour, or supplying other articles necessary for making or repairing roads in the manner thereafter directed. The taxation of apprentices, under any circumstances, may, for the reasons assigned by the Governor in his message to the House of Assembly of 17th November 1835 (vide Parliamentary papers, in explanation of the proceedings of the legislature of Jamaica, pp. 18, 19), be considered inconsistent with the spirit of the Imperial Act. At all events, taxation and fair representation must, under a free government, be considered as correlative provisions. Whatever may be thought of the amount of qualification to vote for a member of assembly, which nevertheless appears much too high to confer any practical benefit on the emancipated negroes, there seems no pretence for requiring the same amount on the election of a vestryman invested by the Highway Act with such extensive powers over apprenticeship property, and still less on the election of a coroner, whose appointment ought to extend equal protection to the lives of all classes in the community.

The highway-tax may be distrained for in case of non-payment, and any surplus of the tax on the settlement of the annual accounts shall be appropriated by the justices and vestry in aid of the road-tax of the following year, or for any other parochial purpose whatsoever, as to the said justices and vestry shall seem meet. The justices and vestry are further empowered to fix the hire of apprentices, carts and cattle employed in these duties, but nevertheless at the customary prices. The inspector is made the sole judge of the ability of the apprentice, and the competence of his cart or cattle for these duties; and no exception appears to be made of provision grounds, in the power to break up lands for the repairs of the road. The 52d, 53d and 54th clauses, containing very exceptionable enactments against smoking, carrying fire, depositing filth, and the punishment of apprentices offending against the Act, have been since repealed by an Act passed 18 December 1835; but a distinction between apprentices and other offenders, which appears invidious, is still left in clause 73, enabling the justices to inflict flogging in lieu of other punishments in the case of apprentices.

AN ACT to enable Parties having Claims to the Services of Apprenticed Labourers to assert their Title at Law, and for other purposes:—Passed 20th December 1834.

ENACTS, that all persons claiming title to the services of any apprenticed labourer, in opposition to the claims of the person or persons in possession, on or immediately before the 1st of August 1834, may bring actions of ejectment to recover the right to the services of the said apprenticed labourers during the remainder of their apprenticeship term, in the same manner as if it had been an ejectment for slaves. And as no writ of possession can now issue, in case of a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, it further enacts that in such case it shall be lawful for the lessor of the plaintiff to apply to the supreme court for an order compelling the party in possession to assign and transfer by deed or conveyance the right or interest of him, her or them, in and to the services of such apprenticed labourers; and the court, upon proof of wilful disobedience or neglect, is authorised and required to enforce such order by process of contempt.

The Imperial Act, sec. 9, intended no doubt to prevent the improper separation of families by indirect methods, not less than by those specified in that Act.

The Colonial Act of Ejectment certainly presents an easy method of evading the Imperial measure, where persons are desirous of purchasing and transferring the services of individuals of an apprentice family, and not of the entire family. In such a process, the real nature of the transaction does not appear; in case of a collusive judgment by default, the merits are not even inquired into. The judgment itself is not a transfer of property, but an adjudication of a right existing before the Imperial Act came into operation, and nothing intervenes after the judgment to prevent the colluding defendant from immediately handing over the pretended property to the colluding plaintiff.

In all such cases, the apprentice should be made a co-defendant, and an order of court, founded on an affidavit by the lessor of the plaintiff of the bonâ fide nature of his claim, ought to be an essential preliminary to all transfers of possession.

BARBADOES—(No. 1.)

No. 4.
Colonial
Abolition Acts.
BARBADOES.

AN ACT to repeal certain Clauses of an Act, intituled, "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery, for the Government of Apprenticed Labourers, and for ascertaining and enforcing the reciprocal Duties between them and their Employers," and to substitute other Clauses in the place of certain of such repealed Clauses.

May it please Your Majesty, that it may be Enacted;

Clause 1st.
The 4th, 5th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 24th, 27th, 33d, 103d and 104th clauses of the Act for the Abolition of Slavery repealed.

Proviso, the repeal of said clauses not to affect the construction of any clauses therein having reference thereto.

Clause 2d.
Apprenticed labourers to be divided into classes of prædials attached, prædials unattached and non-prædials.

Clause 3d.
Registrar of slaves to deliver to employers of apprenticed labourers their original returns, who are to distinguish the classes, and return such lists back to the registrar in three months after.

Clause 4th.
Apprenticeship of all prædial labourers to cease on the 1st August 1840; and not to perform more than 45 hours work per week between Monday and Friday; watchmen and cattle-keepers excepted

Those under 12 years of age to perform the 45 hours between Monday and Saturday.

Apprenticed labourers not to be prevented attending any place of religious worship.

AND be it enacted by the Governor, Council and Assembly of this Your Majesty's island of Barbadoes, that the 4th, 5th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 24th, 27th, 33d, 103d and 104th clauses of the said Act, intituled, "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery, for the Government of Apprenticed Labourers, and for ascertaining and enforcing the reciprocal Duties between them and their Employers," shall be and the same are hereby repealed: Provided nevertheless, and be it also enacted, that the repeal of the said last-mentioned clause shall not alter or in anywise affect the construction of any other clause or clauses in the said Act for the abolition of slavery which may refer to any of the clauses so repealed, but that such unrepealed clauses shall have and receive the same construction with reference to any clauses by this Act substituted for such repealed clause as if these substituted clauses had been originally enacted.

And be it further enacted, that all apprenticed labourers shall be divided into three distinct classes; the first of such classes consisting of prædial apprenticed labourers attached to the soil, and comprising all persons who in their state of slavery were usually employed in agriculture or in the manufacture of colonial produce, or otherwise upon lands belonging to their owners; the second of such classes consisting of prædial apprenticed labourers not attached to the soil, and comprising all persons who in their state of slavery were usually employed in agriculture or in the manufacture of colonial produce, or otherwise upon lands not belonging to their owners; and the third of such classes consisting of non-prædial apprenticed labourers, and comprising all apprenticed labourers not included within either of the preceding classes: Provided always, that no person of the age of 12 years and upwards shall be included in either of the said two classes of prædial apprenticed labourers, unless such person shall for 12 calendar months at the least next before the 28th day of August 1833 have been habitually employed in agriculture or in the manufacture of colonial produce.

And be it further enacted, that the registrar of slaves shall immediately after the passing of this Act deliver to the employers of apprenticed labourers applying for the same, their last lists or schedules of slaves; and every employer of apprenticed labourers, by himself or herself, or by his or her constituted attorney in this island in the case of absentees, or in case any such employer be an invalid or incompetent, then by some other person or persons, shall return back to the registrar such lists or schedules within three months from the said period, distinguishing in reference to each apprenticed labourer therein mentioned (then being an apprenticed labourer), to which of the said three classes such apprenticed labourer belongs; and every such return shall be made on oath before the registrar, who is hereby authorized and required to administer the same, as follows: "I, A. B., do swear, that the distinctions made in the return now presented by me of the classes of apprenticed labourers to which such of the respective slaves therein named, who are now apprenticed labourers, belong, correspond with the occupations usually performed by such apprenticed labourers in their state of slavery, for 12 months previous to the 28th day of August 1833."

And be it further enacted, that no person who by virtue of this Act shall become a prædial apprenticed labourer, whether attached or not attached to the soil, shall continue in such apprenticeship beyond the 1st day of August 1840, and that during such his or her apprenticeship no such prædial apprenticed labourer, whether attached or not attached to the soil, shall be bound or liable, by virtue of such apprenticeship, to perform any labour in the service or for the benefit of the person or persons entitled to his or her services for more than 45 hours in the whole, in any one week, unless he or she shall enter into some contract for that purpose; and that such 45 hours' labour shall be performed between the Monday morning and Friday evening of every week, leaving Saturday and Sunday at the disposal of such prædial labourer, except in the case of any prædial labourer who may be employed in the protection of property, or in tending of cattle, or any other stock, who shall be bound to perform a part of such 45 hours' labour on those days: Provided always, and be it also enacted, that in all cases where such prædial apprenticed labourers shall be under the age of 12 years, then such prædial apprenticed labourers shall perform such their 45 hours' labour between the Monday morning and Saturday evening of each week: Provided always, that no apprenticed labourer shall be liable to be hindered or prevented from attending anywhere on Sundays for religious worship at his or her free will and pleasure, but shall be at full liberty so to do, without any let, denial or interruption whatsoever.

And be it further enacted, that no apprenticed labourer shall be subject or liable to be removed from this island; and that no prædial apprenticed labourer who may in manner aforesaid become attached to the soil, shall be subject or liable to perform labour in the service of his or her employer or employers, except upon, or in, or about the works and business of the plantations or estates to which such prædial apprenticed labourer shall have been attached, or on which he or she shall have been usually employed on or previously to the said 1st day of August 1834; provided nevertheless, that with the consent, in writing, of any two or more special justices of the peace, to be appointed under the Slavery Abolition Act, it shall be lawful for the person or persons entitled to the services of any such attached prædial apprenticed labourer or labourers to transfer his, her or their services to any other estate or plantation within this island, to such person or persons belonging, which written consent shall in no case be given, or be of any validity, unless such justices of the peace shall first have ascertained that such transfer would not have the effect of separating any such attached prædial apprenticed labourer from his or her wife, or husband, parent or child, or from any person or persons reputed to bear any such relation to him or her, and that such transfer would not probably be injurious to the health or welfare of such attached prædial apprenticed labourer; and such consent shall be in the form hereto annexed, marked (A.)

And whereas the following proviso is inserted in the 108th clause of the said Act: "Provided nevertheless, that nothing herein contained shall extend or abrogate, or take away the powers vested by law in the court of grand sessions, or the several courts of common pleas in this island, or the right of appeal to the governor and council from any decision of any special justice of the peace, by any person or persons who may feel themselves aggrieved thereby:" Be it enacted, that the said proviso shall be and the same is hereby repealed; provided nevertheless, and be it further enacted, that nothing in the said 108th clause of the said Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to abrogate or take away the powers by law vested in the supreme courts of record, or the superior courts of civil and criminal justice in this island.

And be it further enacted, that no special constable appointed, or to be appointed under the 111th clause of the said Act, shall be allowed to confine, for safe custody, any apprenticed labourer attached to any plantation or place, except in those cases in which other of His Majesty's subjects might be taken into custody by any ordinary constable, or to those cases in which it may be reasonably presumed that any apprenticed labourer, having offended against the said Act, will attempt to escape, anything in the said Act to the contrary contained notwithstanding: Provided always nevertheless, that all buildings used as places of confinement, however temporary, shall be approved of for that purpose by the special justice of the peace of the district, who is hereby required occasionally to visit the same.

And whereas by the 11th section of the Act of the Imperial Parliament for the abolition of slavery, it is enacted, that during the continuance of any such apprenticeship as aforesaid, the person or persons for the time being entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer shall be and is, and are hereby required to supply him or her with such food, clothing, lodging, medicine, medical attendance, and such other maintenance and allowances as an owner is required to supply to and for any slave being of the same age and sex as such apprenticed labourer shall be: And whereas it is in and by the 16th section of the said last-mentioned Act recited, that it would also be necessary for the protection of such apprenticed labourers as aforesaid, that various regulations should be framed and established in the said respective colonies, for securing punctuality and method in the supply to them of such food, clothing, lodging, medicines, medical attendance and such other maintenance and allowances as they were thereinbefore declared entitled to receive, and for regulating the amount and quality of all such articles, in cases where the laws then existing in any such colony may not in the case of slaves have made any regulation, or any adequate regulation for that purpose, and it was also necessary that proper rules should be established for the prevention and punishment of any frauds which might be practised, or of any omission or neglects which might occur respecting the quantity or quality of the supplies so to be furnished, or respecting the periods for the delivery of the same: And whereas by an Act of this island, intituled, "An Act to repeal several Acts and Clauses of Acts respecting Slaves, and for consolidating and bringing into one Act the several Laws relating thereto, and for the better Order and Government of Slaves, and for giving them further Protection and Security, for altering the mode of Trial of those charged with Capital and other Offences, and for other purposes," being the only law in force respecting slaves at the time of the passing of the said Act by the Imperial Parliament, the amount and quality of the articles to be furnished slaves are not regulated: Be it therefore enacted, that during the continuance of any such apprenticeship as aforesaid, the person or persons for the time being entitled to the services of every such apprenticed labourer, shall be and is and are hereby required to supply, or cause to be supplied to him or her such food as hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, each and every such apprenticed labourer above the age of 10 years, shall receive in each week not less than 30 pounds of plantains, potatoes, yams or eddoes, or 10 pints of Guinea or Indian corn, and two pounds of cod fish or herrings, shads or other pickled fish, or other salted provisions equal thereto; and every such apprenticed labourer under the age of 10 years shall receive the one-half of the first-mentioned allowances of food; provided nevertheless, that the person or persons entitled to the services of any such apprenticed labourers, or any person or persons acting in his or her behalf who may be unable or unwilling to procure such provisions as are hereinbefore mentioned, may, with the authority in writing of the special justice of the peace of the district in which such apprenticed labourer or labourers are or is resident, substitute for the same, or any part or parts thereof, any other kind of provisions, or any money payment or allowance of time, for such apprenticed labourer or labourers to work for his, her or their own benefit and advantage, as shall in the judgment of such special justice be equivalent to the allowances hereinbefore prescribed; and all provisions so to be delivered and supplied to the apprenticed labourers shall be sound and fit for consumption, and of good average and merchantable quality; and the same shall be delivered and supplied to such apprenticed labourer once (or oftener) in each week, on any other day than Saturday or Sunday; and if any such person or persons as aforesaid, subject and liable so to do, shall not deliver or supply to such apprenticed labourer provisions of such amount and quality, and at such times as he, she or they is or are hereinbefore required to deliver and supply the same, such person or persons shall incur and become liable to a penalty (provided complaint thereof be made within 28 days) equal to twice the value of the provisions which ought to have been supplied for the benefit of the apprenticed labourer injured by such omission or neglect, unless it can be proved that the same cannot be purchased in any of the towns or markets of this island: Provided nevertheless, that in times of scarcity the Governor, by and with the advice of the council, may from time to time, by proclamation to be by him for that purpose issued, authorize the substitution of any other provisions or allowances which can be procured in lieu of the aforesaid allowances: Provided always nevertheless, that whilst apprenticed labourers are imprisoned in any house of correction or public prison of this island, the employer or employers of such apprenticed labourers shall not be bound to provide them with any allowance of food, or money to purchase food, but they shall be fed at the public expense; and in all such cases where a weekly payment shall be agreed on as aforesaid, then such weekly money payment or wages shall be recovered before the special justice of the district where such apprenticed labourer shall reside: Provided always, and be it enacted, that the employers of apprenticed labourers shall not be compelled to furnish their apprenticed labourers with more than one pound of such fish or salted provisions until the expiration of one month from the passing of this Act.

And be it further enacted, that in addition to the clothing directed by the aforesaid Act of the said island for the abolition of slavery to be furnished to apprenticed labourers, every person entitled to the services of apprenticed labourers, shall be bound, under the penalty provided by the said Act, to furnish annually an additional shirt and pair of trowsers to each male, and an additional shift and petticoat to each female, and also a blanket to each apprenticed labourer every two years; such additional clothing and blanket to be issued at the period of the year prescribed by the 31st clause of the said last-mentioned Act.

And be it further enacted, that in all cases of urgent necessity, such as fire, tempest, and occurrences of a similar nature, it shall be lawful for the owner or other person in the management of any property, whenever such necessity shall occur, to require and compel the immediate and continued services of all or any of the apprenticed labourers attached to such property during such emergency, anything herein contained to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding; and every apprenticed labourer who shall refuse, when called on, to perform any such services, shall be liable to all such penalties as he or she would be liable to for any undue performance or neglect of work during any time his or her employer may be entitled to his or her services.

And whereas by the 58th clause of the said Act, certain causes are mentioned which alone exempt an apprenticed labourer from punishment in case of absence from his or her employer's service: and whereas other causes may arise which ought to exempt an apprenticed labourer from punishment in case of absence: Be it therefore enacted, that the several special justices of the district before whom any complaint may be exhibited against any apprenticed labourer for absence from his or her employer's service, may admit any other reasonable cause for such absence, which shall be proved on oath to have existed at the time, and which shall appear just to such special justice.

And be it further enacted, that no apprenticed labourer, during his or her apprenticeship, shall be arrested or imprisoned in any action of debt, assumpsit, covenant, or other action founded on contract, nor shall any apprenticed labourer be liable to be arrested or taken in execution by virtue of any writ of execution obtained in any such action or actions during his or her apprenticeship, nor shall any apprenticed labourer be liable to be taken in execution for any debt or demand against his or her employer.

And be it further enacted, that if any apprenticed labourer shall commit any trespass upon his or her employer's property, whether real or personal, or be guilty of uttering any slander, or of publishing any libel against his or her employer or employers, he or she shall on conviction thereof, before the special justice of the district to which he or she shall belong, be adjudged to perform any number of extra days' labour, in the service of his or employer or employers, or to imprisonment with hard labour for any time not exceeding one calendar month, or solitary confinement not exceeding one week; or if a male, to whipping, not exceeding 20 stripes; and if any such apprenticed labourer, so convicted, shall afterwards be guilty of any of the said offences, and shall be convicted thereof before such special justice of the peace as aforesaid, every such offender shall be committed to the house of correction for such term, not exceeding three months, as the said justice before whom he or she shall be convicted shall think fit, and shall be worked on the treadmill or public works; and, if a male, to be whipped, not exceeding 39 stripes: Provided always nevertheless, that this enactment shall not exempt any such apprenticed labourer from his or her liability to such such actions or prosecutions as other persons of free condition may be subject and liable to in respect of any such offences by him or her done or committed; provided nevertheless, that no such apprenticed labourer shall be liable to be sued or prosecuted, both under this Act and under the general law.

No. 4.
Colonial
Abolition Acts.
ST. VINCENT.

AN ACT to repeal certain Clauses, and to alter and amend an Act intituled "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery in the Island of St. Vincent and its Dependencies, in consideration of Compensation, and for promoting the Industry and good conduct of the manumitted Slaves.

Clause 1. WHEREAS it has been deemed expedient to repeal certain parts and to alter and amend other parts of an Act intituled "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery in the Island of St. Vincent and its Dependencies, in consideration of Compensation, and for promoting the Industry and good conduct of the manumitted Slaves." May it therefore please your Majesty, that it may be enacted and ordained, and be it, and it is hereby enacted and ordained by the Lieutenant-governor, Council and Assembly of the said Island of St. Vincent and its Dependencies, and by authority of the same, that from and after the publication of this Act, the 22d, 25th, 34th, 35th, 45th, 46th, 51st and 62d clauses of the above mentioned Act for the Abolition of Slavery shall be and are hereby repealed; provided always, that such repeal shall not invalidate or annul any matter or thing heretofore done in pursuance of the said Act.

2. And whereas by the 15th clause of the before recited Act, 11 days are allowed to every prædial apprenticed labourer out of the 45 working hours in each week, over and above the one day allowed in each week and Sundays in every year, at the discretion of the employer, and it is expedient to increase the time; be it therefore enacted, that 19 days in addition to the 11, be allowed to each prædial apprenticed labourer during the continuance of his apprenticeship term, at the like discretion of the employer as to the period when such time shall be given, or such an equivalent as may be agreed upon between the apprenticed labourer and his employer: provided that the whole number of days so allowed to the prædial apprenticed labourer shall not exceed three consecutive days in one week.

3. And whereas by the 11th clause of the hereinbefore recited Act, it is amongst other things enacted that the consent in writing of one special justice shall be sufficient to authorize the removal of apprentices, with the consent of the party to be removed, and it is expedient to amend the same; be it therefore enacted, that from and after the publication of this Act such part of the said 11th clause as relates to the consent of the party to be removed, shall be and is hereby repealed, and the consent in writing for such removal shall be by two or more special justices, instead of one as heretofore.

4. And be it further enacted, that so much of the 13th clause of the said recited Act as relates to the consent of the party whose services are proposed to be sold or transferred, shall be and is hereby repealed.

5. And whereas it is necessary to define the good and ample provision intended by the 18th clause of the before recited Act, in cases where it may be impracticable to maintain the apprenticed labourers by allotments of land; be it therefore enacted, that in all cases each and every apprenticed labourer above the age of 10 years shall receive in each week not less than four quarts of wheat flour, or of farine, or the flour or meal of Guinea, or Indian corn, or 20 lbs. of yams or potatoes, and every apprenticed labourer below the age of 10 years shall be supplied with one half of the beforementioned allowance in each week, which allowance shall be delivered to the mother or nurse of every such infant apprenticed labourer.

6. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all persons who became apprenticed labourers on the 1st day of August, 1834, shall be and are hereby declared to be entitled to all the rights and privileges of free persons, except as the same be restricted by this or any other Act passed in conformity with the provisions of the Imperial Act of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 73; provided always, that no such apprenticed labourer during the time of his apprenticeship shall have or exercise any political franchise whatsoever by virtue of any property which he may acquire, nor be capable of serving as a juror, or of holding any office, except as a constable or beadle, nor shall be eligible to serve in the militia, unless in cases of great emergency to be judged of by the Governor, Lieutenant-governor or person administering the government and a council of war, when he shall be compelled to serve with the same liabilities as all others serving in the militia.

7. And whereas it may happen that children who had not attained the age of six years on the 1st day of August 1834, or that children who after that day may have been born, or may hereafter be born to any female apprenticed labourer, may not be properly supported by their parents, and that no other person may be disposed voluntarily to undertake the support of such children, and it is necessary that provision should be made for the maintenance of such children in any such contingency: be it therefore enacted, that if any child who on the said 1st day of August 1834, had not completed his 6th year, or if any child to which any female apprenticed labourer may have given birth on or after the said 1st day of August 1834, or may hereafter give birth to, shall be brought before any special justice, and it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of such justice that any such child is unprovided with an adequate maintenance, and that such child hath not completed his age of 12 years, it shall shall be lawful for such justice, and he is hereby required on behalf of any such child to execute an indenture of apprenticeship, thereby binding such child as an apprenticed labourer to the person or persons entitled to the services of such mother; but in case it shall be made to appear to any such justice that such person aforesaid is unable or unfit to enter into such indenture and properly to perform the conditions thereof, then it shall be lawful for such justice, and he is hereby required by such indenture to bind any such child to any other person to be by him for that purpose approved of, and who may be willing and able properly to perform such conditions, and it shall by every such indenture of apprenticeship be declared whether such child shall thenceforward belong to the class of attached prædial apprenticed labourers, or to the class of unattached prædial apprenticed labourers, or to the class of non-prædial apprenticed labourers, and the term of such apprenticeship of any such child shall by such indenture be limited and made to continue in force until such child shall have completed his 21st year, and no longer; and every child so apprenticed as aforesaid by the order of any such justice as aforesaid, shall during his apprenticeship be subject to all such and the same rules and regulations respecting the work or labour to be by them done or performed, and respecting the food and other supplies to be to him furnished, as any other apprenticed labourer as aforesaid; provided always, that the said indenture of apprenticeship shall contain sufficient words of obligation upon the employer to allow reasonable time and opportunity for the education and religious instruction of such child.

8. And be it further enacted, that all complaints between employer and apprenticed labourer shall be tried in a summary manner by any special justice, and if such justice shall either dismiss the complaint or sanction any compromise between the parties, which he may think just, or convict the party charged, or commit him to prison to take his trial for the imputed offence, or if the complaint shall be dismissed, the justice shall in such his decision, to be in writing, state whether it was so dismissed as being unproved, or as being frivolous and vexatious, or as being malicious; and if any such complaint shall be so dismissed as frivolous and vexatious, the justice may award the complainant, if a labourer, to work in the service of his employer for any time not exceeding in the whole 15 extra hours in any one week; or if the complainant be the employer, the justice may adjudge such employer to the payment of a penalty for the use of the labourer of not less than 10s., and not greater than 20s.; and if any such complaint shall be so dismissed as malicious, it shall be competent to such justice, at the instance of the party charged, to adjudge the complainant, if an apprenticed labourer, to imprisonment, with hard labour, for any time not exceeding one month; or if the employer of any such labourer, to a fine not exceeding 40s., for the benefit of the party charged, which judgment shall be a bar to any suit, action or prosecution against such complainant for calumny, defamation or otherwise, in respect of such his complaint.

9. And whereas it is expedient that provision should be made, in cases of imprisonment on plantations by the special justice, against the use of unhealthy or otherwise improper places of punishment; be it therefore enacted, that in every such case, the special justice is hereby required and directed to satisfy himself that such places of imprisonment be not unhealthy or otherwise improper places for imprisonment.

10. And be it further enacted, that all offences specified in the 42d, 43d and 44th clauses of the above recited Act for the abolition of slavery shall be inquired of by one of the special justices, unless he shall see cause to refer any case for trial to the court of grand sessions of the peace, and no employer shall be authorised to inflict any corporal punishment on any male apprenticed labourer, nor shall any female be subject to be punished by whipping for any offence by her committed; but in all cases in which that punishment is authorised, it shall be understood as applying to the case of males only, and that all the offences in respect of which such punishment may be inflicted on any such male offender shall, when committed by women, be punished by confinement in the stocks or solitary confinement, for any period not exceeding 10 days, or by hard labour on the tread-mill, for any period not exceeding 30 days, as the special justice shall direct.

11. And be it further enacted, that when any apprenticed labourer shall be convicted of indolence, or neglect, or improper performance of work, the special justice before whom such conviction shall take place, may, if he sees fit, sentence the offender to corporal punishment, not exceeding 50 stripes, or three months' imprisonment to hard labour, or 10 days' solitary confinement, or to labour for such number of hours or days in his own time for the benefit of the person entitled to his services, as the justice of the case may seem to require, not exceeding fifteen hours in any one week: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or taken to deprive any of His Majesty's subjects of their right to proceed against any such apprentice in any of the superior courts of this island, for remedy against any apprentice for any wrong or injury done or committed to or against the person or property of such subject.

12. And be it further enacted, that all complaints made by any apprenticed labourer against the person entitled to his services, touching any fraud practised, or refusal to furnish any such apprenticed labourer with sufficiency of provision-grounds, or of other means of maintenance and support, in cases where such apprenticed labourer hath no provision-grounds, or of illegally and improperly withholding from such apprentice any portion of the time allowed him to cultivate such grounds, or of imposing task-work on any apprenticed labourer contrary to the provisions of the act or acts regulating the same, or of breach of any contract on the part of any person engaging the voluntary services of any apprenticed labourer, shall be heard, adjudged and determined before any one or more special justices, and he or they are hereby empowered to punish the offender in any of these respects, with a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, and for default of goods and chattels whereon to levy such fine, the offender to commit to gaol until he shall pay or satisfy the same, but such imprisonment not to exceed five days: provided that nothing herein mentioned shall be deemed or taken to bar or destroy the right of any apprenticed labourer to proceed either civilly or criminally in the superior courts of these islands, for any private wrong or injury done to or committed against his property or person by any person whomsoever, nor to bar or destroy the right of His Majesty to proceed by bill of indictment or information.

13. And be it further enacted, that the punishments enumerated in the 56th clause of the before recited Act for the Abolition of Slavery, shall only be inflicted for the offences therein particularly mentioned and expressed.

14. And be it further enacted, that if any person shall buy, barter or truck for, or receive by any means of or from any apprenticed labourer, sugar, cotton, rum, molasses, cocoa, coffee, charcoal or fire-wood, without the knowledge or consent of the employer of such apprenticed labourer, signified by a note in writing specifying the nature and quantity of the goods, upon complaint made to any two or more justices, the person so offending shall, on conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding 5 l. or double the value of the goods so clandestinely bought, to be levied by warrant and sale of the offender's goods, and for default of such goods, the offender shall be imprisoned in the common gaol for any number of days not exceeding five days.

MONTSERAT.--(No. 1.)

MONTSERAT.

AN ACT for the Protection and Maintenance of Apprenticed Labourers in this Island, and for ensuring the punctual discharge by such Apprenticed Labourers of the Services due by them to their Employers, and generally for regulating the conduct and for the punishment of any offences committed by such Apprenticed Labourers.

WHEREAS, by an Act of this island, entitled "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery," it is enacted, that slavery shall be utterly abolished and declared unlawful in the said island on the first day of August, in the present year of our Lord 1834, and that in conformity with the laws now in force in the said island, that all slaves who shall on or before the said 1st day of August 1834, appear by the registration in the Registrar of Slave's Office, to be of the full age of six years or upwards, shall by force and virtue of the said Act, and without the previous execution of any indenture of apprenticeship or other deed or instrument for that purpose, become and be apprenticed labourers, provided for the purposes of the said Act, any slave engaged in his ordinary occupation on the seas shall be deemed and taken to be within the said colony: and whereas, it is enacted in and by the said recited Act, that proper rules and regulations should be framed and established for determining the manner and form in which, and the solemnities with which the voluntary discharge of any apprenticed labourer from such his or her apprenticeship may be effected, and for prescribing the form and manner in which, and the solemnities with which the purchase of any such apprenticed labourer, or his or her discharge from such apprenticeship, without or in opposition, if necessary, to the consent of the person entitled to his or her services shall be effected, and how the necessary appraisement of the future value of such services shall be made, and how and to whom the amount of such appraisement shall in each case be paid and applied, and in what manner and form, and by whom the discharge from any such apprenticeship shall thereupon be given, executed and recorded; and for the maintenance of order and good discipline amongst the said apprenticed labourers, and for ensuring the punctual discharge of the services due by them to their respective employers, and for the prevention and punishment of indolence or neglect, or improper performance of work by any such apprenticed labourer of any contract in which he or she may voluntarily enter into for any hire, during the time in which he or she may not be bound to labour for his or her employer, and for the prevention and punishment of insolence and insubordination on the part of any such apprenticed labourer towards their employer, and for the prevention or punishment of vagrancy, or of any conduct on the part of any such apprenticed labourer injuring or tending to the injury of any such employer; and for the suppression and punishment of any riot or combined resistance of the laws on the part of any such apprenticed labourer, and for preventing the escape of any such apprenticed labourer during their term of apprenticeship from the colonies to which they respectively belong: And it is further provided by the said Act, that rules and regulations should be framed and established for securing punctuality and method in the supply to them of such food, clothing, lodging, medicines, medical attendance and such other maintenance and allowances as they are hereinafter declared entitled to receive, and for regulating the amount and quality of all such articles in cases where the laws at present existing in this colony may not in the case of slaves have made any regulation or any adequate regulation for that purpose: and it is necessary that proper rules should be established for the prevention and punishment of any frauds which might be practised, or of any omissions or neglects which might occur respecting the quantity or the quality of the supplies so to be furnished or respecting the periods for the delivery of the same: and whereas it is necessary in those cases in which the food of any such prædial apprenticed labourers as aforesaid, may either wholly or in part be raised by themselves in the cultivation of ground to be set apart and allotted for that purpose, that proper regulations should be made and established as to the extent of such grounds, and as to the distance at which such grounds may be so allotted from the ordinary place of abode of such prædial apprenticed labourers, and respecting the deductions to be made for the cultivation of such grounds from the annual time during which such prædial apprenticed labourers are hereinafter declared liable to labour: and whereas, it may also be necessary by such regulations as aforesaid, to secure to the said prædial apprenticed labourers the enjoyment for their own benefit of that portion of their time during which they are not hereby required to labour in the service of their respective employers, and for securing exactness in the computation of the time during which such prædial apprenticed labourers are hereby required to labour in the service of such their respective employers; and it is also necessary that provision should be made for preventing the imposition of task work on any such apprenticed labourer without his or her free consent to undertake the same; but it may be necessary by such regulations in certain cases, to require and provide for the acquiescence of the minority of the prædial apprenticed labourers attached to any plantation or estate in the distribution of an apportionment amongst the whole body of such labourers of any task-work which the majority of such body shall be willing and desirous collectively to undertake; and it is also necessary that regulations should be made respecting any voluntary contracts into which any apprenticed labourer may enter with their respective employers, or any other person for hired service for any future period, and for limiting the greatest period of time to which such voluntary contract may extend, and for enforcing the punctual and effectual performance of such voluntary contracts on the part both of such apprenticed labourers, and of the person or persons engaging for their employment and hire; and it is also necessary that regulations should be made for the prevention or punishment of any cruelty, injustice or wrong or injury which may be done to or inflicted upon any such apprenticed labourers by the persons entitled to their services; and it is also necessary that proper regulations should be made respecting the manner and form in which such indentures of apprenticeship as aforesaid shall be made on behalf of such children as aforesaid, and respecting the registering and preservation of all such indentures: We therefore, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Honourable Harry Hamilton, the president, administering the Government and the Council and Assembly of this your Majesty's island of Montserrat, do pray your most excellent Majesty, that it may be enacted, and be it and it is hereby enacted and ordained, that it shall and may be lawful for any apprenticed labourer, or for any other person on his behalf, to purchase his discharge from such apprenticeship for such sum of money or other consideration as may be agreed upon between such apprenticed labourer or any person on his behalf, and the person entitled for the time being to the services of such apprenticed labourer; provided nevertheless, that if any person discharged from such apprenticeship by any such voluntary Act as aforesaid, shall at that time be of the age of 50 years or upwards, or shall be then labouring under any such disease or mental or bodily infirmity, as may render him or her incapable of earning his or her subsistence, then and in every such case, the person or persons so discharging any such apprenticed labourer as aforesaid, shall continue and be liable to provide for the support and maintenance of such apprenticed labourer during the remaining time of such original apprenticeship, as fully as if such apprenticed labourer had not been discharged therefrom; but if it shall happen the person or persons entitled to the services of such apprenticed labourers shall be unwilling to grant such discharge from apprenticeship as aforesaid for the consideration in that behalf proposed, or if such person or persons or any of them shall be a minor, or married woman, or idiot, or lunatic, or shall other person may be disposed voluntarily to undertake the support of such children; and it is necessary that provision should be made for the maintenance of such children in any such contingency; be it therefore enacted, that if any child who, on the 1st day of August 1834, had not completed his or her sixth year, or if any child to which any female apprenticed labourer may give birth on or after the said 1st day of August 1834, shall be brought before any justice of the peace holding special commission, and if it should be made to appear to the satisfaction of such justice that any such child is unprovided with an adequate maintenance, and that such child hath not completed his or her age of 12 years, it shall be lawful for such justice, and he is hereby required on behalf of any such child, to execute an indenture of apprenticeship, thereby binding such child as an apprenticed labourer to the person or persons entitled to the services of the mother of such child, or who had been last entitled to the services of such mother; but in case it should be made to appear to any such justice that such person or persons aforesaid is or are unable or unfit to enter into such indenture, and properly to perform the condition thereof, then it shall be lawful for such justice, and he is hereby required by such indenture to bind any such child to any other person or persons, to be by him for that purpose approved, and who may be willing and able properly to perform such conditions; and it shall by every such indenture of apprenticeship be declared whether such child shall thenceforward belong to the class of attached prædial apprenticed labourers, or to the class of unattached prædial apprenticed labourers, or to the class of non-prædial apprenticed labourers, and the term of such apprenticeship of any such child shall by such indenture be limited and made to continue in force until such child shall have completed his or her 21st year, and no longer; and every child so apprenticed as aforesaid, by the order of any such justice of the peace as aforesaid, shall, during his or her apprenticeship, be subject to all such and the same rules and regulations respecting the food and other supplies to be to him or to her furnished, as any other such apprenticed labourer as aforesaid; provided always, that the said indenture of apprenticeship shall contain sufficient words of obligation upon the employer to allow reasonable time and opportunity for the education and religious instruction of such child.

6. And be it further enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons entitled to the services of any such apprenticed labourer, or any other person or persons, other than such justices of the peace, holding such special commissions as aforesaid, to punish such apprenticed labourer for any offence by him or her committed, or alleged to have been committed, by the whipping, beating or imprisonment of his or her person, or by any other personal or other correction or punishment whatever, or by any addition to the hours of labour hereinbefore limited, nor shall any court, judge, or justice of the peace punish any such apprenticed labourer, being a female, for any offence, by her committed, by whipping or beating her person; provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall extend to exempt any apprenticed labourer from the operation of any law or police regulation for the prevention or punishment of any offence which is or shall hereafter be enforced in this island in respect to all other persons of free condition.

7. And be it enacted, that all offences under this Act shall be tried in a summary manner before any justice, appointed by special commission, and that any apprenticed labourer, convicted of absenting himself or herself from the service of his or her employer without reasonable cause, for half or any smaller portion of the day, shall forfeit to such employer not exceeding a whole day's labour of his or her own time.

8. And be it further enacted, that any apprenticed labourer convicted before any magistrate, having special jurisdiction as aforesaid, of being absent without reasonable cause for more than half a day, shall, in like manner, forfeit not exceeding three days' labour of his or her own time; provided always, that it shall be lawful for the special justice before whom such complaint shall have been heard, and which he shall have adjudged, that the said apprentice shall forfeit three days' labour of his or her own time, and he is hereby authorized and required so to divide the said three days' labour, as shall not impose the obligation on such apprentice of working for more than 15 extra hours in any one week.

12. And be it further enacted, that any apprenticed labourer who shall be found wandering as a vagrant beyond the limits of the plantation of his or her employer, without a written permission from such employer, and who shall not be able to give a satisfactory account of himself or herself, shall be liable to be apprehended, and upon conviction before any special justice, shall be adjudged a vagabond, and sentenced accordingly; provided that nothing in this clause contained shall be applied to apprenticed labourers on their way to or from any place of Divine worship, or to or from market, or at such market or place; provided that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or construed to abridge, or in anywise interfere with the full and free use and enjoyment by such apprentices of the time allotted to them as their own, under and by virtue of the provisions of this Act.

13. And be it further enacted, that any apprenticed labourer who shall refuse or neglect to perform any labour required under this Act, or who shall by wilful negligence damage the property of his or her employer, or who shall be guilty of drunkenness, shall upon conviction thereof as aforesaid, forfeit to such employer any number of days' labour not exceeding four, out of his or her own time, or be sentenced to receive any number of stripes, not exceeding 20; and for the second offence within one month, shall be sentenced to double that amount of punishment; provided always, that it shall be lawful for the special justice before whom such complaint shall have been heard, on which he shall have adjudged, that the said apprentice shall forfeit three days' labour of his or her own time, and he is hereby authorised and required so to divide the said three days' labour as shall not impose the obligation on such apprentice of working for more than 15 hours in any one week.

15. And be it further enacted, that any apprenticed labourer who shall by the careless use of fire endanger the property of his or her employer, or of any other person, or shall ill use any cattle or other stock, or who shall wantonly destroy or injure the property of his or her employer, entrusted to his or her charge, shall upon conviction thereof as aforesaid, be sentenced to hard labour in the house of correction or the penal gang of the island, for any time not exceeding three months, or to receive any number of stripes not exceeding 39.

16. And be it further enacted, that in case of any riot or combined resistance to the laws on the part of any three or more apprenticed labourers, the police of the Island shall, on receiving information thereof, immediately repair to the spot and act as they shall be directed by any special justice, for the repression of any such riot or lawless proceedings; and all apprenticed labourers engaged in any such riot shall, on conviction thereof as aforesaid, be sentenced to hard labour as aforesaid, for any term not exceeding six months, or to receive any number of stripes not exceeding 39.

17. And be it further enacted, that any special justice resorting to or present at any such riotous assemblage, shall cause a flag or some other appropriate signal to be exhibited as a warning to all persons there present to separate and quietly disperse; and all apprenticed labourers who after the exhibition of such flag or signal shall not immediately disperse, shall on conviction thereof before any one or more such special justices, be sentenced to hard labour as aforesaid, for any time not exceeding six months, and to receive any number of stripes not exceeding 39; provided that in the event of the unavoidable absence of such special justice nothing herein contained shall be taken to prevent any justice of the peace from quelling any riot or disturbance among such apprentices in the same way and by the same means as by law he is now authorised to use in quelling any riot or preventing any breach of the peace among or by any of His Majesty's free subjects of this island; and be it enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any apprenticed labourer to keep, use or have in his or her possession any gunpowder, gun, swords, pistols or fire-arms of any description whatsoever, or any other offensive weapons, unless with the knowledge and consent of his or her master or manager.

18. And be it enacted, that every apprentice so offending shall, on conviction before any special justice, be punished with whipping, imprisonment, hard labour in the penal gang or house of correction of the island, or of any two or more of those punishments as may be awarded by such special justice; provided that such whipping shall not exceed 39 lashes, and such imprisonment shall not exceed one month.

19. And be it further enacted, that it shall be lawful for any such master, manager or lawful employer to seize and detain to his own use any gunpowder, guns, swords, pistols or fire-arms of any description whatsoever, or any other offensive weapon unlawfully in the possession of any apprenticed labourer.

20. And be it further enacted, that any apprenticed labourer quitting or attempting to quit this island without the permission in writing of his or her employer, shall, on conviction thereof before any special justice, be sentenced to hard labour in the house of correction or the penal gang of the island, for a term not exceeding six months, or to receive any number of stripes not exceeding 39.

21. And be it further enacted, that in all cases wherein any apprenticed labourer shall have been convicted of having absented himself or herself from the service of his or her employer without reasonable cause for more than one day at a time or during 14 days, such time so lost to such employer shall be made up to him or her by such apprenticed labourer out of his or her own time, not exceeding 15 hours in each week; provided that such extra service or compensation shall not be compellable after the expiration of seven years.

22. And be it further enacted, that if any apprenticed labourer shall by wilful neglect or indolence during his or her own time, suffer his or her house or provision-ground to fall into decay and bad order, it shall and may be lawful for the employer of such apprenticed labourer, with the sanction in writing of any special justice, to be obtained upon proof before him of such neglect or indolence, to put the house or provision-ground of such apprenticed labourer into proper order for his or her comfort and support, and to deduct an equivalent quantity of labour from his or her own time, not exceeding 15 hours in one week.

23. And

23. And be it enacted, that on every plantation the special justices shall appoint one or more of the apprenticed labourers thereon, with the consent of the master or manager, to be constables, who shall be empowered to maintain peace and order on such plantation under the directions of the proprietor or manager thereof, and to secure and place in confinement any apprenticed labourer who shall commit any offence on such plantation, or any apprenticed labourer not employed on such plantation who may be found loitering thereon without the knowledge or permission of the proprietor or manager thereof, such apprentice confined as aforesaid not to be kept in custody longer than shall be necessary to procure the attendance of the special justice: provided always, that if the attendance of a special justice cannot be procured within 24 hours, it shall and may be lawful for the proprietor or manager aforesaid, to order the release of such apprentice so confined as aforesaid, after the expiration of 24 hours; provided nevertheless, that in the event of such apprentice being discharged as aforesaid, the proprietor or manager shall and is hereby required to prefer the complaint on which such apprentice was confined, before the special justice when he shall next come upon the estate; and provided that nothing shall be construed to give any such constable any power or authority over any of His Majesty's subjects, except such apprenticed labourers.

24. And be it enacted, that for all offences where punishment by flogging is authorized to be awarded by this Act, it shall be lawful for the special justices in case such offences shall be committed by females, to sentence such females to solitary confinement for any period not exceeding 10 days.

25. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for any special justice to substitute solitary confinement in any case where punishment by flogging or hard labour is hereinbefore directed, provided such solitary confinement shall not exceed for any offence at any one time, 10 days.

26. And be it further enacted, that in all cases of solitary confinement, the persons so confined shall be fed on such diet as the special justice shall direct, and no other.

27. And be it enacted, that all other inferior misdemeanors and other crimes committed by apprenticed labourers against each other, or against the person entitled to his or her service, or against any other person and not hereinbefore mentioned, shall be heard and determined before any justice appointed by special commission, reasonable notice of the time and place of such trial being given to the person entitled to the services of the apprentice complained against, where such person so entitled to his or her services is not the complainant; and such justice upon conviction of such apprentice shall order and direct punishment to be inflicted as he may think proper, not exceeding 39 lashes, nor three months' imprisonment to hard labour, nor 20 days' solitary confinement; provided that nothing in this clause contained shall be taken to authorize such magistrate to sentence any female apprentice to be flogged or beaten; and provided also, that nothing herein contained shall be deemed or taken to deprive any of His Majesty's subjects of his or her right to proceed against any such apprentice in any of the courts of this island, for remedy against any apprentice for any wrong or injury done or committed to or against the person or property of such subject; and provided also, that when any apprenticed labourer shall be convicted of indolence, or neglect, or improper performance of work, the special justice before whom such conviction shall take place may, if he sees fit, sentence the offender, either alone or in addition to the punishment by flogging or hard labour hereinbefore directed, to labour for such number of hours or days in his or her own time for the benefit of the persons entitled to his or her services, as the justice of the case may seem to require, not exceeding 15 hours in any one week.

28. And be it further enacted, that in cases in which the food of any such prædial apprenticed labourer is supplied, not by the delivery to him or her of provision, but by the cultivation of such prædial apprenticed labourer of grounds set apart for the growth of provisions, the persons entitled to their services shall and are hereby required during the term of such apprenticeship and no longer, to provide such prædial apprenticed labourer with ground adequate both in quality and quantity for his or her support, and within a reasonable distance from his or her usual place of abode, under a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* for each offence.

29. And whereas it is necessary that proper regulations should be made and established as to the extent of such provision-grounds hereinbefore mentioned, and as to the distance at which such grounds may be so allotted from the ordinary place of abode of such prædial apprenticed labourer; be it enacted, that for the purposes of this Act all grounds hitherto allotted to every slave during such his or her state of slavery, for his or her maintenance and support, shall during the term of his or her apprenticeship in quantity, quality and locality be deemed adequate and proper for the maintenance and support of every prædial apprenticed labourer, unless good and sufficient cause be shown to the contrary; provided and be it enacted, that such prædial or non-prædial apprenticed labourer shall satisfy, in case of complaint, such special justice that he has kept his grounds in a due and proper state of cultivation.

30. And whereas one day in every fortnight has heretofore been allowed to the slaves for the cultivation of their provision grounds, so as to make the number of days 26 in the year, for the purpose aforesaid, exclusive of Sundays and holidays; and whereas a provision made in the hereinbefore recited Act for the abolition of slavery within this island confines the hours of labour which the master is entitled to from such prædial apprenticed labourer to 45 hours, or five days of nine hours each in any one week; and whereas a further allowance for the cultivation of their ground, and the raising and securing the crops grown thereon, is allotted to them by the Act of the said island hereinbefore recited; be it enacted, that from and after the 1st day of August next, every prædial apprenticed labourer shall be entitled to  $4\frac{1}{2}$  hours out of the 45 weekly working hours hereinbefore mentioned, for the cultivation of his or her grounds, and such portion of time shall be allowed to each apprentice, either on any day or days in one week, or by any number of days consecutively, at such period of the year as may be deemed by the possessor or manager of such property least detrimental and injurious to the cultivation of the plantation on which he or she shall reside, and the gathering in of the crops, and the manufacture of the produce thereof; and any person entitled to the service of any such prædial apprenticed labourer who shall refuse to allow such portion of time to any such labourer, shall be subject and liable to a penalty of 40 s. for each offence, to be recovered as hereinafter provided; provided always, that such number of days so allowed to the apprenticed labourer shall exceed three consecutive days at one time; provided that it shall and may be lawful for the employer and apprentice to enter into an agreement in writing, of which a copy shall be given to the apprentice, to pay to the said apprentice such sum as may be agreed on between them in lieu of time; and provided also, that in the event of nonpayment of the sum agreed on at such time as shall be stipulated in the said agreement, it shall and may be lawful for the special justice, on the application of the apprentice, of which the employer shall have due notice, to issue a warrant against the goods of such employer for the amount of the money due at the time of such application, which warrant any constable within this island or district may and is hereby required to execute and make sale of the goods so taken under the warrant, unless the amount for which the same is issued shall be paid within three days, and the money to be received or levied under such warrant shall, immediately after the receipt thereof by such constable, be paid over to the said apprentice.

31. And whereas in certain parts of this island there may not be lands proper for the cultivation of provisions, or by reason of long continuance of dry weather or other casualty, the grounds hitherto appropriated for negro grounds may be rendered unproductive; be it enacted, that in such case the master, owner or other person entitled to the service of such apprenticed labourer shall by some other ways and means make good and ample provision for all such apprenticed labourers to whose services they shall be entitled, in order that they may be properly supported and maintained, under penalty not exceeding 40 s. for each offence: provided always, that in such case no diminution of the 45 hours as hereinbefore mentioned shall take place.

32. And be it further enacted, that all complaints made by an apprenticed labourer against the person entitled to his or her services touching any fraud practised or refusal to furnish any such apprenticed labourer with sufficiency of provision ground, or of other means of maintenance and support, in cases where such apprentice hath no provision-ground, or of illegally and improperly withholding from such apprentice any portion of the time allowed him or her to cultivate such ground, or of imposing task-work on any apprenticed labourer contrary to the provisions of this Act, or of breach of any contract on the part of any person engaged in the voluntary services of any apprenticed labourer, or any cruelty, injustice or other wrong or injury done to or inflicted upon any apprenticed labourer by the person entitled to his or her services, shall be heard, adjudged and determined before any one or more special justice or justices, and he or they is or are hereby empowered to punish any offender in any of these respects last mentioned, with a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, and for default of goods and chattels whereon to levy, the offender shall be committed to gaol until he or she shall pay or satisfy the same, but such imprisonment shall not exceed five days; provided that nothing herein mentioned shall be deemed or taken to bar or destroy the right of any apprenticed labourer to proceed in the courts of law of the said island, for any wrong or injury done to or committed against his or her property or person, by any person whomsoever.

33. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that in cases where it shall be necessary for the cultivation of any plantation, sugar-work or other settlement, or for gathering in or manufacturing the crops and produce thereof, to impose task-work on the prædial apprenticed labourers thereof or working thereupon, it shall be lawful for any special justice to sanction such task-work: provided such apprenticed labourers, or a majority of the adults among them, shall be willing and desirous collectively to undertake the same.

34. And be it enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for any employer and apprenticed labourer mutually to contract together for work to be done either by the day or by the task, for such wages or consideration as they may agree upon; provided always, that such contracts or engagements shall be sanctioned by a special justice, and that no such agreement shall be for a longer period than one year, and that no task-work shall be imposed upon any body of apprenticed labourers, except by consent of the majority thereof.

35. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that all indentures of apprenticeship of children required by this Act, shall be as nearly as the nature of the case will admit, in conformity with, and upon the same terms and conditions as indentures of apprenticeship of children made by the parochial or municipal authorities in any town in England, and shall be recorded in the secretary's office in this island.

36. And be it further enacted, that any apprenticed labourer who shall during his or her apprenticeship wilfully absent himself or herself from the service of his or her employer for a period exceeding three months at any one time, may be sentenced by a special justice, either to serve his or her employer after the expiration of his or her apprenticeship, for so long a time as he or she shall have absented himself or herself from such service, or to make satisfaction to his or her employer for the loss sustained by such absence, except so far as he or she shall have made satisfaction for such absence either out of such extra hours as aforesaid or otherwise; provided that such extra service or compensation shall not be compellable after the expiration of seven years next after the termination of the apprenticeship of such apprentice.

37. And be it further enacted, that no apprenticed labourer shall be compelled or compellable to labour on Sundays, except in works of necessity or in tending of cattle, nor shall any apprenticed labourer, except as aforesaid, be liable to be hindered or prevented from attending anywhere on Sundays for religious worship at his or her free will or pleasure, but shall be at full liberty so to do without any let, denial or interruption whatever.

38. And be it further enacted, that from and after the 1st day of August 1834, no person whatsoever shall on Sunday expose to sale in any market or other place, or in any shop or other place, any goods, wares, or merchandize, or provisions, under a penalty not exceeding 5 l. for every offence, provided that in case the goods or provisions so exposed for sale shall not exceed in value the sum of 5 l., the same may in lieu of such penalty be forfeited by order of any justice of the peace, for the benefit of the poor of the parish in which such offence is committed: and provided also that nothing herein shall extend to prevent the keeping open of any druggist shop, tavern, or lodging-house, or the sale of fresh meat, fresh fish, or milk on Sunday, such sale however not to take place during the celebration of divine service; and that from and after the 1st day of August 1834, Saturday in each week shall be the day given to every prædial labourer; provided that prædial labourers employed in works of necessity, tending cattle, domestic services, and protecting property, shall have some other day in lieu of Saturday.

39. And be it enacted, that in all cases of urgent necessity, it shall be lawful for the owner or other persons in management of such property, where such necessity shall occur, to require and compel the immediate and continued services of any or all the apprenticed labourers during such emergency.

40. And be it enacted, that no such apprenticed labourer shall, during the continuance of such apprenticeship, be liable to be arrested or imprisoned for debt, or be liable to be called on, or be competent to serve in the militia of this island, or to serve as a juror.

41. And be it enacted, that all such apprenticed labourers shall, during the term of such their apprenticeship, be and they are hereby disqualified from being elected members of Assembly or Coroners, or of voting at any election for any of the offices aforesaid, or being appointed justices of the peace.

42. And be it further enacted, that if any slave or slaves shall be guilty of any offence now triable under any Act of this island for the trial of slaves, and not brought to trial before the 1st day of August 1834, it shall and may be lawful to bring such slave or slaves to trial, under and by virtue of the power and provisions of the said Act, and to award such punishment as the law provides.

43. And be it enacted, that all fines and penalties imposed by this Act shall be recovered before any special justice of the peace by warrant of distress and sale of the offender's goods and chattels, to be applied for the use of the public of this island.

44. And be it enacted, that a certain statute made in the 52d year of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An Act to repeal certain Acts and amend other Acts relating to Religious Worship and Assemblies, and Persons teaching or preaching therein," shall be and is hereby declared to be in force in this island: provided nevertheless, that any two or more justices of the peace holding special commission under the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 73, shall have, exercise and enjoy all and every the jurisdiction, powers and authorities whatsoever, which by force and virtue of the said Act are within the realm of England had exercised and enjoyed by the several justices of the peace, and by the general and quarter sessions therein mentioned.

45. And be it further enacted, that if any apprenticed labourer shall, without lawful authority, enter upon and take possession of any land belonging to any other person, it shall and may be lawful for any magistrate having special jurisdiction therein, to dispossess and eject such apprenticed labourer from such land, and to cause the same, with all crops growing thereupon, and all buildings thereon erected, to be delivered up to the owner of such land; and may further adjudge such apprenticed labourer to suffer imprisonment for any time not exceeding three calendar months, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of such magistrate that such apprenticed labourer had wrongfully and fraudulently taken such possession.

AN ACT for the Classification of Apprenticed Labourers.

No. 2.
Colonial
Abolition Acts.

MONTSERRAT.

WHEREAS by an Act of this island, intituled "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery," it is enacted, that slavery should be utterly abolished and declared unlawful in the said island on the 1st day of August, in the present year of our Lord 1834; and that in conformity with the laws now in force in the said island, that all slaves who shall on or before the said 1st day of August 1834, have been duly registered as slaves in the said island, and who on the said 1st day of August 1834 shall appear by such registries of the full age of six years or upwards, shall by force and virtue of the said Act, and without the previous execution of any indenture of apprenticeship or other deed or instrument for that purpose, become and be apprenticed labourers, provided, for the purposes of the said Act, any slave engaged in his ordinary occupation on the seas shall be deemed and taken to be within the said colony: and whereas by the fourth clause of the said Act, intituled "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery," it is enacted, that all apprenticed labourers shall be divided into three classes, viz. prædial attached, prædial unattached, and non-prædial, and that such division of the said apprenticed labourers shall be carried into effect in the same manner and form, and subject to such rules and regulations as should for that purpose be established under such authority and by such Acts of the Legislature as thereafter mentioned; and that no person above the age of 12 years should be included in the class of prædial apprenticed labourers, unless for 12 months before the passing and publication of the now reciting Act had been habitually employed a prædial labourer: and whereas for the purpose of carrying into effect the said fourth clause of the said Act, intituled "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery," we, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Governor and Commander-in-chief in and over your Majesty's islands of Antigua, Montserrat, Barbuda, St. Kitts, Nevis, Anguilla, the Virgin Islands and Dominica, and the Council and Assembly of this your Majesty's island of Montserrat, do pray your most Excellent Majesty that it may be enacted, and be it and it is hereby enacted and ordained by the authority aforesaid, that the registrar of slaves shall within 14 days after the passing and publication of this Act, deliver to every owner of slaves, or to the attorney or agent of such owner, or to any other person or persons appearing on the registry to be in the possession of any slave in any capacity whatsoever, a list of such slaves, for which the registrar shall receive the sum of 3 d. cash for the name of each slave named in such registry, and 9 s. for certificate.

And be it enacted, that every such person as aforesaid shall, within 14 days, return such list so given to him as aforesaid to the registrar, distinguishing, in reference to each slave therein mentioned, to which of the said classes he or she belongs, and to every such return shall be annexed an affidavit to the effect that the distinction therein made corresponds with the occupation usually pursued for 12 months next preceding the date of the said Act, intituled "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery," by each of the slaves to whom such returns may refer, under the penalty of 10 l. gold and silver money, to be recovered by warrant under the hand and seal of any justice of the peace for the said island, to be applied to the uses of the said island; and in case the said registrar shall not be satisfied that the return so made as aforesaid is correct, the said registrar shall issue a summons to any person or persons with whose return he is dissatisfied to attend him the said registrar at a time and place to be mentioned in such summons, and if he thinks proper, direct that the person or persons to whom such summons is directed, to bring with him any slave or slaves respecting whom any doubts shall or may arise; and the registrar shall at the time and place mentioned in the said summons proceed to examine the person or persons making such return or returns, and any witness or witnesses that may be produced to hear the truth of such return, and shall either confirm or correct the said return, and give notice of such correction or confirmation to the person or persons making the said return and to the slaves respectively, of his judgment and decision; and if either the party making such return or the slave or slaves to whom it may refer shall be dissatisfied with the decision and judgment of the said registrar, such party may on his own behalf, and the registrar may on the behalf of such slave, apply to the chief or to any other judge of the superior court in the said island, by petition, setting forth the nature of such decision and the objections thereto; and the judge to whom any such petition may be preferred shall proceed in a summary way to hear and determine upon the same, and his decision shall be final and conclusive.

And be it enacted, that when such proceedings as aforesaid shall have taken place, there shall be affixed to the entry of the name of each prædial attached slave in the registry the letters P. A.; of each prædial unattached slave the letters P. U.; and of each non-prædial slave the letters N. to which he is appointed, unless when prevented by sickness or other reasonable cause, to be allowed by the governor; and every such magistrate shall one day in each week, or oftener if need be, at the place of his residence, hold a session for the hearing and deciding upon such cases as may be brought before him; and shall once in each month, or oftener if need be, repair to such plantation within his district, upon which 10 or any greater number of apprenticed labourers shall be employed, there to take cognizance of such cases as may be brought before him.

And be it enacted, that every such special justice shall keep a journal of all the cases brought before him, in which he shall enter, first, the date of the complaint; secondly, the name of the complainant; third, the substance of the complaint; fourth, the names of the witnesses adduced on either side; fifth, the substance of the evidence; sixth, his decision on the case; seventh, whether the decision has been carried into effect; eighth, any general remarks which he may think desirable: and all such journals shall be kept in one uniform manner, to be prescribed for that purpose by the governor; and the said special justice, at the end of each quarter, shall transmit to the governor a duplicate of his journal for the preceding quarter, with an affidavit thereto annexed, to the effect that it has been faithfully kept, and that with the exception of unintentional errors, it contains a true account of all the proceedings in which the deponent has been engaged as such special justice during the quarter to which it refers.

And be it enacted, that it shall be the duty of the special justice, on receiving any complaint, to reduce it to writing, and to cause it to be read by, or to read it over to, the complainant, by whom it shall then be subscribed; and if the complaint shall appear to the justice immaterial, and not to deserve further inquiry, he may, at once, dismiss the complaint; but if he shall think inquiry necessary, he shall call upon the complainant to make oath that the complaint is true; and upon taking any complaint, to the truth of which such oath shall have been so made, the special justice shall either issue his warrant for the arrest of the party charged, or shall issue a summons for his attendance, as the case may require. The warrant of arrest shall be in the form annexed, marked A. and the summons in the form annexed, marked B.

And be it enacted, that in all cases which impute to the party charged, a capital or transportable offence, the special justice shall issue his warrant to apprehend and bring the party charged before him, to answer the said charge; also, in all cases where there is reason to apprehend danger to the peace from delay. In all other cases the justice is to proceed in the first instance by summons.

And be it enacted, that in cases in which it may be necessary to adduce witnesses in support of, or in answer to any such complaint, the justice shall issue a summons to every such witness, in the annexed form marked (C). And the justice shall, in the presence of all parties, first, read over the written complaint, and then take down, in writing, the answer of the party charged, and then proceed to examine on oath, the party complaining and the witnesses, taking down, in writing, the deposition of each witness, which shall be read over to, and signed by, him. And the justice may, from time to time, adjourn any such proceeding for further inquiry, and, if necessary, commit the party charged to custody pending such adjournment, or take bail for his appearance. Every such commitment or bail shall be in the annexed forms, marked (D) and (E). And at the close of such proceedings, the justice shall pronounce his decision thereupon, which decision he shall reduce into writing, and subscribe with his hand; and the justice shall, as law and reason may seem to him to require, either dismiss the complaint, or sanction any compromise between the parties which he may think just, or convict the party charged, or commit him to prison to take his trial for the imputed offence. And if the complaint shall be dismissed, the justice shall, in such his written decision, state whether it was so dismissed as being unproved, or as being frivolous and vexatious, or as being malicious; and if any such complaint shall be so dismissed as frivolous and vexatious, the justice may adjudge the complainant, if a labourer, to work in the service of his employer, for any time, not exceeding in the whole 15 extra hours in any one week, or if the complainant be the employer, to the payment of a penalty, for the use of the labourer, of not less than 20 s., and not greater than 5 l.; and if such complaint shall be so dismissed as malicious, it shall be competent to the justice, at the instance of the party charged, to adjudge the complainant, if an apprenticed labourer, to imprisonment with hard labour, for any time not exceeding one month, or, if the employer of any such labourer, to a fine not exceeding 40 s., for the benefit of the party charged, which judgment shall be a bar to any suit, action, or prosecution against such complainant for calumny, defamation, or otherwise, in respect of such his complaint.

And be it enacted, that if the justice shall by his decision convict the party charged, or shall convict the complainant of preferring a frivolous and vexatious or a malicious complaint, such conviction shall be severally drawn up according to the forms annexed, marked (F), (G), (H), or if such magistrate shall commit the party charged to take his trial for the imputed offence, such commitment shall be drawn up in the form annexed, marked (I), and upon any such conviction as aforesaid, by such special justice, he shall forthwith issue a warrant for the execution thereof, which warrant shall be in the form annexed, marked (K).

And be it enacted, that all summonses, warrants, commitments and other orders so to be issued by any such justice as aforesaid, shall be executed by the police officers of his district, such justice being nevertheless authorised, as occasion may require, to address the same to any other person or persons jointly with, or instead of such officers of police as to him may seem requisite; and any summons, warrant or order issued by any such special justice within his own district, may, without any further authority, be carried into execution in any part of the colony, though beyond such district; and if any person summoned by any such justice justice as a witness, shall not appear in obedience to such summons, or appearing shall refuse to be sworn or examined, or to answer any question proposed to him by such justice in relation to the matters depending before him, it shall be lawful for such justice to issue his warrant for the arrest of any such defaulter, and to commit him to close custody, there to remain until he shall submit to be so sworn and examined, and to make such answers as aforesaid, and every such warrant of arrest or commitment shall be in the form annexed, marked (L) and (M).

And be it enacted, that if any suit or action shall be commenced against any special justice in respect of any Act, matter or thing by him done by virtue and in pursuance thereof; and if the court shall give judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff shall by such judgment be condemned to pay treble costs of suit; and if in any such suit or action, such justice shall at any time before final judgment tender to the plaintiff sufficient amends for the wrong or injury, in respect of which the same may be brought, and submit to pay the costs of suit up to that time incurred, and if the plaintiff shall refuse to accept such amends and costs of suit, then, upon proof made to the court at the trial of such suit, that such amends have been so tendered and were sufficient, judgment shall be given for the plaintiff in the amount of the sum so tendered, subject nevertheless to the reduction therefrom of the costs of suit of the defendant.

And be it enacted, that no suit or action shall be brought against any such justice, in respect of any matter or thing by him done under or in pursuance hereof, unless the same shall be commenced within six months after the cause of action occurred.

TOBAGO.—(No. 2.)

AN ACT to provide for the Building of places of Confinement and Punishment, and to establish a Police Force in the said Island; and also to repeal the 55th, 56th & 57th clauses of the Act, intituled "An Act to carry into effect the Provisions of an Act of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, intituled, 'An Act for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Colonies, for promoting the Industry of the Manumitted Slaves, and for compensating the Persons hitherto entitled to the Services of such Slaves.'"

A place of confinement to be erected in the Windward quarter of this Island; a treadmill established; Commander-in-chief to appoint a proper person to be keeper and superintend the same.

WHEREAS, it is expedient that a place of confinement should be erected in the Windward quarter of this island, and that a treadmill should be established therein, for the punishment of such persons as may be sentenced to hard labour thereon: and whereas by the 2nd clause of an Act, intituled "An Act for establishing certain Rules and Regulations respecting Persons sentenced to punishment by Hard Labour," it was provided that when and as soon as a treadmill should be erected in the said windward quarter of the island, it should be lawful for his Excellency the Lieutenant-governor or Commander-in-chief of the said island, to appoint a proper person to be keeper and superintend the same in person; and it was also provided, that the said superintendent should be the keeper of any house of correction or place of confinement that might be established in the said windward district; and whereas it is also expedient that a place of confinement should be erected in the north side of the island, and that a keeper thereof should in like manner be appointed: and whereas it is desirable that the 55th, 56th and 57th clauses of the Act, intituled, "An Act to carry into effect the provisions of an Act of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, intituled, 'An Act for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Colonies, for promoting the Industry of the Manumitted Slaves, and for compensating the Persons hitherto entitled to the Services of such Slaves,'" should be repealed, in order that the enactments regarding the police may be consolidated into one Act; and whereas it is also desirable that the said buildings should be erected with as little delay as possible, and that provision should be made for the same: we therefore, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, his Excellency Major-general Henry Charles Darling, Lieutenant-governor in and over the island of Tobago and its dependencies, the Council and General Assembly of the same, do humbly pray your most excellent Majesty that it may be enacted;

Commander-in-chief to appoint Commissioners to carry this Act into execution.

2. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all acts, matters, and things which the said Commissioners for the execution of this Act, are by this Act authorized to do or execute, may be done and executed by any three or more of such Commissioners, one at least being of the Council.

4. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that it shall be lawful for all persons who are or shall be seised, possessed of or intrusted in any lands or buildings, which shall be deemed necessary for the purposes of this Act, to contract or agree for the sale of, and to sell, convey and assure such lands or buildings unto such person or persons as shall be named by the said Commissioners, in trust for the purpose of erecting thereon such places of confinement and punishment as aforesaid, and upon the execution of such conveyance or conveyances, the said land, buildings and premises shall vest in the person or persons so to be named by the said Commissioners, and his and their heirs, in trust for the purposes aforesaid.

Lands to be conveyed to trustees, who are to be named by Commissioners.

5. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the said Commissioners shall cause the buildings necessary for such places of confinement, punishment, and as residences for the police force to be erected on such plan or plans as may appear to the said Commissioners best adapted therefor, and shall contract and agree with proper persons for the erection of such buildings, to be built according to such plan or plans, and subject to such alterations as may from time to time seem to the said Commissioners to be necessary and expedient, and shall also contract and agree for the purchase of a treadmill, with the necessary machinery for grinding corn, &c., to be placed in the said building, so to be erected in the parish of St. Paul; and the said Commissioners are also hereby empowered and required from time to time to cause such necessary repairs to be made in such buildings as shall be required, and the said Commissioners are hereby authorized to execute any agreement in writing on behalf of the public with any person or persons to be employed in the erection of such buildings, and for completing the same in a proper and workmanlike manner; provided always, that tenders for such contracts shall be advertised in one or more of the newspapers of this island, and that the lowest and most eligible tender, if approved, shall be accepted by the said Commissioners, and they are hereby required to take a bond or bonds from the contractor or contractors in such penalty or penalties as shall seem proper to them, and with two good and sufficient securities to be approved of by them, for the due and prompt performance of his or their contract or contracts, and from time to time, as any sum or sums of money shall become due to the person or persons from whom such spots or parcels of lands as aforesaid shall have been purchased, or to such contractor or contractors under and by virtue of any such contract or contracts as aforesaid, or for the purchase of such mill or for repairs, it shall and may be lawful for the Governor, Lieutenant-governor or Commander-in-chief in Council, to sign a warrant for payment of the same, which warrant the treasurer of the said island or his lawful deputy shall discharge out of the monies hereafter appropriated to that purpose.

Commissioners to cause buildings of places of confinement and residences of police force to be erected, and to contract for treadmill for Windward quarter.

6. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that when and as soon as the said place of confinement shall be erected and finished in the parish of St. David, it shall be lawful for his Excellency the Lieutenant-governor or Commander-in-Chief of the said island, to appoint a proper person to be keeper and superintendent thereof, and the said superintendent so to be appointed shall be entitled to receive for the same, out of the public treasury of this island, a salary at and after the rate of 45 £. per annum, and the said superintendent shall keep and observe, as well the rules and regulations established by an Act, intituled "An Act for the better Regulation of the Gaol in the Town of Scarborough," as well as the rules and regulations that may hereafter be established by the court of king's bench of the said island.

Place of confinement to be erected in the parish of St. David, a proper person to be appointed as keeper, &c.

7. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the 55th, 56th and 57th clauses of the Act, intituled "An Act to carry into effect the Provisions of an Act of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, intituled 'An Act for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Colonies, for promoting the Industry of the manumitted Slaves, and for compensating the Persons hitherto entitled to the services of such Slaves,' " shall be, and the same are hereby respectively repealed, abrogated and annulled; provided always, that the repeal of the said clauses shall not alter or in anywise affect the construction of any other clause or clauses of the said Act for the abolition of slavery, which may refer to any of the clauses so repealed, but that such unrepealed clauses shall have and receive the same construction, with reference to any clause by this Act substituted for such repealed clauses, as if these substituted clauses had been originally enacted.

Clause 55th, 56th and 57th of the Imperial Abolition Slavery Act repealed.

8. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the Governor, Lieutenant-governor or Commander-in-Chief of the said island shall, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to nominate, and from time to time to appoint six fit and able-bodied men to act as a police force for the said island, two of which said men shall be

10. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the special justices shall from time to time, subject to the approbation of the Governor, Lieutenant-governor or Commander-in-chief of the said island, frame such orders and regulations as they shall deem expedient, relative to the general government of the men to be appointed under this Act, the description of their arms, accoutrements and other necessaries to be furnished them, and all such orders and regulations relative to the said police force, as the said justices shall from time to time deem expedient for preventing neglect or abuse; and either of the said justices may at any time suspend or dismiss from his employment any man belonging to the said police force, whom he shall think remiss or negligent in the discharge of his duty, or otherwise unfit for the same; such suspension or dismissal nevertheless to be subject to the confirmation or disallowance of the Governor, Lieutenant-governor or Commander-in-chief of the said island; and when any man shall be so dismissed or cease to belong to the said police force, all powers vested in him by virtue of this Act as a constable, shall immediately cease and determine.

Warrants, &c. of special justice to be executed by one of police force.

11. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all summonses, warrants, commitments or other orders to be issued by any such special justice of the peace, in the execution of his duty as aforesaid, shall be executed by one or other of the police constables of the district; provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent such special justice from addressing the same, as occasion may require, to any other constable or constables of the said island jointly with or instead of such police constables as to him may seem requisite.

Persons assaulting or obstructing police force; how dealt with.

12. And be it and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any person shall assault or obstruct any person belonging to the said police force in the execution of his duty, or shall aid or incite any person so to assault or resist, every such offender being convicted thereof before two justices of the peace, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay such sum, not exceeding 5 £, as the said justices shall think meet; provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive the court of king's bench of its jurisdiction over such offences.

ANALYSIS of COLONIAL ACTS and ORDINANCES, general in their Title, but in Practice more particularly affecting the Emancipated Negroes; presented by Mr. Beldam, as the Evidence of himself and Mr. Matthews, on the Acts and Ordinances included in it, and ordered to be printed on the 15th July 1836.

No. 5.
Analysis of Colonial Acts.

MANY of the enactments considered in this analysis, especially such as relate to vagrancy, police regulations and prison discipline, have been virtually adopted into the Abolition Laws, and require to be examined as part and parcel of them; others relate, in express terms, to apprenticed labourers; and, together with the remainder, form parts of an oppressive system recently established in the colonies for the government of the labouring classes, and exercising a decisive influence upon the present and future condition of the emancipated negroes.

With respect to vagrancy it may be briefly observed, that the Imperial Act of Abolition expressly authorizes the enactment of new provisions with a view to the social change about to take place in the colonies; and that the colonial legislatures have accordingly provided against this offence, partly by special enactments introduced into their Abolition Laws, and partly by general laws upon the subject. In the greater number of instances the Abolition Law, which defines the offence, specifies likewise the penalty; but the mode of bringing the offender to justice, as well as his subsequent treatment, are in most cases left to the provisions of the general law of the colony, which, on that account, if on no other, requires to be carefully examined. The abuses of which vagrant laws in general are susceptible, having been already considered in the printed Analysis of the Jamaica Vagrant Act, need not be here repeated.

With respect to police and prison laws it may be observed, that so far as new provisions are required, with a view to the contemplated change, they were fully authorized by the Imperial Abolition Act; and provisions of this kind have been framed accordingly, partly in the Abolition Laws themselves, and partly in the general laws of each colony. In all cases under the Abolition Laws, to which the authority of the estate constables does not extend, the powers of the general police supply the deficiency; and in a great variety of cases under the Abolition Laws, the special justices are enabled or required to commit the offender to the common gaol or common house of correction. In Jamaica and in Barbadoes this punishment may be substituted alone for all the other punishments authorized by the Abolition Acts of those colonies. The constitution and powers of the general police, and the discipline and management of places of confinement, form therefore a most important part of the general inquiry into the working of the abolition system.

With respect to those portions of the general laws of the colonies which expressly relate to apprenticed labourers, the very nature of such enactments requires that they should now undergo examination.

With regard to the remaining general laws, such for instance as relate to questions between master and servant, such as create or fix the conditions of new apprenticeships, such as limit the rights of small proprietors and petty tradesmen, or in any way disclose in their structure or their practical operation a design to make the emancipated classes the continued objects of peculiar restraint or coercion, it seems impossible to exclude such enactments from an impartial inquiry into the means adopted for carrying the intentions of the Imperial Parliament into operation. Without undervaluing any part of the previous inquiry, it may, indeed, be affirmed that laws of this permanent and comprehensive character possess a higher importance, and require a more minute investigation than the provisions of any temporary system: and unless it be consistent with good faith to perform with one hand an act of justice, which may be immediately resumed with the other, such Acts passed almost contemporaneously with the Acts of Abolition, in direct contravention of the spirit of the Imperial Act, and practically withdrawing from the emancipated negroes a considerable portion of that substantial freedom which it was the design of the Imperial Act to bestow, must be considered as virtual infractions of that Act, not only justifying but demanding immediate inquiry and redress.

To this entire analysis the concluding sentiments expressed in the analysis of the Jamaica Vagrant Act appear to be applicable. The friends of emancipation, after having consented to pay so costly a price for the absolute freedom of the slaves, will not consider the compact completed by finally converting them into "serfs;" while from such specimens of colonial legislation as many of these Acts and Ordinances exhibit, they must naturally conclude that the abolition of an avowed system of slavery is but the commencement of the work; and that the more important part still remains to be accomplished, in securing to the negroes, by just and permanent enactments, administered by impartial and responsible functionaries, the substance of that liberty which has been so dearly purchased.

JAMAICA.

JAMAICA. The Jamaica laws under this head have been already printed in the second part of Mr. Beldam's Analysis, except the following; viz.

AN ACT to Organize a Police:—Passed 17th December 1835; expired 31st December 1836.

This Act has most probably been revived, and it may be proper therefore to remark, that it contained among other enactments, a clause prohibiting under a very heavy penalty the possession of any sugar, rum, pimento, coffee or other produce, or any wood, grass, or canes, without a permit from the proprietor or overseer, or other person in charge of the property whereon such produce was grown and manufactured.

This enactment, including every species of produce, applies of course to the articles usually raised upon the apprentices' own grounds, and they may consequently be put at any time to the almost impossible proof of the identity of every article cultivated or produced by themselves, subject to the penalties on default as aforesaid.

BARBADOES.

BARBADOES.

AN ACT for the Establishment of a Rural Police for this Island, and for the Erection of Houses of Correction connected therewith:—Passed 14th July 1834.

AN ACT for the Temporary Establishment of a Rural Police in this Island:—Passed 24th April 1835, for six months only.

AN ACT for continuing in force and amending the last-mentioned:—Passed 9th December 1835; allowed 9th March 1836.

Insurmountable objections of a political character occasioned the disallowance of the first of these Acts by the Home Government. These objections appear to have been removed by the two following Acts, and a more liberal character is given to the police system of this colony, by placing it for the present under the practical control of the special justices. This arrangement, however, does not justify the introduction of several arbitrary clauses which will be briefly noticed. It is true that a colourable precedent may be found for such clauses in the Metropolitan Police Act of the 3d & 4th Will. 4, c. 19: but it should be remembered, that the last-mentioned Act has only a local operation; that its duration is extremely limited; that its officers are under the immediate notice and control of a Secretary of State; and that it is guaranteed from gross abuse by the force of public opinion; yet, with all these securities it is still regarded with some jealousy, and its powers are exercised with great moderation: and it is to be remarked, that neither in that Act nor in any other British Act is to be found the unconstitutional authority introduced into the Barbadoes Police Act, of examining the accused party on oath for the purpose of self-crimination.

The several enactments of the Barbadoes Police Act, up to section 14, need no particular comment.

Section 14. Remarks similar to those made on portions of the Jamaica Vagrant Act, ss. 3. 5. are applicable here. The right to search and seize without warrant ought to be limited as in the English Statute 5th Geo. 4, c. 83, to "suspected persons and reputed thieves." To convict in such cases without the slightest proof of guilt or even direct charge of guilt, seems contrary to reason and justice.

Ss. 15. 17. These clauses seem dangerous alike, to personal and domestic security. Not only the person on whose premises suspected articles are found, but all other persons being there and suspected of assisting to deposit the suspected articles, having cause to suspect their lawful possession, must either prove the possession to be lawful, or that the deposit was made without their knowledge or default, or otherwise, without any proof even of the suspected articles being really stolen or unlawfully obtained, they may be convicted of a misdemeanor and be fined 10 l., or be imprisoned with hard labour for not more than two months. The effect of such an imprisonment upon the apprentice's future subsistence has been exhibited in the remarks already made upon the Barbadoes Abolition Act, ss. 58, 59.

Section 16. The injustice of convicting on a mere chain of suspicions, attached to no ultimate proof, is aggravated into a violation of constitutional right by this clause, which authorizes and requires the justice to apprehend and examine on oath all persons through whom such property has passed, touching their possession; and upon the whole evidence to convict every such person who had cause to suspect such articles to have been stolen or unlawfully obtained.

Section 18. Shows the extent to which such suspicions may be carried, and provides for the sale of unowned property accordingly.

AN ACT for the establishing of Rules and Regulations for the Government and Discipline of the Rural Police of this Island:—Passed 9th December 1835; allowed 9th March 1836.

Appears to require no particular comment.

AN ACT to establish a Police in Bridge-Town, in the Parish of Saint Michel:—Passed 29th July 1834.—Suspended.

The first of these was suspended for reasons similar to those which occasioned the disallowance of the Rural Police Act. These reasons were removed by the second Act, which vests the appointment of magistrates in the governor, and excepts from their jurisdiction all questions between apprenticed labourers and their employers. But sec. 16 is still open to the objections made to sec. 3 of the Jamaica Vagrant Act, and to sec. 14 of the Barbadoes Rural Police Act, as to the power of apprehending on mere suspicion of “any evil design;” a power which, as connected with the punishment of absence in the case of apprentices, appears especially objectionable, and ought at least to be confined to “wanderers” at night, as in the British Act 11 Geo. 4, s. 30; and section 17, should be limited as in the British Act 5th Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 5, to cases of violent resistance and subsequent conviction of the original offence.

BYE-LAWS, ORDINANCES and REGULATIONS for the good Government of Bridge-Town:—Assented to by the Governor, 16th November 1835.

These bye-laws not having been put into the form of a legislative Act, have not been allowed by the Home Government.

AN ORDINANCE relative to Idle, Disorderly and Suspicious Persons.

Rule 2. And it shall and may be lawful for the said justices of the peace, and they or any two of them are hereby required, when any idle or disorderly person shall be brought before them, suspected of any evil design, to inform themselves touching the same, by the examination upon oath of any person or persons; and for the purpose of obtaining a knowledge of the condition and circumstances of every such suspicious person, it shall and may be lawful for such justices to examine every such person on oath, and every such suspicious person so examined, who shall give a false account of himself or herself shall be liable to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one month, and be worked on the treadmill, or public works, if so ordered.

Advantage appears to have been here taken, as in the Jamaica Vagrant Act, ss. 6, 11, of a clause in the British Act, 17th Geo. 2, c. 5, s. 7, authorizing a similar examination, on oath, of “rogues and vagabonds,” for the purpose of ascertaining their means of subsistence, and the place of their legal settlement; but that merely parochial provision awards no specific punishment in case of false answers, and moreover gives, in s. 26, a right of appeal to the sessions against the abuse of this power. This rule is objectionable likewise, as observed on the preceding Police Acts, in giving the power of apprehending on mere suspicion of any evil design.

AN ORDINANCE regulating the Time for bringing Provisions, Poultry, Guinea Grass and other Articles from the Country into Bridge-Town.

After prohibiting the introduction of such articles before six o'clock in the morning and after six o'clock in the evening, a regulation which, to say the least of it, operates very harshly upon labouring apprentices, who are thereby deprived of the power of bringing the produce of their provision-grounds to market, except on one day in the week, it further enacts as follows: “And the justices are also hereby authorized and required to examine the person or persons so apprehended and brought before them, on oath, touching their situation or calling, and the place of his or their residence, and either to dismiss such person or persons” (the articles brought for sale being absolutely condemned and forfeited) “or deal with him, her or them according to law.”

The same objection lies to this as to the preceding ordinance, but with greater force; inasmuch as the persons so apprehended and examined are not outcasts from society, and the intention of such examination is openly avowed to be for the infliction of punishment when necessary.

AN ACT for the better regulating the Common Gaol of this Island.—Passed 9th December 1835; allowed March 1836.

By section 6 of this Act any prisoner, being a Dissenter, desirous of conferring with any Catholic or Dissenting minister, and making application to the provost-marshal or his deputy, and specifying the minister, the provost-marshal or deputy is required to give a ticket of admission to such Catholic or Dissenting minister, after inquiring into his character, for the purposes aforesaid.

The discretion as to character hereby given to the provost or his deputy is highly objectionable, and there appears no reason for not extending a similar privilege to all inmates of prisons, as in the more recent British enactments in similar cases. The arbitrary power given to the special justice by the Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 75, of substituting confinement at the treadmill for all other punishments under that Act, makes the exclusion of this privilege of peculiar importance to apprentices.

BARBADOES.

AN ACT the better to regulate the Sale of Goods, Wares and Merchandizes by Itinerant Vendors, in and about the Roads and Streets of this Island.—Passed 9th December 1835; suspended.

The objections taken by the Colonial Secretary to this Act are not certainly known; the following clauses, however, are grossly repugnant both to the spirit and the letter of the Imperial Act of Abolition, and may be presumed to have been among the principal grounds of its suspension:

Section 1 excludes all persons, not being free, from being hawkers and pedlars.

Section 2 authorizes free persons nevertheless, under certain restrictions, to employ apprenticed labourers in that trade as carriers.

It is needless to observe on the invidious distinction, not only in practice but in name, hereby created between apprenticed labourers and other persons of similar occupations in the colony.

AN ORDINANCE for the more speedy Recovery of Debts not exceeding in any case the amount of 5 l. sterling, or 70 guilders.—Enacted 6th November 1835; allowed 30th January 1836.

This ordinance, though doubtless of great practical utility, seems inconsistent with the 18th section of the Imperial Act. To be in strict conformity with that section, cases between master and apprentices should be entrusted to special justices only; employers at least should be prevented from prosecuting such claims against apprentices before the ordinary magistrates. The 9th clause, requiring the permission of the master in order to compel the attendance of an apprentice witness, is in all cases unreasonable, and would be unjust where the complaint is made against the witness's own master.

No new police or vagrant laws appear to have been passed in this colony.

ABSTRACT of certain ORDINANCES passed in this Colony.

ORDINANCE on Public Instruction:—Dated 12th December 1835.

Articles.

The provisions of this Act, however conformable they may be with the laws of France, are inconsistent with the full enjoyment of civil and religious liberty, and may seriously interfere with missionary and other efforts for the education and religious instruction of the negroes.

Public instruction is placed under the protection of government; its direction and superintendence is confided to a committee to be called, "The General Committee of Public Instruction," of 13 members.

Art. 3. Requires teachers of private schools to obtain the previous sanction of the governor, and to renew this permission, which may be withdrawn on report of the committee of instruction.

4. Punishes keeping school without permission, with a fine not exceeding 20 l. sterling, and with closing of the school.

5. Requires a prospectus or programme of the studies, discipline, terms and management to be communicated to the committee of instruction, and makes teachers liable to be examined by committee.

ORDINANCE respecting Domestic, Gens de Service et de Journée:—Dated November 14, 1835.

Art. 1. The object of this and several of the following clauses is evidently to bring the entire class under the surveillance of the police; and to subject them to peculiar restraint and coercion.

Art. 1. Enacts that persons of both sexes, hired by the year, month or day, under whatever denomination, as domestics, throughout the colony, shall register themselves at the police office in Port Louis, and at the civil commissioners' in the districts, under pain of imprisonment not exceeding three days, and provide themselves with a passport; but excepts apprentices under the Abolition Act.

2. Enacts that masters of apprentices hiring them out as domestics, shall do for them in like manner, under a penalty not exceeding 1 l.

3. Enacts that none shall harbour or hire a person without passport, under a penalty not exceeding 5 l.; and the passport shall be deposited with the hirer.

4. Directs that on a person quitting service, the master shall send the passport to the police, inserting the day and causes of leaving; within three days afterwards the domestic must attend at the police to declare whether he intends to continue in service or to take some business, under pain of imprisonment not exceeding four days. A similar declaration must be made by the master for his apprentice hired out, under a penalty

a penalty not exceeding 1*l.*, the passport viséd accordingly, is to be re-delivered to the domestic or master of apprentice hired out, and in the latter case viséd likewise by the special justice. A list of these declarations is to be returned by the commissioners to the chief commissary of police.

5. Enacts that none shall hire a person after dismissal from a former master until the passport shall have been inspected by the police, under a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*

6. Punishes every domestic using a passport borrowed, fabricated or falsified, with imprisonment and hard labour for one month, and with forfeiture of wages. The person counterfeiting, fabricating or falsifying, forfeits a sum not exceeding 5*l.*, or suffers imprisonment with hard labour not exceeding one month.

Art. 7. This clause corresponds with the provisions of the vagrant ordinance; and practically reduces the greater part of the free population of the colony to the condition of "serfs."

Art. 10. This clause is an evident infringement upon the free enjoyment of the apprentice's own time; and as such is directly repugnant to the Imperial Act of Abolition.

Art. 14, 15. The persons appointed by this clause are for the most part planters, and cannot be considered impartial judges in such matters.

Articles.

7. Enacts that every domestic, labourer, or artizan, out of service for more than three months and unable to prove that he has the means of subsistence, may be taken by the police and be employed on the public works. Or if only provisionally resident in the colony, may be sent away.

8. Authorises the appointment by the police of a special officer for domestic larcenies. In the districts the same duty is to be performed by the civil commissioner.

9. Enacts that punishments be inflicted within six months, or within three months, if the servant procure a new place.

10. Enacts that masters willing to permit apprentices to hire themselves or work for themselves, must conform to Art. 2, and the special justice may authorize or refuse his sanction according to the conduct and character of the apprentice.

11. Obliges day-labourers, porters, jobmen and others of that description in Port Louis to wear a badge, and when unemployed to occupy a stand, under a penalty not exceeding six days of labour or imprisonment, with labour not exceeding three days.

12. Enacts a like punishment as in Art. 6, for wearing counterfeit, fabricated or false badges, and for the making of the same.

13. Punishes persons employing porters, &c., without badge, by a penalty not exceeding 1*l.*

14, 15. Authorize the civil commissioners or their substitutes in the districts, and the tribunal of the peace at Port Louis, to take cognizance of disputes, &c., respecting agreements, wages, &c.

16. Enacts that this ordinance shall take effect from the date of publication.

ORDINANCE respecting Labourers and Workmen :—Dated 14th November 1835.

The preamble recites, that the change produced by the Act of Abolition, the natural tendency of the emancipated to idleness, the daily introduction into the colony of foreign labourers, and the insufficiency of the penal laws to compel the lower orders to work, call for measures proper to conciliate good order, with the necessity of agriculture and the mutual interests of masters and servants.

Art. 1. Enacts a general census of all the inhabitants (slave apprentices only excepted) under a penalty not exceeding 2*l.* sterling, and the census to be annually amended.

2. Treats

Art. 2. The character and object of this and several following clauses, is pointed out in remarks on Art. 1 of the preceding ordinance.

Art. 3. The character and consequences of this and similar clauses is pointed out in remarks on Art. 7 of the preceding ordinance.

Art. 7, 8. Vide remarks on a Trinidad Ordinance of the 13th October 1834, containing similar clauses.

Art. 9. This clause revives the master's power of flogging; and females are not excepted.

2. Treats all persons in the class of labourers, having no trade or employment or visible means of subsistence, as persons without object (aveu), and places them under the surveillance of the police.

Such persons offending against police regulations for the first time shall be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding three months, but in case of a subsequent offence, for one year.

3. Enacts that every person under 60 years of age and able to work, who does not make it appear that he has some employment, or sufficient means of subsistence, shall be obliged to take a trade, to find an employer or to engage in agriculture, within a period to be fixed by the chief commissioner of police or civil commissioners, in default of which he may be put by the police to the public works; after a default of three months, he may be placed in any house or shop, at any trade for which he is best suited, during a term of three years, subject, however, to an appeal to the Tribunal of First Instance within eight days, whose decision shall be final. If, at the expiration of three years, the same person cannot procure himself an employment, he may be bound again in like manner.

4. Enacts that within a month after the publication of the present ordinance, every person above the age of 21 years who is or shall be in service as a labourer, workman or apprentice, of whatever denomination it may be, for more than one month, shall come in person to be registered at Port Louis by the police, and in the districts by the civil commissioners, under a penalty not exceeding 1 l. sterling, or imprisonment not exceeding three days. This shall be done officially for the persons included in Art. 3. There shall be delivered to each individual a certificate containing his names, birth-place, business, description, whether maimed or otherwise, and the name of his master.

5. Prohibits any person from engaging a labourer or apprentice without a certificate under a penalty of 10 l. sterling.

6. Requires that the certificate be renewed with each change of service, under pain of not more than eight days' imprisonment.

7. Enacts that any child above the age of eight years, and every minor, may of his own accord, if his parents or guardians do not object, become an apprentice or labourer or workman of any kind; the indentures must be made in writing before a justice or commissary and be registered, but the apprenticeship is to continue only until the age of 21, and a certificate, similar to that in Art. 4, shall be granted.

8. Enacts that children under the age of 21, who cannot be maintained by their parents, shall be apprenticed by the justices or commissioners in the same form, and on the same conditions, as those prescribed by Art. 7.

9. Authorizes the master of every apprentice under the age of 14 years, on failure of duty, to imprison the offender for any time not exceeding 24 hours, or to inflict such domestic correction as is proportioned to the age and offence.

10. Ordains that apprentices above the age of 14, for breaches of duty not specified in their indentures, may be fined not exceeding 5 l. sterling, or imprisoned with hard labour for not exceeding three months.

11. Punishes assault or battery of the master or manager with one year's imprisonment with hard labour.

12. In the cases provided for by the preceding articles authorizes the indentures to be annulled by the master, without prejudice to the public action, if there be ground for it.

13. Compels a master failing in his duty to pay damages.

14. The same in cases of excessive chastisement or other ill-treatment.

15. In such cases authorizes the indenture to be annulled, saving the right of complaint before the ordinary tribunals and the right of public action, if there be ground for it.

16. Punishes conspiracies to quit or neglect work, to alter the terms of engagement or to raise wages, with imprisonment for six months with hard labour.

Art. 17. 19. These clauses may lead to a new species of slave trade, and to much of the injustice pointed out in the Resumé.

17. Enacts that foreign labourers, workmen or apprentices shall not be introduced into the colony without the permission and authority of the governor, under a penalty not exceeding 100 l. sterling.

18. Enacts that persons obtaining permission as above must furnish a caution to the police.

19. Enacts that foreign contracts, written and registered at the police, shall be binding in the colony, and that the servant or apprentice shall have a certificate as in Art. 4.

20. Punishes absence without sufficient cause by the loss of double the time of absence, and if for upwards of three days, by imprisonment not exceeding five days.

21. In case of conspiracy, as in Art. 16, entitles the master to damages before the judge of First Instance.

Art. 22. The injustice of such an enactment has been already noticed in remarks upon the enactments of other colonies.

22. In case of condemnation to imprisonment, authorizes the master to retain two days' wages for every day's imprisonment.

23. Authorizes the recovery of pecuniary punishments against masters, with the privileges awarded to gens de service.

Art. 24. The arbitrary and injurious character of this clause, particularly as it may lead to the separation of families, is apparent.

24. Authorizes every foreign labourer, workman or apprentice committing a crime against the public peace, to be sent out of the colony, at the expense of the person who introduced him.

25. Punishes inveigling apprentices, &c. from service with a fine of 5 l. sterling.

Art. 26. For the partiality of such tribunals, vide remarks on Arts. 14 & 15 of the preceding ordinance.

26. Refers minor complaints of masters against apprentices, &c. respecting service, to the justices of the peace at Port Louis, and to the commissioners in the districts; and authorizes the same persons to decide as to wages, contracts and general matters connected with this ordinance, and to inflict punishment separately or cumulatively; and makes their decision final, except in cases as in Art. 3.

27, 28. Give powers to commissaries accordingly.

29. Excepts from the meaning of the word apprentice, apprentices under the Act of Abolition.

RESUMÉ of the two above abstracted LABOUR ORDINANCES of the 14th November 1835.

THE substance of the following resumé is extracted from the comments of John Reddie, esq., late upon the projets de lois, upon which these two ordinances (with a few modifications) have been framed.

The first of these ordinances, in its practical operation, reduces all the free coloured population, who are not landed proprietors, to a state of bondage little differing from slavery itself. It removes them from the protection of the ordinary laws hitherto in force, and places places them under the surveillance of the police, who possess the power to punish severely, and even to banish, individuals who may happen to be unemployed during a limited period, and are unable to satisfy the civil commissary that they are possessed of the means of subsisting independently. In short, it enforces the most oppressive and odious police regulations upon those who had been previously treated as freemen, and it legalizes the punishment of such as through no fault of their own may happen to be unemployed.

The second of these ordinances gives the governor a power to admit African, Madagascar or Mozambique negroes into the colony in the name of labourers; in other words, it re-establishes a species of slave trade. It withdraws the individuals thus imported from the protection of the ordinary tribunals, subjects them to conditions and penalties without their consent or knowledge, and compels them to seek for protection and justice, in cases of injury, from the civil commissaries, who are themselves planters, and cannot therefore be considered impartial judges. The real spirit of such enactments is undoubtedly slavery, by whatever other name it may be designated.

AN ACT for the Summary Punishment of Common Assaults and Batteries, and of Riotous and Disorderly Conduct:—Passed 22d November 1834.

Gives a summary jurisdiction to ordinary justices of the peace, not only over riotous and disorderly conduct, and abusive or provoking language addressed to any person, "tending to a breach of the peace," but also over "any improper language" in the public streets or highways; each of which offences may be punished by a fine (including costs) of 10 l., and on non-payment immediately, or at a time to be fixed by the justice, by imprisonment in the common gaol for any time not exceeding two months, unless sooner paid.

The latitude hereby given to the right of police interference seems open to much abuse. At all events apprenticeship cases of this description ought to be referred to the decision of a special justice.

AN ACT for establishing a Police in the said Island:—Passed Council 26th April 1834; allowed 3d February 1836.

The immediate superintendence of the police, the framing of regulations for the discipline of police establishments, and the government of prisoners confined therein, are respectively entrusted to the special justices. Powers so important to the welfare of the community ought not to be valid until they have received the sanction of the governor. Vide the preliminary remarks to the Jamaica Prison Act, already referred to.

Sections.

Sect. 1. This Act having been passed subsequently to the Abolition Act, which gives exclusive jurisdiction to the special justices over apprenticeship cases, it is at least doubtful whether such cases are not cognizable under this Act by the ordinary magistrate.

Sect. 2. The offenders chiefly contemplated by this clause are obviously the negro population, and the offences specified in it have been already provided for in various instances by the Abolition Acts themselves; the severe punishments of this Act may be considered therefore as cumulative or capable of substitution for the penalties inflicted by the Abolition Acts. Merely "wandering" in the streets, without begging, is not punishable by any British Act, nor is it necessarily any offence at all. "Dwelling" in a negro house without permission, includes the case of wives or husbands, and other persons from other

Sect. 1. All vagrants may be apprehended without warrant by constables, auxiliary constables and the police, and may be taken before a justice of the peace.

Sect. 2. All persons having no visible means of subsistence, who shall be found wandering about the streets, or dwelling in any of the houses upon any plantation, without the sanction of the owner or director, or trespassing on the land of any plantation, by attempting to cultivate or use the same, by cutting the wood or taking the vour or grass on the same, or any other article the growth thereof, without legal authority, or the implied sanction of the owner or his representative, or who shall be found promulgating false reports, or wandering about any plantations, or in any of the ranges or private other estates, visiting their nearest relations, private roads thereof, shall be deemed or temporarily residing on the plantation. vagrants. This clause is not only opposed to the spirit of the Imperial Act, but likewise to the admonition of Lord Glenelg, in his remarks on a clause in the Tortola Act, (vide Parliamentary Papers, Part II. p. 133.) "Cultivating" waste ground, or collecting its produce, is certainly no indication of a vagrant disposition, and, if an offence at all, seems to be amply provided against in the case of apprentices, by the Abolition Acts themselves. "Promulgating false reports," is a description much too general for penal legislation; it ought at least to be limited to libel or gross slander. "Wandering about plantations," or in ranges or private roads thereof, includes the case of apprentices visiting their nearest relatives on other estates. Even if the words "having no visible means of subsistence," at the commencement of this section, be understood to govern the whole clause, which the nature of the offences therein specified seems to contradict, these enactments, as compared with the British Act 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, appear to be highly objectionable.

Sect. 3. This clause seems principally designed to interfere with the harmless recreations of the negro population, and it exposes the offender to a punishment unwarrantably severe.

Sect. 4. Many of the articles herein specified are the produce of the apprentices' own provision-grounds, and certain utensils are necessary for their cultivation; yet any constable meeting an apprentice with any such articles upon him, may seize and carry him before a magistrate, and the apprentice is exposed to the risk of severe punishment, unless by mere good fortune he be able to prove his right to the identical articles in question; and no summary redress is provided by the Act in case the police should abuse their authority.

Sect. 5. This clause does not even (as the Barbadoes Police Act, sec. 15,) require that the information, putting the accused party in peril of his liberty, shall be on oath.

Sect. 6. This clause seems unnecessarily to interfere with the harmless recreations of the negro classes.

These punishments are doubled for a second offence, and for a third offence the offender may be transported for seven years.

Sect. 16. By 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, s. 4, a similar offence must be accompanied "with intent to commit a felony."

Sect. 23. The generality of the language here employed includes British subjects, and mere political offenders against the laws of other countries, as well as fugitive slaves.

Sect. 3. All persons playing at noisy games, in the public streets or squares, are to be deemed vagrants.

Sect 4. All persons removing or carrying away sugar, syrup, wood, grass, voura, cotton, molasses, rum, canes' sprouts, magop, pewter drop, copper, iron, lead, oats, corn, oil-cake, lumber of any kind, or other plantation article or utensils, and not able to account satisfactorily for the possession of the same, are to be deemed vagrants.

Sect. 5. Any person suspected of having purchased or received any of the articles mentioned in the preceding clause, knowing the same to have been received or carried away, shall, on information against him, prove his ignorance of any fraud or theft, or else suffer as a vagrant.

Sect. 6. All persons opening their habitations for dancing or other noisy merriment, without a written licence from a justice on each occasion, and all persons there assembled and not quietly dispersing after due notice, are to be deemed vagrants, and suffer one or more of the punishments of this Act.

Sect. 16. Any person lounging or idling about the towns or bays, without a porter's or boatman's badge, shall be deemed a vagrant, and punished accordingly.

	These clauses are open to great abuse in the case of missionaries, teachers and other persons visiting the island on errands connected with the welfare of the negroes and the benefit of the colony.	Sects. 24, 25. Require every stranger, except a British officer, within 10 days after his arrival, to enter into a bond, with one sufficient security, to be approved by the secretary, in the sum of 50 l. , not to be chargeable to any parish, and to conduct himself in a peaceable and orderly manner; and in default of entering into such bond, such stranger shall be imprisoned until it is given, or he or she can be sent from the island: And any person receiving the offender as an inmate, or otherwise harbouring or entertaining such person, may be fined 25 l. currency, and in default of payment be imprisoned for one month.

NEVIS. AN ACT for the Summary Punishment of Common Assaults and Batteries, and of Riotous and Disorderly Conduct in the Island of Nevis:—Passed 31st July 1834.

AN ACT for establishing a Police Force and House of Correction in and for the Island of Nevis:—Passed 4th November 1835.

Limited in its duration to five years.

Sect. 14. The power hereby given to the police to destroy hogs and goats abroad in the streets, or trespassing on cultured lands, seems a wanton sacrifice of the property of apprentices.

Sects. 15 & 18 are objectionable in leaving the rules and regulations of penal gangs, police stations and houses of correction to be framed by the commissioners; the discipline of such establishments ought at least to be subject to the approval of the governor. Vide preliminary remarks to the Jamaica Prison Act, already referred to.

VIRGIN ISLANDS. AN ACT for improving the Administration of Criminal Justice in the Virgin Islands:—Passed 26th July 1834.

By sect. 29 of this Act, any person who shall have in his possession any rum, sugar, sling, syrup, molasses or cotton, or one or more sugar cane or canes, without being able to account for, or being unwilling to account for, or failing to show that he or she came honestly and lawfully by the same, shall on conviction before a justice of the peace for the first offence forfeit and pay over and above the value of the articles stolen, and also the amount of the injury done, any sum not exceeding 5*l.*; and for a second offence be committed to hard labour in the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding three months; and being a male, and convicted before two justices, be once or twice publicly or privately whipped; and for any subsequent offence be deemed guilty of felony, and punished as for simple larceny.

It may be doubtful whether clause 86 does not even confer on the justice the right to compel an accused party to submit to examination.

The remarks already made upon similar enactments in the Antigua Act of 23d August 1834 apply to this Act. It appears to be part of a system for discouraging agriculture among the negroes, and perpetuating their servile condition.

AN ACT for the Punishment of Idle and Disorderly Persons, Rogues and Vagabonds :—
Passed 2d March 1833, for Five Years only.

By sect. 1, "Any person not having a right of residence in the colony according to the laws thereof," shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person, and may be imprisoned to hard labour on the tread-mill.

By sect. 2, every person playing or betting in any house or outhouse (the British Act 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, requires that it should be in some open or public place), and any person charged with any of the offences enumerated in the Act for the establishment and regulation of a tread-mill in Kingstown (which includes a simple breach of the peace), shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond.

By sect. 4, a third conviction, as an incorrigible rogue, is punishable with transportation for life.

By sects. 5, 6, 7, a person coming to settle in the colony, and not possessing 20*l.* per annum, may, if he become actually chargeable, be sent out of the country, unless he give security for future good behaviour and proper maintenance. And any person convicted of a breach of the peace, or deemed by any laws of the colony an idle or disorderly person, or who shall appear to the magistrate, upon the oath of one witness, to be a person of evil fame, and not being able to give a satisfactory account of himself, or of his way of living, shall be considered a person actually chargeable under this Act, and may be removed to his native place, or last place of abode, by order of the magistrates. And on his refusal to go, or voluntarily returning, he may be punished with two months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

By sect. 8, any free person may apprehend any offender, and convey him before a justice of the peace.

The arbitrary and oppressive character of this statute may be seen by reference to the disallowed Jamaica Vagrant Act, and to corresponding clauses in the St. Kitt's Vagrant Act.

TOBAGO.

No. 275.—AN ACT to regulate the Police of the Towns of Scarborough and Plymouth :—
Passed 16th July 1834.

TOBAGO.

By sect. 12 of this Act, any justice of the peace residing at Plymouth may authorize any person to destroy sheep, goats and hogs found in the streets of the said towns, and such person, upon producing the heads thereof, shall be entitled to retain the same for his own use, and also to receive the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* sterling from the public treasury, upon the certificate of the justice to whom such head is produced; and it shall be lawful for any person or persons to kill any sheep, goats or hogs found in the streets of the said towns, or upon any of the lots of the same, and the heads shall become the property of the person so killing them as aforesaid; and if the owner or owners of such sheep, goats or hogs do not remove them from the said streets or lots at the end of two hours after being killed, the bodies thereof shall become the property of the person killing, or of any other person who will take them away, and if any person shall be prosecuted in any action for such killing, he may plead the general issue, and give this Act in evidence.

Clause 28, extends the same powers to magistrates and constables throughout the colony.

Property of this description belongs principally to the emancipated negroes; this Act contrasts singularly with an enactment in the Act of 26th January 1835, for the protection of property belonging to a different class of owners.

No. 281.—AN ACT for the Prevention of Trespasses in the said Island :—Passed 26th January 1835.

By sect. 6 of this Act all owners, renters, possessors, or persons having the charge of any plantation or estate, pieces or parcels of land, and for their respective servants to kill and destroy any hogs or goats found trespassing upon their lands, the heads to become the property of the person killing them. The owner may have the bodies, if claimed within two hours after they are killed, and paying for the damage they may have done. If not claimed within two hours or damage not paid, the bodies shall become the property of the person killing them, or of any other who will take them away. Persons prosecuted may plead general issue, and give the Act in evidence. But if any person shall wilfully and intentionally kill, wound, maim or destroy any horse, cattle or stock (wild or dangerous cattle, hogs and goats only excepted), although found in trespass, such person shall, on proof thereof, pay the owner double the value of the same.

Proviso not to prevent the killing of sheep in the streets or lots in the towns of Scarborough and Plymouth, as is by law allowed.—(Vide Act, No. 275.)

An invidious distinction seems to be here drawn between different classes of owners; the object apparently being to protect the property of the planters at the expense of the apprentices and other small proprietors.

No. 284.—AN ACT to regulate the Conduct and to fix the Value of the Labour of Persons acting as Porters and Labourers in the said Island :—Passed 26th January 1835.

By section 1 of this Act no apprenticed labourer shall obtain a licence for this purpose without first producing to the magistrate a ticket or other document from the person entitled to his services, specifying that such apprenticed labourer had his or her permission to act as a porter or labourer.

Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any person in charge of apprenticed labourers from sending them to work for a temporary period on board of any ship or vessel that may be consigned to the estate to which such apprenticed labourer belongs.

The arbitrary character of this clause and its repugnancy to the spirit of the Imperial Act is apparent.

The proviso should be limited to labour exclusively connected with the estate, and to the period during which the vessel remains at the island.

AN ACT for the better regulation of the Gaol in the Town of Scarborough :—Passed 16th February 1830.

By section 7 of this Act each prisoner confined under the Tread-mill Act, and whose diet is thereby restricted to bread and water, shall be allowed good wholesome bread, not exceeding two pounds per day. For all other prisoners, coarse wholesome food, viz. salt or pickled fish, with corn meal, yams, plantains, rice or bread, not exceeding in value 8 d. sterling per day for each prisoner.

No minimum is fixed in the case of tread-mill prisoners; and the allowance of other prisoners should be determined not by value but by quantity.

By section 12 the friends of prisoners for debt, damages or contempt, and of prisoners in solitary confinement, are permitted to visit them at stated intervals; but this privilege does not extend to prisoners for trial or in execution, unless they be in solitary confinement. The omission is particularly important as regards spiritual consolation and advice.—Vide British Act, 4th Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 31.

By section 16 it does not appear whether corporal punishment may be inflicted on females.

TRINIDAD.

TRINIDAD. ORDINANCE for establishing an effective System of Police within the Town of Port of Spain :—Passed 7th September 1835.

AN ORDINANCE to explain the above, 16th September 1835.

Sections 40 to 42 inclusive, relating to cases of suspicion of felony, and authorizing the examination of the accused party, are open to many of the objections already urged against the Barbadoes Rural Police Act, ss. 14. 16.

AN ORDINANCE for the more speedy Administration of Justice in cases of Contracts for the Performance of Labour, and of Apprenticeships and Contracts of the nature thereof; and to regulate the Formation of Apprenticeships, and to prevent and punish the harbouring of runaway Apprentices :—Passed 29th November 1834.

This ordinance has almost exclusive relation to the apprenticeship of liberated Africans; but as several of the clauses, either directly or indirectly, affect Abolition apprentices, some notice of them seems requisite here.

By sections 6, 7, minors, above the age of 14 years, may apprentice themselves; and guardians of children, under that age, may apprentice such children to this new species of servitude. As great advantage may be taken of the dependent condition of apprentices under both systems of apprenticeship, especially in default of parents or near relations, no such engagements ought to be valid without the written sanction of a special magistrate.

No. 838.—AN ACT to prevent the Resort of Rogues, Vagabonds and other idle and disorderly Persons to the Bahama Islands, and for the Punishment and Correction of certain Offences therein specified, and for other Purposes therein mentioned :—Passed 12th November 1835.

Notes and References.

The offenders chiefly contemplated in this clause are evidently the emancipated negroes. It is unnecessary to dwell on the arbitrary and unconstitutional manner in which it treats them. Acts of vagancy in this colony ought to correspond, as nearly as possible, with the definitions of the British Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83; the examination of the accused party on oath should be altogether expunged, and the discretion of the magistrates as to recognizances with sureties confined within proper limits.

The trivial nature of many of the acts constituted offences in these clauses, and the arbitrary power of interference given to the constable, with the severity of the punishment that may be imposed, respectively form grounds of strong objection to these clauses.

The former part of this clause applies to all British subjects, and, to say nothing of its vagueness of expression, it appears to invest the governor with a power capable of great abuse through the agency of inferior officers.

and examined, may commit him to prison until he be purged of his contempt and contumacy, to the satisfaction of the magistrate; and on summary trial and conviction of vagrancy as aforesaid, shall commit the offender to gaol or the house of correction for one month, unless the offender enter into recognizances, with one or more sureties to the satisfaction of a magistrate, to be of good behaviour, and keep the peace for at least six months; on a second conviction the imprisonment is extended two months, with hard or moderate labour, at the discretion of the magistrate; and, after a second conviction, if the offender persist in vicious or disorderly courses, the judges of the general court, or chief presiding judge, on complaint, shall proceed against the offender in like manner, and on conviction commit him to prison, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding 12 nor less than three months; and on a second or third conviction, the offender shall not be enlarged as a matter of right on entering into recognizances as aforesaid.

duty, calling or employment, or object; all loitering, carousing or the like, in or about any shop or place where liquors are sold by retail; all loud singing or whistling in or near the said streets or highways, or playing at cricket or other like games on the parade, or in or near the said streets or highways; and all flying of kites, or other like pastimes, in or near the same, are declared to be unlawful, and may be repressed by the constable; and all resistance, disturbance or abuse of the constable is declared to be a misdemeanor; and such offenders may be summarily convicted and punished, either by a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, or by imprisonment not exceeding 20 days: Provided, that an old offender, of general bad character, may be sentenced to hard labour, solitary confinement and the stocks, with the addition of 39 stripes if he be a male; and provided, that in the worst cases the magistrates may proceed as if this Act had not been passed; and an action for damages is reserved.

of an idle or disorderly person, or a rogue, vagabond or swindler, the magistrate shall immediately report the same to the governor, who may order the commander of any such vessel to take and keep such passenger on board, or to carry him back to the port from whence such vessel departed at the commencement of its voyage, or to any other port out of the limits of the Bahamas, under a penalty of 200 l., and such suspected rogues, vagabonds and others, not being British subjects, may be imprisoned and sent out of the colony.

Sections.

By sections 1, 2, of this Act, persons of idle, drunken or disorderly habits, not exercising any regular trade or calling, or without visible means of livelihood, who, on being examined touching such their habits and absence of employment, or want of honest means of subsistence, shall not satisfy the magistrates of the correctness of their lives, shall be deemed vagrants. The Bahamas Vagrant Act, is perhaps the most arbitrary of the West India acts upon this subject. It is certainly more objectionable than the disallowed Jamaica Vagrant Act.

By sect. 10, this Act is limited to the period of 10 years.

AN ACT to provide a Summary Remedy against the Occupation of Lands by Persons having no Title to the same :—20th March 1834.

Has been already fully commented upon by Mr. Jeremie.

AN ACT for regulating the Public Market of the Town of Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, and for limiting the Price of Butchers' Meat, and for other Purposes therein mentioned :—Passed 31st March 1835.

This Act is limited to the period of 10 years.

The small venders, who are principally affected by this enactment, are of course apprenticed and free negroes.

By the 16th sect. of this Act, persons offering for sale their meat, corn, or other articles or things for sale in a loud voice, to "attract customers," or disturbing the market by shouting, singing, screaming or otherwise, may be punished on conviction by a fine not exceeding 20 s. or by imprisonment for any number of days not exceeding five.

AN ACT for the more effectual Punishment of Persons committing Malicious Injuries to Property :—Passed 6th October 1834.

By sect. 12, injuries to fences, &c., are punishable with a fine of 10 l., and for a second offence with six months' imprisonment, and twice whipping, but the number of stripes is not specified. Acts of this description ought to correspond as nearly as possible with the British Act 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 30, on the same subject, and some limitation ought to be put upon the power of flogging.

ORDINANCE for erecting, constituting and establishing Police Courts, to be holden in Cape Town and Simon's Town respectively, and for defining the Duties and Jurisdiction of the Judge and Superintendent of Police of Cape Town, and of the Justice of the Peace of Simon's Town respectively :—1st August 1834.

Sect. 4 of this ordinance expressly gives jurisdiction in petty cases of a criminal nature, between masters and their apprentices, to the ordinary magistrate; and although by sect. 12 the jurisdiction of the special justice is indirectly reserved, the clauses, taken together, appear to bestow a concurrent jurisdiction in such cases on both descriptions of magistrates.

Two drafts of ordinances for the better suppression of "vagrancy" have been prepared in this colony; the first was published in the month of May and the second in the month of September 1834; but as neither of them actually passed into a law, nor was ever in practical operation throughout the colony, it is unnecessary to state more respecting them here, than that their extremely oppressive and objectionable character appears to have occasioned their disallowance.

ANTIGUA.

AN ACT for establishing a New System of Police and for increasing the Power of the Magistracy of this Island, in the Appointment of Rural Constables, and for providing and regulating a House of Correction; passed 31st July 1834.

This Act being passed for two years only, will soon expire; but it will most probably be re-enacted. Under a general title it chiefly affects the enfranchised negroes, and comes therefore within the scope of this Analysis.

The several enactments up to sect. 13 need no particular observation.

Sect. 13. The remarks already made on the Jamaica Vagrant Act, sect. 2, as to "night-walkers," and "idle and disorderly persons," apply here.

Sect. 14.

Sect. 14. Gives a discretion to police-officers, in determining what are offences, which may be much abused; "unsuitable" conduct in the streets, and playing at bat and ball, are respectively punished with a fine of 5*l.*, and on default of immediate payment, with imprisonment in the common gaol for 21 days.

Sect. 15. Authorizes the unnecessary destruction of a description of animals most commonly belonging to the negro population.

Sect. 23. Authorizes the demand of a deposit, which may operate as a denial of justice to the class in the greatest need of protection.

Sections 26 to 30. These clauses give an unconstitutional influence to owners of estates over the administration as well as the officers of justice, and not only expose it to natural suspicion, but actually endanger its proper exercise.

Sect. 33. Prison discipline forms much too important a branch of municipal government to be left, as in this clause, to the uncontrolled discretion of local magistrates.—Vide on this subject the preliminary remarks to the Jamaica Prison Act already referred to.

AN ACT for the Establishment and Regulation of a Market in the Town of St. John, and for regulating the Sale of various Commodities throughout the Island :—No. 386, passed 23d August 1834.

Sect. 8. No person shall sell, barter or offer for sale any sugar, molasses, syrup or sugar-canes in the said market, or in the public streets or highways of the island, under the penalty of their being seized.

Sect. 9. No person shall carry about or offer for sale or barter in any part of this island, any wood, grass, cane tops, trash or magoss, milk or fresh butter, without a regular pass, dated and signed by the owner, manager, or director of the estate from which the same is sent. Any person may seize offenders, and, as soon as conveniently may be, carry them before a justice of the peace, who, on satisfactory proof of the offence, is directed to dispose of such articles to the informing party; and the offenders, if unable to account satisfactorily for the manner in which such articles came into their possession, shall incur the pains and penalties endured by persons convicted of receiving stolen goods.

The necessary consequence and probably the intended effect of enactments like these, is to discourage the production of such articles by small proprietors and occupiers. Apart from the impolicy of this legislation, the injustice is obvious of exposing such individuals, being themselves the owners, to the punishment of felony, unless by mere good fortune they be able to prove their property in the identical articles so found in their possession.

AN ACT for more effectually preventing the purchase of stolen Iron, Copper, Lead and Brass in this Island, and for repealing sundry Laws at present in force in the said Island relative thereto :—Passed 7th November 1834.

Section 4. "If any iron, copper, lead or brass shall be found in the possession of any person not being the proprietor or renter of a sugar plantation," he shall be deemed to have stolen the same, unless he prove the possession lawful.

Putting the proof of innocence on the accused party seldom admits of justification, but the generality of this clause connected with its impolicy, renders it peculiarly objectionable.

AN ACT for the better adjusting and more easy Recovery of the Wages of Servants in Husbandry, and of Artificers, Handicraftsmen, and other Labourers employed upon Estates, and for the better Regulation of such Servants, Artificers, Handicraftsmen and other Labourers :—Passed 8th August 1835.

By sect. 2 of this Act, misdemeanor, miscarriage or ill-behaviour on the part of servants may be proved by the oath of the master, and punished by imprisonment, not exceeding one month, or by abatement of wages, or by discharge from employment; misconduct, cruelty or ill-treatment of servants by masters, may be proved by the oath of the servant, who thereupon is entitled to his discharge from the employer's service.

This clause is defective in reciprocity, as it inflicts no punishment on the master for misconduct, and gives no remuneration to the injured servant. While on the other hand, the abatement of wages, as a punishment for the misconduct of the servant, is subject to no limitation.

Sect. 5. Gives an appeal to any person aggrieved by the decision of the magistrates, except on order of commitment. The effect of this clause is obviously to limit the right of appeal to the master, who is the only party not liable to be committed.

Ss. 6, 7, 9. Under these clauses all special or particular hirings on estates are to be entered into in the presence of a justice, and attested by him; but the presumption of law is to be in favour of general hirings. No definite distinction seems indeed to exist between general and special hirings under this Act, a small number only of which (it may be feared), notwithstanding the penalties incident to the breach of them, will be reduced to writing, or approved by a magistrate.

AN ACT passed the 25th August 1835, and another Act passed the 14th September 1835 respectively, extend the Wages' Act above analysed to servants in towns and other places, and to menial servants.

No. 465.—AN ACT for regulating the Sale of Garden or Farm Productions, and the Establishment of Markets in the Towns of Hamilton and St. George:—Passed 7th August 1833; expired 1st September 1834.

Notes and References.Sections.

This Act was passed for one year only; but as there is reason to believe it has been renewed, it will require a few comments.

Enactments seriously tending to the discouragement of agricultural industry among the peasantry, and to the oppression of small tradesmen and others, ought to be very cautiously allowed. The arbitrary and mischievous character of such clauses as are here abstracted, has been already pointed out in remarks upon a section of the Jamaica Police Act of the 17th December 1825, and upon the Antigua Market Act of the 23d August 1834.

By sect. 3, any person importing, sending, carrying or exposing such articles for sale in the island, must, when required by any constable, prove to the satisfaction of the constable, either by certificate or otherwise, to whom the said articles belong; and that he came lawfully by them.

Sect. 5. In case of suspicion of theft, constables may make inquiry of all venders who may have sold such articles within four weeks past, and on failure of proof, to the satisfaction of the constable, of the lawful possession of such articles as are then, or within four weeks past have been in their possession, or of the production of the party from whom such articles were received, such persons may be taken without warrant before a justice, who, on like failure by the vender to produce satisfactory evidence as aforesaid, shall inflict a penalty of not less than 30s., nor more than 5*l.*, besides costs, and on default of satisfaction by distress, commit the party so charged for one month to solitary confinement, or to the treadmill, or to both, at his discretion.

Sect. 10. Corn and all other kinds of grain, fruit, esculent vegetables and roots of all sorts, poultry of all sorts, grass, eggs, milk, palmetto tops and leaves, honey and honeycomb, are, under this Act, to be deemed garden and farm productions.

No. 470.—AN ACT in addition to the Act, as well for the Relief of the Poor as for the putting out of Apprentices, and setting idle Persons to work:—Passed 25th June 1834; expires 25th June 1841.

Advantage has been taken of an objectionable portion of British law to establish a still more objectionable system in this colony. In England the simple object of a parish apprenticeship law was to relieve the parochial burdens at the expense of individual parishioners, a system which, in this country, practically led to comparatively little oppression, but in a colony where cheap labour is an article of the greatest solicitude, the main object of such a law must plainly be to procure that article on the easiest terms, and in a manner which obviously tends to the re-introduction of many of the evils of the old system.

If such powers as usually belong to a parish apprenticeship system (including the master's power of administering personal correction) can be safely exercised at all in a community but just emerged from slavery, they ought at least to be restrained within the narrowest possible limits, and submitted to those checks which have been deemed requisite even in the mother country. Among these will be found two of the greatest importance. By the British statute, 56 Geo. 3, c. 139, s. 2, no such indenture shall be allowed by any justice of the peace who shall be engaged in the same business, employment or manufacture, in which the person to whom such child shall be bound is engaged. And by the 28 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 7, regulating the apprenticeship of chimney-sweeps, who were thought peculiarly exposed to hardship and ill-treatment, no master is allowed to retain, keep or employ more than six apprentices at one and the same time; restrictions such as these introduced into Bermuda would greatly limit the evils to be apprehended; but so long as this new species of apprenticeship is permitted to continue, measures of protection at least equal to those afforded by the slave apprenticeship system ought to be provided.

Sect. 1. Recites and confirms a colonial Act of the 13th July 1787, authorising churchwardens and overseers, with the assent of the justice or justices, of the parish, to bind out any poor child they shall think proper to be apprenticed, until the age of 21 years, or if a female, until 20, or marriage; but enacts that all such apprenticeships shall henceforth be by indenture.

Sect. 11. This clause, like the Antigua Wages Act, sect. 2, exhibits the grossest want of reciprocity.

It provides not the slightest recompense to the servant for ill-treatment or cruelty on the part of the master; while the power of abating wages for the servant's misconduct, which may be proved by the master himself, is left without limitation to the magistrate's discretion.

Sect. 12, 13. Vide remarks on preceding clause.

Sect. 18, 19. Some pretext might exist for compensation to the master in addition to the punishment as already provided by this Act, and to the personal correction a master is authorised to inflict on his apprentice, if the contract in the first instance had been voluntary, or its advantages could be shown to be mutual.

Sect. 20. This clause (considered in connexion with sect. 11) wants reciprocity; it withholds from the servant a power possessed by the master, viz. that of proving his own case.

one month; and masters determining their contracts with servants, without sufficient cause, may, on proof thereof, be fined in a penalty not exceeding 10*l.*, for the benefit of the servant; but no oath can be administered in this case to the servant.

Sect. 21. This clause is obviously defective in reciprocity.

Sect. 27. The British Acts require that a person should be actually chargeable, to authorize any interference on the part of the parish; and the order must be made by at least two justices in session. The importance of this objection is enhanced by the supposed power given to owners in the next clause.

Sect. 28. It may be presumed that the power hereby given to overseers extends to cases in which no actual chargeability has been incurred.

by the consent of the justice or justices of the parish, may by indenture place out such child or children to service from time to time until the age of 21 if a male, or if a female until such age or marriage.

By section 29. Such children are entitled to the same protection, and liable to same punishment as parish apprentices.

Sections.

By sect. 11. The misconduct of any servant, artificer, handicraftsman or labourer, towards an employer, being proved on the oath of the employer, may be punished by the justice with one month's imprisonment and hard labour, or otherwise by abating the wages or discharging the party from his employment. In case of ill-treatment or cruelty on the part of the employer, no power of administering an oath to the servant is given, but on proof of the complaint the justice is simply authorised to discharge the servant.

By sect. 12, 13. The like power of discharge is given in the case of parish apprentices, and the like power of punishing them for misconduct, but the punishment may be extended in these cases to three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

By sects. 18, 19. Apprentices absenting themselves from the service of their masters are bound to serve an equal time, or to make satisfaction; and on oath by the master of the apprentice refusing so to do, a justice may determine the amount of satisfaction, and if the apprentice shall not give security for such satisfaction, he may be imprisoned for any time not exceeding three months; but satisfaction must be made within seven years after the expiration of the original apprenticeship.

Sect. 20. Servants in husbandry, &c. under contract, absenting themselves, or being guilty of any other misdemeanor in their employment, may, on the oath of the employer or agent, be imprisoned for any time not exceeding three months, nor less than Sect. 21. Gives a power of appeal to the master or agent, but not to the servant, &c.

Sect. 27. Obliges certain relations to maintain their relatives, "in such manner and according to such rules, as by the justice or justices of the peace, and vestry of the parish where such sufficient persons dwelt, shall be deemed and ordered, upon pain that every one of them shall forfeit and pay 20*s.* for every month which they shall fail therein."

with the British Statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, in pari materia. The Bermuda Vagrant Act is in fact, with few exceptions, a copy of the disallowed Jamaica Act, to which is added in this colony the power of punishment on the public works or in the public service.

Sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 14, of this Act closely resemble the corresponding clauses, viz. sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 11, 14 & 15 of the Jamaica Vagrant Act.

AN ACT for the Regulation of the Public Gaols within these Islands:—Passed 5th September 1834.

The preliminary remarks already made on the Jamaica Prison Act apply generally to this Act; the sanction of the governor to all such rules and regulations ought to be made essential to their validity.

By this Act rules and regulations for the admission of the friends of convicted persons are to be made by the justices at sessions, and approved by the court of general assize; and all additional rules, &c., are to be made by them, and approved by the same authority; provided that such rules, &c., be conformable with this Act.

BARBADOES.

No. 1.—AN ACT for the Abolition of Slavery, for the Government of Apprenticed Labourers, and for ascertaining and enforcing the reciprocal Duties between them and their Employers:—Passed 5th April 1834; allowed 5th June 1834. (Subject to Amendments.)

No. 2.—AN ACT to alter An Act, intituled, &c. (as above); passed 3d November 1834.

No. 3.—AN ACT to repeal certain Clauses of An Act, intituled, &c. (as first above), and to substitute other Clauses in the place of certain of such repealed Clauses:—Passed 19th August 1835. (Left to its operation.)

These Acts have already undergone much revision at the Colonial Office: and, taken together, they may now be considered as embodying the substance of the various amendments required by the despatches printed in the Parliamentary Papers, Part II., pp. 64, 85, &c.

Adequate

Adequate provision was accordingly declared to have been made in this colony by a despatch of the 13th October 1835.

The Government amendments are very important, but they still leave many objections untouched; which is the more to be regretted in a colony where a considerable negro population, divided among an unusual number of poor proprietors, increases the probability of abuse, and requires the strictest enforcement of all the protective provisions of the Imperial Abolition Act.

The present comments will be confined to the objections untouched, or only imperfectly noticed by the Government despatches. Before proceeding to details, it may be observed generally, that the Barbadoes Abolition Acts, even in their amended form, exhibit most of the glaring defects already noticed in the Jamaica Abolition Acts; the same marked inequality is apparent between the coercive and the protective enactments of each colony, the same practical sacrifice is made by both of the rights and privileges of the negroes to the interest or convenience of the planters. Whatever relates to the welfare and protection of the apprentices appears in each to be either scantily provided, or ill secured; while restraints and punishments are multiplied upon them without necessity, and are stretched beyond their due limits. Similar impediments are thrown by both legislatures in the way of compulsory manumission; and a similar appropriation of penal labour, in cases not intended by the Imperial Act, and contrary to sound principle, has been enacted by each for the benefit of the employers, who, through the medium of a constabulary force, subjected to their direction, possess in each colony the same arbitrary powers over the personal freedom and domestic security of their apprentices.

COMMENTS ON THE BARBADOES ACTS.

Barbadoes Acts.—No. 1. (Amended by Acts No. 2, No. 3.)

Sect. 5. As to registration is amended by Act No. 2, s. 4; but in the oath prescribed by the latter, the "year" is omitted in the date.

Sect. 10. It should have been made the duty of the employer to furnish each apprentice, in the first instance, with a written copy of his classification, and of his right of appeal against it; and in case of alteration on appeal, or otherwise, with a certificate of the final entry.

Sect. 13. The distinction, as to period of labour between children under the age of 12, and adults, is retained in the amending Act, No. 3, s. 4. It appears disadvantageous to both parents and children, especially to children, who may be deprived thereby of many opportunities of instruction. If the employment of children be strictly suited to their tender age, no pretext will exist for withholding from them the repose and enjoyment of the Saturday.

Sect. 15. Is repealed by Act No. 3, s. 1. and re-enacted by the same Act, s. 10, with amendments; but no provision is made for remuneration of the labour of apprentices in cases of urgent necessity.

Sect. 18. The unfairness of this mode of valuation is noticed in remarks upon 1st Jamaica Act, ss. 9, 13; and no provision is made for the cases mentioned in Jamaica Act No. 2, ss. 3, 4, and notes thereon.

Sect. 23. The repugnancy of this clause to the Imperial Act is noticed in remarks upon third Jamaica Act, s. 2.

Sects. 24, 25. Section 24 has been repealed by Act No. 3, s. 1, and other provisions substituted by the same Act, s. 5; but provision yet remains to be made for the reunion of families improperly separated, or suffering loss by removal.

Sect. 27. Repealed by Act No. 3, s. 1, and re-enacted with amendments by s. 8, 9 of the same Act. No single justice should have power to defeat the intentions of the Imperial Act, and the specific provisions of the Colonial Acts, by substitutions in such cases. The substitution of "extra time," not "ground," for "provisions" seems to be unwarranted by the Imperial Act. Where changed by the governor, a schedule of the substituted provisions should be published; plantation stores should in all cases be subjected to periodical inspection; and when allowances are reduced in times of scarcity, compensation should be made to the apprentice. The inadequacy of the penalty on employers for default in supplying provisions may be analogically inferred from a comparison of this clause with the Jamaica Slave Act, ss. 12, 13.

Sect. 28. It appears repugnant to the Imperial Act to allot provision-ground to an orphan or illegitimate child incapable of cultivating it, or at any rate by such means to shift the responsibility of supporting a child from the master to a third person. The inadequacy of the penalty inflicted on employers neglecting to supply provision-grounds, or time for cultivating them, may be analogically inferred from a comparison of this clause with the Jamaica Slave Act, sect. 13.

A special justice ought not to have the power of licensing an alteration in the mode of maintaining an apprentice during any current year without his consent, or on some manifest necessity. Where provision-grounds are to be allotted, due notice should be given to the apprentice as well as to the special justice, and seed and instruments of labour, when necessary, should be supplied by the master; the locality of provision-grounds once allotted should not be changed without license; further compensation, where reasonable, beyond the appraised value of crops, should be made to an apprentice dispossessed by legal process; a clause similar to 1st Jamaica Act, s. 47, to prevent the allowance of too many cultivation days in succession, and a penalty in addition to damages on default or refusal, as in 1st Jamaica Act, s. 49, seem necessary.

Sect. 30. The right hereby given to employers, to destroy the stray cattle and other stock of apprentices, is repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act. Apprentices in these cases, should be placed on the same footing with free persons, except as regards summary process for damages committed on the cultivated portions of the estate, which process ought to be allowed likewise against employers and their agents trespassing on the provision-grounds of the apprentice. The wording of the clause appears to assume the employer's right of prohibiting apprentices altogether from possessing live stock.

Sect. 31. If the master be permitted in any case to substitute "other fit and sufficient clothing," the authority of a special justice ought at least to specify the clothing to be substituted; and every such substitution should be entered by him in his journal.

Sect. 32. The substitution of "extra time" for clothing does not seem warranted by the Imperial Act.

Sect. 33. Amended by Act No. 2, s. 5, and by Act No. 3, s. 4; but the right of attending on religious worship on any day during the apprentice's own time, ought to be secured to him, subject only to cases of urgent necessity.

Sect. 34. The word "other" before the word "person," in line 6, should be omitted, in order that medical assistance may be administered to all persons "when necessary." Medical officers, having duties to perform of the greatest importance to the welfare of the apprentices, ought to be specially licensed by the governor for that purpose, and to return a periodical journal to the special justice; and no hospital rules should be valid until sanctioned by the governor.

Sect. 36. A habitation by "day" as well as by "night" ought to be provided, and it should be the periodical duty of the special justice to inspect such habitations.

Sect. 38. The design of the Imperial Act, in respect to the apprenticeship of children, is noticed in remarks upon 1st Jamaica Act, s. 18. The provisos making the misconduct of a child presumptive evidence of its destitution, and compelling all such apprentices to become prædial labourers, are repugnant to the spirit and letter of the Imperial Act, s. 13.

Sect. 41. Sittings of the justices ought to be open to the public. On summary convictions this is allowed in England, and it cannot be less necessary in the colonies.

Sect. 42. No other duties should hinder the special justice from periodically visiting the estates. Constant liability to supervision tends to the discharge of reciprocal duties; and it affords the best practical protection against petty abuses of authority on the part of employers and estate constables, more especially against arbitrary detention and unjust imprisonment; offences likely to be committed with impunity during the prolonged absence of the justice.

Sects. 50, 51. For observations on the power to dismiss frivolous charges, vide Comments on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 40.

Sect. 52. "Vexatious and malicious charges" should be applied to such only as are unproved, and without reasonable ground of suspicion. The power hereby given of inflicting unlimited extra labour is repugnant to the Imperial Act.

Sect. 55. To compel an apprentice-complainant to pay the employer for the absence of an apprentice required as a witness under this Act, amounts in any case to a hindrance of justice; but it is especially objectionable where the employer himself happens to be the accused party.

Sect. 57. The rules so substituted should be immediately transmitted, and, if possible, a suspending clause should be added.

Sect. 58. Appropriation of penal labour to the benefit of the master is reprobated in remarks on 1st Jamaica Act, ss. 22, 26. The severity of this clause, connected with that which follows, will appear from the fact, that for a second absence from labour of only a single hour, an apprentice may be deprived of his own time for a longer period than is allowed him by his master for procuring his own subsistence during two whole years; and this in addition to the hardships of imprisonment and penal labour during confinement.

Sect. 59. Compensation to employers for the imprisonment of their apprentices removes the best check on the vindictive feelings of employers: no parallel exists between these cases and those in which the apprenticeship has been voluntarily contracted.

Sects. 60, 63. These clauses exceed in severity the corresponding clause of 1st Jamaica Act, ss. 22, 26.

Sect. 64. Compensation to the master for absent time should be made at the earliest possible period.

Sect. 65. The power hereby given of inflicting unlimited extra labour is repugnant to the Imperial Act.

Sect. 66. This clause is repugnant to the Imperial Act, in extending to the property of any other person than the employer, and in authorizing the infliction of unlimited extra labour. In other respects its penalties are unwarrantably severe (vide preceding clause 58), especially when taken in the aggregate and inflicted for injuries, and malicious or merely negligent exposure to injury of property of small value, which would be sufficiently punished, even in cases of actual injury, by payment of damages or costs. The protection hereby extended to the live stock of the employer is in singular contrast with s. 30.

Sect. 67. The punishments inflicted on the majority of the offences herein enumerated are wholly disproportionate; several of the offences, unless committed under peculiar circumstances, can scarcely be considered proper subjects for penal legislation. The punishment for a mere assault, without a blow, is very severe; it ought at least to be open to the legal defences ordinarily available.

Sect. 68. The power of "commuting other punishments for extra labour in the service of the master" is repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act: this clause is open to the strongest objections urged against that injurious practice.

Sect. 69. A day of penal labour should be of the same legal length with that of ordinary labour.

Sect. 70. In the last line of the proviso the important word "all," used in the Imperial Act, s. 17, is omitted.

Sect. 71. So strict a tenancy at will seems incompatible with the domestic comfort of the apprentice, and tends to discourage the proper cultivation of provision-grounds.

Sect. 72. The power of inflicting unlimited extra labour is repugnant to the Imperial Act.

Sect. 74. Persons so employed ought not to be worked in chains, nor driven with the whip.

Sect. 75. The power of substituting unlimited punishment at the treadmill for any of the punishments imposed by this Act is repugnant to the Imperial Act. Whether the flogging of females in such places is tolerated here as in Jamaica, deserves further inquiry. Vide, on this subject, Parliamentary Papers, Part II., p. 91.

Sect. 76. The slightness of the penalty on force or fraud practised by employers in respect to the time of apprentices, contrasts singularly with the enormous punishment of an apprentice in respect to the time of his employer, vide s. 58.

Sects. 79. 85. Contracts for task-work or extra labour ought in all cases to be previously reduced to writing, and to obtain the written sanction of the special justice; or otherwise the clause inflicting penalties, as in the case of ordinary labour, ought not to come into operation. The power of enforcing proportional wages in cases of part-performance of labour should be added, and a power of inflicting penalties on the master for withholding wages seems a necessary counterpoise to the power of inflicting punishment on apprentices for misconduct. Section 83, under colour of giving to the apprentice the English labourer's right of proving on oath the wages due to him, really enables the defendant by an oath to shut out the apprentice's own evidence, and thus in many cases to defeat his claim altogether. In cases of injury to the apprentice, punished by forfeiture to his benefit, equally with the case of wages withheld, the uncontradicted evidence of the apprentice should be deemed sufficient.

Sects. 86, 87. The penalty hereby imposed on injuries inflicted by the employer is extremely inadequate (vide opinion of the governor, Parliamentary Papers, Part II., p. 60); and for the generally defective character of these clauses, vide remarks on 1st Jamaica Act, s. 49, and Jamaica Slave Code, ss. 31. 33.

Sect. 88. The power hereby given to a court of competent jurisdiction in case of cruelty, ought to be extended to a special justice, or at least to a session of two special justices.

Sect. 89. A verbal notice of an intention to complain is all that can be requisite, and even this might lead to an obstruction of justice.

Sects. 90, 91. An interval of three months ought to be allowed for complaints, and in case of any unavoidable delay, an additional period of one fortnight after its cessation.

Sect. 92. Some ambiguity appears to exist in this clause, but it may be presumed to contain no limitation of the right to proceed in the superior courts of law.

Sect. 93. The power of the ordinary justice should be limited to the absence of a special justice, as in 1st Jamaica Act, s. 32.

Sect. 95. Amended by Act No. 3, s. 11; but the special justice should possess, in the first instance, the power of granting the pass; and vide, on this subject, the Trinidad Order in Council, c. 7, s. 4.

Sects. 96, 97. The power of dislodging whole communities should be entrusted to the governor alone. Clause 97 should not be retrospective, and it ought to take effect only after due notice to such communities, and refusal on their part to disperse.

Sect. 101. No evidence of guilty knowledge in the cases of "harbouring or concealing" is required: for the oppressive character of this whole enactment, vide the Governor's despatch, Parliamentary Papers, Part II., p. 60; and for its effect on married persons and near relations, vide remarks on a similar clause, Jamaica Act No. 2, s. 20.

Sect. 104. Amended by Act No. 3, s. 13. But the amended clause is still open to objection in subjecting merely civil injuries to a special criminal jurisdiction, and it is repugnant to the Imperial Act in authorizing unlimited extra labour.

Sect. 105. The unconstitutional character of a similar enactment respecting fire-arms is noticed in remarks on Jamaica Act No. 1, ss. 33. 35.

Sect. 112. Amended by Act No. 2, s. 7, and likewise by Act No. 3, s. 7. The duty of the constable should be to convey the offender forthwith before a special justice, except under circumstances which would furnish a sufficient cause of delay in case of the arrest of free persons; husbands, wives, children and near relations visiting each other on other plantations, ought not to be deemed "loiterers." Trespassers under this Act should be convicted before special justices only; who should have the power, for reasonable causes, of wholly remitting the fine. A strong objection to making estate constables the mere official agents of the employers has been already taken in remarks on Jamaica Act, No. 1, s. 39.

Appendix (D.) The words of the Imperial Abolition Act, s. 13, are "for the education and religious instruction" &c.; the wording of the Colonial Act appears to exclude "civil" instruction.

BRITISH GUIANA.

AN ORDINANCE for the Classification and Registration of Slaves hereafter to become and be Apprenticed Labourers:—8th February 1834. BRITISH GUIANA.

It may be remarked that ss. 6. 9, must be considered as having relation only to conflicting claims of compensation, and that the right of the negro to establish his claims to freedom exists during the whole period of his apprenticeship.

AN ORDINANCE for the Government and Regulation of Apprenticed Labourers:—8th March 1834.

This ordinance was allowed by Order in Council of the 5th June 1834, subject to certain amendments which are printed in the Parliamentary Papers, Part II., p. 142.

Cap. 1, sect. 13. Rules and Regulations of police settlements, forming an important part of the new system, and materially affecting the security and welfare of apprentices, ought to be "immediately" transmitted to the Home Government for approbation.

Cap. 2, sect. 4. Vide remarks on 1st Jamaica Act, ss. 53, 54, 55, and Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 42, as to the necessity of general and frequent visits to estates.

Sect. 7. A similar oath to that prescribed for the chairman, ought to be sent with the duplicate of each special justice.

Sect. 8. For the limitation of power to dismiss complaints, vide remarks on Draft General Order, chap. 2, and Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 40.

Sect. 15. The power of inflicting unlimited extra labour as a punishment for frivolous, not unproved, complaints is repugnant to the Imperial Act; and would of itself explain much of the apparent content of this colony.

Sect. 22. Rules of judicial procedure ought to be transmitted at the earliest possible period, for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of the Home Government.

Cap. 3, sect. 1: Rule 3d. The power of making frequent changes in the mode of providing maintenance is oppressive.

Rule 6th. The governor's power of substituting provisions should be limited to cases of necessity.

Rule 8th. The power to substitute provisions should at least be confined to the governor as aforesaid.

Rule 9th. The plantation stores should be periodically inspected by the special justices.

Rule 10th. The minimum quantity of provision-ground ought to be stated.

Rule 11th. Seed and utensils ought to be furnished when necessary.

Sect. 2. The maintenance of the apprentices appears to be very inadequately secured by the penalties of this clause.

Sect. 3. The power of substituting other clothing, hereby given to the district sessions, seems objectionable.

Sect. 6. The propriety of making medical attendants responsible to the governor is noticed in remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 34. Medical attendance ought to be provided for all apprentices as well in less serious and chronic, as in acute and dangerous diseases; whenever in short a special magistrate shall think it necessary.

Sect. 7. All hospital regulations, forming an important part of the discipline of apprentices, ought to be first sanctioned by the governor.

Cap. 4, sect. 1. Hours of prædial labour should be fixed between sunrise and sunset. It appears, from a proclamation of the governor, dated 5th August 1834, that the seven-and-a-half hours per day system is established in this colony, and that pregnant women, children and aged persons are entitled to the same mitigation of labour as before the abolition of slavery.—Vide Royal Gazette, 8th August 1835.

Sect. 7. The power of inflicting unlimited extra labour is repugnant to the Imperial Act.

Sect. 8. Besides the severity of this clause, its extension to the property of other persons than the employer is repugnant to the Imperial Act; and in respect to aggregate punishment, it is open to the objections made to 1st Jamaica Act, s. 30, and to the Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 66.

Sect. 9. This clause seems repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 20, as it enables the justice to inflict extra labour after the expiration of the apprenticeship, in other cases than the only one therein allowed, namely, for wilful absence.

Sect. 12. This clause is open to several of the objections made to the Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 67. The convicted persons should at least have been "found abroad" in a state of "drunkenness," or the offence should have been committed in the master's time.

Sect. 14. The appropriation of penal labour to the benefit of the master has been the subject of frequent animadversion, but it appears in this clause to be systematically recommended.

Sect. 15. This power in the hands of a single justice tends to defeat the principal purpose of a special magistracy.—Vide remarks on 1st Jamaica Act, s. 49.

Cap. 5, sect. 1. Compensation should be made to the apprentices for over-time in cases of negligence or mistake. To prevent disputes about time, and petty encroachments upon it, a clock might be so placed on every estate as to be distinctly visible or audible to all the apprentices. A time-piece at least should be kept, and be accessible at all reasonable times; and such machines should be subject to be regulated by the special justices, and all falsifications of time visited with a heavy penalty.

Sect. 3 to 12. As to the securities requisite in cases of contract for task-work and extra labour, vide remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, ss. 79, 85.

Sects. 13, 14. The power which should be given to special justices, in cases of cruelty, is noticed in remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, ss. 87, 88; and vide on this subject, Jam. Slave Code, ss. 30, 31, 33.

Cap. 6, sect. 1. This clause gives to every negro constable (consequently to every planter and overseer), a power which ought to be exercised only by a special justice of the peace.

Sects. 5, 6. The objectionable character of these enactments is noticed in remarks on 2d Jamaica Act, ss. 18, 19.

Sect. 8. On the subject of the apprenticeship of children, vide remarks on 1st Jamaica Act, s. 18.

Sects. 9, 10. At least a period ought to have been fixed beyond which the possession could not be thus summarily disturbed; such clauses, in fact, appear chiefly calculated to perpetuate the servile condition of the negroes.

Cap. 7, sects. 4, 7. The choice of a special justice for this purpose ought to be given to the apprentice; his own free consent should be obtained to the price of manumission, and his right of appeal be independent of the will of the special justice.

Sect. 8. Fraud or gross injustice, satisfactorily proved, ought to entitle the apprentice to a new valuation at any period within the original term of apprenticeship.

Sects. 9, 10. These clauses contain direct infringements of the rights of manumission, and are plainly repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 8.

Sect. 11. This clause appears to admit of unnecessary delay in completing the manumission of the apprentice.

Cap. 8. Some provision should be made for the reunion of families improperly separated, and for the compensation of losses sustained by removal.

Cap. 9. The intentions of the Imperial Act on this subject are noticed in remarks on 1st Jamaica Act, s. 18.

Cap. 10. It is only the right and interest of the employers in the services of apprentices which can be transferred under the Imperial Act, s. 10, which right and interest is expressly limited by s. 9, in the case of attached prædials, to their services on the estate where they had been usually employed previously to the 1st August 1834, or on some other estate in the same colony, belonging to the persons entitled to their services. It is plain, therefore, that no employer can hire out such apprentices to labour on any other estate than his own. If the law, however, had been less explicit in this particular, the unfavourable operation of hiring out such apprentices on the price of free labour, on compulsory manumission, and on the comfort of the negroes themselves, would have furnished sufficient reasons for disallowing it.

Cap. 11. The recital of the Imperial Act, s. 22, is incorrect; the words are "certain," "services," "offices," "franchises," and not "any," such, &c.

Cap. 12, sect. 3. Contains an unnecessary aggravation of punishment: a day's "hard labour," as a penalty, ought not to be prolonged beyond the period of an ordinary day's labour, nor performed between sunset and sunrise: the object of this enactment appears to be, to enable masters to procure labour at periods not otherwise allowed.

By a general circular despatch from Lord Glenelg, dated the 15th June 1835, special commissions of the peace were directed to be withdrawn from persons interested in apprentice property throughout the colonies.

Such commissions were accordingly withdrawn in this colony, by a proclamation of the governor, dated the 8th August 1835.

No new police or vagrant laws appear to have been passed in the colony.

Adequate provision was declared by an Order in Council, of the 5th June 1834, to have been made in this colony.

MAURITIUS.

AN ORDER of the King in Council for giving effect in the Colony of the Mauritius to the Statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 73, for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Dominions, 17th September 1834.

MAURITIUS.

VARIOUS ordinances appear to have been passed in this colony for the purpose of giving effect to the Imperial Act, and an Order in Council of the 3d August 1835, declares that adequate and satisfactory provision has been made.

The present Order in Council, nevertheless, seems open to most of the objections taken to the Draft General Order in Council, many of which apply with peculiar force (it may be feared) to this unsettled colony.

Cap. 1. Vide as to rules and regulations of police establishments, remarks on British Guiana Ordinance, c. 1, s. 13.

Cap. 2. As to the special justices' power of dismissing complaints, ss. 8, 16, and of inflicting unlimited punishment on "frivolous or vexatious" complaints, s. 17, vide remarks on Draft General Order, c. 2.

Rules, suspending or altering the judicial procedure of the justices, as prescribed by Order in Council, ought to be immediately transmitted for the approbation of the Home Government. The delegation of the general power of supervision to special justices, who, however impartial as magistrates, cannot be so considered as reporters of their own conduct, seems calculated to remove an essential check against abuse.

Cap. 3. The provisions under this head were quite inadequate to the protection of the rights of an immense number of Africans, well known to have been illegally imported into the colony. It appears from Lord Glenelg's despatch of the 5th August 1835, Parliamentary Papers, Part II., page 214, that the case of a considerable proportion of these slaves has been already satisfactorily provided for; but the provisions of that despatch cannot be carried into efficient operation as it regards other negroes, whose names, appearing in some of the registers, have nevertheless not been "duly registered according to the laws in force in the Mauritius." Justice requires, on behalf of these individuals, the establishment of an impartial tribunal, the appointment of a disinterested public prosecutor, the furnishing of facilities for procuring evidence, and the adoption of equitable rules of presumption. It cannot be admitted, in the meantime, that past decisions are "final and conclusive" (ss. 9 and 12) of the rights of apprentices, or of anything beyond the conflicting claims of planters to compensation.

Cap. 4. The power to substitute clothing and furniture, vide s. 14, for the articles already prescribed, should be vested in the governor alone, and exercised only in cases of necessity. For the importance of the duties of medical attendants, vide s. 17; and the propriety of making them responsible to the governor, vide remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 34.

Cap. 5.

Cap. 5. The penalties under this head, extending in some instances to the unwarrantable infliction of unlimited extra labour, appear generally to be too severe to be entrusted to the discretion of a single special justice. The effect of aggregate punishments for comparatively venial offences has been noticed in remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 66. The power given in s. 16 to the justices (and even to a single justice) to refer offences cognizable only under this Act to a superior court, seems not only dangerous, but repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 19, which in such cases preserves the old, but gives no new jurisdiction.

Cap. 6. As to the securities requisite in cases of contract for "task-work" and extra labour, vide remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, ss. 79, 85. As to cases of cruelty, s. 14, vide remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, ss. 87, 88.

Cap. 7. The objectionable character of ss. 5, 6, 7, 9 (although qualified by s. 8), has been noticed in remarks on 2d Jamaica Act, ss. 18, 19.

Cap. 8. On the subject of manumission by appraisement, vide remarks on 1st Jamaica Act, ss. 9, 13, and British Guiana Act, c. 7, ss. 4, 7, 8, 11.

Capita 9, 10, 11, 12 need no particular comment.

ORDINANCE for Declarations and other Acts to be made before the Civil Authorities in the case of Apprentices:—Dated 26th January 1835.

Articles.

Art. 4. The obstacles to matrimony created by this clause are repugnant alike to the spirit and the letter of the Imperial Abolition Act, which in matters unconnected with apprenticeship service, confers absolute freedom upon the negro. The imperfect character of the marriage laws in the British colonies will form the subject of a distinct analysis.

Art. 1. Requires apprentices to be registered in the district.

2, 3. Require the birth of children of apprentices, and deaths of apprentices, to be declared in writing by the master, within one month, under a penalty not exceeding 5 l. nor less than 1 l., and directs that these declarations be forwarded monthly to the special justice of the district.

4. Requires marriages between apprentices to be publicly celebrated by the civil officer at the domicile of one of the parties, with no other previous formality than the written consent of the master or mistress of both apprentices; or on their refusal, without just cause (admitted to be such by the special justice), with the authority of the special justice, to be mentioned in the marriage certificate, and annexed to the register.

When apprentices belong to different sections, the refusal of the special justice of either section shall prevent the marriage.

ORDINANCE for amending the Laws relative to Runaway Slaves:—Dated 26th July 1835.

The preamble recites that the laws relative to runaway slaves should be made applicable to apprentices.

Art. 1. For the arbitrary character of this enactment, and its inconsistency, both with the Imperial Abolition Act and the Draft Circular Order in Council, vide notes on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 27.

Art. 1. Enacts that a pass, on going beyond the estate, must be signed by the master or agent, and that it must mention the name of the apprentice, the district or section, the article carried, the place of destination, the period of leaving, the duration of leave, and be moreover subject to any other formalities which the special justice, with the sanction of the governor, may impose.

Art. 2. Enacts that persons holding apprentices shall, within three days, report their absence, under a penalty of 1 l. and costs of capture and expenses.

Art. 3. Enacts that apprentices, with such a pass, are not to be arrested unless the person arresting has reason to believe the pass is forged; and in this case he must forthwith conduct the apprentice to his master, or to the special justice, under a penalty not exceeding 1 l. sterling, or imprisonment not exceeding one month, and with double punishment for a second offence.

Art. 4. For plundering an apprentice captured inflicts a fine not exceeding 10 l. sterling, without prejudice to any indemnity that may be due.

Art. 5. Enacts that an apprentice taken without a pass shall be immediately conducted before the nearest justice, under penalty of loss of benefit of capture and 1 l. sterling for every day of detention; and if there be sufficient grounds for deeming such apprentices deserters, vagabonds or runaways, they shall be sent, with the least delay, to the special justice of the district, to be dealt with accordingly.

Art. 7.

Art. 7.

Notes and References.

Art. 7. It would be difficult to say what limits this clause was intended to assign.

Art. 9. Retains the chasseurs de police.

Art. 10. Leaves their discipline to be settled by the chief commissioner of police, with the sanction of the governor.

Art. 13. Authorizes the chiefs of detachments to exercise the powers of brigadiers of police, in dispersing idle and disorderly meetings, especially on Sundays, for gambling or other irregularities.

Art. 20. Authorizes any person receiving information of runaways on his property, to go in pursuit of them.

Art. 21. Fixes the fee for capture at 10 s. for an absentee of 30 days, and at 1 l. if absent longer.

Art. 22. For the oppressive character of this clause, especially as connected with Art. 7, vide remarks on the Jamaica Act in Aid of the Gaol Act.

Articles.

Art. 7. Enacts that no other measures of violence shall be resorted to in the apprehension of runaway apprentices than those allowed by law in the arrest of felons.

Art. 22. Authorizes any person to arrest a runaway, and awards him a moiety of the fee.

ORDINANCE respecting Misdemeanors committed by Apprentices :—Passed 12th October 1835.

Ordains that breaches of police laws and regulations committed by slave apprentices are to be heard and determined before the special justices of the section where the offender resides, subject to one or more of the punishments in the Order in Council of 17th December 1834, and the local ordinances of 21st of March last.

A reasonable fine may likewise be inflicted; and the concealment of Maroon apprentices is deemed an infraction of police law.

ORDINANCE for modifying certain Dispositions of the existing Criminal Laws, and adding new Dispositions thereto :—Dated 9th March 1835.

The preamble recites, among other things, the necessity of mitigating the excessive severity of the penal code of the 7th August 1793; of giving greater latitude to the judges in the application of punishment; of modifying some other dispositions of the criminal code, and of amending their insufficiency in matters of great import to public order, especially in what concerns vagrants and vagabonds.

Art. 3. The invidious distinction hereby created between apprentices and other offenders is repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act. It seems to admit even of the flogging of female apprentices, when other females could not be subjected to the same punishment.

Art. 3. Enacts, that if the offence therein mentioned be committed by a slave apprentice, flogging may be ordered conjointly with one of the other punishments.

Art. 5. Declares vagrancy to be a misdemeanor.

Art. 6, 7. The arbitrary character of these vagrant clauses will be seen on reference to the remarks on the disallowed Jamaica Vagrant Act, already printed, and to the British Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83. The object of such enactments is distinctly stated in the Resumé of the Labour Ordinances.

Art. 6. Defines vagrants or vagabonds to be those who are without any fixed residence, or who have not the means of subsistence and habitually carry on neither trade nor profession.

Art. 7. Enacts that vagrants or vagabonds shall be imprisoned, for any time not exceeding six months; and at the expiration of their imprisonment shall be placed at the disposal of the governor, to be employed in the public works until they can satisfactorily prove that they have procured employment or the means of subsistence.

Articles 94 and 210 of the Code d'Instruction Criminelle are modified and made applicable to slave apprentices.

ORDINANCE for the purpose of regulating the Internal Order and Discipline of Prisons :—
Dated 24th February 1835.

The preamble recites, that the present state of society requires the introduction of fresh regulations on this subject.

Art. 7. Enacts that a prison committee shall be composed of seven persons to be appointed by the governor; but without prejudice to the "Code d'Instruction Criminelle," requiring the inspection and superintendence of prisons.

Art. 8. The committee is to inspect twice a year; the report is to be published in the official gazette, and forwarded to the governor.

Art. 20. Fixes working allowance at  $1\frac{1}{2}$  lb. of bread or rice, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. salt; non-working allowance at  $1\frac{1}{2}$  lb. of bread or rice, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz. salt.

The committee may augment, add to, or substitute other articles.

The rules and regulations of this ordinance appear in the main to be excellent; but the constant inspection of the special justices seems highly desirable, if not essential to the prevention of abuses.

ANTIGUA.

ANTIGUA.

THIS colony having resolved to dispense with the apprenticeship system, passed an Act for that purpose on the 4th June 1834, which they accompanied with a "Police Act," a "Wages Act," and an Act for regulating "Contracts;" the last of these was disallowed by a despatch of the 28th February 1835, remarkable for the comprehensive soundness of its principles.

No. 1.—AN ACT for relieving the Slave Population from the Obligations imposed upon them by the recent Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, intituled, "An Act for the Abolition of Slavery throughout the British Colonies," &c. :—Passed 4th June 1834; confirmed and allowed by Order in Council of the 10th June 1835.

The nature of this Act is explained by its title. The vagueness of its provisions for the future maintenance of the aged and infirm, is the only feature in it that requires comment.

Sect. 2. Confers parochial relief on the enfranchised negroes "on the same footing" as any of His Majesty's other subjects in the colony. It appears from Abolition Paper (Part II. continued, p. 15), that this relief is founded on no "legal right," but is entirely of a benevolent and compassionate character.

Sect. 4. Obliges owners to provide for such negroes as, through disease or mental or bodily infirmity, are incapable of earning their own subsistence, with such maintenance and allowances as they would have been entitled to as slaves, until due and adequate provision be made, either by parochial relief or by some other benevolent and effectual plan, but no longer, under a penalty of 5*l.* for every offence, to be paid, as appears from sect. 6, into the public treasury; and in case of doubt respecting such disease or infirmity, any two of the nearest justices, taking the opinion of a medical man, shall decide peremptorily and conclusively upon it.

Admitting the general mischief of a parochial system, calculated to lessen prudence and forethought on the part of the poor, it is plain that the claims of the diseased victims of slavery, a very numerous class in the colonies, as likewise the claims of aged and infirm negroes recently enfranchised, form an excepted case; yet for the claims of such persons no adequate tribunal, nor any certain or suitable maintenance has been provided, unless the decision of interested magistrates and the allowances of slaves, made contingent on the introduction of some voluntary scheme, and to be enforced at the worst by a trifling penalty of 5*l.* per annum, which goes into the public treasury, can be so considered.

No. 2.—AN ACT for establishing a new System of Police, and for increasing the Power of the Magistracy of this Island in the Appointment of Rural Constables, and for providing and regulating a House of Correction:—Passed 31st July 1834.

This Act being passed for two years only, will soon expire; but as it will probably be re-enacted, and though nominally including all classes, it particularly affects the enfranchised negroes, it comes within the scope of this analysis, and is open to the remarks already made on corresponding enactments in the Jamaica and Barbadoes Police and Vagrant Acts.

The several enactments up to section 13 need no particular observation.

Sect. 13. The remarks already made on the Jamaica Vagrant Act, s. 2, as to "night walkers," and idle and disorderly persons, apply here.

Sect. 14 gives a discretion to police officers, in deciding upon offences, which may be much abused. "Unsuitable" conduct in the street, and playing with bat and ball, are respectively subjected to a penalty of 5*l.*, and on default of immediate payment, to imprisonment in the common gaol for 21 days.

Sect. 15 authorizes the unnecessary destruction of a description of animals commonly belonging to the negro population.

Sect. 23 authorizes the demand of a deposit, which may operate as a denial of justice to the class in the greatest need of protection.

Sect. 26 to 30. These clauses give an unconstitutional influence to owners of estates over the administration as well as the officers of justice; and not only expose it to natural suspicion, but actually endanger its proper exercise.

Sect. 33. Prison discipline, the subject of this clause, forms too important a part of municipal government to be left to the uncontrolled discretion of local magistrates. Vide Preliminary Remarks on Jamaica House of Correction Act.

Adequate provision was declared to have been made in this colony by an Order in Council of the 31st July 1835.

No. 7.
Analysis of Colonial Acts.

MONTserrat.

No. 1.—AN ACT for the Abolition of Slavery in this Island :—Passed 30th July 1834.

No. 2.—AN ACT to repeal the Proviso contained in the 4th Clause of (the above Act) :—
Passed 28th May 1835 ; allowed 3d February 1836.

The first of these Acts being merely an imperfect transcript of the first 22 sections of the Imperial Act, was of course deemed an insufficient compliance with its provisions. The second Act repeals an objectionable proviso in the first Act. But the first Act, s. 9, still contains an important repugnancy to the Imperial Act, in giving the power of removal to one justice instead of two, as required by the Imperial Act, and this repugnancy is re-enacted in a subsequent Act.

No. 3.—AN ACT for the Classification of Apprenticed Labourers :—Passed 13th October 1834 ; allowed 3d February 1836.

The imperfection of the machinery of this Act in respect of notice to apprentices, and facilities of appeal, has been already adverted to in the Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 11, s. 10.

No. 4.—AN ACT for giving to the Special Magistrates Jurisdiction over Apprenticed Labourers, and directing their Mode of Proceeding in the exercise of such Jurisdiction :—
Passed 13th October 1834 ; allowed 3d February 1836.

By this Act the special justices are required to hold a session at home once a week, and to visit estates employing 10 apprentices once a month or oftener. The importance of frequent periodical visits upon estates has been already noticed in comments upon the Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 42 ; and the punishment of frivolous as contradistinguished from unproved complaints, which punishment in this Act is unlimited, has been already objected to in comments upon the Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 40.

No. 6.—AN ACT for the protection and maintenance of Apprenticed Labourers in this Island, and for insuring the punctual discharge by such Apprenticed Labourers of the Services due by them to their Employers, and generally for regulating the Conduct and for the punishment of any Offences committed by such Apprenticed Labourers :—Passed 14th August 1834 ; allowed 3d February 1836.

Sect. 1. As to compulsory manumission, makes no provision for the case of an apprentice who, during his employer's absence, is under no immediate direction or control. Vide on this subject, remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 2, ss. 3, 4.

Sect. 2. Is repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 9, in requiring only the consent of one or more special justices to the removal of an apprentice.

Sect. 4. Is open to the objection already taken to the Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1. s. 16, that it limits the maintenance of the apprentice to the provisions of a single Act, viz. a general Act for the Leeward Caribbee Islands, passed 20th April 1798. This Act is moreover in itself objectionable, in giving to the employers the power to distribute the provisions required by law for any certain number of apprentices, in whatever proportions they may think fit among that number, and likewise in authorizing the diminution of one-fifth of this allowance during crop time.

The remainder of this Act from section 7, is scarcely more than a transcript of the Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, from section 22 to the end. The comments already made upon the various clauses of the Jamaica Act may be applied, therefore, to the corresponding clauses of the present Act. It should be remarked, that a clerical omission of the word "not," in s. 30 of this Act, with respect to the allowance of time for the cultivation of provision-grounds, renders it much more objectionable than the corresponding clause of the Jamaica Act. Several additional clauses have provided for a few of the omissions of the first Jamaica Act ; but the omissions and defects of that Act, which were remedied or supplied by the second Jamaica Act, ss. 5, 6. 10. 26 and 27, still remain wholly unprovided for in this colony.

A comparison of many of the provisions of the Leeward Islands Act with the corresponding provisions of the Montserrat Abolition Act, will discover various points of inferiority in the latter, as it regards the protection and security of the negroes.

Adequate provision was declared, by an Order in Council of the 3d February 1836, to have been made in this colony.

ST. CHRISTOPHER.

No. 1.—AN ACT for the Abolition of Slavery in this Island, and for the Establishment of a System of Apprenticeship for a limited Time in lieu thereof :—Passed 18th July 1834. ST. CHRISTOPHER.

Needs no comment.

No. 2.—AN ACT for prescribing the Powers and Duties of Special Magistrates :—Passed 18th July 1834.

Sect. 3. Apprentices requiring certificates, with a view to ulterior proceedings, ought to be exempted from fees.

Sect. 7. The privileges and protections accorded to ordinary magistrates of the island are not known : they ought to be at least equal to those enjoyed in Great Britain, and vide Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 2, ss. 11. 13.

Sects. 8. 15, 16. As to dismissal and punishment of frivolous complaints, vide remarks on Draft General Order, c. 2, and Jam. Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 40.

No. 7.
Analysis of
Colonial Acts.
ST. CHRISTOPHER.

No. 3.—AN ACT to divide Apprenticed Labourers into several Classes :—Passed 18th July 1834.

The imperfection of this machinery, as it respects notices to the apprentice and right of appeal, is alluded to in Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 10.

No. 4.—AN ACT to provide for Apprenticed Labourers during the Term of their Apprenticeship :—Passed 18th July 1834.

The purposes of this Act are to be effected by the adoption of various clauses of the General Act for the Leeward Caribbee Islands, vide Montserrat Abolition Act, No. 6, s. 4, and remarks thereupon. But the employer, with the sanction of the special justice (which ought to be in writing), may make any bargain with the apprentice for a commutation of this allowance.

The authority given by sections 3 and 4 to medical practitioners, makes the remarks in the Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 34, peculiarly applicable here. The application, by s. 5, of the penalties on the non-fulfilment of these duties by the master, leaves the injured apprentice without summary redress under this or any subsequent Act of the colony; and the power of appeal to the next superior court of criminal jurisdiction (the quarter sessions, it may be presumed) is not only repugnant to the Imperial Act, but renders the provision for summary punishment absolutely nugatory.

No. 5.—AN ACT for prescribing the Duties and regulating the Conduct of Apprenticed Labourers within this Island :—Passed 18th July 1834.

Sects. 1, 2, 3. No provision is made by these clauses for preventing the abuse of consecutive labour, and works of necessity are not defined. The accustomed labour should be enforced only so far as it corresponds with the spirit of the Imperial Abolition Act. And the rules authorized by section 3 should be qualified in the same manner.

Sect. 8, and remaining clauses of this Act, exhibit the same improper classification of offences as in other Colonial Acts, and are open to the same general charge of imperfect classification, undue severity, the unlimited infliction of extra labour, and the appropriation of penal labour beyond the purpose of compensation. Among other objectionable clauses not adverted to in the Government despatch, s. 14 demands attention not only on account of its repugnancy to the Imperial Act, with reference to the property of "other persons" than the employers (vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 30), but on account of the extreme severity of its aggregate punishments.

For the most venial offence therein mentioned the aggregate punishment (composed of any two or more of the punishments mentioned in the clause) may amount to the loss of more than the entire period allowed by masters to their apprentices for procuring their subsistence, during one whole year, in addition to the hardships of imprisonment, flogging, to the extent of 30 lashes, and an unlimited amount of extra labour for the benefit of the master; all of which may be inflicted at the discretion of a single magistrate. Drunkenness, in like manner, s. 18 (not necessarily abroad nor in the master's time), and insolent language (towards "any person whatsoever") may be punished with a week's imprisonment, with hard labour, or with flogging, to the extent of 15 lashes. The latter section is directly repugnant to the Imperial Act.

Sect. 21, including mere attempts or persuasion to neglect duty, carries penal legislation to a fearful extent; and vide, on the subject of sheltering absconded apprentices, the remarks already made on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 2, s. 20.

Sect. 22. As to offensive weapons.—Vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, ss. 33, 34, 35.

Sect. 24. This clause not being limited to original remedies before the supreme courts allowed by the Imperial Act, s. 19, is repugnant to that section, and to the general spirit of that Act.

Sect. 25. Cases of "urgent necessity," involving such heavy punishment, should be strictly defined.

No. 6.—AN ACT to prescribe the Duties to be performed by Employers towards their Apprenticed Labourers, and to enforce the Performance of the same :—Passed 18th July 1834.

Sect. 4 to 9, and s. 10, as to the securities requisite in the cases of voluntary contracts. Vide remarks on the Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, ss. 79 to 85.

Sect. 9. As to the apprenticeship of children, vide remarks on the Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, ss. 18 and 32.

Sect. 11, 12. The defective character of similar provisions has been already alluded to in remarks on the Barbadoes Abolition Act, No. 1, ss. 86, 87, and more particularly on the Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 49.

A comparison of the provisions of this and the preceding Acts with those of the general Leeward Islands' Slave Act above referred to, will show the inferiority of the former in regard to the maintenance and protection of the negroes.

No. 7.—AN ACT to regulate the Removal of Prædial Labourers from one Plantation to another, to establish certain Rules to govern the Sale of the Services of all classes of Apprenticed Labourers, and the disposition thereof by Will, as well as to regulate the Descent of the same in cases of Intestacy :—Passed 18th July 1834.

Sects. 2 and 3 are repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 9, not only in fettering the privileges of of reputed relationship among apprentices, in reference to removals, with various unnecessary conditions, but in permitting one special justice, instead of two, to authorize such removals; and s. 3 uses the word "lawful" instead of "reputed," in direct violation of the Imperial Act, s. 10.

Colonial Acts.

ST. CHRISTOPHER.

No. 8.—AN ACT for dividing this Island into Districts, and for establishing a sufficient Police within the same:—Passed 31st July 1834; expired 31st July 1835.

Sects. 7 to 10. The power of the master to nominate any apprentices as special constables. The obligation of the apprentices in such capacity to obey his orders at all times, at a salary likewise very disproportionate to the discharge of perpetual duties, and greatly inferior to that of the ordinary police, but subject, nevertheless, for official misconduct, to the same penalties as for the neglect of apprenticeship duties, make these enactments repugnant to justice and to the spirit and intention of the Imperial Act. The remarks already made on Jamaica Abolition Act, s. 39, apply strongly to these clauses.

Sect. 13. As to prison discipline.—Vide preliminary remarks on Jamaica House of Correction Act.

This Act expired on 31st July 1835, and does not appear to have been yet revived. It is understood, however, to be still practically in force in the colony.

No. 9.—AN ACT to punish Apprenticed Labourers for Offences against the Public Welfare:—Passed 18th July 1834.

Sect. 1. As to tumultuous assemblies. Vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 32.

Sect. 4. As to residence and rights of locomotion. Vide provision in Trinidad Order in Council, c. 7, s. 4, and remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 27. The power to convict given by this clause to "any" justice of the peace, is plainly repugnant to the 18th section of the Imperial Act. The special magistrates thereby become merely the registrars of the decision of the ordinary justice. The apprentice appears to be liable to punishment under the provisions of the Vagrant Act of the 29th October 1834.

Sects. 6, 7, 8. As to distinct communities. Vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 2, s. 18, 19.

Sects. 9 to 13. The maintenance of negro children by their parents properly belongs to a system of general law, and any exclusive enactments in this case appear to be invidious and unnecessary.

No. 10.—AN ACT to regulate the Dissolution of Apprenticeship by the voluntary act of the Employer, and to compel such Dissolution in cases where the Labourer is able and willing to purchase his or her Discharge from Apprenticeship:—Passed 18th July 1834.

The remarks already made on valuation in Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 9 to 13, appear to apply to this Act.

Sect. 4. The apprentice should have the appointment of his own nominee.

Sects. 5, 6. The limitations on the right of manumission contained in these clauses are repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 8.

Sect. 9. The rule for payment of expenses is obviously defective and inapplicable to the case most likely to occur, namely, that of a price being fixed between the sums respectively demanded and offered: the rule should have been confined to a certain proportion over or under the sums respectively proposed by the parties.

No. 11.—AN ACT to extend to the Island of Anguilla the several Acts passed by the Legislative Council of the Island of St. Christopher, &c.:—Passed 18th July 1834.

Needs no comment.

Adequate provision was declared, by an Order in Council of the 31st of July 1835, to have been made in this colony.

No. 2.—AN ACT to alter and amend an Act entitled (as above):—Passed 16th October 1835.

Various objectionable enactments in the first of these Acts were disallowed by the Home Government, and have since been repealed by the amending Act; but many others appear to have escaped observation, which, together with several clauses in the amending Act, now remain to be briefly noticed.

Act No. 1, sect. 6, is repealed by Act No. 2; and the provision clauses in the General Leeward Islands' Act, already referred to, are substituted for the defects of this Act. Vide comments on the Montserrat Abolition Act, No. 6, s. 4.

Sects. 7, 9. The allowance of provision-grounds and of clothing, only the materials of which are to be furnished, appears to be insufficient, and no provision whatever seems to be made for lodging.

Sect. 15. This clause is repealed by the amending Act, and the consent of two justices to removal is now made necessary; but the conditions set forth in the Imperial Act are not enacted; and no express provision is made for the redress of injuries sustained by improper removal.

Sect. 16 to 18. As to appraisement; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 9 to 13, and No. 2, ss. 3, 4, 7.

Sect. 20. The compendious character of this penal clause allows of unnecessary severity in the application of punishments, and is open, moreover, to the charge of appropriating penal labour to the benefit of the master beyond the purpose of compensation.

Sect. 21. Vide remarks as to the injurious tendency of exclusive legislation for the maintenance of negro children in the St. Christopher's Act, No. 7, s. 9 to 13.

The abuses of a constabulary force, so constituted, have been fully noticed in remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, ss. 39, 53, 54, 55, and in the St. Christopher's Act, No. 6, ss. 7, 10.

Adequate provision was declared to have been made in this colony, by an Order in Council of the 16th February 1836.

VIRGIN ISLANDS :

TORTOLA.

VIRGIN ISLANDS :
TORTOLA.

No. 1.—AN ACT for regulating the Division of Apprenticed Labourers into their respective Classes, and for providing for the Dissolution of the Apprenticeship Contract, or otherwise;—Passed 19th July 1834.

This Act, with the three following, have already undergone the revision of the Colonial Secretary, and their allowance was suspended on the adoption of certain amendments specified in the despatch; many other objections, however, appear to have been overlooked, which will now form the subject of the following comments:

Sect. 2. As to classification, gives neither notice nor appeal to the apprentices. Vide remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 10.

Sect. 5 to 14. As to compulsory manumission; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 9 to 13; and Barbadoes Abolition Act, ss. 18, 23. Sects. 7 and 10, limiting the right of manumission, is repugnant to the Imperial Act. Sect. 8 should give to the apprentice a right to insist on an appraisement, and to appoint his own nominee; and sect. 13 furnishes the same defective rule for expenses as in St. Christopher's Act, No. 10, s. 9.

No. 2.—AN ACT prescribing the Duties of Apprenticed Labourers and Employers respectively, and imposing Penalties on the Non-performance thereof, and providing other Regulations for the Maintenance of good Order:—Passed 19th July 1834.

The peculiarly defective character of this Act called for severe revision; many of its objectionable enactments, unobserved in the Government despatch, will now require a more specific notice. It may be observed, in the meantime, that the Act, generally, is equally open with the other Colonial Acts to the charges of repugnancy, undue severity, misappropriation of penal labour, and the unlimited power of inflicting extra labour.

Sect. 6. Not adverted to in the Government despatch, extends to other property than that of the employer, and is open to the remarks made in Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 30: this clause, however, goes much further; for, permitting such property to be injured by another, or even neglecting to report such injury if committed (perhaps no offence at all, and certainly not one of those contemplated by the Abolition Act), may be punished under this clause (as connected with s. 22 of the Act No. 3, allowing compensation to the master for time spent in prison) by a loss to the apprentice of 50 days of his own time, or more than a whole year's allowance of time for cultivating his provision-ground, in addition to the hardship of imprisonment, and to either an unlimited amount of extra labour at the end of the imprisonment, or the infliction of 30 lashes, at the option of the convicting magistrate.

Sect. 7 inflicts the same punishment for neglecting or exposing to injury any property of any other person than the employer, if entrusted to the apprentice's care by the employer.

Sect. 14. As to riot; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 32. The firing of a musket by night cannot of itself be a sufficient notice to disperse.

Sect. 15. As to residence and locomotion; vide provision in Trinidad Order, c. 7, ss. 1, 4; and Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 29.

Sect. 17. As to distinct communities; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 2, ss. 18, 19.

Sect. 19. This clause appears to amount to a total prohibition to keep such live stock as therein mentioned, without the written permission of the employer.

Sects. 23

Sects. 23 and 24. The distinction here taken between apprentices and freemen is repugnant to the general spirit of the Imperial Act; and the cognizance given to the ordinary courts over matters incident to the apprenticeship condition, is repugnant to the 19th section of that Act.

Sect. 26.—“Working in irons” seems objectionable, and scarcely necessary in a small island; and in section 27 the expression “any other punishment” is vague and unlimited.

Sect. 29 to 31. As to medical attendance; vide remarks on Barbadoes Abolition Act, ss. 34, 35.

Sect. 32 to 37. The provision made by these clauses for the maintenance and clothing of apprentices appears inadequate; s. 33 fetters the imperfect provision so made with conditions repugnant to the Imperial Act; s. 34 adds provision-grounds, which are nevertheless inadequate; s. 35 makes it optional with the employer to allow any time for their cultivation, and enables him to withdraw both allowance and time, on payment of 1 s. 8 d. per week; s. 36 enables him to withdraw both on giving an equivalent; s. 37 provides only the materials of clothing, which may be withheld on payment of a penalty of 2*l.* currency; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 49, and the Jamaica Slave Code, ss. 12, 13.

Sect. 39. Authorizes the extension of the hours of labour in certain cases beyond the maximum time allowed by the Imperial Act.

Sect. 42 to 49. As to contracts; vide Barbadoes Abolition Act, p. 79 to 85. Compelling specific work or task-work, even during crop, s. 43, is repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 16.

Sect. 50. The power hereby given to a single justice to refer offences to the grand sessions, is not only dangerous in its tendency, but repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 19, and the same remarks apply to the power of appeal in clause 51.

Sect. 52. The unqualified authority as evidence given to estate books by this clause, is contrary to the principles of evidence, and repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act.

Sect. 53. As to the ex officio right and duty of special justices to visit estates, vide Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 42.

Sect. 54. The vaguely comprehensive character of this clause is unworthy of penal legislation; if rigorously enforced, it must lead to great abuse.

Sect. 55. The provisions of this clause are indefinite and unsatisfactory, and the penalty is inadequate.

Sect. 58. The vagueness of this clause renders it liable to great abuse.

No. 3.—AN ACT for prescribing the Powers and Duties of Special Justices, and for defining the Jurisdiction of the same:—Passed 19th July 1834.

Sect. 1. As to estate constables and imprisonment on estates; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, pp. 39, 53, 54, and Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 112.

Sect. 3. As to necessity of visiting estates; vide Barbadoes Abolition Act, s. 42.

Sect. 5. The right to insist on proceeding should be inserted into all the colonial Acts.

Sect. 6. As to offensive weapons; vide remarks on Jamaica Act, No. 1, ss. 33, &c.

Sect. 8. As to the power of reference hereby given to the special justice; vide s. 50 of preceding Act.

Sect. 13. An injurious distinction is hereby created between apprentices and other persons.

Sect. 15. To permit the accused party to expurgate himself, or even to be examined on oath, is contrary to British law; and the exclusion of the apprentice in most cases from the benefit of this innovation indicates the animus of the whole clause.

Sect. 22. This clause is not only objectionable for the reasons assigned in the Government despatch, but is repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 16, which applies only to wilful absence.

Sect. 24. This clause is repugnant, not only for the reasons assigned in the despatch, but as creating an invidious distinction between apprentices and other persons.

Sects. 25, 26. On the subject of the protection due to special justices; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 2, ss. 11, 13.

No. 4.—AN ACT to regulate the removal of Prædial Apprenticed Labourers from one Plantation to another; the Alienation by Sale, Inheritance or Will of the Services of Apprenticed Labourers; the Apprenticeship of Children, &c. &c.:—Passed 19th July 1834.

Sects. 6, 7. As to apprenticeship of children and their indentures; vide remarks on Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, s. 18.

The amendments proposed by the Home Government not having been yet complied with, no adequate provision has been declared in this colony.

No. 3.—AN ACT to give Effect to the 59th Clause of an Act passed the 19th day of May last, &c., and to form efficient Police Establishments, &c. &c.

The Abolition Act was allowed by an Order in Council of the 20th February 1835; but subject, it may be presumed, to the amendments required by Lord Aberdeen in a despatch of the 10th January 1835. This Act corresponds so closely with the Jamaica Abolition Act, No. 1, that a particular repetition of its repugnancies and defects appears to be unnecessary here; they will be found in the comments upon that Act already analysed. It may be remarked, however, of the Act of Dominica, that s. 18, purporting to carry into effect the Imperial Act, s. 11, which enjoins for the apprentices such maintenance and allowances as by any law of the colony they were then entitled to, specifies an Act passed in the year 1826, which is less liberal in several of its provisions than an Act passed on the 28th June 1831, intitled, "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Slaves," to the full benefit of which latter Act the apprentices seem now to have an undoubted right.

It may likewise be added, that ss. 53 and 54 of the Abolition Act of Dominica, providing for the maintenance of negro children, are open to the objections already urged against corresponding clauses in the St. Kitt's Act, No. 9, ss. 9—13.

Adequate provision was declared to have been made in this colony, by an Order in Council of the 31st July 1835; but no notice appears to have been taken by the Colonial Legislature of the amendments suggested by Lord Aberdeen, and the repugnancies and defects of the Act No. 2 remain therefore unaltered.

ST. VINCENT.

No. 1.—AN ACT for the Abolition of Slavery in the Island of St. Vincent and its Dependencies, in consideration of Compensation, and for promoting the Industry and good Conduct of the manumitted Slaves :—Passed 2d April 1834.

No. 2.—AN ACT to repeal certain Clauses, and to alter and amend, &c. &c. :—Passed 9th September 1835; allowed 20th November 1835.

The defects and repugnancies of the first of these Acts were largely, but still imperfectly, noticed in the despatch printed in the Parliamentary Papers, Part II., p. 161.

The second Act adopts the greater part, but not all the recommendations of this despatch. The two Acts, when taken together, correspond so closely in most respects with the Jamaica Acts, that a particular repetition of the objections urged against those Acts seems needless. They may be applied respectively to the clauses on compulsory manumission, s. 8 to 10; provision-grounds, and time, or other provision in lieu thereof, s. 15 to 18; apprenticeship of children, s. 25; duties of special justices and estate constables, s. 28 to 31; imprisonment on estates, s. 32; summary trials, absence, vagrancy, harbouring deserters, s. 34 to 40; injuries to property of any other person than the employer, and drunkenness, s. 42 to 45; inferior misdemeanors, and unlimited punishment, s. 46; contracts, s. 48 to 50; apprentice-complaints, s. 51; riots, s. 52; offensive weapons, ss. 53, 55; distinct communities, s. 53. The whole of these clauses are open to the general charge of imperfect classification, repugnant powers, undue severity, and misappropriation of penal labour. A few brief remarks upon several unnoticed clauses may be added to these general objections, and to the voluminous comments of the Colonial Secretary.

Sect. 14. If intended to extend the labour of watchmen and other servants beyond the period of 45 hours per week, is repugnant to the Imperial Act, s. 5.

Sect. 19. The substitution of clothes, of merely equivalent value, without the consent of the apprentice, or the written sanction of a special justice, is objectionable. The amending Act makes no provision, in compliance with the Government despatch, for children between the ages of five and twelve.

Sect. 20. The attendance of a medical practitioner, in cases of necessity, should be made imperative.

Sect. 26. As to maintenance of negro children; vide remarks in St. Christopher's Act, No. 7, ss. 9, 13.

Sect. 39, as to wandering beyond the limits of the plantation, was disapproved by the Government despatch, but remains unaltered by the amending Act; and it may be here remarked, that the 14th section of the amending Act puts an unjust restraint upon the liberty of the apprentice.

Sect. 42, for ill using or exposing property of other persons than the employer, and for contumaciously disobeying the employer, inflicts a like enormous punishment, as in the corresponding cases in the St. Kitt's Act, No. 5, s. 14. The objection with regard to the property of "other persons" was taken by the Government despatch; the amending Act, however, makes no alteration, except to give the justice the option to transfer such offences to the grand sessions of the peace, which would be still more repugnant to the spirit of the Imperial Act.

Sect. 45. This clause is modified by the amending Act, s. 10, into an enactment, that no employer shall inflict corporal punishment on any male apprenticed labourer. If the ambiguity of this language did not seem to tolerate the whipping of females, it would at least appear to sanction the employer in the punishment of males by any other means than those expressly prohibited.

Sect. 46. This clause, as modified by the amending Act, s. 11, is still repugnant to the Imperial
